found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commandement. In the meane time Alexander the ſon of Polyperchon came with an army, pretending to aide them of the citie againſt Nicanor, where indeed he meant (if he could) to get the reſt of the citie into his hands, then eſpecially, when they were in greateſt broile one againſt another; & the rather, becauſe the baniſhed men entred hand ouer head with him, and diuers ſtrangers alſo, & other defamed men: ſo that there was a confuſed councell & aſſembly of Omnigatherum kept within the citie, without any order; in the which Phocion was depriued of his office of Generall, and others were alſo choſen Captaines in his place. And had they not ſeene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the wals of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS afraid and miſtruſtfull, they had neuer ſaued it from taking. At that time Phocion was preſently accuſed of treaſon by the Oratour Agnonides: the which Callimedon and Pericles fearing, got them out of the citie betimes. And Phocion alſo with his friends that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: with whom alſo Solon PLATÆIAN and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN went for companie, who thought to haue found friendſhip and familiaritie with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling ſick by the way in the city of ELATIA, they ſtayed there many daies, hoping of his recouery. But in the meane time, the people at the perſwaſion of the Orator Agnonides, & at the requeſt of Archeſtratus, ſtabliſhed a decree, to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuſe Phocion: inſomuch as both parties met at one ſelfe time, and found him in the field with the king about a village of the country of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGES, ſtanding at the foote of the mountaine Acrorion, which they ſirname alſo Galaten. There Polyperchon commanded a cloth of gold to be ſet vp, and cauſed the king to be ſet vnder the ſame, and all his chiefeſt friends about him. But to begin withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commanded them to put him to death after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to ſay. Then they began to quarrell, and to be loud one with another, accuſing one another in the preſence of the king and his councell, vntill Agnonides at length ſtepped foorth, and ſaid: My Lords of MACEDON, put vs all in priſon, and then ſend vs bound hands and feete to ATHENS, to giue account of our doings. The king laughed to heare him ſay ſo. But the Noblemen of MACEDON that were preſent then, and diuers ſtrangers beſides to heare their complaints, made ſigne to the Ambaſſadours to vtter their accuſations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did ſtill cut off his tale as he thought to purge himſelf; inſomuch as in anger he beate his ſtaffe he had in his hand againſt the ground, and commanded him at length to hold his peace, and to get him thence. And when Hegemon alſo told Polyperchon, that he himſelfe could beſt witneſſe, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully ſerued and loued the people, he angrily anſwered him: Come not hither to lie falſly vpon me in the preſence of the king. Therewith the king roſe out of his ſeate, and took a ſpeare in his hand, thinking to haue killed Hegemon had not Polyperchon ſodainly embraced him behind, and ſtaid him. So the councell roſe, & brake vp, but preſently Phocion was apprehended, and they that ſtood by him. Certaine of his friends ſeeing that, which ſtood further off, muffled their faces, and ſtraight conueyed themſelues away. The reſt were ſent priſoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not ſo much to haue their cauſes heard there, as to haue them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carrying of them to ATHENS was ſhamefull. For they were caried vpon carts through the great ſtreete Ceramicum vnto the Theater, where Clitus kept them vntill the Senate had aſſembled the people, excepting no bondman, no ſtranger, nor defamed perſon out of this aſſembly, but left the Theater wide open to all commers in whatſoeuer they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euery man that would ſpeake againſt him. So firſt of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aduertiſe the people, that he had found theſe offenders conuicted of treaſon: notwithſtanding, that he referred the ſentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were freemen. Then Clitus brought his priſoners before the people, where the noblemen when they ſaw Phocion, were aſhamed, and hiding their faces, wept to ſee him. Howbeit, there was one that roſe vp, and ſaid: My Lords, ſith the king referreth the iudgement of ſo great perſons vnto the people, it were great reaſon all the bondmen and ſtrangers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, ſhould be taken out of this aſſembly. The people would not agree to it, but cried out, that ſuch traitors ſhould be ſtoned to death that fauour the authoritie of a few, and are enemies of the people: whereupon ſilence was made, and no man durſt ſpeake any more for Phocion. Neuertheleſſe when Phocion with much ado had obtained audience, he asked them: My Lords, will ye iuſtly or wrongfully put vs to death? Some anſwered him, iuſtly. How then can you do it, quoth he, that will not heare our iuſtification? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming nearer, ſaid vnto them: For my ſelfe, my Lords, I confeſſe I haue done you wrong, and haue in gouernment committed faults deſeruing death; but for theſe priſoners with me, what haue they done why you ſhould put them to death? The common people anſwered him, Becauſe they are thy friends. With this anſwer Phocion departed, and ſpake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in his hand ready written, read it openly to the people, declaring how they ſhould be iudged by voices, whether the offendors had deſerued death or not: and if it were found they had, then that they ſhould all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was read, cried out, that they ſhould adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion ſhould be put to death, they ſhould firſt torment him: and therewithall commandement was giuen that the wheele ſhould be ſet vp to breake his ioynts vpon it, and alſo that the hangman ſhould be ſent for. But then Agnonides perceiuing that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking beſides it were too beaſtly & barbarous a part to vſe him in that ſort, he ſaid openly: My Lords, when you ſhall haue ſuch a varlet in your hands as CALLIMEDON, then you may caſt him on the wheele; but againſt Phocion, I would not wiſh ſuch crueltie. Then roſe vp a Nobleman among them, and added to his words: Thou haſt reaſon to ſay ſo, Agnonides, for if Phocion ſhould be laid on the wheele, what ſhould we then do with thee? The decree being confirmed according to the contents thereof, iudgement was giuen by voyces of the people, no man ſitting, but all ſtanding vp, and moſt of them with garlands on their heads, for the ioy they had to condemne theſe priſoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned Nicocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pithocles: but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedon and Charicles were alſo in their abſence condemned to die. Now when the aſſembly was broken vp, and that the perſons condemned were caried backe to priſon, from thence to be conueyed to execution: others embracing their friends, and taking their laſt leaue of them as they went, wept, & lamented their curſed fortune. But Phocion looking as chearfully of it as he was wont to do being Generall, when they honourably waited on him to his houſe from the aſſembly, he made many of them pity him in their hearts to conſider his conſtancie and noble courage. On the other ſide alſo, there were many of his enemies that came as neare vnto him as they could, to reuile him, amongſt whom there was one that ſtepped before him, & did ſpit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magiſtrates, ſaid: Will ye not cauſe this impudent fellow to leaue his railing? When they were in priſon, Thudippus ſeeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a mortar to giue them drinke, he began deſperatly to curſe and ban, ſaying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, ſaid Phocion againe, and doeſt thou not rather reioyce to die with me? When one that ſtood by, asked Phocion if he would any thing to his ſon Phocus: Yes, quoth he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the ATHENIANS do me. Then Nicocles one of Phocions deareſt friends, prayed him to let him drinke the poyſon before him. Phocion anſwered him, Thy requeſt is grieuous to me, Nicocles: but becauſe I neuer denied thee any thing in my life, I will alſo grant thee this at my death. When all the reſt had drunke, there was no more poiſon left, and the hangman ſaid he would make no more, vnleſſe they gaue him twelue Drachmaes, for ſo much the pound did coſt him: Phocion perceiuing then that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends vnto him, and prayed him to giue the hangman that litle money he demanded, ſith a man cannot die at ATHENS for nothing, without coſt. It was the nineteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, (to wit, March) on which day the knights were wont to make a ſolemne proceſſion in the honour of Iupiter: howbeit ſome of them left off the garlands of flowers which they ſhould haue worne on their heads, and others alſo looking towards the priſon doore as they went by, burſt out a weeping. For they whoſe hearts were not altogether hardened with crueltie, and whoſe iudgements were not wholly ſuppreſſed with enuie, thought it a grieuous ſacrilege againſt the gods, that they did not let that day paſſe, but that they did defile ſo ſolemne a feaſt with the violent death of a man. His enemies notwithſtanding, continuing ſtill their anger againſt him, made the people paſſe a decree, that his bodie ſhould be baniſhed, and caried out of the bounds of the country of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire ſhould be made for the ſolemnizing of his funerals. For this reſpect no friend of his did once touch his bodie. Howbeit a poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his liuing

that way, being hired for money to burne mens bodies, he tooke his corſe, and caried it beyond the city of ELEVSIN; and getting fire out of a womans houſe of MEGARA, he ſolemnized his funerals. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of MEGARA, who coming by chance that way, with her gentlewoman, where his body was but newly burnt, ſhe cauſed the earth to be caſt vp a litle where the body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe; whereupon ſhe did vſe ſuch ſprinklings and effuſions, as are commonly done at the funerals of the dead: and then taking vp his bones in her lappe in the night, ſhe brought them home, and buried them in her harth, ſaying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring him one day to the graue of his anceſtors, when the ATHENIANS ſhall come to confeſſe the fault and wrong they haue done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardneſſe of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained iuſtice and honeſty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his image to be ſet vp in braſſe, and gaue honourable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accuſers, they condemned Agnonides of treaſon, and put him to death themſelues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwards met with by his ſonne Phocus, who was reuenged of them. This Phocus, as men report, was otherwiſe no great good man, who fancying a yong maide, which a bawd kept, comming by chance one day into the ſchoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheiſt (to wit, that beleeued not there were any gods) make this argument: If it be no ſhame, ſaid he, to deliuer a mans friend from bondage, no more ſhame is it to redeeme his lemman which he loueth: euen ſo it is all one to redeeme a mans lemman, as his friend. This yong man taking this argument to ſerue his turne, beleeuing that he might lawfully do it, got the young maid he loued from the bawd. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did alſo reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the GRECIANS: for men thought that was a like hainous offence, and calamity vnto the citie of ATHENS.

The end of Phocions life.

THE LIFE OF Cato Vtican.

The parentage of Cato

THe family and houſe of Cato tooke his firſt glorie and name of his great grandfather, Cato the Cenſor: who for his vertue (as we haue declared in his life) was one of the famouſeſt and worthieſt men of Rome in his time. This Cato whom we now write of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Capio, and Porcia his ſiſter. Seruilia was alſo Catoes halfe ſiſter by his mothers ſide. All theſe were brought vp with their Vncle Liuius Druſus, at that time the greateſt man of the citie: for he was paſſing eloquent, and very honeſt, and of as great a courage beſides, as any other Romaine. Men report, that Cato from his childhood ſhewed himſelfe both in word and countenance, and alſo in all his paſtimes and recreations, very conſtant and ſtable. For he would go through with that he tooke vpon him to do, and would force himſelfe aboue his ſtrength: and as he could not away with flatterers, ſo was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh; and yet had euer a pleaſant countenance. He was not cholericke, nor eaſie to be angered; but when the bloud was vp he was hardly pacified. When he was firſt put to ſchoole, he was very dull of vnderſtanding and ſlow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men elſe cõmonly do. For ſuch as are quicke of conceipt, haue commonly the worſt memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, do keep that better which they haue learned. For euery kind of learning is a motion and quickening of the mind. He ſeemed beſides not to be light of credit, & that may be ſome cauſe of his ſlowneſſe in conceipt. For truly he ſuffereth ſomewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth that they that haue leaſt reaſon to reſiſt, are thoſe which do giue lighteſt credit. For yong men are eaſilier perſwaded then old men, and the ſicke then the whole. And where a man hath leaſt reaſon for his doubts, there he is ſooneſt brought to beleeue any thing. This notwithſtanding, it is reported, that Cato was obedient vnto his ſchoolemaſter, and would do what he commanded him: howbeit he would aske him ſtill the cauſe and reaſon of euery thing. Indeed his ſchoolemaſter was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to ſtrike him with his fiſt. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of Italy which were confederates of the Romaines, ſued to be made free citizens of Rome. At that time it chanced one Pompedius Silo, a valiant ſouldier, and of great eſtimation among the confederates of the Romaines, and a great friend beſides of Druſus, to be lodged many dayes at his houſe. He in this time falling acquainted with theſe yong boyes, ſaid one day vnto thẽ: Good boyes, intreat your vncle to ſpeake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of Rome.

ROME. Capio ſmiling nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no anſwer, looked very wiſely vpon the ſtrangers that lay in the houſe. Then Pompedius taking him aſide, asked him: And thou, my pretie boy, what ſayeſt thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle as well as thy brother, to be good to his gueſts? Cato ſtill held his peace and anſwered nothing, but ſhewed by his ſilence and looke, that he would not heare their requeſt. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would haue let him haue gone and ſpeaking more ſharply to him then he did before, he caſt him many times out of his armes without the window, and ſaid, Promiſe vs then, or elſe I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer quinched for it, nor ſhewed countenance of feare. Thereupon Pompedius ſetting him downe again, told his friends that ſtood by him: O what good hap doth this child promiſe one day vnto ITALY, if he liue? Sure if he were a man, I beleeue we ſhould not haue one voice of all the people on our ſide. Another time there were ſome of Catoes neare kinſmen, that keeping ỹ feaſt day of his birth, had many yong boyes to ſupper, and amongſt others this Cato. The boyes to occupie themſelues till ſupper was readie, gathered themſelues together great & ſmal, into ſome priuate place of the houſe. Their play was counterfeiting pleadings before the Iudges, accuſing one another, & carying them that were condemned to priſon. Amongſt them a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bound and a condemned perſon. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cried out vnto Cato: who miſtruſting what it was, went ſtraight to the chamber dore, & putting them by by force that withſtood him to come vnto it, he took out the yong boy, and caried him very angerly with him to his own houſe, and all the other yong boies followed him alſo. So Cato had ſuch name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of yong boyes running on horſebacke, which the ROMAINES call Troia; to appoint them before that they might be readie at the day of the ſhew, he hauing gotten all the yong boyes of noble houſes together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, becauſe of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephew to Pompey the Great, neither would they be exerciſed vnder him, nor follow him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cried then, Cato, and Sextus himſelf did willingly giue him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers friend, and therefore did ſend for them many times to come vnto him, & he would talke with them: the which kindneſſe he ſhewed to few men, for the maieſty and great authority he had. Sarpedo alſo (Catoes ſchoolemaſter) thinking it a great preferment & ſafety for his ſcholers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes houſe, to wait vpon him: the which was rather like vnto a iayle or priſon, for the great number of priſoners which were daily brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but fourteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heads brought which were ſaid to be of great men, and that euery body ſighed & mourned to ſee thē, he asked his ſchoolemaſter, how it was poſſible the tyrant ſcaped, that ſome one or other killed him not? Becauſe, quoth Sarpedo, that all men feare him more then they hate him. Why then, replied Cato againe, didſt thou not giue me a ſword that I might kill him, to deliuer my countrey of this ſlauiſh bondage? Sarpedo hearing the boy ſay ſo, and ſeeing his countenance and eyes on fire with choler he maruelled much at it, and afterwards had a verie good eye vnto him, leſt raſhly he ſhould attempt ſomething againſt Sylla. When he was but a little boy, ſome asked him whom he loued beſt? My brother, ſaid he. Then the other continuing ſtill to aske him and who next? he anſwered likewiſe his brother. Then the third time againe, likewiſe his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was wearie with asking him ſo oft. Yea and when he was come of age alſo, he then confirmed the loue he bare to his brother in his deeds. For twenty yeares together he neuer ſupped without his brother Capio, neither went he euer out of his houſe into ỹ market place, nor into the fields without him: but when his brother did annoint himſelf with ſweet oiles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things elſe, he led a ſtreight and hard life. So that his brother Capio being commended of euery man for his temperance, honeſtie, and ſober life, he granted indeed that in reſpect of others, he led a ſober and temperate like: but when I do (ſaid he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinks then there is no difference betwixt me and Scippius. This Scippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once choſen Apolloes Prieſt, he went from his brother, and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred and twentie talents. Then he liued more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintance with Antipater TYRIAN, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gaue himselfe chiefly vnto the study of morall and ciuill Philosophie, embracing all exercise of vertue with such an earnest desire, that it seemed he was pluckt forward by some god: but aboue all other vertues, he loued the seuerity of iustice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauour. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, because he would there should be certaine warlike forces entertained in ciuill Philosophy, as also in a great citie. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any bodie, neither would he euer haue any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so litle in company: It skilleth no matter, quoth he, so they cannot reproue my life, for I will begin to speake, when I can say something worthy to be spoken. Hard by ŷ market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the citie, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Censorship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience, and because there was a pillar that troubled their seats, they would either haue taken it away, or else haue set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his wil to go into the market place, and to get vp into the pulpit for Orations, to speak against them, where hauing giuen this first proofe of his eloquence and noble mind, he was maruellously esteemed of. For his Oration was not like a yong man, counterfeiting fineness of speech and affectation, but stout, and full of wit and vehemency: and yet in his shortnesse of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he maruellously delighted the hearers: & furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine grauity besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and audible voyce that might be hard of a maruellous number of people, and such a strong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speech: for many times he would speake a whole day together, and was neuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, he returned againe to keepe his former great silence, and to harden his body with painefull exercises, as to abide heate, frost and snow bare headed, and alwaies to go on foot in the field, where his friends that did accompany him rode on horsebacke; and sometime he would come and talke with one, sometime with another, as he went on foot by them. He had a wonderfull patience also in his sickness: for when he had any ague, he would be alone all day long, and suffer no man to come to see him, vntill he perceiued his fit was off him, and that he found he was better. When he supped with his friends and familiars, they drew lots who should chuse their parts. If he chanced not to chuse, his friends notwithstanding gaue him the preferment to chuse: but he refused it, saying, it was no reason, sith the goddesse Venus was against him. At the first he did not vse to sit lõg at ŷ table, but after he had drunk one draught only he wold straight rise. But when he came to be elder, he sate long at the table: so that oftentimes he would sit it out all night with his friends, till the next morning. But they seeking to excuse it, said, that his great businesse and affaires in the commonwealth was the cause of it: for following that all the day long, hauing no leisure nor time to study, when night came he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers at the boord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, said, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night; Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, answered him: Thou doest not adde this vnto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dice. To be short, Cato thinking that the manners and fashions of mens liues in his time were so corrupt, and required such great change and alteration, that to go vprightly, he was to take a contrary course in all things: therefore when he saw that purple, red, and the lightest colours were best esteemed of, he in contrary maner desired to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner he would go abroad bare footed without shoes, and without any gowne: not because he would be wondered at for any such strangeness, but to acquaint himselfe to be ashamed only of shamelesse and dishonest things, and to despise those which were not reproued, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, land being left him to the value of an hundred talents by the death of a cousin of his that likewise was called Cato, he put it into ready money, to lend to his friends that lacked; and without vsurie. And there were some of his friends also that would morgage his land, or his slaues, to the chamber of the citie, for their owne priuate businesse: the which he himselfe would either giue them to morgage, or els afterwards confirme the morgage of them. Furthermore when he was come of age to marie, hauing neuer knowne woman before, he was made sure to Lepida. This Lepida had bene precontracted vnto Metellus Scipio: but afterwards the precontract being broken, he forsook her, so that she was free, when Cato was contracted to her.

Notwithſtanding, before Cato maried her, Scipio repenting him that he had refuſed her, made all the meanes he could to haue her againe: and ſo he had. Cato tooke it ſo grieuouſly, that he thought to go to law for her, but his friēds diſſwaded him frō it. Then ſeeing no other remedy, to ſatisfie his angry mind, he wrote verſes againſt Scipio, in the which he reuiled him al he could: vſing the bitter taunts of Archilocus verſes, but not ſuch impudent, lewde, and childiſh reproaches as be there. After that he maried Attilia, Soranus daughter, being the firſt woman he euer knew: yet not the onely woman whom he did know, as is reported of Lælius, Scipioes friend, who therein was counted the happier, becauſe all that long time wherein he liued, he neuer knew other woman but his firſt wife. Furthermore, in the warre of the bondmen (otherwiſe called Spartacus warre) one Gellius was choſen Prætor of the army, vnder whom Cato ſerued of his owne good will, for the loue he bare vnto his brother Cæpio, who in that army had charge of a thouſand footmen. Now Cato could not as he wiſhed, ſhew his valiantneſſe and good ſeruice, becauſe of the inſufficiency of the Prætor that gaue ill direction. This notwithſtanding, in the midſt of all the riot and inſolencie of them in the campe, he ſhewing himſelfe a ſtayed man in all his doings, valiant where need was, and very wiſe alſo, all men eſteemed him to be nothing inferiour vnto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prætor gaue him many honours in token of his valiantneſſe, which are giuen in reward of mens good ſeruice: howbeit Cato refuſed them, and ſaid, that he was nothing worthie of thoſe honors. Theſe things made him to be thought a maruellous ſtrange man. Furthermore, when there was a law made, forbidding all men that ſued for any office in the commonwealth, that they ſhould haue no prompters in any of the aſſemblies, to blow into their eares the names of priuate citizens: he alone making ſuite to be Colonell of a thouſand footmen, was obedient to the law, and committed all the priuate citizens names to memory, to ſpeake vnto euery one of them, and to call them by their names: ſo that he was enuied euen of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deeds praiſeworthy, by ſo much more were they grieued, for that they could not follow them. So Cato being choſen Colonell of a thouſand footemen, he was ſent into MACEDON, vnto Rubrius, Prætor there. Some ſay, that at his departure from thence, his wife lamenting, and weeping to ſee him go, one Munatius a friend of his ſaid vnto her: take no thought Attilia, and leaue weeping, for I promiſe thee I wil keepe thy husband for thee. It is well ſaid, anſwered Cato. Then when they were a daies iourney from ROME, Cato after ſupper ſaid vnto this Munatius: Thou muſt looke well to thy promiſe thou haſt made Attilia, that thou wouldeſt keepe me for her, and therefore forſake me not night nor day. Therupon he cōmanded his men that from thenceforth they ſhould prepare two beds in his chāber, that Munatius alſo might lye there: who was rather pleaſantly himſelf looked vnto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fifteene ſlaues with him, two freemen, and foure of his friends which rode, and he himſelf went on foot: ſometime talking with one, otherwhile with another as he went. When he came to the campe, where there were many legions of the ROMAINES, the Prætor immediatly gaue him charge of one of them: who thinking it ſmall honor to him for himſelfe only to be valiant, ſith he was but one man, he practiſed to make all his ſouldiers vnder him, like vnto himſelfe. The which he did not by feare and terror, but by lenity and gentle perſwaſions, training and inſtructing them in euery point what they ſhould do: adding to his gentle inſtructiō and perſwaſions, reward to thoſe that did well, and puniſhment to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to iudge, whether he had made thē more quiet then warlike, more valiant, then iuſt. So dreadfull they ſhewed themſelues to their enemies, and courteous to their friends: feareful to do euil, & ready to win honor. Whereof followed that which Cato leaſt accounted of, that is, he wan fame and good wil: for his ſouldiers did greatly honour and loue him, becauſe he himſelfe would euer firſt ſet his hand to any thing he commanded them; and becauſe alſo both in his diet, in his apparel, and in any iourney or pains, he was rather like vnto the meaneſt ſoldier, then any of the other captaines. In contrary maner alſo in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he far exceeded al the other Colonels and Captaines, for the true loue of vertue, (to wit, the deſire to follow it) taketh no roote in mens minds, vnleſſe they haue a ſingular loue & reuerence vnto the perſon, whom they deſire to follow. When Cato vnderſtood that Athenodorus ſirnamed Cordylion, a Stoicke Philoſopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the citie of PERGAMVS, being a very old man, and one that ſtifly refuſed the friendſhip of kings, princes, & noble men, deſirous to haue him about them: to write to him, he thought it was loſt labour. the lawes of the Romaines, to follow his owne affaires, he tooke sea, and went into Asia to him, hoping he should not lose his iourney, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of diuers matters together, at length he brought him from his first determination, and caried him to the campe with him; esteeming this victorie more then all the conquests of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most part of all the prouinces and realmes of the East parts of the world. In the meane time, whilest he lay at his charge in the campe, being Colonell of a thousand footmen, his brother preparing to go into Asia, fel sicke in the city of Ænvs, in the country of Thracia. Cato hauing speedy intelligence thereof tooke sea presently, when it was maruellous rough and boisterous, and imbarked in a little crayer of a merchants of Thessaly, with two of his friends, & three bondmen only, & did escape drowning very narrowly: & yet by good fortune arriued safely, a litle after his brother Cæpiones death.

The death of Cæpio, Catoes brother.

He took his death more sorrowfully then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, embracing the dead corps of his brother: but also for the exceeding charge and sumptuous funerals which he bestowed vpon him, in perfumes, sweet sauours, and sumptuous silkes that were burnt with his body: and furthermore, in the stately tombe of Thracian marble which he made for him, and set vp in the market place of the Ænians, that cost eight talents. Some did mislike this vaine charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modesty and temperance he vsed in all things else, not regarding with iudgement his tender loue and affection towards his kinsmen, which was mingled in him with his seueritie, and hardnesse, against all voluptuousnesse, feare, and shameless requests. Diuers cities, Princes and Noblemen sent him many sundrie presents, to honour the funerals of his brother Cæpio: howbeit he tooke no money of all them, sauing only spices, and sweet sauors, and such other ornaments as honoured the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, vnto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the land that fel vnto him, & a litle daughter of his, by the death of his brother, notwithstanding the charge he had bene at in his funerals, he did not reckon it in the partition of the land, betwixt him & his brother Cæpiones daughter. All the which things when they were solemnized, some* write notwithstanding, that he did cleanse the imbers where his brothers body had bene burnt, through a siue or riddle, where through they cleanse corne, and all to get out the gold and siluer that was molten there: but such thinke that their writings should be as farre from controlment as their doings. So when Catoes time of his charge was expired, they did accompany him at his departure, not onely with ordinary praises, vowes and prayers to the gods for his health: but with embracings, teares, & maruellous lamētations of the soldiers, which spred their garments on the ground as he went, and kissing of his hands, which honor the Romaines did but to very few of their Generals. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to Rome to deale in the affaires there, to go and see Asia, partly to be an eye-witnesse of the maners, customs, & power of euery prouince as he went: & partly also to satisfie king Deiotarus request, who hauing bene his fathers friend, had earnestly intreated him to come and see him, he went the iourny, and vsed it in this sort, First, by peepe of day, he sent his baker & cooke before, where he meant to lie that night. They coming soberly into the city or village, inquired if there were none of Catoes friends & acquaintance there, & if they found none, then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man: but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Gouernors of the town, & praied them to help thē to lodging, and did content thēselues with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the townsmen did not beleeue they were Catoes men, & made no account of them, because they tooke all things so quietly, & made no ado with the officers. In so much as Cato sometime came himself, & found nothing ready for him; & when he was come, they made as smal account of him, seeing him set vpon his cariages, and speake neuer a word: for they took him for some meane man, & a timorous person. Notwithstanding, sometime he called them vnto him, and told them: O poore men, learne to be more courteous to receiue trauelling Romains that passe by you, & looke not alwaies to haue Catoes to come vnto you: and therfore see that you vse them with such courtesie and entertainment; that they may bridle the authoritie they haue ouer you: for you shal find many that wil desire no better colour nor occasiō by force to take from you that they would haue: because you vnwillingly also do grant them the things they wold, and need. There is a report of a prety ieast hapned him in Syria. When he came to Antioch, he found a great number of people deuided on either side of the street, standing a row one by another very decently, the yong men by thēselues in faire clokes, boies by thēselues in seemely seemely array,& priests and other officers of the citie also,all in white garments,crowned with garlands.Cato thought straight they had made this solemne processiõ to honor him,and fell out with his men he had sent before,because they did suffer them to make such preparation for his coming.So he made his friends light from their horses,and go on foote to accompany him.But when they came neare to the gate of the city,the master of these ceremonies that had assembled all that cõpany(an old man,hauing a rod in his hand,& a crown on his head)came to Cato without saluting of him, and asked him onely, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius had bene one of Pompeys slaues,and because Pompeys fame was great with all men,his seruant Demetrius also was much honoured and made of aboue his desert,for that he was in great credite with Pompey. Catoes friends hearing what question the old man asked him, burst out a laughing as they went through this procession. Cato being ashamed of it,said no more then,but:O vnfortunate city! Afterwards notwithstãding,when he told it to any body,he wold laugh at it himselfe.But Pompey rebuked them that through ignorance had failed to honour Cato. When Cato came to the citie of EPHESVS,and was coming towards Pompey to salute him,being the elder man,and of greater dignitie and estimation then he,who at that time also was General of a great and puissant army:Pompey seeing him coming towards him a farre off, would not tary till he came to him, sitting in his chaire of estate, but rising vp went to meete him, as one of the greatest & noblest persons of ROME;and taking him by ŷ hand,after he had embraced and welcomed him,he presently fel in praise of his vertue before his face,and afterwards also commended him in his absence,when he was gone from him.Whereupon,euery man after that had him in great veneration for those things which before they despised in him, when they considered better of his noble and courteous mind.For men that saw Pompeys entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reuerenced,& for a kind of duty obserued,more then for any loue he bare him:and they noted further, that he honoured him greatly while he was with him,but yet that he was glad when Cato went frõ him.For he sought to keepe backe all the yong gentlemen of ROME that went to see him,and desired them to remaine with him:but for Cato,he was nothing desirous of his company,for that in his presence he thought he could not command as he would,and therefore was willing to let him go, recõmending his wife and his children to him,ŷ which he neuer did before vnto any other ROMAINE that returned to ROME:howbeit indeed Cato was partly allied vnto him.After that time,all the cities wherby he passed,deuised(in emulation one of the other)which of them should honor him most,and made him great feasts and banquets: in the which he praied his friends to haue an eye to him,lest vnwares he shold proue Curioes words true.For Curio sometime being his friẽd,& a familiar of his, misliking notwithstãding his seuerity,asked Cato if he would go see ASIA,when his charge were expired.Cato answered again,that it was his full determination.O well said,quoth Curio, I hope then thou wilt returne more pleasant and ciuil.And these were Curioes words.Furthermore,Deiotarus king of GALATIA, being a very old man, sent for Cato to come into his countrey, to recommend his sons and house vnto him:who when he arriued there,had great rich presents of all sorts offered him by the king,intreating him all he could to take them.This so much misliked & angred Cato,that he coming thither in the euening,(after he had taried there one whole day only) the next morning he went his way from thence at the third houre.Howbeit he had not gone one dayes iourny,but he found greater gifts that taried him,with Deiotarus letters,at the citie of PESSINVNTA:in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the least if he would refuse them himselfe,that then he would let thẽ be deuided amongst his friends,sith euery way they did deserue it, but specially for his sake, for that his goods also were not so great,as could cõtent all his friends.But Cato wold not suffer thẽ to take any iot of it more then before,although he saw wel enough that there were some of them so tender hearted,that they cõplained of him, for that he would not suffer them to take any of it. For he told them,that otherwise,corruption and bribery could lacke no honest colour to take:and for his friends, they should alwayes haue part with him of that which was his own iustly.So he returned king Deiotarus presents backe again.Now when he was ready to imbarke,to passe ouer the sea again vnto BRVNDVSIVM, some of his friends perswaded him,that it was better to put the ashes of his brother Cepioes bones into another ship. But he answered them, that he would rather lose his owne life,then to leaue his brothers relicks.Thereupon he presently hoisted saile, and it is reported that he passed ouer in great danger, where other ships arriued very safely. When he was returned vnto ROME, he was alwaies either talking Philosophy with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the market place, to pleasure his friends. When his turne came that he was to make suite to be Quæstor, he would neuer sue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the ordinances touching the office of Quæstor, and that he had particularly made enquirie of men of greatest experience, to know what the authoritie of the office was. So he no sooner came to his office, but he presently made great alteration amongst the Clearkes and officers of the treasurie: who hauing the lawes and records in their hands, and exercising the office commonly vnder young men which were chosen Treasurers (who for their ignorance & lacke of experience, stood rather in neede of maisters to teach them, then that they were able to correct others) they themselues were the officers and controlled them. But Cato not contenting himselfe with the name and honor of the thing, did throughly vnderstand what the Clearkes and Registers should be, and therfore would haue them to be as they ought to be, ministers vnder the Quæstors onely; telling them of their briberie and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also that faulted through ignorance. And when he saw some insolent and impudent persons, that curried fauour with other treasurers to be against him, he caused the chiefest of them to be condemned for falshood, in making diuision betwixt two coheires: and consequently turned him cleare out of his office, for euer doing any thing there any more. He accused another also for forging of a Will, whom Catulus Luctatius defending, being then Censor, and a man of great honour for the dignitie of his office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the iustest man one of them in his time at Rome, and of those also that highly commended Cato, was conuersant with him for his honest life: when he perceiued that he could not defend his man by no reason, he prayed them at his request that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wise grant it. But Catulus earnestly intreating still for him, then Cato plainly said vnto him: It is shame for thee (Catulus) thou that art Censor, and shouldest reforme all our liues, thus to forget the dutie of thine office, to please our ministers. Catulus looking at Cato when he had spoken, as though he would answer him: whether it were for shame or anger, he went his way, and said neuer a word more. Yet was not the partie condemned, though there was one voice more, that did condemne then cleare him, because of the absence of one of the Iudges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Catoes colleagues in the Quæstorship, being sicke at that time, and absent, Catulus sent vnto him, to pray him to come and helpe the poore man. Thereupon Lollius being brought thither in a litter, after iudgement giuen, gaue his last voice, which absolutely cleared him. Cato, this notwithstanding would neuer vse him as a Clearke, nor pay him his wages, nor would count of Lollius voice among others. Thus hauing pulled downe the pride and stomacke of the Clearkes, and brought them vnto reason, in short time he had all the tables & records at his commandement, and made the Treasure chamber as honorable as the Senate it selfe: so that euery man thought, and said, that Cato had added vnto the Quæstorship the dignitie of the Consulship. For finding diuerse men indebted before vnto the commonwealth, and the commonwealth also vnto diuers men, he set downe such an order, that neither the commonwealth should be deceiued by any man, nor that any man also should haue wrong of it. For being rough with them that were indebted to the chamber, he compelled them to pay their debt, & willingly and quickly also paid them to whom the chamber ought any thing: so that the people were ashamed to see some pay which neuer thought to haue paid any thing; and on the contrary side also others paid, which neuer looked to haue had any part of their debts paid them. Furthermore, diuers men did before make false bils of their debts, and brought them so to be put into the coffer of the Quæstors: and many times also his predecessors were wont of fauor & friendship to receiue false messages. But whilest he was Quæstor, he neuer did passe away matter so lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a message that was sent vnto him, to know whether it was true or no: albeit diuers men did witnesse it was true, yet wold he not beleeue it, vntill such time as the Consuls themselues came in their owne persons to iustifie it was true, and to sweare, that it was so ordained. Now there were many vnto whom Lucius Sylla (being Dictator) had appointed in his second proscription twelue thousand siluer Drachmaes for euery citizen and outlaw which they had slain with their owne hands. These men, though euery man did hate them, and knew them to be wicked people and cruell murtherers, yet no man durst offer to be reuenged of them. Cato called these men in suite, as those that did wrongfully detaine the mony of the common treasure, and compelled them to repay it backe againe: sharply reprouing (and iustly) the wicked diuelliſh fact they had committed.

committed. So when they had repayed the money, they were straight accused by others for murder: and as if they had bene wrongfully condemned by one iudgement, they were brought into another, to the great ioy of all the ROMAINS, who then thought they saw all the tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla himselfe punished. Besides all this, Catoes continuall paines and care of the treasure, was so well thought of and liked of the people as could be. For he was alwayes the first that came to the coffer of the treasurers, and also the last that went from thence, and was neuer weary of any paines. Furthermore, he neuer missed to be at any assembly of the people, or Senate, fearing, and being alwayes carefull, lest lightly by fauour, any money due to the commonwealth should be forgiuen, or else that they should abate the rent of the farmers, or that they should giue no money but to them that had iustly deserued it. Thus hauing rid all accusers, and also filled the coffers with treasure, he made men see that the commonwealth might be rich without oppressing of any man. Indeed at his first coming into the office, his colleagues and companions found him maruellous troublesome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and seuere: howbeit they all loued him in the end; because he onely withstood the complaints and cries of all men against them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or fauour let go the mony of the common treasure,) and was contented his companions should excuse themselues vnto their friends that were importunate, and lay the fault vpon him, saying, that it was vnpossible for them to bring Cato vnto it. The last day that he went out of his office, being very honourably brought home to his house by the people, it was told him that Marcellus being in the treasure chamber, was attempted and enuironed with many of his friends, and men of great authoritie, that were earnestly in hand with him to record a certaine summe of mony, as a thing that had bin due by the commonwealth. This Marcellus had bene Catoes friend euen from their childhood, and whilest Cato was in office, he did orderly execute his office with him: but when he was left alone, he was of so gentle a nature, that he would easily be entreated, and was as much ashamed to denie any man, as he was also ouer-readie to grant euery man that he required. Cato straight returned backe vpon it, and finding that Marcellus had yeelded vnto their importunacie, and recorded the gift, he caused the bookes to be brought vnto him, and did raze it out before his face, Marcellus speaking neuer a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and neuer once repined against that he had done, neither then, nor at any time after, but continued still in friendship with him, as he had done before. But now though Cato was out of his office of Quæstor, he was not without spials of his men in the treasure chamber, who marked alwayes, and wrote what was done and passed in the treasury. And Cato himselfe hauing bought the bookes of account for the summe of fiue talents, containing the reuenew of the whole state of the commonwealth, from Syllaes time vntill the very yeare of his Quæstorship: he euer had them about him, and was the first man that came to the Senate, and the last that went out of it. There many times the Senators tarying long before they came, he went and sate downe in a corner by himselfe, and read closely the booke he had vnder his gowne, clapping his gowne before it, and would neuer be out of the citie on that day when he knew the Senate should assemble. After that, Pompey and his consorts perceiuing that it was vnpossible to compell Cato, and much lesse to win or corrupt him, to fauor their vniust doings, they sought what meanes they could to keepe him from comming to the Senate, and defending certaine of his friends causes, and to occupie him some other wayes about matters of arbiterment. But Cato finding their wils and craft, to encounter them, he told his friends once for all, whom he would pleasure, that when the Senate did sit, no mans cause could make him be absent from thence. For he came not to serue the commonwealth to enrich himselfe as many did, neither for any glorie or reputation, nor yet at all aduenture; but that he had aduisedly chosen to serue the commonwealth, like a iust and honest man, and therefore thought himselfe bound to be as carefull of his dutie, as the Bee working her waxe in the hony combe. For this respect therefore, to performe his dutie the better, by the meanes of his friends which he had in euery prouince belonging to the Empire of ROME, he got into his hands the copies of all the chiefest acts, edicts, decrees, sentences, and the notablest iudgements of the gouernours that remained in record. Once Cato perceiuing that Publius Clodius a seditious Orator amongst the people, did make great stirre, and accused diuerse vnto the assembly, as the Priests and Vestall Nunnes, among the which Fabia Terentia, Ciceroes wiues sister was accused; he taking their cause in hand, did so disgrace Clodius their accuser, that he was driuen to flie the citie. Cicero therefore giuing Cato thankes, Cato told him, that he must thanke the commonwealth, not him, for whose sake onely he both said and did that he had done. Hereby Cato wanne him great fame. For when a certaine Orator or common counsellor preferred one witnesse vnto the Iudges, the counsellor on the other side told thē, that one witnesse was not to be credited, though it were Cato himselfe. Insomuch as the people tooke it vp for a prouerbe among them, that when any man spake any strange and vnlikely matter, they would say: Nay, though Cato himselfe said it, yet were it not to be beleeued. When on a time a certaine prodigal man had made a long oration in the Senate, in praise & commendation of sobriety, temperance, and thriftinesse, one Amnæus a Senator rising vp, said vnto him: Alas friend, what thinkest thou? who can abide to heare thee any longer with patience, that farest at thy table like Crassus, buildest like Lucullus, & speakest to vs like Cato? So men cōmonly (in sport) called them Catoes, which were graue and seuere in their words, and dissolute in their deeds. When diuers of his friends were in hand with him to sue to be Tribune of the people, he told thē he thought it not meete at that time: for such an office (quoth he) of so great authoritie as that, is not to be imploied, but like a strong medicine in time of need. So, the terme and matters of law ceassing for that time, Cato went into the country of Lvca to take his pleasure there, where he had pleasant houses, and tooke with him both his bookes and Philosophers to keepe him company. But meeting as he went, with diuers sumpters and great cariage, and a great traine of men besides, he asked them whose cariage it was: they told him, it was Metellus Nepos that returned to Rome, to make suite to be Tribune. Therupon Cato stayed suddenly, and bethinking himself, commanded his men to returne backe againe. His friends maruelling at it, he answered them, Do not you know that Metellus is to be feared of himself, for his rashnesse and folly? and now that he commeth instructed by Pompey, like a lightning he would set all the common-wealth on fire? for this cause therefore we must not now go take our pleasure in the countrey, but ouercome his folly, or otherwise die honourably in defence of our libertie. Yet at his friends perswasions he went first vnto his house in the countrey, and taried not long there, but returned straight againe to Rome. When he came thither ouer night, the next morning betimes he went into the market place, and sued to be Tribune of the people, purposely to crosse Metellus enterprise, because the power and authoritie of the Tribune consisteth more in hindering then doing any thing: for if all men else were agreed of a matter, and that he onely were against it, the Tribune would carie from them all. Cato at the first had not many of his friends about him, but when they heard of his intent, why he made suite for the Tribuneship, all his friends and Noblemen straight tooke part with him, confirmed his determination, and incouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to serue the common-wealth then his owne turne; considering that where many times before he might (without resistance or deniall) haue obtained the same, the state being toward no trouble, he then would neuer sue for it, but now that he saw it in danger, where he was to fight for the commonwealth, and the protection of her liberty. It is reported that there were such a nūber of people about him to fauour his suite, that he was like to haue bene stifled among them, and thought he should neuer haue come to the market place, for the preasse of people that swarmed about him. Thus when he was chosen Tribune with Metellus and others, he perceiued how they bought and sold the voices of the people when the Consuls were chosen: whereupon he made an oration, and sharply tooke them vp for this detestable merchandise; & after his oration ended, solemnly protested by oath, that he wold accuse him, & bewray his name which had giuen mony to be chosen Consull. Howbeit he spake nothing of Syllanus, whose sister Seruilia he had maried: but he flatly accused Lucius Muræna, that had obtained to be Consul with Syllanus, by meanes of his mony. Now a law being prouided, that the party accused might haue a keeper or spiall to follow the accuser, to see what he would accuse the partie with that he might the better be able to defend himselfe, knowing what should be obiected against him: Muræna hauing one for him to wait vpon Cato, to consider throughly what course he tooke, when he saw that he went not maliciously to work, but took a plaine common way of a iust accuser, he had so great confidence in Catoes vpright mind and integrity, that not regarding the narrow sifting of him otherwise, he did one day aske him himself in the market place (or at home in his own house) if that day he were determined to prosecute any matter against him touching his accusation. If Cato answered him that he did not, then he went his way, & simply beleiued him. When the day came indeed that his cause was to be heard & pleaded vnto, Cicero being Consull that

that yeare, defending Muræna, played ſo pleaſantly with the Stoicke Philoſophers, and their ſtrange opinions, that he made all the Iudges laugh: inſomuch as Cato himſelfe ſmiling at him, told them that were by him: See we haue a pleaſant Conſull that makes men laugh thus. So Muræna being diſcharged by this iudgement, did neuer after malice Cato for that, but ſo long as he remained Conſull, he was alwayes ruled by his counſell in all his affaires, and continued euer to honour him, following his counſell in all things touching his office. Hereof Cato himſelfe was cauſe, who was neuer rough nor terrible, but in matters of counſell, & in his orations before the people, for the maintenance only of equity and iuſtice: for otherwiſe he was very ciuil and courteous to all men. But before he entred into his Tribuneſhip, Cicero being yet Conſul, he did help him in many things touching his office, but ſpecially in bringing Catilines cõſpiracy to good end which was a noble act done of him. For Catiline did practiſe a generall commotion and ſtirre in the commonwealth, to ouerthrow the whole ſtate of ROME, by ciuil diſcord within ROME, and open warres abroad: who being diſcouered and ouercome by Cicero, he was driuen in the end to flie ROME. But Lentulus, Cethegus, & many other of the accomplices of this conſpiracie, blamed Catiline for his faint & cowardly proceeding in it. For their parts, they had determined to burne the whole citie of ROME, and to put all the Empire thereof in vprore, by ſtrange warres, and rebellious forreine nations and prouinces. Howbeit this treaſon being diſcouered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred vnto the iudgement of the Senate, to determine what was to be done therein. Syllanus being the firſt who was asked his opinion therein ſaid, that he thought it good they ſhould ſuffer cruell paines: and after him alſo, all the reſt ſaid the like vntill it came to Cæſar. Cæſar being an excellent ſpoken man, and that rather deſired to nouriſh then to quench any ſuch ſtirres or ſeditions in the commonwealth, being fit for his purpoſe long determined of, made an Oration full of ſweete pleaſant words, declaring vnto them, that to put ſuch men as they to death without lawfull condemnation, he thought it altogether vnreaſonable, and rather that they ſhould do better to keepe them in priſon. This oration of Cæſar ſo altered all the reſt of the Senators minds, for that they were afraid of the people, that Syllanus ſelfe mended his opinion againe, and ſaid, that he meant not they ſhould put them to death, but keepe them faſt in priſon; becauſe that to be a priſoner, was the greateſt paine a ROMAINE citizen could abide. Thus the Senators minds being ſo ſuddenly changed, and bent to a more fauorable ſentence, Cato riſing vp to ſay his opinion, began very angrily with maruellous eloquence, grieuouſly to reproue Syllanus for changing his mind, and ſharply to take vp Cæſar, that vnder a popular ſemblance, and maske of ſweet fugred words, he ſought vnder-hand to deſtroy the commonwealth, and alſo to terrifie and make the Senate afraid: where he himſelfe ſhould haue bene afraid, and thinke himſelfe happie, if he could ſcape from being ſuſpected, giuing ſuch apparent cauſe of ſuſpition as he did, going about ſo openly to take the enemies and traitors of the commonwealth out of the hands of iuſtice, ſeeming to haue no pitie nor compaſſion of his naturall citie, of ſuch nobilitie and fame, being euen brought in maner to vtter deſtruction; but rather to lament the fortune of theſe wicked men, that it was pitie they were euer borne, and whoſe death preſerued ROME from a thouſand murthers, & miſchiefes. Of all the Orations that euer Cato made, that only was kept: for Cicero the Conſul, that day had diſperſed diuers pen-men in ſundry places of the Senate houſe, which had maruellous ſwift hands, and had further taught them how to make briefe notes and abridgements, which in few lines ſhewed many words. For vntill that time, writers were not known that could by figures and ciphers expreſſe a whole ſentence and word, as afterwards they could, being then the firſt time that euer they were found out. So Cato at that time preuailed againſt Cæſar, and made them al change their minds againe, that theſe men were put to death. But that we may not leaue out a iot of his manners, as the very paterne and impreſſion of his mind: it is reported, that when Cato that day was ſo hote and vehement againſt Cæſar, that all the Senate could but looke at them, to heare them both, a letter was deliuered Cæſar, ſent him into the houſe. Cato began preſently to ſuſpect it, and ſo earneſtly miſliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commanded his letter ſhould be ſeene and read openly. Cæſar therupon reached his letter vnto Cato, that ſate not farre from him. When Cato had read it, and found that it was a loue letter, which his ſiſter Seruilia, had written vnto Cæſar, whom ſhe loued, and had knowne, he caſt it againe to Cæſar, and ſaid, There drunkard. After that he went on againe with his matter, which he had begun before. In fine, it ſeemeth that Cato was very vnfortunate in his wiues: for this Seruilia, as we haue ſaid, had an il name by Cæsar. And the other Seruilia also, which was his sister, was worse defamed: for she being maried vnto Lucullus, one of the greatest men of Rome, by whom she had a sonne, was in the end put away from him, for her naughtie life. But worst of all, his owne wife Attilia also was not altogether cleare without suspition: for though he had two sons by her, yet he was driuē to be diuorced from her, she was so naught and cōmon. After that, he maried Martia, the daughter of Philip, which by report seemed to be a very honest gentlewoman It is she that is so famous among the Romains. For in the life of Cato, this place (as a fable or comedie) is disputable, and hard to be iudged. For thus it was, as Thraseas writeth, who referreth all to the report & credite of one Munatius, Catoes very familiar friend. Among many that loued Catoes vertues and had them in admiration, some of them did shew more what he was, then other some did: amongst the which was Q. Hortensius a man of great honestie and authoritie. He desiring not onely to be Catoes friend & familiar, but also to ioyne with him in alliance, and by affinitie to make both their houses one, was not abashed to moue him to let him haue his daughter Porcia in mariage (which was Bibulus wife, and had brought him two children) that he might also cast abroad the seed of goodly children, in that pleasant fertile ground. And though to men this might seeme a strange minde and desire, yet that in respect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the common wealth, not to suffer a young woman in the prime of her youth to lose the fruite of her wombe, being apt to beare children: nor also that he should impouerish his sonne in law with moe children then one house needed. And further, that communicating women in this sort from one to another, specially being bestowed vpon worthy and vertuous men, that vertue should thereby be increased the more, being so dispersed in diuers families; and the citie likewise should be the stronger, by making alliances in this sort together. And if it be so quoth he, that Bibulus do loue his wife so dearly, that he will not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him againe when he had a child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendship to him, by meanes of this communication of children with Bibulus selfe, and with him. Cato answered him, that he loued Hortensius well, and liked of his alliance, howbeit that he maruelled he would speake to him to let him haue his daughter to get children of, sith he knew that she was maried to another. Then Hortensius altering his tale, stuck not to tel him his mind plainly, and to desire his wife of him, the which was yet a young woman, and Cato had children enough. But a man cannot tell whether Hortensius made this suite, because he saw Cato make no reckoning of Martia, for that she was then with child by him. In fine, Cato seeing the earnest desire of Hortensius, he did not deny him her, but told him, that he must also get Philips goodwill, the father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had granted his goodwill, would not therefore let him haue his daughter before that Cato himselfe by his presence did confirme the contract and mariage with him. Though these things were done long after, yet hauing occasion to talke of Catoes wiues. I thought it not amisse to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus and his consorts of Catilines conspiracie being put to death, Cæsar to cloake the accusations wherewith Cato charged him in open Senate, did put himselfe into the peoples hands; and gathering the rakehels & seditious persons together, which sought to set all at sixe and seuen, he did further encourage them in their mischieuous intent and practises. Whereupon, Cato fearing lest such a rabble of people should put all the commonwealth in vprore and danger, he perswaded the Senate to winne the poore needie people that had nothing, by distributing of corne amongst them, the which was done: and the charge thereof amounted yearely vnto twelue hundred and fiftie talents. This liberalitie did manifestly drinke vp and quench all those troubles which they stood in feare of. But on the other side, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certaine seditious Orations & assemblies, and preferred a law to the people, that Pompey the great should presently be called into Italy with his armie, that he should keepe the citie by his comming from the present danger of Catilines conspiracie. These were but words spoken for fashions sake, but indeed the law had a secret meaning, to put the whole commonwealth and Empire of Rome into Pompeys hands. Hereupon the Senate assembled, wherein Cato at his first comming spake somewhat gently, and not too vehemently against Metellus, as his maner was to be sharpe vnto them that were against him: but modestly perswaded him, & fel to intreate him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwayes taken part with the Senate and Nobilitie. But Metellus therewith tooke such pride and conceit of himselfe, that he began to despise Cato, thinking he had vsed that mildnesse, as though he had bene afraid of him: in so much as he gaue out proud proud ſpeeches againſt him, and cruell threats, that in deſpite of the Senate he would do that which he had vndertaken. Then Cato changing his countenance, his voice and ſpeech, after he had ſpoken very ſharply againſt him, in the end he roughly proteſted, that while he liued, he would neuer ſuffer Pompey to come into ROME with his armie. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both wel in their wits, but that Metellus doings was a fury, which proceeding of a cancred ſtomacke and extreme malice, would put all in hazard: and that which Cato did, was a rauiſhment and extaſie of his vertue, that made him beſide himſelfe, contending for iuſtice and equitie. When the day came that this law ſhould paſſe by voices of the people, Metellus failed not to be in the market place with a world of ſtrangers, ſlaues, and fencers, armed, and ſet in battell ray, beſides a number of the common people that were deſirous to ſee Pompeys returne, hoping after change. Beſides all thoſe, Ceſar then being Prætor, gaue aide likewiſe with his men, in the behalfe of Metellus. On the contrary part alſo, the Noblemen and Senators of the citie were as angry as Cato, and ſaid, it was a horrible ſhame: howbeit they were his friends, rather in miſliking the matter, then in defending the common wealth. Whereupon, all his friends at home, and his whole family, were maruellouſly perplexed and ſorowfull, that they both refuſed their meate, and alſo could take no reſt in the night for feare of Cato. But he, as one without feare, hauing a good heart with him, did comfort his people, and bade them not ſorow for him: and after he had ſupped (as he commonly vſed to do) he went to bed, and ſlept ſoundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his colleague and fellow Tribune, came and called him. So they both went together into the market place, accompanied with a very few after them. Whereupon diuers of their friends came and met them by the way, and bad them take heede vnto themſelues. When they were come into the market place, and that Cato ſaw the temple of Caſtor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or ſteps kept by ſword players and fencers, and Metellus on the top of them ſet by Ceſar: turning to his friends, he ſaid, See I pray you the coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, againſt one man naked and vnarmed. Therewithall he ſtraight went forward with his companion Thermus vnto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of themſelues to let him paſſe, but they would let no other go vp but himſelfe: but Cato with much ado, taking Minutius by the hand, got him vp with him; and when he was come vp, he ſet him downe betwixt Metellus and Ceſar, to keepe them aſunder, that they ſhould not whiſper one in anothers eare. Neither of them both could tell what to ſay to him: whereupon the Noblemen that conſidered Catoes countenance and boldneſſe, wondring to ſee it, drew neare, and by their cries willed him not to be afraid, but incouraged one another to ſticke by him that ſtood for defence of their liberrie. So, there was a ſeruant that tooke the written law in his hand, and would haue read it to the people, but Cato would not let him. Then Metellus tooke it himſelfe in his hands to reade it, but Cato alſo ſnatched it out of his hands. Metellus notwithſtanding, hauing it perfect without booke, would needs declare the effect of it by heart. But Thermus clapped his hand before his mouth to keepe him that he ſhould not ſpeake. Metellus ſeeing theſe two men bent by all meanes to keepe this law from paſſing, and that the people did leane on their ſide, he beckned to his men to go for the armed men which were at home in his houſe, that they ſhould come with terrour and cries to make them afraid, and ſo they did. The people thereupon were diſperſed here and there for feare, that Cato was left alone in the market place, and they threw ſtones at him from beneath. But then Muræna, who had before accuſed Cato for buying of the Conſulſhip, forſooke him not in that danger, but holding his long gowne before him, cried out vnto them beneath that threw at Cato, to leaue. So ſhewing him the danger he had brought himſelfe vnto, holding him ſtill by the armes, he brought him into the temple of Caſtor and Pollux. Then Metellus ſeeing the pulpit for Orations voided, and his enemies flying out of the market place, he thought he had wonne the goale: whereupon commanding his ſouldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to paſſe his law. But his enemies that fled for feare, being gathered againe together in the market place, began afreſh to crie out againſt Metellus, with greater boldneſſe and courage then before. Then Metellus and his adherents being afraid and amazed, doubting that their enemies had gotten weapons, and were prouided, and therefore were the bolder, they fled, and all of them left the pulpit for Orations. So when Metellus and his company were gone, Cato came againe to the pulpit for Orations, and greatly commended the people for the good wil they had ſhewed, and perſwaded them to continue in their well doing. Whereupon the common people were then againſt Metellus; and the Senate alſo being aſſembled gaue order, that Cato ſhould haue better aide then he had before, and that by all meanes poſſible they ſhould reſiſt Metellus law, which onely tended to moue ſedition and ciuill war in Rome. For Metellus ſelfe, he was yet vehemently bent to follow his attempt and enterpriſe; but perceiuing that his friends were maruellouſly affraid of Cato, as a man whom they thought inuincible, he ſuddenly came into the market place, and aſſembling the people, told them many reaſons in his oration, ſuppoſing to bring Cato in diſgrace with the people: and amongſt other things he ſaid, that he would withdraw himſelfe out of this tyrannicall power of Catoes, and his conſpiracie againſt Pompey, the which peraduenture the citie before it were long ſhould repent, for that they had ſhamed and defaced ſo noble a man. After that he preſently departed Rome, and went into Asia to informe Pompey of all this matter. Cato on the other ſide, was greatly eſteemed for his doings, for that he had freed the common wealth from the great trouble of ſuch a fooliſh Tribune, and by ouerthrowing Metellus, he had alſo ſuppreſſed the power of Pompey. But yet he was much more commended, when he was againſt the Senate, who would haue noted Metellus of infamie, and depriued him of his office, the which he would not ſuffer them to do. The common people thought him of a courteous and gentle nature, becauſe he would not tread his enemie vnder his foote, when he had the vpper hand of him, nor be reuenged of him when he had ouercome him: but wiſe men iudged it otherwiſe, that it was wiſely done of him not to prouoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucullus from the warre, of the which it ſeemed that Pompey had taken the honor and glory from him for the ending of it, and was likely alſo to haue bene put from his honour of triumph, for that Caius Memmius was his aduerſary, who laid many accuſations againſt him before the people, rather to pleaſe Pompey, then for any malice elſe he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his brother in law, and had maried his owne ſiſter Seruilia, as alſo for that he ſaw they did him wrong, reſiſted this Memmius, and defended many accuſations againſt him. So that in the end, though Memmius had laboured that Cato ſhould be depriued of his office, as from a tyrannicall power, yet Cato cõpelled Memmius at the laſt to leaue off his accuſations, & to proſecute law no more againſt him. Thus Lucullus hauing obtained honor of triumph, did embrace Catoes friendſhip more then before, taking him for a ſure bulwarke and defence againſt the power of Pompey the great. But Pompey ſhortly after returning home again, with great honor from his conqueſts, truſting that for reſpect of his welcome he ſhould be denied nothing at the peoples hands when he came home, ſent before vnto the Senate, to pray them for his ſake to deferre the election of the Conſuls, vntill he came to Rome, that being preſent he might fauour Piſoes ſuite, ſuing to be Conſul. Therunto the moſt part of the Senate gaue their conſent, but Cato on the other ſide was againſt it; not that the deferring of time was a matter of ſuch importance, but to cut all hope frõ Pompey to go about to attempt any new deuices: inſomuch that he made the Senate change opinion againe, and Pompeys requeſt was denied. Pompey being maruellouſly troubled withall, and perceiuing that Cato would be againſt him in all things, if he found not ſome deuice to win him, he ſent for his friend Munatius, by his meanes to demand Catoes two neeces of him which were mariable; ỹ eldeſt for himſelf, & the yongeſt for his ſon. Others ſay alſo, that they were not his neeces, but his own daughters. Munatius did Pompeys meſſage, and brake the matter vnto him, his wife, and his ſiſters, who maruellouſly deſired Pompeys alliance, for the greatnes & dignity of his perſon. But Cato making no further delay, without other deliberation, as not greatly pleaſed with the motion, anſwered him preſently: Munatius, go thy way vnto Pompey againe, and tell him that Cato is not to be won by women, though otherwiſe I miſlike not of his friendſhip: and withall, that ſo long as he ſhall deale vprightly in all cauſes, and none otherwiſe, he ſhall find him more aſſuredly his friend, then by any alliance of mariage; and yet, that to ſatisfie Pompeyes pleaſure and will againſt his country, he will neuer giue him ſuch pledges. The women and his friends at that time were angry with his anſwer and refuſall, ſaying, it was too ſtately and vncourteous. But afterwards it chanced, that Pompey ſuing to haue one of his friends made Conſull, he ſent a great ſumme of money to bribe the voyces of the people, which liberalitie was noted, and ſpoken of, becauſe the mony was told in Pompeys owne garden. Then did Cato tell the women of his houſe, that if he had now bene bound by alliance of mariage vnto Pompey, he ſhould then haue bene driuen to haue bene partaker of Pompeys ſhamefull acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confeſſed then that he was wiſer to refuſe ſuch alliance, then they were

that wished and desired it. And yet, if men should iudge of wisedome, by the successe and euent of things, I must needs say, that Cato was in great fault for refusing of his alliance. For therby he was the cause of Pompeys matching with Cæsar, which ioyned both their powers together, was the whole destruction of the Empire of ROME: whereas peraduenture it had not fallen out so, if Cato fearing Pompeys light faults, had not caused him by increasing his power with another, to commit farre greater faults. Howbeit those things were yet to come. Furthermore, Pompey being at iarre with Lucullus, touched certaine ordinances which he had made in the Realme of PONTVS, because both the one and the other would haue their ordinances to take place, Cato fauoured Lucullus, who had open wrong. Pompey therefore seeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, took part with the people, and put forth the law for deuiding of the lands amongst the souldiers. But Cato stoutly resisting that law againe, he put it by, and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquaint himselfe with Publius Clodius, the most seditious and boldest person of all the Tribunes; and besides that, made alliance euen at that time with Cæsar, whereof Cato himselfe was the onely author. Cæsar returning out of SPAINE from his Prætorship, required the honour of triumph, and withall made suite to be Consull. But being a law to the contrarie, that they that sued to be Consuls should be present themselues in the city, and such also as desired the honour of triumph, should be without the citie, he earnestly required the Senate, that he might sue for the Consulship by his friends. The most part of the Senat were willing vnto it, but Cato was flatly against it. He perceiuing that the other Senators were willing to gratifie Cæsar, when it came to him to deliuer his opinion, he spent all the whole day in his Oration, and by this policy preuented the Senate, that they could not conclude any thing. Then Cæsar letting fall his triumph, made suite to be Consull, and entring the city, ioyned friendship with Pompey. Hereupon he was chosen Consull, and immediatly after maried his daughter Iulia vnto Pompey; and so hauing made in maner a conspiracie against the commonwealth betweene themselues, Cæsar preferred the law Agraria, for distributing the lands vnto the citizens, and Pompey was present to maintaine the publication thereof. Lucullus and Cicero on the other side taking part with Bibulus the other Consul, did what they could against it, but specially Cato: who fearing much this alliance of Cæsar and Pompey, that it was a pact and conspiracie to ouerthrow the commonwealth, said, that he cared not so much for this law Agraria, as he feared the reward they looked for, who by such meanes did intice and please the common people. Therewithall, the Senate were wholly of his opinion, and so were many other honest men of the people besides, that were none of the Senate, and tooke his part, maruelling much, and also being offended with Cæsars great vnreasonablenesse and importunitie, who by the authoritie of his Consulship did preferre such things, as the most seditiousest Tribunes of the people were wont commonly to do, to curric fauour with the people, and by such vile meanes sought to make them at his commandement. Wherefore, Cæsar and his friends fearing so great enemies, fell to open force. For to begin withall, as the Consull Bibulus was going to the market place, there was a basket of dung powred vpon his head: and furthermore, the Officers rods were broken in their hands, which they caried before him. In fine, darts were throwne at them out of euery corner, and many of them being hurt, they all at length were driuen to flie, and leaue the market place. But Cato, he came last of all, keeping his wonted place, and often cast backe his head, and cursed such citizens. So, they did not onely passe this law Agraria by voyces of the people, but furthermore they added to it: that the Senate should be sworne to stablish that law, and be bound to defend the same (if any attempted the alteration thereof) vpon great penalties and fines to be set on his head, that should refuse the oath. All the other Senatours sware against their wils, remembring the example of the mischiefe that chanced vnto the old Metellus, who was banished out of ITALY, because he would not sweare to such a like law. Whereupon, the women that were in Catoes house, besought him with the teares in their eyes, that he would yeeld and take the oath: and so did also diuerse of his friends besides. Howbeit, he that most inforced and brought Cato to sweare, was Cicero the Orator: who perswaded him, that peraduenture he would be thought vnreasonable, that being but one man, he should seeme to mislike that, which all other had thought meete and reasonable: and that it were a fond part of him wilfully to put himselfe in so great a danger, thinking to hinder a matter already past remedy. But yet that besides all this, a greater inconuenience would happen, if he forsooke his countrey (for whose sake he did all these things) and left it a prey, vnto them which ſought the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſame, as if he were glad to be rid from the trouble of defending the common-wealth. For (ſaid he) though Cato haue no neede of Rome, yet Rome had neede of Cato, and ſo haue all his friends: of the which, Cicero ſaid, he was the chiefe, and was moſt maliced of Publius Clodius the Tribune, who ſought to driue him out of the countrey. It is ſaid that Cato being wonne by theſe like words and perſwaſions at home, and openly in the market place, they ſo ſoftned him, that he came to take his oath laſt of all men, but one Phaonius, a very friend of his. Cæſars heart being then lift vp, for that he had brought his firſt purpoſe to paſſe he began now to preferre another law, to deuide all Campania, and the countrey called Terra Di Lavoro (the land of labour) vnto the poore needy people of Rome, and no man ſtood againſt him but Cato. Whereupon Cæſar made his officers to take him from the pulpit for Orations, to carie him to priſon. All this made not Cato ſtoupe, nor leaue his francke ſpeech, but as he went he ſtill ſpake againſt this edict, and perſwaded the people to beware of them that preferred ſuch lawes. All the Senate, and the beſt ſort of citizens, followed Cato with heauie hearts, ſhewing by their ſilence that they were offended and angrie for the iniurie they did vnto him, being ſo worthy a man. In ſo much as Cæſars ſelfe perceiued that the people were offended with it, and yet of ambition and ſtomacke, he looked alwayes when Cato would haue appealed vnto the people. So when he ſaw that Cato meant no ſuch matter, at lengh ouercome with ſhame and diſhonour, he himſelfe procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeants. In fine, all Cæſars practiſe tended to this end, that when he had wonne the peoples fauour by ſuch lawes, they ſhould then grant him the gouernment of all the Gavles (as well on this ſide, as beyond the mountaines) and all Illyria, with an armie of foure legions, for the ſpace of fiue yeares; notwithſtanding that Cato told the people before, that they themſelues with their own voyces did ſet vp a tyrant, that one day would cut their throats. They did alſo chuſe Publius Clodius Tribune of the people, which was of a noble houſe: a thing directly contrarie to the law. But this Clodius had promiſed them, ſo that they would helpe him to baniſh Cicero out of Rome, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made Calphurnius Piſo (Cæſars wiues father) and Gabinius Paulus (a man wholly at Pompeys commandement, as they write which knew his life and manners) Conſuls the next yeare following. Now notwithſtanding they had the rule of the common-welth in their owne hands, and that they had wonne part of the citie with bribes, and the other part alſo with feare, yet they were both afraid of Cato, when they conſidered what trouble they had to ouercome him; which they did very hardly notwithſtanding, and to their great ſhame, being driuen to vſe force, and yet thought they ſhould neuer haue done. Furthermore, Clodius vtterly deſpaired that he could poſſibly baniſh Cicero, ſo long as Cato was there. So deuiſing waies how to do it, when he had taken poſſeſſion of his office, he ſent for Cato, and began to tell him, that he thought him the honeſteſt and iuſteſt man of Rome, and that he was ready to performe it to him by deed. For, where many made ſuite vnto him to be ſent into Cyprvs, to make warre with king Ptolomy, he thought none ſo worthie as himſelfe, and therefore for the good will he bare him, he was very willing to offer him that pleaſure. Cato ſtraight cried out with open mouth, that this was a deuice to entrap him, not to pleaſure him. Then Clodius proudly and fiercely anſwered him, Well, ſeeing thou wilt not go with good will, thou ſhalt go then againſt thy will: and ſo he did. For at the firſt aſſembly of the citie, he cauſed the people to grant his commiſſion for his iourney thither: but they neither appointed him ſhips, nor ſouldiers, nor any miniſters to go with him, ſauing two Secretaries onely, of the which the one of them was a very villaine and arrent theefe, and the other one of Clodius followers. Beſides all this, as if they had appointed him but little to do in Cyprvs againſt Ptolomy, he made them command him after that, to go and reſtore the outlawes and baniſhed men of the citie of Bizantivm, vnto their countrey and goods againe, of purpoſe only to keepe Cato farre inough from Rome, whileſt he continued Tribune, Cato being driuen by neceſſitie to obey, he counſelled Cicero (whom Clodius purſued) to beware that he made no ſtirre againſt him, for feare of bringing Rome into ciuill warre and murther for his ſake: but rather, to abſent himſelfe, that he might another time preſerue his countrey. After that, he ſent his friend Canidius before into Cyprvs, vnto Ptolomy, to perſwade him to be quiet without warre: declaring vnto him, that he ſhould neither lacke honour nor riches, for the Romaines would grant him the Prieſthood of Venus in the citie of Paphos. Cato in the meane time remained in the Ile of Rhodes, preparing preparing himselfe there, and abiding his answer. In the time of these stirres, Ptolomie king of Ægypt, for a certaine offence and discord with his subiects, departing out of Alexandria, sailed towards Rome, hoping that Cæsar and Pompey with a great armie would restore him to his Crowne and kingdome againe. He being desirous to see Cato, sent vnto him, supposing he would come at his sending for. Cato by chance was occupied at that time about some businesse, and bad the messenger will Ptolomie to come to him, if he would see him. So when Ptolomie came, he neither went to meete him, nor rose vp vnto him, but onely welcomed him, and bad him sit downe. It amazed the king at the first, to see vnder so simple and meane a traine, such a statelinesse and maiestie in Catoes behauiour. But he heard him boldly talke with him of his affaires, and such graue talke come from him, reprouing his folly he had committed, to forsake such princely pleasure and wealth, to go and subiect himselfe vnto such dishonour, such extreame paines, and such passing great gifts and presents, as he should throwaway, to satisfie the couetousnesse of the rulers at Rome, the which was so vnsatiable, that if all the Realme of Ægypt were conuerted into siluer to giue among them, it would scarce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counselled him to returne backe with his nauie, and to reconcile himselfe againe with his subiects, offering himselfe also to go with him, to helpe to make this peace. Then Ptolomie comming to himselfe, and repenting him of his folly, knowing that Cato told him truly, and wisely, he determined to follow his counsell, had not his friends turned his mind to the contrary. So when Ptolomie came to Rome, and was driuen to waite at the gates of the Magistrates that were in authoritie, he sighed then, and repented his folly, for that he had not onely despised the counsell of a wise man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolomie that was in Cyprvs (a happy turne for Cato) poisoned himselfe. Cato being also informed that he left a wonderfull summe of mony behind him, he determined to go himselfe vnto Byzantivm, and sent his nephew Brutus into Cyprvs, because he durst not trust Canidius so farre. Then hauing restored the banished men vnto the peoples fauour againe, setting agreement betwixt them, he returned into Cyprvs. There he found a maruellous great treasure, and plate both of gold and siluer, tables, precious stones, hangings, and purple silkes, all the which he was to make ready money of. There he tooke great care and paines to raise all things to the vtmost and deerest prices that could be, and he himselfe was present at all, to keepe the reckening of the last penny. Wherefore, to bring this to passe, he would not stand to the common vse of the sale of the crier, but suspected them all, both criers, praisers, and his owne friends, and therefore talked himselfe with the praisers, and made them set high prises vpon euery thing that was to be sold. And thus were the most part of their goods sold and caried away, at the deerest prises. This did maruellously offend the most part of his friends, when they saw that he did mistrust them: but Munatius specially, his deerest friend, tooke it so inwardly, that he thought neuer to be friends with him againe. Insomuch as in the booke Cæsar wrote against Cato, in this place he forceth most the accusation against him. Munatius notwithstanding writeth, that he was not angry so much with Cato for that he mistrusted him, but for a certaine disdaine he had himselfe of Cato, and for the emulation betwixt him, and Canidius. For Munatius wrote a booke of Catoes deeds and sayings, whom Thraseas in his history chiefly followed. In this booke he sheweth that he came late into Cyprvs, and was very ill lodged. And furthermore also, that when he would haue come into Catoes house, they kept him out of the gates, for that Cato was busie, doing something with Canidius. He modestly complaining of it vnto Cato, had this churlish answer: Ouermuch loue (saith Theophrastus) oftentimes causeth hate. So fareth it with thee, who ouer louing me, doest thinke that I esteeme thee not as thou deseruest, and therefore art angry with me. And for Canidius, I must tell thee truly, I do rather employ him for his skil and faithfulnesse in things, then any man else: for that he hath beene with me from the beginning, and as farre as I learne, was neuer bribed, but cleane handed still. These words Cato told Munatius secretly betweene them two, but afterwards he knew that he had also reported them vnto Canidius. When he saw that, he would no more go and sup with Cato as he was wont; and when he was also called to counsell, he would not come there neither. Wherefore Cato threatned him, that he would seize vpon all his goods and cariage, as they vse to handle them that are disobedient vnto iustice. This notwithstanding, Munatius cared not for it, but tooke sea, and returned againe to Rome, bearing Cato grudge a long time. Then Martia, being at that time Catoes wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to ſupper together vnto a friend of theirs called Barca. Thereupon Cato alſo arriued, and came thither when they were all ſet at ſupper, and asked where he ſhould ſit: Barca told him againe, where it pleaſed him. Then caſting his eyes about, he ſaid, he would ſit by Munatius: and ſo fetching a compaſſe about the boord, he went and ſate by him, but offered him no friendſhip and familiarity al ſupper time. Afterwards notwithſtanding, at the requeſt of Martia, that was earneſtly in hand with Cato for him, he wrote vnto him, and willed him to come and ſpeake with him. Munatius went to Catoes houſe in the morning, where Martia ſtayed him, and kept him company, vntill all the reſt that came to ſalute Cato were departed. Then Cato comming to him, embraced him in his armes, and made very much of him. We haue the willinglier dilated this matter at length, becauſe mens natures and maners might be diſcerned euen in theſe ſmall matters of friendſhip priuatly, as otherwiſe in the greateſt publike cauſes. Now touching Catoes commiſſion, he got together little leſſe then ſeuen thouſand ſiluer talents. Furthermore, fearing the farneſſe of the iourney he had to go by ſea, he made diuers little coffers, and put into euery one of them two talents, and fiue hundred Drachmaes, and tied vnto each of them a long rope, and a great peece of corke; becauſe that if the ſhippe ſhould fortune to miſcarie, thoſe corkes might ſhew where the cheſts with money lay in the bottome of the ſea. Thus was all the money ſaued, ſauing a litle, and brought ſafely to ROME. Cato hauing made two bookes, wherein he had noted all things done in his iourny, he could neither ſaue the one nor the other of them. For one of his bondmen made free, called Philargyrus, tooke the one away; who taking ſhip at the hauen of CENCHREES, was himſelfe drowned, and the booke he had alſo, loſt with him. The other book which he himſelf had kept vntil he came to CORFOV, he lying in the market place of the citie in his tents which he cauſed to be ſet vp; the mariners being very cold in the night, made ſo great a fire, that it burnt the tents, ſtuffe, booke and all. Notwithſtanding, he brought certaine of the late king Ptolomies ſlaues with him, who while he liued, had the charge and cuſtodie of all his treaſure and riches, the which he brought as witneſſes to ſtop the mouthes of his malicious enemies, that would haue accuſed him in any thing. But yet the loſſe of thē did grieue him, not ſo much for the great care and paines he had taken in ſetting downe the account of his charge, for the iuſtification and proofe of his fidelity and good ſeruice; but alſo for that they might haue ſerued for a good memoriall and example vnto all others, to haue bene a like careful in their charge, as himſelf. But the gods denied him this good hap. Newes being brought that he was come to ROME by water; when they vnderſtood that he was at hand, by and by al the Magiſtrates, the Prieſts, the Senate, and the moſt part of the people alſo went out to meete him by the ritiers ſide: ſo that both ſides of the riuer of Tyber were full of people, and the receiuing of him in, ſeemed not inferour to the entry of a triumph. Notwithſtanding, ſome thought him very preſumptuous, that the Conſuls and Prætors comming out to meet him, he did not ſtay his gally, but rowed ſtill vp the ſtreame (being in a kings gally of ſixe oares to euery banke) and neuer ſtayed, vntill all his fleete arriued in the hauen. This notwithſtanding, when the coffers with money were caried through the market place into the treaſure chamber, the people wondered to ſee ſo great a quantitie of it. And thereupon the Senate being aſſembled, with great and honourable words they gaue Cato an extraordinary Prætorſhip, and priuiledge alſo, at any common ſports to weare a purple gowne. Cato refuſed all theſe honours, and only beſought the Senate to make Nicias a freeman, Steward of the late deceaſſed king Ptolomy, being a witneſſe of his faith & great paines he had taken in this ſeruice. Philip the father of Martia, was that yeare Conſull, ſo that after a ſort, the authoritie of the Conſul was in Cato: becauſe Lentulus, colleague and fellow Conſull with Philip, did no leſſe reuerence Cato for his vertues, then Philip did for his alliance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was reſtored againe from his baniſhment, the which Publius Clodius (being then Tribune of the people) had put vpon him, and being againe growne to great credite, he went one day into the Capitoll, in the abſence of Clodius, by force to take away the tables which Clodius had conſecrated there, in the which were compriſed all his doings during the time he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being aſſembled, Clodius did accuſe Cicero of this violent fact. Cicero anſwered him againe, that becauſe Clodius was choſen Tribune, directly againſt the law, therefore all his doings were voide, and of no validitie. Then ſtood vp Cato, and ſaid, he knew that all that which Clodius did when he was Tribune, was ſcantly good and allowable; but yet if generally any man ſhould vndo all that he had paſſed by that authoritie, then all that he himſelfe had done likewiſe in CYPRVS, muſt must of neceſſitie de reuoked. For the commiſſion that was granted vnto him (by vertue where-of he had done many things) ſhould be vnlawfull: becauſe the Tribune alſo that did grant it him, was not lawfully choſen. And therefore, that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune againſt the law, who by conſent of the law was taken out from a noble houſe, and made a popular perſon: howbeit, if he had behaued himſelfe vndutifully in his office, as other men that haply had offended, then he was to be accuſed to make him mend his fault, and not to deſtroy the authoritie of the officer, which in it ſelf was lawfull. After that, there fell miſliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this counterbuffe he had giuen him: and Cicero continued a long time after, before he did ſhew him any countenance of friendſhip as he had at other times done. But afterwards they were reconciled together againe, by this occaſion. Pompey and Craſſus hauing bene with Cæſar to talke with him (who for that purpoſe came out of GAVLE beyond the Alpes) made an agreement there betwixt them, to demand the ſecond Conſulſhip together, and when they had it, then to proroge Cæſars gouernment for fiue yeares more; and alſo they would haue the beſt prouinces and greateſt for themſelues, with great armies, and money inough to pay them with. This was indeed a plaine conſpiracie to deuide the Empire of ROME betweene them, and vtterly to ouerthrow the ſtate of the commonwealth. At that time there were many Noble men, which came to make ſuite for the Conſulſhip. But when they ſaw Pompey and Craſſus offer to make ſuite for it, all the reſt gaue ouer, but Lucius Domitius that had maried Porcia, Catoes ſiſter: through whoſe perſwaſion he would not repleniſh his ſuite, conſidering that it was not the office onely of the Conſulſhip that was the chiefeſt matter of importance, but the libertie of the Senate & people. Straight there ran a rumor through the moſt part of the people, that they were not to ſuffer Pompeys power to be ioyned with Craſſus, by meanes of his office: for then his authoritie would be too great and ſtrong, and therefore, that of neceſſitie one of theſe two were to be denied. For this cauſe therefore, the good men tooke Domitius part, and did encourage him to go on with his ſuite, aſſuring him of aide vnderhand of diuerſe, which durſt not be ſeene openly for feare of thoſe two great men, who at the day of the election wold procure him voices in his fauour. Pompey and Craſſus miſtruſting this, made Domitius be ſet vpon, going with torch-light before day into the field of Mars, where the election was alwayes made: and firſt ſtriking the torch-bearer that went before him, they hurt him ſo ſore, that he fell down dead at his feete. Then they laid at the reſt in like caſe, who finding themſelues cruelly hurt, ran away euery man of them, and left Domitius and Cato poſt alone. But Cato notwithſtanding he was hurt in one of his armes, ſtil held Domitius faſt, and prayed him to tary, and not to leaue to defend the liberty of their countrey, againſt tyrants, which plainly ſhewed after what manner they would gouerne, ſith by ſuch wicked meanes they aſpired to tyrannicall gouernment. All this notwithſtanding, Domitius would tary no longer, but betooke him to his legs, and ranne home. Thus were Craſſus and Pompey without deniall proclaimed Conſuls. Cato neuer yeelded therfore, but came and ſued to be Prætor, becauſe that thereby he might yet make it ſome ſtrength and countenance to him againſt their Conſulſhip, that being no priuate perſon, he ſhould haue ſome better authoritie to reſiſt them that were the chiefeſt perſons. But they fearing, that the Prætorſhip by the eſtimation of Cato, would come to equall their authoritie of the Conſulſhip, firſt aſſembled the Senate (the moſt part of the Senators not hearing of it,) and in that aſſembly cauſed the Senate to decree: that all ſuch as were choſen Prætors, ſhould preſently go to their charge, not attending the time and liberty appointed by the law, during which time men might accuſe thoſe which had bought the voices of the people with money. Then hauing by this colour and decree ſet ill doers at libertie, without feare of puniſhment, they pretended to vſe corruption, did preferre ſome of their owne miniſters to make ſuite for the Prætorſhip, themſelues giuing money to corrupt the people, and being preſent alſo at the election. But notwithſtanding all theſe practiſes, the vertue and reputation of Cato ouercame them. For the people had him in ſo great reuerence, that they thought it too ſhamefull a part to ſell Cato by voyces, who deſerued rather to be hired to take the Prætorſhip vpon him. Then the firſt Tribe being called to giue their voyces, declared him Prætor. Pompey ſeeing that, ſtraight brake off the aſſembly, making a ſhamefull lie, telling that he had heard it thunder: the which the ROMAINES do maruellouſly deteſt, and will conclude nothing when it thundreth. Howbeit afterwards they gaue more money then they had done before, and thereby draue away the chiefeſt men out of the field of Mars; and by practiſe obtained, that Vatinius was choſen Prætor for Cato.

Why Cato ſued to be Prætor.

Cato put by the Prætorſhip by Pompey.

And the report went, that they that had ſo wickedly giuen their voyces, feeling thēſelues pricked in conſcience, fled immediatly out of the field: and the honeſt men that remained, were both very ſory and angry, for the iniurie they had offered Cato. At that time one of the Tribunes keeping an aſſembly of the citie, Cato ſtood vp, and told (as if he had propheciedi) before them all, what would happen to the commonwealth by theſe practiſers, and ſtirred vp the people againſt Pompey and Cæſar, ſaying: that they were guiltie of thoſe things, and therefore procured them to be done, becauſe they were afraid that if Cato had bene Prætor, he would too narrowly haue ſifted out their deuices. In fine, Cato going home to his houſe, had more company to waite vpon him alone, then all the other Prætors that had beene choſen. When Caius Trebonius, Tribune of the people, had preferred a law for the deuiding of the prouinces vnto the new Conſuls, SPAINE and AFRICKE vnto the one, and ÆGYPT and SYRIA vnto the other, with full power to make warre as they thought good both by ſea and land: all other men hauing no hope to keep it back, did let it alone, and ſpake nothing to contrarie it. Then Cato getting vp into the pulpit for Orations, before the people began to giue their voices, could hardly haue two houres ſpace to ſpeak: but at length, they perceiuing, that he delayed time by foretelling things to come, would ſuffer him to ſpeake no longer, but ſent a Sergeant to him, and plucked him by force out of the pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cried out notwithſtanding, and diuerſe gaue good eare vnto him: the Sergeant went to him againe, and tooke him, and caried him out of the market place. Howbeit the officer had no ſooner left him, but he went ſtraight towards the pulpit for Orations, and there cried out more vehemently then before, and willed the people to haue an eye to aide the libertie of their common-wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentimes together did this, Trebonius the Tribune being mad withall, commanded his Sergeant to carie him to priſon. The people followed him hard notwithſtanding, to heare what he ſaid vnto them. Whereupon Trebonius fearing ſome ſtirre, was forced to command his Sergeant to let Cato go. So Cato draue off all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithſtanding, the contrarie faction hauing partly put the ROMAINES in feare, and wonne the other part alſo by faire words and money, and by force of armes likewiſe kept Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from coming out of the Senate; and after they had alſo violently driuen Cato out of the market place, for ſaying that it thundred: and hauing hurt many men, and alſo ſlaine ſome out of hand in the market place, in the end they forcibly paſſed the decree by voices of the people. Many being offended therewith, a company of them went together to plucke downe Pompeyes images: but Cato would not ſuffer them. And afterwards alſo, when they preferred another law for the prorogation of the prouinces & armies which Cæſar demanded, Cato would ſpeake no more to the people to hinder it, but proteſted vnto Pompey himſelfe, that he ſaw not how he plucked Cæſar vpon him, and that he ſhould feele the weight of his force before he looked for it: and then when he could neither ſuffer nor remedie it, he would euen caſt his burthen and himſelfe vpon the common-wealth, and too late would remember Catoes warnings, which were priuatly as profitable for Pompey, as openly iuſt and reaſonable for the common-wealth. Cato vſed many of theſe perſwaſions ſundrie times vnto him, but Pompey neuer made account of them: for he would not be perſwaded that Cæſar would euer change in that ſort, and beſides he truſted too much to his owne power and proſperitie. Furthermore, Cato was choſen Prætor for the next yeare following, in the which it appeared (though he miniſtred iuſtice vprightly) that he rather defaced and impaired the maieſtie and dignitie of his office, then that he gaue it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go on foot bare-legged, and without any coate, vnto his Prætors chaire, and there giue ſentence of life and death, otherwhiles on men of great account. And ſome report, that he would giue audience when he had dined, and drunke wine: but this is vntrue. Now Cato perceiuing that the citizens of ROME were marred by bribes and gifts of thoſe which aſpired vnto offices, and that the people made an art and faculty to gaine by: to roote this vice altogether out of the common-wealth, he perſwaded the Senate to make a law, that ſuch as hereafter ſhould be choſen Conſuls or Prætors, ſhould (if there were no man to accuſe them) come and offer themſelues before the Iudges, and taking their oath, ſhould truly declare what meanes they had vſed to attaine to their office. This offended the ſuiters for the offices, but much more the mercenarie multitude. Whereupon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his audience, & all cried out vpon him, reuiled him, & threw ſtones at him: inſomuch as they that were there, were forced to flie thence, and himſelfe alſo was driuen

Cato choſen Prætor.

Cato preferred a law for vnlawful bribing

driuen out of the place by the preaſe of the people, and had much ado to get to the pulpit for Orations; where ſtanding on his feete, he preſently pacified the tumult of the people, by the boldneſſe and conſtancie of his countenance onely. Then when all was pacified by the preſent perſwaſions he vſed, aptly ſpoken to purpoſe for the inſtant, they giuing attentiue eare, without ſtir or vprore; the Senate giuing him great commendation therefore, he told them roundly and plainly: but I haue no cauſe to praiſe you, to leaue a Prætor in ſuch danger of his life, offering no aide to helpe him. But the ſuiters for the offices, they were in a maruellous caſe: for one way, they were afraid to giue mony to buy the peoples voices; and on the other ſide, they were afraid alſo if any other did it, that they ſhould go without their ſuite. So they were all agreed together, euery man to put downe twelue Myriades and a halfe a peece, and then they ſhould make their ſuite iuſtly and vprightly: and whoſoeuer were taken faultie, and that had otherwiſe made his way by corruption, that he ſhould loſe the money he had layed downe. This agreement being concluded betweene them, they choſe Cato (as it is reported) for their arbitrator, and keeper of all the ſame money. This match was made in Catoes houſe, where they all did put in caution or ſureties to anſwer the money: the which he tooke, but would not meddle with the money. The day being come, Cato aſſiſting the Tribunes that gouerned the election, and carefully marking how they did giue their voices, he ſpied one of the ſuiters for the office breake the accord agreed vpon, and condemned him to pay the forfeiture vnto the reſt: But they greatly commending his iuſtice and integritie, forgaue the forfeiture, thinking it puniſhment enough vnto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Cato. But thereby Cato procured himſelf the diſpleaſure of the other Senators, for that he ſeemed therein to take vpon him the power and authoritie ouer the whole court and election. For there is no vertue, whereof the honour and credite doth procure more enuie then iuſtice doth, becauſe the people do commonly reſpect and reuerence that more then any other. For they do not honour them as they do valiant men, nor haue them in admiration as they do wiſe men, but they loue and truſt them better. As for the two firſt, the one they are afraid of, and the other they diſtruſt: beſide, they ſuppoſe that valiancie and wiſedome commeth rather by the benefite of nature then of our intent & choiſe, eſteeming wiſedome as a readineſſe of conceit; and fortitude, a preſence and courage of the mind. For euery man may be iuſt that will, and therefore iniuſtice is of all other vices moſt ſhamefull: for it is a wilfull and malicious default, and therefore cannot be excuſed. Lo, this was the cauſe why all the Noblemen in manner were againſt Cato, as though he onely had ouercome them. Pompey thought that the eſtimation of Cato was altogether the diſcountenance of his power and greatneſſe, and therefore did dayly riſe vp many railers againſt him. Of them Publius Cledius that ſeditious Tribune, who was againe fallen in friendſhip with Pompey, he accuſed Cato, and cried out vpon him, how he had robbed the common-wealth of a wonderfull treaſure by his commiſſion in CYPRVS: and that he was enemie vnto Pompey, becauſe he did refuſe to marie his daughter. Cato thereto made anſwer, that he had brought more gold and ſiluer out of CYPRVS into the treaſure of ROME, without the allowance of either horſe or ſouldier, then Pompey had done with all his triumphs and warres, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreouer, that he did neuer ſeeke alliance with Pompey, nor that he thought him vnworthy of it, but becauſe he ſaw he dealt not as vprightly in the common wealth as he himſelfe did. I (ſaid he) haue refuſed a prouince offered me when I came out of my Prætorſhip: but Pompey hath taken ſome by force, and giuen away vnto others. And to conclude, he lent Cæſar not long ſince, an armie of ſixe thouſand men to ſerue him in the warres of GAVLE: the which he neuer required of vs, nor Pompey granted them him by our conſent. But we ſee, that ſo many armies, armours and weapons, ſo many men and horſes by common pleaſures of our priuate citizens, giuen and lent at our charge: and Pompey himſelfe reſeruing onely the name of Emperour, and Lieutenant generall, aſſigneth ouer his armies and prouinces to the gouernment of others, whileſt he himſelfe beſiegeth here the walls of the citie, with ſeditious and tumultuous election of officers, craftily vndermining thereby the ſtate of the commonwealth, to bring all to confuſion, that he himſelfe might be abſolute Prince, and rule alone. Thus was he reuenged of Pompey. Among Catoes friends, he had one called Marcus Faonius, ſuch a one as Apollodorus PHALERIAN was ſaid to be in old time vnto Socrates, who did counterfeit to be another himſelfe, in doing all things as he did. This man wold be farre out of reaſon, and paſſionate in his talke, ſtorming like a drunkard. He one yeare made ſuite to be Ædilis, but he was reiected. Howbeit Cato that furthered his ſuite, marked, that the tables wherein the voyces were written, were all one hand. So he finding out the falſhood, appealed thereupon vnto the Tribunes, and made the election voide for that time. After that Faonius was created Ædilis, Cato did helpe him forth in all the other charges of his office, & ſpecially in ſetting forth plaies in the Theater, which are accuſtomably done at the comming in of euery ſuch new officer, to giue the people paſtime: and gaue vnto the common players and dancers in thoſe playes, no golden crownes, as other Ædiles did, but crownes of wilde oliue twigges, as they cõmonly vſe in GRECE at the Olympian games. And where others gaue vnto the poore rich gifts, he gaue the GRECIANS leekes, lettiſes, radiſhes, and peares: and vnto the ROMAINES, they had earthen pots full of wine, porke, figges, cucumbers, and fagots of wood of ſmall value. Inſomuch as ſome thought ſcorne of them they were ſo meane, others were very glad of them, ſeeing that Cato which was ſeuere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by little and little they turned this auſteritie of his into pleaſure. In fine, Faonius himſelfe ſitting down amongſt the people, which looked vpon the playes, clapped his hands for ioy at Cato, and cried out to him, that he ſhould giue them good rewards that played well; alluring them alſo about him to do the like, and told them that he had made Cato the whole ruler of thoſe ſports. At the ſelfe ſame time, Curio, Faonius colleague and companion in the office of Ædilis, had likewiſe goodly playes in another Theater: but all the people forſooke his, and went to ſee Faonius playes, who ſate among them like a priuate man, and Cato as the maſter of the playes. Cato did this in ſcorne and mockery of vaine charge and expences, which men are wont to beſtow in ſuch trifles, ſhewing thereby, that whoſoeuer will make any playes, he ſhould make the charge but a ſport alſo, furniſhing it only with a conuenient grace, but with no vaine expence or charge about ſuch a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypſeus and Milo, ſued all three together to be Conſuls, not onely by briberie of money (a common fault then in ſuing for any of the offices in the commonwealth) but by plaine force of armes, ſlaying and killing as in a ciuill warre, they were ſo deſperate and inſolent: ſome preferred a law, that they ſhould make Pompey Preſident in theſe elections, becauſe men ſhould moue their ſuite after a lawful ſort. But Cato ſtraight was againſt it, ſaying that the law could haue no ſafetie by Pompey, but Pompey might haue ſafetie by the law. Notwithſtanding, when he ſaw this trouble continue of a long time without any Conſuls in ROME, and that daily there were three camps in the market place, that it was almoſt impoſſible to preuent the miſchiefe at hand, and to ſtay that it ſhould go no further: then he thought it better, that the Senate of their owne goodwils, rather then by compulſion, ſhould put the gouernment of the ſtate into Pompeys hands alone, chuſing the leſſer euill, to withſtand the greater, and ſo to yeeld to the abſolute gouernment without conſtraint, which the ſedition would bring it vnto. Therefore Bibulus, Catoes friend and kinſman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would chuſe Pompey ſole Conſull: For, ſaid he, either the commonwealth ſhall be well gouerned by him, or elſe ROME ſhall ſerue an ill Lord. Cato then riſing vp, beyond all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and ſaid, that the citie were better to haue one ſouereigne Magiſtrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could giue preſent order for the pacifying of this confuſion, and that he would be carefull to preſerue the citie, when he ſaw that they truſted him with the gouernment thereof. Thus was Pompey by Catoes meanes choſen ſole Conſull. Then he ſent for Cato to come to his gardens to him, which were in the ſuburbes of the citie. Cato went thither, and was receiued with as great honour and courteſie of Pompey as could be deuiſed: & in the end, after he had giuen him great thanks for the honors he had done him, he prayed him to affoord him his aduice and counſell in his gouernment. Cato anſwered him thus: That he had not ſpoken any thing before that time in reſpect of any ill wil he bare him, neither that he deliuered this laſt opinion of his in reſpect of his friendſhip, but wholly for the commonwealths ſake: howbeit otherwiſe, that for his owne priuate affaires, if he thought good to vſe his aduice, whenſoeuer it pleaſed him to aske his opinion, he would tell him the beſt he could. But for common cauſes, that he would alwaies tell what he thought, though he neuer asked him: and in fine, he performed all he ſaid. For, firſt of all, when Pompey did ſet grieuous penalties and new fines, vpon their heads which had bought the peoples voyces for money, Cato counſelled him to prouide for things to come, and to let that alone which was already paſt. For, ſaid he, it is a hard thing to determine any certaine time, in the which a man ſhould ſeeke to reforme the faults that are paſt: and furthermore, if the puniſhments appointed were neuer then the offences committed, then they ſhould do wrong vnto them that were already accuſed, to puniſh them by a new law law which they had not offended. Afterwards alſo, certaine men of good calling (Pompeys friends) being accuſed, Cato perceiuing that Pompey grew remiſſe, and yeelded in many things, he ſharply reproued and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by law taken away the praiſes which were wont to be ſpoken of the offenders that were accuſed, he himſelfe notwithſtanding hauing written an Oration in the praiſe of Munatius Plancus, ſent it vnto the Iudges, whileſt his cauſe was a hearing. Cato being one of the Iudges at that time, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, and would not haue it read. Wherefore Plancus refuſed him for one of his Iudges, after his cauſe was pleaded vnto: howbeit he was condemned notwithſtanding. To conclude, Cato was ſuch a griefe and trouble vnto them that were accuſed, that they could not tell well how to deale with him. For, once they durſt not let him be any of their Iudges, neither could they well alſo refuſe him. For there were many that were condemned, which refuſing Cato, ſeemed vnto others that they were guilty: and many alſo were ſhamefully reproued, becauſe they would not accept Cato for their Iudge, when he was offered them. Things proceeding in this ſort at Rome, Cæſar remained in Gavle with his armie, where he made warres: neuertheleſſe he wanne him friends ſtill in Rome, by gifts and money, and made himſelfe very ſtrong. Now appeared Catoes predictions and forewarnings true vnto Pompey, and beganne to quicken his ſpirits which had ſlept ſo long, and made him then to conſider of the danger, the which before he could not be perſwaded to beleeue. But perceiuing his ſlackneſſe and feare withall, doubting how to proceede: to preuent Cæſars practiſes, Cato determined to ſue to be Conſull, with intent either to make him leaue his army, or elſe to find out the practiſe he intended. Catoes competitors, they were both of them very honeſt men alſo, of the which Sulpitius had receiued great honour and preferment by Catoes credit and authority: in reſpect whereof many thought that it was ſcant honeſtly done of Sulpitius, to ſhew himſelfe ſo vnthankfull, as to ſtand againſt Cato in this ſuite. Howbeit, Cato neuer cõplained of the matter, but ſaid, that it was no maruell he would giue place to no man in that, ſith it was the greateſt good happe that euer came vnto him. This notwithſtanding he perſwaded the Senat to make a law, that from thenceforth, ſuch as ſued for any office, they ſhould themſelues be ſuiters to the people, and not preferre their ſuite by others. This cauſed the people to be more offended with him then before, becauſe thereby he did not only take away their fingering of mony, which they got by their voices in elections: but tooke from them the meanes they had alſo to pleaſure many, bringing them now into pouerty and contempt. He therefore hauing no face to flatter the people and to currie fauor with them, but rather ſticking to his graue maner and modeſt life, then to ſeeke the dignity of a Conſull by ſuch meanes, made ſuite himſelfe in perſon, and would not ſuffer his friends to take the ordinary courſe which might win the peoples harts, wherupon he was put by his Conſulſhip. This deniall was wont not only to haue made ŷ parties refuſed, very ſorowfull, but their friends and kinſmen alſo greatly aſhamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckening of that, but went the next morning, and played at tennis with his friends in the field of Mars, and after he had dined, walked againe in ŷ market place, as his maner was, without ſhooes on his feet, & coat. Cicero blamed him much for that, becauſe the cõmonwealth requiring then ſuch a Conſull as he, he had not carefully endeuoured himſelfe by curteſie and gentle meanes to win the fauor of the people, neither would euer after make ſuite for it, although at another time he ſued to be Prætor. Thereunto Cato anſwered, that for the Prætorſhip he was not denyed it by the good-will of the people, but rather for that they were bribed with money. And for the election of the Conſuls, where there was no deceipt vſed, he knew plainly he went without it, for his maners which the people miſliked: the which he thought were no wiſe mans part to change for any mans pleaſure, nor yet by making the like ſuite againe to hazard the refuſall. Furthermore, Cæſar making warre with very ſtout nations, and hauing with no ſmall danger and trauell ſubdued them: and hauing alſo ſet vpon the Germaines with whom the Romaines were at peace, and alſo ſlaine three hundred thouſand perſons: his friends made ſuite that the people ſhould do ſolemne ſacrifice to giue thanks vnto the gods. But Cato in open Senate was of opinion, that they ſhould deliuer Cæſar into their hands whom he had iniured, to receiue ſuch puniſhment as they thought good: to the end the whole offence, for the breach of peace, might be caſt vpon him, that the city might be no partaker of it, ſith they could not do withall. Neuertheleſſe, ſaid he, we are to do ſacrifices vnto the gods, to giue them thankes, for that they turned not the reuenge of the furie and raſhneſſe of the Captaine, vpon our poore ſouldiers which were in no fault, but

haue pardoned the common wealth. Cæsar being aduertised thereof, wrote a letter vnto the Senate, containing many accusations against Cato. The letter being read, Cato rose, not as a man put in a chafe with choler, nor pricked with enuie, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long before premeditated what he would say) declared that ỹ accusations which Cæsar heaped against him in his letters, were but prety mockes and sleights which he had gathered together, to make the people merrie withall. But on the other side, when he began to vnrip his whole intents and practises from the beginning, not as if he had bene his enemy, but rather a confederate with him in his cõspiracie, declaring that they were not the GERMAINS, nor the GAVLES, which they were to be afraid of, but of himselfe, if they were wise: he therupon so offended the Senate, and made such stirre among them, that Cæsars friends repented them they had caused his letters to be read in the Senate, giuing Cato thereby occasion iustly to complaine of Cæsar, and to alledge much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing decreed in the Senate against Cæsar, but this was said onely, that it was good reason to let him haue a successour. Then Cæsars friends made suite that Pompey should put away his army, and resigne vp the prouinces he kept, or else that they should compell Cæsar no more then him to do it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and said, the thing was now come to passe, which he had euer told them of, and that Cæsar came to oppresse the common wealth, openly turning the armie against it, which deceitfully he had obtained of the same. All this preuailed not, neither could he thereby win any thing of the Senate, because the people fauoured Cæsar, and would alwayes haue him great; for the Senate did beleeue all that he said, but for all that they feared the people. When newes was brought that Cæsar had wonne the city of ARIMINVM, and was coming on with his army towards ROME, then euery man looked vpon Cato, and the people and Pompey confessed, that he onely from the beginning had found out the marke Cæsar shot at, and had hit the white of his slie deuice. Then said Cato vnto them, If you would haue beleeued me, my Lords, and followed my counsell, you should not now haue bene afraid of one man alone, neither should you also haue put your onely hope in one man. Pompey answered thereunto, that Cato indeed had guessed more truly, howbeit that he also had dealt more friendly. Thereupon Cato gaue counsell that the Senate should referre all vnto Pompeys order: for, said he, they that can do great mischiefe, know also how to helpe it. Pompey perceiuing that he had no armie conuenient about him to tarie Cæsars coming, and that the men also which he had, were but faint hearted, he forsooke the citie. Cato being determined to go with him, sent his younger sonne before vnto Munatius, which lay in the countrie of the BRVTIANS, and tooke his eldest sonne with him. Now because he was to prouide a stay and gouernor of his house and daughters, he tooke Martia againe, which was left a widow and very rich, for that Hortensius dying made her his heire of all that he had. Therein Cæsar vpbraideth Cato much, reprouing his couetousnesse to marie for goods. For, said he, if he had need of a wife, why then did he before grant her vnto another? If he had no need of a woman, why then did he take her afterwards againe? Vnlesse she were before a baite vnto Hortensius, to keepe her whilest she was young, that he might haue her againe when she was rich. But against that me thinkes it is sufficient to recite these verses of Eurypides:

Vnlikelihoods first I disproue. For why? what man can say.
That euer feare made Hercules to turne his face away?

For I take it to be all one, to reproue Hercules cowardlinesse, and Catoes couetousnesse. But if his mariage be to be reproued, peraduẽture it is in another sort. For so soone as he had maried Martia againe, he left his house and his daughters to her gouernment, and followed Pompey. But after that time, men report that he neuer polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any garland, but to his dying day, lamented and bewailed in his heart, the miserie and calamitie of his countrey, whether they had victory, or were ouercome. So hauing the prouince of SICILE allotted to him, he went vnto SYRACVSA. There vnderstanding that Asinius Pollio was arriued at MESSINA, with men of warre from his enemies, Cato sent vnto him, to know wherefore he came thither, Pollio againe asked of him, who was the causer of all this warre. Againe, when Cato was aduertised that Pompey had forsaken ITALIE, and that he lay in campe beyond the sea by the city of DYRRACHIVM, then he said, he saw a maruellous great change & incertainty in the prouidence of the gods: that when Pompey did al things beyond reason, and out of course, he was inuincible, and now that he sought to preserue his countrey, he saw he lacked his former good happe. Now he knew he was strong enough at that time to driue Asinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would: but but becauſe there came a greater aide vnto him, he would not plague that Iland with the miſery of warre. Then after he had aduiſed the SYRACVSANS to take the ſtronger part, and to looke to their ſafetie, he tooke the ſea, and went towards Pompey. When he was come vnto him, he did alwayes counſell him to prolong the warre, hoping ſtill of ſome treatie of peace; and would in no caſe they ſhould come to fight any battell, where the weaker part ſhould of neceſſitie be put to the ſword by the ſtronger. Therefore he perſwaded Pompey and the counſellers about him, to eſtabliſh certaine lawes to this effect. That they ſhonld ſacke no city in this warre, the which belonged vnto the Empire of ROME: and alſo, that they ſhould kill no citizen of ROME, but in furie of battell, when their ſwords were in their hands. Thereby he wanne himſelfe great honour, and brought many men to take Pompeys part, by the lenitie and clemencie he vſed vnto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being ſent into ASIA, to aide them that had commiſſion to preſſe ſhippes and men of warre, he tooke his ſiſter Seruilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her: for all the time of her widdowhood ſhe had followed Cato, and thereby had worne out her ill name ſhe had before, ſith they ſaw ſhe had ſo willingly giuen her ſelf to follow him in his flying, and contented herſelfe with his ſtraight manner of life. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar did not let to ſhame her to Cato. Pompeys Captaines had no need of Cato any where but at RHODES. For he wanne the people there with his courteous vſage and perſwaſion, leauing with them Seruilia and her little ſonne, and went from thence to Pompeys campe, who had leauied a great armie both by ſea and land. There did Pompey moſt of all diſcouer his mind and intent. For firſt he meant to haue giuen Cato the charge of the army by ſea, which were aboue 500 ſhips of war, beſides an infinite number of foiſts and pinnaces, and ſuch ſmall bottomes vncouered: but ſodainly conſidering better of it (or poſſibly being informed by ſome of his friends, that all Catoes regard and counſel in matters of gouernment was, to deliuer ROME frō tyranny; and that if he had ſo great a charge vnder him, Cæſar being once ouercome, he would alſo force Pompey to leaue his army, and ſo make him ſubiect to the law) he changed his mind, notwithſtanding he had already moued it to Cato, and leauing him, gaue Bibulus the charge of all his army by ſea. But Cato therefore ſhewed no leſſe goodwill vnto Pompey then before. For it is reported, that in a certain skirmiſh & cōflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, Pompey encoraging his ſoldiers, & commanding euery Captain alſo to do the like in his quarter, the ſoldiers gaue but faint eare vnto them, and made no maner of ſhew of men whoſe hearts had bin any whit the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after thē all came & told them (as the time ſerued) the reaſon of Philoſophie, touching libertie, manhood, death and honor, and that with a vehement affection: and laſt of all, ending his oration, with calling vpon the gods, turning his ſpeech vnto them, as if they had bene preſent to haue ſeene how valiantly the ſouldiers fought for the liberty of their country: they gaue ſuch a luſty cry, and had ſuch a braue conceit & vehement deſire to fight like men, that all the Captaines were filled with good hope, & ſo led thē to battell, where they gaue ſuch a cruell charge and fierce onſet vpon their enemies, that they ouerthrew them, & put them that day to flight. Howbeit Cæſars good fortune tooke the finall end of this victory from Pompey, by his ouer great feare and miſtruſt: who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victorie, as we haue written more amply in his life. But when all the reſt reioyced that they had done ſo noble an exploit, and made their vaunts of the great aduantage they had of their enemies, Cato to the contrary bewailed the calamity of his country, and lamented that curſed ambition which cauſed ſo many good and valiant citizens of one ſelfe citie, ſo to kill and murther one another. After this ouerthrow, Cæſar taking his way into THESSALY, Pompey raiſed his campe to follow him, and leauing a great power at DYRRACHIVM, of men, armour, munition, and friends, he gaue Cato the charge of them all, and fifteene enſignes of footmen beſides. The which he did for the feare and miſtruſt he had of him, being aſſured, that if by ill fortune he ſhould loſe the battell, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a truſtier man then he: but on the other ſide if he wan the victory, he doubted ſore that he could not command as he would, where Cato was. There were alſo many other noblemen, as a man wold ſay, caſt away, & left at DYRRACHIVM with Cato. In fine, the ouerthrow of the battell at PHARSALIA being blowne abroad, Cato reſolued with himſelfe if Pompey were dead, that he would paſſe ouer all his men into ITALY, and then like a baniſhed man would himſelfe alone wander as farre as he could from the tyranny: and contrarily, if he were aliue, that then he would keepe his armie together for him, as long as he could. With this determination he paſſed ouer the ſea into the Ile of COREY, where Pompeys armie by sea lay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would haue surrendred vp his charge vnto him, as to a man of a greater dignitie, for that he had bene Consull, and Cato onely but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wise receiue it, but returned immediatly into ITALY. Cato then perceiuing that Pompey the yonger (sonne vnto Pompey the Great) of a rash and haughtie minde, would haue punished all them that went into ITALIE, and left the armie by sea; and that specially he was bent first of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproued him priuatly for it, so that he certainly saued Ciceroes life, and many other mo besides. Now Cato supposing that Pompey the Great had saued himself in ÆGYPT or in AFRICK, he determined to take ỹ seas, to meet him with all his men: but before he tooke ship he gaue all men leaue to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arriued in AFRICKE, sailing vp and down the coast there, he met with Sextus, the yongest sonne of Pompey, who first told him, that his father was slaine in ÆGYPT: when the soldiers heard it, they took it very heauily, and not one of thẽ after the death of Pompey the Great, would serue vnder any other Captaine then Cato. He thereupon being ashamed, and thinking it pitie also to leaue so many noble and good men that had serued so faithfully vnder him, without a Captaine, not knowing what way to take, nor whither to go, at their request he was contented to take charge of them, & went first into the city of CYRENES, where not many daies before, the citizens had shut the gates against Labienus. Being there, it was told him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten vnto king Iuba, who had receiued him, and that Actius Varus, vnto whom Pompey had giuen the charge of the prouince of AFRICKE, was in their company with an armie, and determined to go ioyne with them. So he went by land in the winter time, and had gotten a maruellous number of asses together, to cary water and victuals, which followed him with a great number of carts besides, and of those men, which the AFRICANS call PSILLES, to wit, they that do heale the stinging of serpents, & do sucke out the poison with their mouthes, and do furthermore charme and enchant the snakes, that they haue no power to do hurt. He was seuen dayes together marching continually, and went on foote as a guide vnto his men, without helpe of horse or beast. From that day forth, on the which he vnderstood of the battell lost at PHARSALIA, he neuer supped but sitting; * and added that vnto the rest of his sorrow, that he neuer laid him downe, but when he went to bed for all night. Cato hauing passed the winter in LIBIA, he brought his souldiers into the field, which were about ten thousand persons. The affaires on their side had but hard successe, for the contention and variance betwixt Scipio and Varus, for the which they both flattered king Iuba, to win fauour: being a maruellous proud man for his greatnesse and riches: as he shewed the first time he spake with Cato. For when Cato came, he caused his owne chaire to be set betwixt Scipio and Cato, to haue the honour to be in the midst. But Cato perceiuing it, tooke vp his owne chaire, and set it on the other side by Scipio to put him in the middest, notwithstanding that he was his enemy, and had written a shamefull booke against him. Many make no account of this fact of Cato, but reproue him, because that walking one day with Philastratus in SICILE, he gaue him the vpper hand, honoring him for his Philosophie. Thus Cato did pull downe the pride of the king at that time, who before had vsed Scipio and Varus as his noble men and subiects; howbeit Cato did reconcile them together againe. Furthermore, when all the company prayed him to take charge of the whole armie, and that Scipio himselfe, and Varus both, did first giue him place, and willingly resigned vnto him the honour to command the whole campe: he answered them, he would not offend the law, sith he made warre onely to preserue the authoritie and priuiledge thereof, neither would take vpon him to command all, himselfe being but Vicepretor, where there was Viceconsull present. For Scipio was created Proconsull, and furthermore, the people had a certaine confidence that their affaires would prosper the better, if they had but the time of a Scipio to leade them in AFRICKE. Now when Scipio was Generall ouer them, he would straight, for Iubaes sake, haue put all the inhabitants of the citie of VTICA (without respect of age) vnto the sword, and haue razed their houses to the ground, as those that had taken Cæsars part. Howbeit Cato would not suffer him, but protesting vnto them that were present, and calling the gods to witnesse in open councell, with great difficultie he saued the poore people, of VTICA from that cruell tragedie and slaughter. Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipioes instance, Cato tooke vpon him to keepe the citie, fearing lest by treason, or against their wils it should come into Cæsars hands: because it was a strong place of situatiõ, & wel replenished with all things necessary for him that should keepe it. Cato did both furnish it, and also fortifie it.

The modestie and noble mind of Cato.

Cato ioyneth with Scipio in Africke.

Cato was made gouernour of the citie of Vtica.

For

For he brought in great ſtore of corne, he repaired the rampers of the wals, made great high towers, and caſt deepe trenches round about the citie, paling them in: and betwixt the trenches and the towne, he lodged all the young men of VTICA, and compelled them to deliuer vp their armour and weapon, and kept all the reſt within the citie it ſelfe, carefully prouiding that neuer a man of them ſhould be hurt by the ROMAINES; and beſides, did alſo ſend corne, armour, munition and money vnto the campe: ſo that the citie of VTICA was the ſtaple and ſtore-houſe of the warres. Moreouer, as he had before counſelled Pompey not to come to battel, the like counſel he now gaue alſo vnto Scipio, not to hazard battell againſt a man of great skill & experience in wars, but to take time, whereby, by litle and litle, he ſhould conſume the power and ſtrength of Cæſars tyranny. But Scipio was ſo ſtout, that he regarded not Catoes counſell, but wrote otherwhile vnto him, twitting him with his cowardlineſſe in this maner: That it was enough for him to be ſafe in a good citie cõpaſſed about with wals, though otherwiſe he ſought not to hinder men to be valiant, to execute any enterpriſe, as occaſion was offered. Cato wrote againe vnto him, that he was ready to go into ITALY with his footmen and horſemen which he had brought into AFRICK, to draw Cæſar frõ them, & to turne him againſt him. Scipio made but a ſport at it. Then Cato ſhewed plainly, that he did repent him he had giuen him the preferment to be Generall of the army, becauſe he ſaw he would but fondly proſecute this war; & alſo, that if he chanced to ouercome, he could not moderatly vſe ỹ victory againſt his countrimen. Then he began to miſtruſt the good ſucceſſe of this war (and ſo he told his friends) for the Generals haſtineſſe & vnskilfulneſſe: and yet if beyond expectation it fel out well, and that Cæſar were ouerthrown, he would neuer dwel at ROME any more, but would flie the crueltie and bitterneſſe of Scipio, who euen at that preſent time did proudly threaten many. But in the end, that fell out ſooner then looked for. For a poſt came to him late that night, who but three dayes before departed from the campe, and brought newes that all was loſt, in a great battel, by the citie of THAPSES, which Cæſar had won: that he had taken both campes; that Scipio and king Iuba were fled with a few men, and that all the reſt of their army was ſlaine. Theſe newes did put the citizens in ſuch a feare and maze, (and ſpecially being in the warre, and in the night time) that for very feare they could ſcant keepe themſelues within the wals of their citie. But Cato meeting with them, ſtayed them that ran vp and downe crying in the ſtreetes, and did comfort them the beſt he could. Yet he tooke not all their feare from them, though he brought them againe vnto themſelues frõ the extaſie they were in, declaring vnto them that the loſſe was nothing ſo great as it was made, and that it was a cõmon matter to enlarge ſuch newes with words enough. By theſe perſwaſions, he ſomewhat pacified the tumult and vprore, and the next morning by breake of day he made a proclamation, that the three hundred men which he had choſen for his counſellers, ſhould come and aſſemble in the temple of Iupiter, they all being citizens of ROME, which for trafficke of merchandize lay in AFRICK, and all the ROMAINE Senators and their children alſo. Now whilſt they gathred themſelues together, Cato himſelfe went very gravely with a ſet modeſt countenance, as if no ſuch matter had happened, hauing a litle booke in his hand, which he read as he went. This booke contained the ſtore and preparation of munition he had made for this warre, as corne, armour, weapons, bowes, ſlings, and footmen. When they were all aſſembled, he began greatly to commend the good loue and faithfulneſſe of theſe three hundred ROMAINES, which had profitably ſerued their country with their perſons, mony, and counſell; and did counſell them not to depart one from another, as men hauing no hope, or otherwiſe ſeeking to ſaue themſelues ſcatteringly. For remaining together, Cæſar would leſſe deſpiſe them, if they would make war againſt him: and would alſo ſooner pardon them, if they craued mercie of him. Therfore he counſelled them to determine what they would do, and for his owne part, he ſaid he would not miſlike whatſoeuer they determined of: for if their minds followed their fortune, he would thinke this change to proceed of the neceſſitie of time; but if they were reſolued to withſtand their misfortune, and to hazard themſelues to defend their libertie, he then would not onely commend them, but hauing their noble courage in admiration, would himſelfe be their chiefetaine and companion, euen to proue the fortune of their country to the vttermoſt. The which was not VTICA nor ADRVMETVM, but the city ſelfe of ROME: the which oftentimes through her greatneſſe had raiſed her ſelfe from greater dangers and calamities. Furthermore, that they had many wayes to ſaue themſelues, and the greateſt meane of all was this, that they ſhould make war with a man, who by reaſon of his warres was compelled to be in many places. For SPAINE of the one ſide was vp

Catoes oration to the Romanes at Vtica.

» againſt him, and took part with the yonger Pompey: and the city of Rome alſo not being vſed to » be bridled with the ſnaffle of ſuch inſolencie, could not abide it, but would rather riſe with any » other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refuſe any danger, but to take example of their » enemy: who to work his miſchieuous intent, ſpareth not his perſō in any danger. And contrarily » alſo, that vnto them the incertaintie of the war, if victory followed, would make them happy; as » alſo in being ouerthrowne, their death would turne to immortall glory. Notwithſtanding, they » were to think of the matter among themſelues, and to make their prayers to the gods, that in re» compence of their vertue and good ſeruice which they had ſhewed therunto, they would grant them grace to determine for the beſt. After Cato had ended his oration, there were diuers of thē that were ſtirred vp by his liuely perſwaſions, but the moſt part of them were incouraged by his conſtancy and noble mind, and alſo by his kindnes: ſo that they preſently forgot the danger they were in, and praying him to command their perſons, goods, & weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their only inuincible captain, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to die obeying his counſel, then to ſaue thēſelues, forſaking ſo valiant & worthy a man. Then, when one of the aſſembly made a motion that they ſhould make their bondmen free, and that diuers alſo did confirme it, Cato ſaid, he would by no meanes ſuffer it, becauſe it was neither meete nor lawfull: howbeit if their māſters would manumiſſe them, that he was contented to receiue them for ſouldiers that could weare any weapon. Diuers promiſed him to do it: and Cato commanded their names ſhould be enrolled that would, and ſo went his way. Immediatly after, letters were brought him from king Iuba and Scipio: of the which king, Iuba was hidden in a mountaine with few men with him, who ſent vnto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he meant to forſake Vtica, he would tary him there: & if otherwiſe he determined to keepe Vtica, then that he would come & helpe him with an army. Scipio on the other ſide riding at anker, at a point of the land not far frō Vtica, ſtaid for the like anſwer. Then Cato thought it beſt to ſtay ý meſſengers which had brought him their letters, til he ſaw what was the determination of the 300.
For all they that were Senators of Rome, were very glad men, & did preſētly make their bond-men free, & gaue them weapons. But the other three hundred which were merchant venturers, and that liued by vſury and exchange, who had the moſt part of their goods in ſlaues and bond-men, did not long follow Catoes counſell, but like men, whoſe bodies ſoone receiue heate, & are ſoone cold again when they are once gone frō the fire: euen ſo thoſe merchants, while Cato was preſent among them, had ſome good pretty will & deſire, but when by themſelues they had caſt their account, the feare they had of Cæſar made them forget the reuerence they bare vnto Cato, and vnto their duty. For, ſaid they, what are we, and what is he whom we diſdaine to obey? Is it not Cæſar himſelfe, who at this day is Lord and Emperor of Rome? Neuer a one of vs is Scipio, Pompey, or Cato: and yet now, when all men for feare (and in maner compelled) do yeeld and ſubmit themſelues, we wil needs take vpon vs within the wals of Vtica to fight for the libertie of Rome againſt him, for whom Cato flying with Pompey forſooke Italy: and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cæſar, hauing no better liberty our ſelues then it pleaſeth him to giue vs. Let vs therfore now know our ſelues whileſt we haue time, and craue mercy at his hands that is the ſtronger, and ſend vnto him to pray him to pardon vs. The greateſt and wiſeſt men of thoſe three hundred merchants had this ſpeech. But the moſt part of them ſought means how to intrap the Senators, hoping the better of mercy at Cæſars hand, if they did deliuer them vnto
him. Cato did looke for this change in them, but yet vttered not that he thought, and returned the meſſengers backe againe vnto king Iuba and Scipio, and wrote vnto them, that they ſhould beware they came not neare Vtica, becauſe he did miſtruſt theſe three hundred merchants.
Now there were a great number of horſemen which had ſcaped from the battell, who coming towards Vtica, ſent three of their company vnto Cato, the which brought him not one ſelfe determination from all the company. For ſome of them meant to go vnto king Iuba, others alſo to ioyne with Cato, and part of them were afraid to come into Vtica. Theſe things being thus reported vnto Cato, he commanded Marcus Rubrius to take care of theſe three hundred men, and to receiue the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumiſſed, without compelling of any man. In the meane time Cato with all the Senators went out of Vtica to meet with theſe horſemen, and there he ſpake to the Captaines, and prayed them that they would not forſake ſo many Noblemen & Senators of Rome as were there: and that they would not haue king Iuba for their Captaine before Cato, but to come into Vtica, where they might ſaue themſelues

the citie was of ſuch ſtrength, and beſides, ſo wel armed and victualed for many yeares. The like requeſt did the Senators alſo make vnto them, with the teares running down their cheeks. Therupon the Captaines went and ſpake with their ſouldiers. Cato in the meane time ſate him downe on a litle hil, with the Senators, tarying for anſwer. But then on the ſodain came Rubrius vnto him in great haſt, complayning of the tumult of theſe three hũdred merchants, which went about to make the city to rebell: wherupon the reſt (their hearts failing them) fell to bewaile their miſerable fortunè. But Cato ſought to comfort them, and then ſent vnto the three hundred merchants, to pray thẽ to haue a litle patience. So the Captains returned again with vnreaſonable demands of the horſmen. For they ſaid, that they cared not for king Iubaes pay, neither were they afraid of Cæſars malice, ſo that they had Cato for their Generall: yet to be pend vp within the wals of a city with AFRICANS, that were PHOENICIANS, & a traiterous nation as could be, that grieued thẽ moſt of all. For, ſaid they, though now they ſtirre not, and be quiet, yet when Cæſar comes, they will be the firſt that will betray vs, and cut our throates. And therefore, if Cato would haue them to ioyne with him in this war, that he ſhould either kill or driue away all the VTICANS out of the citie, and then that they would come into it, when it was cleare of al thoſe barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruell and barbarous condition, neuertheleſſe he told them that he would talke with the three hundred: and ſo returning againe into VTICA, he ſpake vnto them. But they then not regarding the reuerence vnto Cato, diſſembling no longer, ſaid openly, that they would not like of him whatſoeuer he were, that ſhould compel them to make war with Cæſar, both becauſe they would not, nor cold not do it. Further, there were ſome of them that mumbled to themſelues, that the Senators, ſhould be kept there till Cæſar came. Cato ouer-heard them, for indeed his hearing was not very quicke. At that very inſtant one came to him, and told him, that the horſemen were going their way. Cato therfore fearing leſt theſe three hundred merchants would lay hands vpon the Senators, he went vnto them himſelf with his friends, and perceiuing they were gone a great way off, he tooke his horſe and rode after them. They reioycing to ſee him come, receiued him among them, and prayed him to ſaue himſelf with them. But Cato prayed them againe to ſaue the Senators, and that with ſuch affection, as it forced teares in him: beſides, he held vp his hands vnto them, took their horſes by the bridles, & themſelues by their weapons, that at the length he obtained of them, that they would remaine there one day at the leaſt to helpe the Senators to ſaue themſelues. So Cato returning with them into the citie, he appointed ſome of them to ward at the gates, and put others alſo in garriſon into the caſtell: ſo that the three hundred merchants quaked for feare, leſt he would haue bin reuenged of them, becauſe of their return with him. Therupon they ſent vnto Cato, humbly to pray him to come vnto them in any caſe. But the Senators flocking about him, would not ſuffer him to go, and ſaid, that they would not caſt away their ſauior and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doubtleſſe, all that were within VTICA plainly ſaw the vertue and ſimplicitie of Cato, and found that there was no fraud nor deceit in him: who hauing long time reſolued to kill himſelfe, he onely tooke that extreme paines and care for others, that their liues being ſaued, he might then rid himſelf of his own. For men might eaſily ſee, though he diſſembled it, that he was reſolued to die. Whereupon, hauing comforted the Senators, he yeelded vnto the requeſts of the 300. merchants, and went himſelfe alone vnto them. Then they thanked him much for his comming, and prayed him to command them, and boldly to truſt them: ſo that he would pardon them if they could not be all Catoes, and would take pitie of their faint hearts, though they were not ſo conſtant and noble minded as he. For they were determined to ſend vnto Cæſar, ſpecially to intreate him for him: and if that they could not obtaine pardon for him, then they were aſſured they could haue none for themſelues, and therefore would fight for the ſafetie of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wils, anſwered, that they ſhould ſend quickly to craue pardon for themſelues, but to aske none for him. For (ſaid he) men that be ouercome, and haue offended, it ſtandeth them vpon to make humble ſuite, and to craue pardon: but for himſelfe, he was neuer ouercome in his life, and yet had ouercome as much as he deſired; and had alwayes bene better then Cæſar in iuſtice, who only (not himſelfe) was now taken and ouercome: the thing being apparẽtly proued in fight againſt him, which he had alwaies denied to haue practiſed againſt his country. When he had made this anſwer vnto the three hundred merchãts, he departed from them. Newes being brought that Cæſar was in his way with all his army, coming towards VTICA: O gods, ſaid he, then he commeth againſt vs as againſt men. Then turning vnto the Senators, he gaue them counsell quickly to saue themselues, whilest the horsmen were yet in the citie. So shutting all the gates of the citie, sauing that towards the hauen, he appointed ships for them all, and set euery thing at a stay, without tumult or disorder, no man hauing iniury offered him, and gaue euery one money to make way for their safetie. When Marcus Octauius (who came with two legions, and camped hard by VTICA) sent vnto Cato, to determine which of them two should be Generall, he made no answer, but turning to his friends, said: How can we wonder any more, that all goeth to wracke with vs, sith there is such ambition amongst vs for the gouernment, euen now, when we are at the last cast? In the meane time word was brought him, how the horsemen going their way were spoiling of the citizens goods, as a lawfull prey in warre. He straight ran thither himselfe, and the first he met withall, he took from them that they had gotten: the rest, before he came vnto them, threw downe that they were carying away, and hanging downe their heads for shame, they went their way, and said nothing. Then Cato calling all the citizens of VTICA together, prayed them not to incense nor moue Cæsar against the three hundred, but rather to craue of him pardon for them all. Then he went againe to the peere, and there embracing his friends, and taking his leaue of them all, he brought thē to their ships. Now for his son, he did not counsel him to go, neither did he thinke it meet to vrge him to forsake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statilius a yong man in his company, of a noble courage, that was determined to follow the inuincible constancie of Cato: who counselled him to take the sea, and to saile away with the rest, because he knew he was Cæsars mortall enemy. Statilius said, he would not go. Then Cato turning him vnto Apollonides a Stoick Philosopher, & vnto Demetrius a Peripatetick Philosopher, said: You must take this stout yong man, to perswade him to obey vnto necessitie. Cato himself in the meane time sent away the rest, and did minister iustice vnto them that required it, spending all that night and the next day about those matters. Then Lucius Cæsar, the kinsman of Iulius Cæsar the conqueror, being chosen by ẏ three hundred, to go & make suite vnto him for them all, came and prayed Cato to help him to make his oration, which he should say vnto Cæsar for them all: and as for thee Cato, said he, I will kisse his hands, and fall downe on my knees before him to intreat him for thee. Nay, said Cato, thou shalt not do so. For if I would saue my life by Cæsars grace. I could do it, if I wold but go vnto him: howbeit I wil not be bound to a tyrant for iniustice. For it is an iniustice in him, to take vpon him as a Lord & soueraigne to saue a mans life, when himselfe hath no authoritie to command. But yet let vs consider if thou wilt, what thou shalt say, to craue pardon for the three hundred. So they were awhile together considering the matter: and in fine, Lucius Cæsar being ready to depart, Cato recommended his son and friends vnto him, and embracing him, took his leaue of him. Then he returned vnto his lodging, and calling his son and friends before him, and talking of many matters, among others he charged his sonne in no case to meddle in the affaires of the commonwealth. For, said he, to deale vprightly like Catoes son, the corruption of the time and state will not abide it: and contrarily, obseruing the time, thou canst not do like an honest man. Towards euening he went into his bath to wash himselfe, and as he was bathing, thinking vpon Statilius, he cried out aloud: Well Apollonides, thou hast at length yet perswaded Statilius to go his way, and pulled down his stout courage he had: and is he gone without bidding vs farewell? How, gone, said Apollonides? Nay, his heart is now more stout & couragious then euer it was, notwithstanding all the perswasions we could vse vnto him: for he is determined to tary, & to take such part as thou dost. After he had bathed himselfe, he went to supper, and sate at his meate, as he had alwaies vsed after the battel of PHARSALIA, and neuer lay, but when he went to bed: and he had all his friends & the chiefe Magistrates of VTICA to supper with him. After supper they fell into graue talke, & matters of Philosophy, til at length they came vnto the strange opiniō of the Stoicke Philosophers, which was this, that only ẏ good man is free, & al the euil be slaues. The Peripatetick Philosopher that was preſēt there, was straight against it. But Cato was very earnest against the Peripatetick & argued the matter a long time, with a vehement speech & contention: insomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to end his life, and to rid himselfe out of all those troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and saw that euery man held their peace, and looked sadly on it: to comfort them againe, and to put the suspition of his death out of their heads, he began againe to fall in talke of their affaires, and seemed to be carefull of them, as though he had bene affraid lest some misfortune were come vnto them vpon the sea, or vnto them that were gone by land, because they passed through deserts, where there was no water to be had:

Now

Now when ſupper was done,& the ſtrangers gone,he walked as his maner was with his friends, and hauing taken order with the captaines of the watch for matters of ſeruice, as the time required, going into his chamber he embraced his ſonne and his friends more louingly then he was wont to do, whereby he made them againe ſuſpect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his chamber and laied in his bed, he tooke Platoes dialogue in hand, treating of the ſoule, and read the moſt part of it. Then looking by his beds ſide, and miſſing his ſword, (which his ſon had taken from him when he was at ſupper) he called one of the groomes of his chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his ſword away. His man made him no anſwer, and he fell againe to reade his booke. Then a prettie while after,not ſeeming to be importunate, or ouerhaſty of the matter,but as though he would only know what became of it, he willed thē to bring him his ſword againe. They taried long, and he had read ouer all the booke,but yet his ſword was not brought him againe. Wherupon he called for all his men, one after another, and very angerly asked them his ſword, and gaue one of them ſuch a blow on the face, that his noſe fell a bleeding,and his hand was all bloudy withall;and cried out,that his ſonne and his ſeruants would deliuer him naked into the hands of his enemy:vntill his ſon and his friends at length ran vnto him,and falling downe on their knees, lamented, and beſought him to be contented. Cato then riſing out of his bed, looked grimly vpon them,and ſaid vnto them:O gods,who euer ſaw me in this taking? why doth no man by reaſon perſwade me, if they ſee me out of the way, and not to keepe me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doeſt not thou (my ſonne) bind thy fathers hands behind him, that when Cæſar commeth, he may find me in caſe not to defend my ſelf? I do not deſire my ſword to hurt my ſelfe,for if I had any ſuch mind,I need but hold my breath a litle, or giue but a knocke of my head againſt the wall onely, and diſpatch my ſelfe quickly. When he had ſaid thus, his ſonne went out of his chamber weeping, and all his friends alſo, no man remaining with Cato, but Demetrius and Apollonides, vnto whom he ſpake more gently,and reaſoned in this ſort:What do you thinke to keepe an old man as I am aliue by force? and haue you taried behind but to ſit ſtaring vpon me, and ſay nothing vnto me? if otherwiſe elſe,by reaſon you come to perſwade me, that it ſhall be no ſhame for Cato (deſpairing of the ſafetie of his life) to ſeeke it by the grace and mercie of his enemie, why then do you not now tell me your reaſons to perſwade me; that forſaking all other fancies and determinations which hitherunto we haue holden for good, being on a ſudden become wiſer by Cæſars meanes,we ſhould be bound the more therefore to giue him thankes? I do not tell you this,that I haue determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I liſt) to put the thing in execution I haue determined: but yet I will conſult with you, when I am ſo determined,to heare the reaſons and opinions of your bookes,which your ſelues do vſe in diſcourſe and argument together. Go your way therefore hardily vnto my ſon, and tell him that he muſt not thinke to compell his father vnto that which he cannot proue good vnto him by reaſon. After this talke, Demetrius and Appollonides being nothing comforted,weeping,departed out of his chamber. Then his ſword was brought him by a litle boy. When he had it,he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his ſword was ſharpe and would cut: when he ſaw it was well: O,ſaid he,now am I where I would be, and ſo laying downe the ſword naked by him,he tooke his booke againe in his hand, and read it ouer (as they ſay) twiſe together. Then he ſlept ſo ſoundly after it,that his men which were without his chamber heard him ſnort againe. About midnight he called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his Phiſitian, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his weightieſt affaires of the commonwealth. So he ſent him vnto the hauen,to ſee if all his men that were imbarked were vnder ſaile, & gaue his hand to the Phiſitian to be bound vp, becauſe it was ſwollen with the blow he gaue one of his ſlaues when he hit him on the face. All his ſeruants were glad to heare of that,hoping then that he deſired to liue. Soone after came Butas backe againe from the hauen, and brought him word that all were gone but Craſſus, who ſtayed about ſome buſineſſe he had, and yet that he was going to take ſhip;howbeit that the ſea was very rough, and wind exceeding great, Cato hearing this, ſighed,being ſorie for them that were vpon the ſea: and ſent Butas backe againe to the heauen, to ſee if any man came backe for any matter they had to ſay vnto him. The litle birds began to chirpe, and Cato fell againe in a litle ſlumber. But thereupon Butas returned, and brought him word that all was quiet in the hauen, and there was no ſtirre. Then Cato bade him go his way, and ſhut too the doore after him, and layed him downe in his bed, as though he had meant to haue ſlept out all the reſt of the night. Butas backe was no ſooner turned, but Cato taking his naked ſword in his hand, thruſt it into his breaſt: howbeit the ſwelling of his hand made the blow ſo weake, that it killed him not preſently, but drawing on to his latter end, he fell downe vpon his bed, and made ſuch a noiſe with his fall (ouerthrowing a litle table of Geometrie hard by his bed) that his ſeruants hearing the noiſe, gaue a great ſhreeke for feare. Thereupon his ſonne and his friends ran into the chamber, and found him all of a goare bloud, and the moſt part of his bowels coming out of his body, himſelfe being yet aliue and ſeeing them. They were all ſtricken with ſuch ſorrow to behold it, that at the firſt they were ſo amazed, as they could not tell what to ſay to it. His Phiſitiō comming to him, he went about to put in his bowels againe which were not periſhed, and to ſow vp his wound. But Cato coming to himſelfe, thruſt backe the Phiſition, and tore his bowels with his owne hands, and made his wound very great, and immediatly gaue vp the ghoſt. Whereupon the three hundred ROMAINES (in leſſe time then a man would haue thought Catoes owne houſhold ſeruants could haue knowne of his death) were at his doores; and immediatly after all the people of VTICA alſo came thither, and with one voice called Cato their benefactor & ſauiour, and ſaid, he only was a freeman, and had an inuincible mind: and this was done, when they heard ſay, that Cæſar was not farre from VTICA. Furthermore, neither feare of the preſent danger, nor the deſire to flatter the conqueror, neither any priuat quarrell amongſt themſelues, could keepe them from honoring Catoes funerals. For ſumptuouſly ſetting out his body, and honorably accompanying his funerals as might be, they buried him by the ſea ſide, where at this preſent time is to be ſeene his image, holding a ſword in his hand. After that, they made their beſt way to ſaue themſelues and their city. Now Cæſar being aduertiſed by them that came vnto him, how Cato ſtirred not from VTICA, nor fled not, but ſent all others away, ſauing himſelfe and his ſon, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing, he could not deuiſe what he meant by it. Therefore eſteeming Cato much, he made haſt with all the ſpeed he could with his army to come thither. But when he vnderſtood that Cato had ſlaine himſelfe, writers do report he ſaid thus: O Cato, I enuie thy death, ſith thou haſt enuied mine honor to ſaue thy life. For indeed, had Cato bene contented Cæſar ſhould haue ſaued his life, he had not ſo much impaired his owne honour, as he had augmented Cæſars glory. And yet what Cæſar would haue done, men make it doubtfull, ſauing that they coniecture well of Cæſars clemencie. Cato died when he was but eight and forty yeares old. For his ſonne, Cæſar neuer did him hurt: howbeit it is reported of him that he was very idlely giuen, and laſciuious beſides. For when he lay in CAPPADOCIA, in a noblemans houſe of the kings bloud, called Maphradates, who had a faire woman to his wife, he taried longer there then he might well with honeſtie; wherupon he fell to be a laughing ſtocke to the people, and in mockerie they ſaid: Cato will go to morrow, a thirty daies hence. And further, that Maphradates and Porcins are two good friends, but they haue but one mind: and the reaſon was, becauſe Maphradates wife was called Pſyche, which in the Greeke ſignifieth, mind: and Cato is a noble fellow, and hath a princely mind: howbeit his famous death did ſtop this infamous ſpeech. For he valiantly fighting againſt Auguſtus and Antonius at the battell of PHILIPPES, for the liberty of his country, their army being ouerthrown and fled, he would neither flie nor hide himſelfe, but running in amongſt his enemies, he made them know what he was, by encoraging thoſe of his ſide, which yet did defend themſelues, till he was ſlain in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantnes. Furthermore, Porcia the daughter of Cato, gaue no place vnto her father, neither for chaſtitie, nor greatneſſe of mind. For ſhe being maried vnto Brutus, who ſlue Cæſar, was of the conſpiracie, and ſlue her ſelf as couragiouſly as became the vertue and nobility of her bloud from whence ſhe came, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Brutus. Statilius alſo, who had ſaid, he would runne Catoes fortune (as we haue told you before) was kept from killing of himſelfe by the Philoſophers, Demetrius and Apollonides. But after that time hauing ſhewed himſelfe very faithfull and ſeruiceable vnto Brutus in all his affaires, he was ſlaine in the field alſo at the battell of PHILIPPES.

AGIS AND CLEOMENES.

TRuly the fable of Ixion was not ill deuiſed againſt ambitious perſons, who imbracing a cloud for the goddeſſe Iuno, begot (as it is ſaid) the CENTAVRI. For euen ſo ambitious men, imbracing glory for the true image of vertue, do neuer any act that is good nor perfect: but being caried away with diuerſe fancies, and following others humors with deſire to pleaſe the people, they may as the heardmen in the tragedy of Sophocles (ſpeaking of their cattell) ſay:

The fable of Ixion againſt ambitious perſons.

We waite vpon their beaſts, though we their maſters be,
And whereſoeuer they become, there alſo follow we.

Such indeed are they compared to, that gouerne common weales after peoples luſt and fancy: who doubtleſſe are as their ſeruants obedient at call, becauſe they only may enioy the glorious title and name of an officer. For like as in a ſhip the mariners that ſtand in the prowe, do better ſee before them then the pilots that ſteere the helme in the poope, and yet lookes alwayes backe vnto them to ſee what they command: euen ſo, they that gouerne in the commonwealth for honors ſake, are no better then honourable ſlaues of the people, hauing no more but the bare name of a gouernour. But indeed, the perfect good and honeſt man ſhould neuer couet outward glory, but as a meane to bring him to noble attempts, whereby he might procure the better credit of his doings. And for a young man that coueteth honour by vertue, giue him leaue a little to glory in his well doing: for as Theophraſtus ſaith, vertue buddeth and flouriſheth in youth, and taketh faſt roote by praiſes giuen, as wit and courage groweth in them. But ouermuch praiſe is dangerous in euery perſon, but chiefly in ambitious gouernours. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many deſperate parts: for they will not allow that honour proceeds of vertue, but that honour is vertue it ſelfe. But indeed they ſhould ſay as Phocion did vnto Antipater, that requeſted an vnlawfull matter of him: Thou canſt not, ſaid he, haue Phocion a friend and flatterer both. This, or the very like, may be ſaid vnto the people: you cannot both haue one, a maſter and a ſeruant, that can command and obey together. Or elſe the miſchiefe ſpoken of in the tale of the Dragon muſt needs happen, which was; The taile on a time fel out with the head, and complained, ſaying, it would another while go before, and would not alwayes come behind. The head granted the taile, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing how to guide the head; and beſides that, the head thereby was tormented euery way, being compelled againſt nature to follow that part and member, which could neither heare nor ſee how to guide it. The like matter haue we ſeene happē vnto many, which in the adminiſtration of the commonwealth, did ſeek to pleaſe the humors of ỹ multitude. For when they haue once put their heads vnder their girdles to pleaſe the common people, which without cauſe and reaſon do ſoone rebell, they can by no poſſible meanes afterwards bridle their furie and inſolencie. Now the reaſon that made vs enter into diſcourſe againſt the ambition and vaine glorie amongst the people, was the consideration I had of their great power, remembring the misfortunes of Tiberius and Caius Gracchi: both of the which coming of a noble house, and hauing bin maruellous well brought vp, and managing also the affaires of the common wealth with a good desire, were notwithstanding in the end cast away: not so much through couetousnesse of glorie, as for feare of dishonour, which came also of no base mind. For they hauing receiued great pleasures and friendship of the people, were ashamed to be indebted to them, and therefore earnestly sought to exceed the people in goodwil, by new decrees & deuices, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people also for their parts contended to honor them the more, by how much they striued to shew themselues thankfull. So with like strife on either side, they to gratifie the common people, and the people to honour them, were so vnwares entangled with publike causes, that they could no more follow the common prouerbe, which saith:

Although our deeds dissent from equitie,
Yet can we not desist with honesty.

This thou shalt easily find by the declaration of the historie. With these we do compare two other popular men, both kings of LACEDÆMON, Agis and Cleomenes. For they as the Gracchi, seeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the iust and honest gouernment againe of the common wealth of LACEDÆMON, which of long time had bene out of vse, did in like manner purchase the hate of the Nobilitie, which were loth to lose any part of their wonted couetousnesse. Indeed these two LACONIANS were no brethren borne, but yet did both follow one selfe course and forme of gouernment, which had beginning in this sort. After that couetousnesse of gold & siluer crept againe into the city of SPARTA, and with riches, couetousnesse also and misery, and by vse voluptuousnesse and licentious life: SPARTA then was voide of all honor and goodnesse, and was long time drowned in shame & dishonor, vntill king Agis and Leonides came to reigne there. Agis was of the house of the Eurytiontides, the sonne of Eudamedas, the sixt of lineall descent after Agesilaus who had bene the greatest Prince of all GREECE in his time. This Agesilaus had a son slaine in ITALY by the MESSAPHIANS, called Archidamus before the citie of MANDONIVM. Archidamus had issue two sonnes, Agis and Eudamidas that was king, who succeeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater slue before the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudamidas: which Eudamidas also begat Agis, whose life we now write of. Leonidas also, the sonne of Cleonymus, was of the other family of the Agiades, the eight of succession after Pausanias, who slue Mardonius, the kings Lieutenant generall of PERSIA, in a battell fought before ỹ city of PLATÆES. This Pausanias had a son called Plistonax, & Plistonax also another, called Pausanias: who flying frõ SPARTA vnto the city of TEGEA, his eldest son Agesipolis was made king in his fathers roome; who dying without issue, his yõger brother Cleombrotus succeeded him in the kingdome. Cleombrotus had two sons, Agesipolis and Cleomenes: of the which, Agesipolis reigned not long king, and died without issue. Then Cleomenes his brother, who was king after him, had two sons, Acrotatus the elder, that died in his fathers life time: and Cleonymus the yonger which suruiued him, & was not king, but one Areus his nephew, the son of Acrotatus. This Areus died before the city of CORINTH, who hauing another Acrotatus to his son, he succeeded him in the kingdome. He also died at a battell before the city of MEGALIPOLIS, & was slain there by the tyrãt Aristodemus, leauing his wife great with child. She being brought to bed after his death of a sonne, whom Leonidas the sonne of Cleonymus taught and brought vp, the child dying very yong, the crowne by his death was cast vpon Leonidas himselfe. Howbeit his manners and conditions neuer liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the common wealth, and cleane out of order, yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the ancient LACONIAN life: because he had bene long time brought vp in princes houses, and followed also Seleucus court, from whence he had brought all the pride and pompe of those courts into GREECE, where law & reason ruleth. Agis on the contrary part did not only farre excell Leonidas, in honour and magnanimitie of mind: but all other almost also which had reigned in SPARTA from the time of Agesilaus the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty yeares old, & being daintily brought vp with the fineness of two women, his mother Agistrata, and Archidamia his grandmother, which had more gold and siluer then all the LACEDÆMONIANS els, he began to spurne against these womanish delights and pleasures, in making himselfe faire to be the better liked, and to be fine and trimme in his apparell; and to cast vpon him a plaine plaine Spaniſh cape, taking pleaſure in the diet, bathes, and manner of the ancient LACONIAN life: and openly boaſted beſides, that he would not deſire to be king, but onely for the hope he had to reſtore the ancient LACONIAN life by his authoritie. Then began the ſtate of LACEDÆMON firſt to be corrupted, and to leaue her ancient diſcipline, when the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing ſubdued the Empire of the ATHENIANS, ſtored themſelues and country both, with plenty of gold & ſiluer. But yet reſeruing ſtil the landes left vnto them by ſucceſſion from their fathers, according vnto Lycurgus firſt ordinance and inſtitution, for diuiſion of lands amongſt them: which ordinance, and equalitie being inuiolably kept amongſt them, did yet preſerue the common wealth from defamation of diuerſe other notorious crimes, vntill the time of the authoritie of Epitadeus, one of the Ephores, a ſeditious man, and of proud conditions: who bitterly falling out with his owne ſonne, preferred a law, that euery man might lawfully giue his lands and goods whileſt he liued, or after his death by teſtament, vnto any man whom he liked or thought well of. Thus this man made a law to ſatisfie his anger, and others alſo did confirme it for couetouſneſſe ſake, and ſo ouerthrew a noble ordinance. For the rich men then began to buy lands of numbers, and ſo transferred it from the right and lawfull heires: whereby a few men in ſhort time being made very rich, immediatly after there fell out great pouerty in the city of SPARTA, which made all honeſt ſciences to ceaſſe, and brought in thereupon vnlawfull occupations, who enuied them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not aboue ſeuen hundred natural citizens of SPARTA in all, and of them, not aboue an hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the reſt were poore people in the city, and were of no countenance nor calling, and beſides that, went vnwillingly to the warres againſt their enemies, looking euery day for ſtirre and change in the city. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good act (as indeed it was) to repleniſh the city of SPARTA againe, and to bring in the old equalitie, he moued the matter vnto the citizens. He found the youth (againſt all hope) to giue good eare vnto him, and very well giuen vnto vertue, eaſily changing their garments and life, to recouer their liberty againe. But the oldeſt men, which were now euen rotten with couetouſneſſe and corruption, they were affraid to returne againe to the ſtraight ordinances of Lycurgus, as a ſlaue and runnigate from his maſter, that trembleth when he is brought backe againe vnto him. Therefore they reproued Agis, when he did lament before them their preſent miſerable eſtate, and wiſh alſo for the former ancient honour and true dignitie of SPARTA. Howbeit Lyſander the ſonne of Lybis, and Mandroclidas the ſonne of Ecphanes, and Ageſilaus alſo, greatly commended his noble deſire, and perſwaded him to go forward withall. This Lyſander was of great authoritie and eſtimation amongſt them in the city, Mandroclidas was alſo very wiſe, and carefull about any matter of counſell, and with his wiſdome and policy, very valiant: Ageſilaus in like manner, the kings vnckle, and an eloquent man, was very effeminate and couetous, and yet prickt forward to giue his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his ſonne Hippomedon, who was a noble good ſouldier, and could do very much, by meanes of the loue and good will the young men did beare him. But indeede, the ſecret cauſe that brought Ageſilaus to conſent vnto this practiſe, was the greatneſſe of his debt which he ought, of the which he hoped to be diſcharged by changing of the ſtate and common wealth. Now when Agis had wonne him, he ſought by his meanes to draw his mother alſo vnto the matter, which was Ageſilaus ſiſter. She could do very much by the number of her friends, followers, and debtors in the city, by whoſe meanes ſhe ruled the moſt part of the affaires of the city after her owne pleaſure. But the young man Hippomedon making her priuie vnto it, at the firſt ſhe was amazed withall, and bade him hold his peace if he were wiſe, and not meddle in matters vnpoſſible & vnprofitable. But when Ageſilaus had told her what a notable act it would be, and how eaſily in might be brought to paſſe, with maruellous great profit: and that king Agis began alſo to ſtraine her with great intreatie, that ſhe ſhould willingly depart with her goods to win her ſonne honor and glory: who though he could not in mony and riches come to be like vnto other kings (becauſe the ſlaues & factors only of the kings Seleucus, and Ptolomy, had more money then all the kings of SPARTA had together that euer raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftineſſe, and noble mind (exceeding all their vanities) he could come to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIANS againe vnto equalitie, that then indeed he ſhould be counted a noble king. Theſe women being ſtirred vp with ambition by thoſe perſwaſions of the young man, ſeeing him ſo nobly bent, as if by the gods their minds had ſecretly bin inflamed with the loue of vertue, did preſently alter their minds in ſuch ſort, that they them-

Agis goeth about to reduce the common wealth to her ancient eſtate.

How loving the Lacedæmonians were vnto their wiues.

ſelues did pricke forward Agis, and ſent for their friends to pray and intreate them to fauour his enterpriſe: and furthermore they brought on other women alſo, knowing that the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer heare and beleeue their wiues, ſuffering them to vnderſtand more of the affaires of the ſtate then they thẽſelues did of their priuate eſtate at home. Herein is to be conſidered, that the moſt part of the riches of LACEDÆMON was in the hands of the women, and therefore they were againſt it, not onely becauſe thereby they were cut off from their fineneſſe and exceſſe, in the which being ignorant of the true good indeed, they put all their felicity: but alſo becauſe they ſaw their honour and authoritie which they had by their riches, cleane troden vnder foote. Therefore comming to Leonidas, they did perſwade him to reproue Agis, becauſe he was elder man then he, and to let that this enterpriſe went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in fauour of the rich, but fearing the common people, who deſired nothing but alteration, he durſt not openly ſpeake againſt him, but ſecretly he did the beſt he could to hinder Agis practiſe; talking with the Magiſtrates of the city, and accuſing Agis vnto them, he told them how he did offer the rich mens goods vnto the poore, the diuiſion of their lands, and the aboliſhings of all debts, for reward to put the tyranny into his hands, and that thereby he got a ſtrong guard vnto himſelfe, but not many citizens vnto SPARTA. This notwithſtanding, king Agis hauing procured Lyſander to be choſen one of the Epheres, he preſently preferred his law vnto the counſell. The articles whereof were theſe: That ſuch as were in debt, ſhould be cleared of all their debts, and that the lands alſo ſhould be deuided into equall parts: ſo that from the valley of Pallena vnto mount Taugetus, and vnto the cities of MALEA and SELASIA, there ſhould be foure thouſand fiue hundred parts; and without thoſe bounds, there ſhould be in all the reſt, fifteene thouſand parts, the which ſhould be diſtributed vnto their neighbours meete to carry weapon; and the reſt vnto the naturall SPARTANS. The number of them ſhould be repleniſhed with their neighbors and ſtrangers in like maner, which ſhould be very well brought vp, and be able men beſides to ſerue the common wealth: all the which afterwards ſhould be deuided into fifteene cõpanies, of the which, ſome ſhould receiue two hundred, and others foure hundred men, & ſhould liue according to the old ancient inſtitutiõ obſerued by their anceſtors. This law being preferred vnto the Senate, the Senators grew to diuerſe opinions vpon it. Whereupon Lyſander aſſembled the great counſell of all the people, and there ſpake vnto them himſelfe, and Mandroclidas, and Ageſilaus alſo, praying them not to ſuffer the honor of SPARTA to be troden vnder foote, for the vanitie of a few: but that they would remember the ancient Oracles of the gods, warning them to beware of auarice, as of the plague and deſtruction of the commonwealth: and of the late Oracle alſo brought vnto them, from the temple of Paſiphaé. The temple & Oracle of Paſiphaé, was famous at the city of THALAMES: & ſome ſay, that Phaſiphaé was one of the daughters of Atlas, which was gotten with child by Iupiter, and was deliuered of a ſon called Hammon: Other thinke that it was Caſſandra, one of king Priamus daughters that died there, which was ſurnamed Paſiphaé, becauſe ſhe gaue all the anſwers and Oracles of things to come. But Phylarchus writeth that Daphné the daughter of Amycla, flying from Apollo that would haue rauiſhed her, was turned into a lawrel tree, and honored by Apollo with the gift of prophecy, So, they ſaid that this Oracle of the god commanded them, that the SPARTANS ſhould againe returne vnto their former ancient equality, ſtabliſhed firſt by Lycurgus law. When euery man elſe had ſpoken, king Agis riſing vp, briefly ſpeaking vnto the people, ſaid: that he would beſtow great contributions for the reformation of this common wealth, which he was deſirous to reſtore again. For firſt of all, he would make common all his arable & paſture he had, and beſides that he would adde too ſixe hundred talents in ready mony, and ſo much ſhould his mother, grandmother, kinſmen, and friends, all the which were the richeſt and wealthieſt in SPARTA. When the people heard what he ſaid, they maruelled much at the noble mind of this yong king, and were very glad of it, ſaying: that for three hundred yeares ſpace together, the city of SPARTA had not ſo worthy a king as he. But Leonidas contrarily aſſaied with all the power he could to reſiſt him, thinking with himſelfe that if king Agis purpoſe tooke place, he ſhould alſo be compelled to do as he did, and yet he ſhould haue no thankes, but king Agis: becauſe that all the SPARTANS indifferently ſhold be compelled to make their goods common, but the honor ſhould be his onely that firſt began it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had bene a good and iuſt man, or not. Agis anſwered that he had bene. Then replyed Leonidas, Did you euer ſee that he had taken away and aboliſhed any debts, or had receiued ſtrangers into the number of the citizens of SPARTA? Who contrarily thought his commonwealth vnperfect, if al ſtrangers were not baniſhed the city. Agis againe anſwered him: that he maruelled not that Leonidas being brought vp in a ſtrange countrey, and alſo maried there in a noblemans houſe, he ſhould be ignorant of Lycurgus lawes, who baniſhing gold and ſiluer out of his city, did therewithall exile debt and lending. And for ſtrangers he hated them that would not conforme themſelues vnto the manners and faſhions of life which he inſtituted, and thoſe they were which he baniſhed: not for any ill will he bare vnto their perſons, but becauſe he feared their manners of life, leſt that mingling them with the citizens, they ſhould make them run after vanity & couetouſneſſe to be rich. For otherwiſe, Terpander, Thales, and Pherecydes, which were all ſtrangers, were maruellouſly reuerenced and honored in SPARTA in old time, becauſe they did ſing in their writings, the ſelf ſame things which Lycurgus had eſtabliſhed in his lawes. And thou thy ſelfe alſo doeſt cõmend Ecprepes, being one of the Ephores, becauſe he did cut with a hatchet the two ſtrings which Phrynis the muſitian had added vnto the citherne, more then the ſeuen common ſtrings, and thoſe alſo which did the like vnto Timotheus: and yet thou reproueſt me, becauſe I go about to roote out all exceſſe and pride out of SPARTA, as though thoſe men did not farre off preuent that theſe ſuperfluous ſtrings of the muſicke, delighting the citizens minds too much with their ſongs, ſhould not cauſe them fall vnto ſuch trade and maner of life, as ſhould make the city at diſcord with it ſelfe. After this contention the common people did ſticke vnto king Agis, and the rich men followed Leonidas: praying and perſwading him not to forſake them: & further, they did ſo intreate the Senators, in whom conſiſteth the chiefe authority, to determine and diſgeſt all matters before they be propounded vnto the people, that they ouerthrew the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lyſander who was yet in office, attempted to accuſe Leonidas by an ancient law, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules ſhould marie with any ſtrange woman, nor beget children of her: and ſaid further, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould dwel any where, but in SPARTA. When he had inſtructed others to obiect theſe things againſt Leonidas, he with others of his colleagues obſerued a ſigne in the element, the ceremony whereof was in this ſort: Euery ninth yeare, the Ephori chuſing a bright night without moone-light, did ſit downe in ſome open place, and beheld the ſtarres in the element, to ſee if they ſaw any ſtarre ſhoote from one place to another: if they did, then they accuſed their kings that they had offended the gods, and did depriue them of their kingdom, vntil ſome Oracle came frõ DELPHES or OLYMPVS, to reſtore them again. Lyſander then declaring that he had ſeen a ſtar flie in the element, did therfore accuſe king Leonidas, and brought forth witneſſes againſt him, how he had maried a woman of ASIA, the which one of king Seleucus Lieutenants had giuen him in mariage, and that he had two children by her; and afterwards being forſaken of his wife that refuſed him, he returned again into his cõtry againſt his wil, and had ſo poſſeſſed the kingdom for lacke of a lawful heire. So following his accuſation in this maner againſt him, he allured Cleombrotus his ſon in law, being alſo of the kings bloud, to make title to the crowne. Leonidas being afraid of the ſucceſſe hereof, took ſanctuary in the temple of Iuno, ſirnamed Chalcœcos, and his daughter with him, who forſooke her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appeare in perſon, & making default, they depoſed him, & made Cleombrotus king. In the meane time Lyſanders office expired, and the new Ephori which ſucceeded him, did deliuer Leonidas againe, and accuſed Lyſander and Mandroclidas, becauſe againſt the law they had aboliſhed all debts, and had againe made new diuiſion of lands. When they ſaw they were openly accuſed, they incenſed both the kings, that ioyning together, they ſhold make the Ephores ordinances of no effect; declaring that their authority was onely erected for the diſcord of the two kings, becauſe they ſhould giue their voices vnto that king that had the beſt iudgement and reaſon, when the other would wilfully withſtand both right and reaſon: and therfore they two agreeing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controlment of any perſon: and that to reſiſt the kings, was a breaking of the law, ſith that by right the Ephori had no other priuiledge and authority, but to be Iudges and arbitratours betweene them, when there was any cauſe of iarre or cõtrouerſie. Both the kings being caried away by this perſwaſion, went into the market place accompanied with their friends, plucked the Ephores from their ſeats and put others in their roomes, of the which Ageſilaus was one. Furthermore they armed a great number of young men, and opening the priſons, did ſet the priſoners at libertie: the which made their aduerſaries afraid of them, doubting ſome great murder would haue followed vpon it, howbeit no man had any hurt. For Ageſilaus being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled to the city of TEGEA, and hauing alſo layed men in waite for him by the way: king Agis hearing of it, ſent thither other friends of his in whom he put great confidence, & they did accompany Leonidas, and brought him ſafely vnto the city of TEGEA. Thus their purpoſe taking effect, and no man contrarying them, one man onely Ageſilaus ouerthrew all, and daſhed a noble LACONIAN law by a ſhamefull vice, which was couetouſneſſe. For he being a great landed man, and hauing the beſt lands of any man in the countrey, and owing a great ſumme of money beſides, would neither pay his debts, nor let go his land. Wherefore he perſwaded king Agis, that if he went about to ſtabliſh both together, he ſhould raiſe a great vprore in the city, and withall, if he did firſt win them that were landed men, preferring at the beginning the cutting off of debts onely, then that they would eaſily and willingly alſo accept the law of partition of lands. Lyſander was alſo of this opinion: whereby king Agis and he both were deceiued by Ageſilaus ſubtilty. So they commanded all the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, and bils of debt (which the LACEDÆMONIANS do call Claria) into the market place, & there laying them on a heape together they did ſet fire on them. When the vſurers & creditors ſaw their writings obligatory on a fire, they departed thence with heauy harts: but Ageſilaus mocking them ſaid, he neuer ſaw a brighter fire in his life. The people then requiring that the lands alſo ſhould be preſently deuided, and the kings likewiſe commanding it, Ageſilaus ſtill interpoſing ſome cauſe of let, delayed time, vntill oportunity ſerued, that king Agis ſhould go to the warres: for that the ACHAIANS their confederates had prayed aide of LACEDÆMON, being bound thereunto by the league confirmed betweene them, becauſe they looked daily that the ÆTOLIANS coming through the countrey of MEGARA, would inuade PELOPONNESVS. Aratus Generall of the ACHAIANS had leauied a great army to withſtand their inuaſion, and had alſo written vnto the Ephores, that they ſhould ſend them aide. Whereupon they preſently ſent king Agis, perceiuing alſo the readineſſe and good will of the ſouldiers which were appointed to go with him: for the moſt part of them were young men and needy, who ſeeing themſelues diſcharged of the feare of their debts, and hoping alſo at their returne, that the lands likewiſe ſhould be deuided among them, they went with glad hearts, and were obedient to king Agis. So that the cities where through they paſſed, wondred how they came through PELOPONNESVS, from the one ſide to the other, very quietly, without noiſe or offence to any man. Likewiſe many GRECIANS calling to mind the ancient times, told one another, that it was a noble ſight then to ſee the army of LACEDÆMON whē they were led by Ageſilaus, Lyſander, and Leonidas, famous Captaines: ſith now they ſaw ſo great obedience vnto Agis by his ſouldiers, who was in manner the youngeſt man of all his campe: who alſo glorying to be content with litle, to away with paines, and not to be more coſtly apparrelled, and armed then any priuate ſouldier he had, he wanne himſelfe thereby a maruellous loue of the people. Howbeit the rich men liked not this change, and were afraid leaſt Agis ſhould giue other people example to riſe alſo, and to do the like with theirs, as he had done. Agis meeting with Aratus by the city of CORINTH, euen as he was conſulting whether he ſhould fight with his enemy, or not, ſhewed himſelfe in his counſell then, no raſh, but a reſolute and valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, and not to ſuffer the warre to come any farther, leauing ỹ entry into PELOPONNESVS free to their enemy: neuertheleſſe, that he would do what Aratus thought good, becauſe he was the elder, and Generall alſo of the ACHAIANS, whom he came not to command, but to aide them. But Baton SINOPIAN writeth that king Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he had not read that which Aratus had written for his excuſe & iuſtification, alledging there that the farmers and husbandmen hauing brought all the corne into their barnes, he thought it better to ſuffer the enemies to come farther into their countrey, rather then to hazard battell, to the loſſe of the whole countrey of PELOPONNESVS, and that therefore he licenced all the confederates to depart, and brake vp his army. So king Agis returned home againe, greatly honoured of them that ſerued with him in his iourney, finding the citie of SPARTA then in great broile and trouble. For Ageſilaus at that time being one of the Ephores, finding himſelf ridde of the feare which before kept him vnder, cared not what iniurie or miſchiefe he did vnto any citizen, ſo he might get money. For amongſt other things, that very yeare he made him pay beyond all reaſon the tallages and taxes due vnto the common wealth for thirteene moneths, adding too the thirteenth moneth aboue the ordinary time of the yeare. Wherefore perceiuing euery man hated him, and being afraid of them he had offended, he kept ſouldiers about him, armed with their ſwords, and ſo

came downe into the market place among them. And for the two Kings, he made no account of the one; but of the other that was Agis, he seemed outwardly to make good account, rather for kindreds sake, then for his dignitie of a King; and furthermore gaue it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephores the next yeare following. Wherupon, his enemies speedily to preuent the danger, gathered force together, & openly brought king Leonidas frō TEGEA, to restore him againe to his kingdome. The people were glad to see that, because they were angry they had bin mocked in that sort, for that the lands were not deuided according vnto promise. Furthermore Hippomidon was so well beloued of euery man for his valiantnesse, that intreating the people for his father Agesilaus, he saued his life, and got him out of the city. But for the two kings. Agis took sanctuary in the temple of Iuno Chalcœcos; and Cleombrotus the other king fled into the temple of Neptune: for it seemed that Leonidas being much more offēded with him, did let king Agis alone, and went against him with certaine souldiers armed. Then he sharply taunted him, that being his son in law, he had conspired against him to depriue him of his kingdom, and had driuen him out of his country. But then Cleombrotus not hauing a word to say, sat still, and made him no answer. Whereupon his wife Chelonis, the daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the iniury they did her father, & had left her husband Cleombrotus, that had vsurped ŷ kingdom from him, to serue her father in his aduersitie, and while he was in sanctuary tooke part with him also of his misery; and afterwards when he went into the city of TEGEA, wore blacks for sorrow, being offended with her husband: she contrarily then changing her anger with her husbands fortune & misery, became also an humble suter with him, sitting down by him, and imbracing him, hauing her two litle sonnes on either side of them. All men wondring, and weeping for pitie to see the goodnesse and naturall loue of this Lady, who shewing her mourning apparell, and haire of her head flaring about her eyes, bare headed, she spake in this maner vnto her father: O father mine, this sorowfull garment and countenance is not for pitie of Cleombrotus, but hath long remained with me, lamenting sore your former misery and exile: but now, which of the two should I rather chuse, either to continue a mourner in this pitifull state, seeing you againe restored to your kingdome, hauing ouercome your enemies; or else putting on my princely apparell, to see my husband slaine, vnto whom you maried me a maide? who if he cannot moue you to take compassion on him, and to obtaine mercie, by the teares of his wife and children, he shall then abide more bitter paine of his euill councel then that which you intend to make him suffer. For he shall see his wife die before him, whom he loued more dearely then any thing in the world. Also, with what face can I looke vpon other Ladies, when I could neuer bring my father to pitie by any intercession I could make for my husband, neither my husband intreate him for my father: and that my hap is to be borne a daughter and wife alwayes most vnfortunate, and despised of mine owne? And for my husband, if he had any reason to do that he did, I then tooke it from him, by taking your part, and protesting against him: and contrarily your selfe doth giue him honest colour to excuse his fault, when he seeth in you the desire of the kingdome so great, that for the loue therof, you thinke it lawful to kill your sonnes in law; and also not to regard the children he hath gotten, for her sake. Chelonis pitifully complaining in this sort, putting her face vpon Cleombrotus head, cast her swollen and blubbering eyes vpon the standers by. Wherefore Leonidas after he had talked a litle with his friends, he commanded Cleombrotus to get him thence, and to leaue the citie as an exile: and prayed his daughter for his sake to remaine with him, and not to forsake her father, that did so dearly loue her, as for her sake he had saued her husbands life. This notwithstanding, she would not yeeld to his request, but rising vp with her husband, gaue him one of his sonnes, and her selfe tooke the other in her armes; and then making her prayer before the altar of the goddesse, she went as a banished woman away with her husband. And truly the example of her vertue was so famous, that if Cleombrotus mind had not bene too much blinded with vaine glory, he had cause to thinke his exile farre more happy, to enioy the loue of so noble a wife as he had, then for the kingdome which he possessed without her. Then Leonidas hauing banished king Cleombrotus out of the citie, and remouing the first Ephores, had substituted other in their places, he presently bethought him how he might craftily come by king Agis. First, he perswaded him to come out of the sanctuary, and to gouerne the kingdome safely with him, declaring vnto him that his citizens had forgiuen him all that was past, because they knew he was deceiued, and subtilly circumuented by Agesilaus craft, being a young man, ambitious of honour. Agis would not leaue the sanctuary for Leonidas cunning perswasion, but mistrusted

all that he ſaid vnto him. Wherefore Leonidas would no more beguile him with faire words. But Amphares, Demochares and Arceſilaus, did oftentimes go to viſite king Agis; and otherwhile alſo they got him out of the ſanctuary with them vnto the bath, and brought him backe againe into the temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares hauing borowed not long before, certain rich apparell and plate of Ageſiſtrata, becauſe he would not redeliuer them againe, he determined to betray king Agis, his mother & grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did ſerue Leonidas turne, and prouoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) againſt Agis. Now therfore, Agis keeping al the reſt of his time within the temple, ſauing when he went vpon occaſion to the bath, they determined to intercept him by the way, & to take him when he was out of the ſanctuary. So they watched him one day when he came and bathed, and came and ſaluted him as their maner was, and ſeemed to accompany him, ſporting & being merry with him, as with a yong man their familiar. But when they came to the turning of a ſtreete that went towards the priſon, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, ſaid vnto him: I arreſt thee Agis, and will bring thee before the Ephores, to giue account of thy doings in the commonwealth. Then Demochares which was a great mightie man, caſt his gowne ouer his eares, and pulled him forward: others alſo thruſt him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being neare them to helpe Agis, they got him into priſon. Then came Leonidas incontinently with a great number of ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, & beſet the priſon round about. The Ephores went into the priſon, and ſent vnto ſome of the Senate to come to them, whom they knew to be of their mind: then they commanded Agis, as if it had bene iudicially, to giue account of the alteration he had made in the commonwealth. The yong man laughed at their hypocriſie. But Amphares told him, that it was no laughing ſport, & that he ſhould pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores ſeeming to deale more fauorably with him, and to ſhew him a way how he might eſcape the condemnation for his fault, asked him if he had not bene enticed vnto it by Ageſilaus and Lyſander. Agis anſwered that no man compelled him, but that he only did it to follow the ſteps of the ancient Lycurgus, to bring the commonwealth vnto the former eſtate of his graue ordinance and inſtitution. Then the ſame Senator asked him again, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The yong man boldly anſwered him, that he would neuer repent him of ſo wiſe and vertuous an enterpriſe, though he ventured his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commanded the Sergeants to cary him into the Decade, which was a place in the priſon where they were ſtrangled that were condemned to die. Demochares perceiuing the Sergeants durſt not lay hold on him, and likewiſe that the ſouldiers which were ſtrangers, did abhorre to commit ſuch a fact contrary to the law of God & man, to lay violent hands vpon the perſon of a king, he threatned and reuiled them, and dragged Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumor ranne ſtraight through the citie, that king Agis was taken, and a multitude of people were at the priſon doores with lights and torches. Thither came alſo king Agis mother and grandmother, ſhrecking out, and praying that the king of SPARTA might yet be heard and iudged by the people. For this cauſe they haſtened his death the ſooner, and were afraid beſides, leſt the people in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more people thither. Thus king Agis being led to his death, ſpied a Sergeant lamenting and weeping for him, vnto whom he ſaid: Good fellow, I pray thee weepe not for me, for I am an honeſter man than they that ſo ſhamefully put me to death; and with thoſe words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the priſon into the ſtreet, found Ageſiſtrata there, king Agis mother, who ſtraight fell downe at his feete: but he taking her vp againe, in old familiar manner, as being her very friend, told her that they ſhould do king Agis no hurt, and that ſhe might if ſhe would, go and ſee him. Then ſhe prayed that they would alſo let her mother in with her. Amphares ſaid, With a good will: and ſo put them both into the priſon houſe, and made the doores be ſhut after them. But when they were within, he firſt gaue Archidamia vnto the Sergeants to be put to death, who was a maruellous old woman, and had liued more honorably vnto that age then any Lady or Matron beſide her in the citie. She being executed, he commanded Ageſiſtrata alſo to come in. Who when ſhe ſaw the body of her dead ſon layed on the ground, and her mother alſo hanging on the gallowes, ſhe did her ſelfe helpe the hang-man to plucke her downe, and layed her body by her ſonnes. Then hauing couered her in decent maner, ſhe layed her downe on the ground by the corpes of her ſonne Agis, and kiſſing his cheeke, ſaid: Out alas my ſon, thy great modeſtie, goodneſſe and clemency brought thee and vs vnto this death.

Then Amphares peeping in at the doore, to see what was done, hearing what she said, came in withall in a great rage, and said: I perceiue that thou hast also bene of counsell with thy son, and sithence it is so, thou shalt also follow him. Then she rising also to be strangled, said: The gods grant yet that this may profit SPARTA. This horrible murther being blowne abroad in the city, and the three dead bodies also brought out of prison, the feare though it were great amongst the people, could not keepe them backe from apparent shew of griefe, and manifest hate against Leonidas and Amphares, thinking that there was neuer a more wicked and crueller fact committed in SPARTA, since the DORIANS came to dwell in PELOPONNESVS. For the very enemies themselues in battel, would not willingly lay hands vpon the kings of LACEDÆMON, but did forbeare as much as they could possible, both for feare & reuerence they bare vnto their maiestie. For in many great battels & conflicts which the LACEDÆMONIANS had against the GRECIANS, there was neuer any king of LACEDÆMON slaine before Philips time, but Cleombrotus only, who was slain with a dart at the battel of LEVCTRES. Some write also that the MESSINIANS hold opinion, that their Aristomenes slue Theopompus: howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS said, that he was but hurt, not slaine. But hereof there are diuers opinions: but it is certaine that Agis was the first king whom the Ephores euer put to death; for that he had laied a plot of a noble deuice, and worthy of SPARTA, being of that age when men do easily pardon them that offend: and was rather to be accused of his friends then of his enemies, because he had saued Leonidas life, and had trusted other men, as the best natured yong man that could be.

The enemies did not willingly kill any king of Lacedamon.

Now Agis hauing suffered in this sort, Leonidas was not quicke enough to take Archidamus his brother also, for he fled presently: yet he brought Agis wife out of her house by force, with a litle boy she had by him, and maried her vnto his sonne Cleomenes, who was yet vnder age to marry; fearing lest this young Ladie should be bestowed elsewhere, being indeed a great heire, and of a rich house, and the daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agiatis; besides that, she was the faireſt woman at that time in all GREECE, and the vertuousest, and best conditioned. Wherefore for diuers respects she prayed she might not be forced to it. But now being at length maried with Cleomenes, she euer hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and louing wife vnto her young husband: who immediately after he was maried vnto her, fell greatly in fancie with her, and for compassions sake (as it seemed) he thanked her for the loue she bare vnto her first husband, and for the louing remembrance she had of him, in so much as he himselfe many times would fall in talke of it, and would be inquisitiue how things had passed, taking great pleasure to heare of Agis wise counsell and purpose. For Cleomenes was as desirous of honour, and had as noble a mind as Agis, and was borne also to temperancie, and moderation of life, as Agis in like manner was: howbeit, he had not that shamefast modestie and lenitie which the other had, but was somewhat more stirring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it great honestie to bring the citizens (if he could) to be contented to liue after an honest sort: but contrarily, he thought it no dishonestie to bring them vnto good life, by compulsion also. Furthermore, the manners of the citizens of SPARTA giuing themselues ouer to idlenesse and pleasure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the king did suffer the commonwealth to be ruled as they listed, so no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did let him alone: in so much as no man regarding the profite of the commmonwealth, euery man was for himselfe and his family. And contrarily, it was not lawfull for any man to speake for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperancie, and for the restoring againe of equalitie of life, the preferment whereof was the onely cause of the late death of Agis. They say also, that Cleomenes being a yong stripling, had heard some disputatiõ of Philosophy, when ỹ Philosopher Spharus, of the country of BORYSTHENES, came to LACEDÆMON, and louingly stayed there to teach yong men and children. He was one of the chiefest scholers of Zenon CITIAN, and delighted (as it seemed) in Cleomenes noble mind, and had a great desire to pricke him forward vnto honour. For as it is reported, that the ancient Leonidas being demanded what Poet he though Tyrtæus to be, answered, he was good to flatter young mens minds: for he set their hearts on fire by his verses, when they began to fight any battell, fearing no danger, they were so encouraged by them. So the Stoicke discipline is somewhat dangerous, for the stout and valiant minds, which otherwise doth make desperate: and when they are ioyned vnto a graue and gentle nature, first it lifteth vp his heart, and then maketh him taste the profite thereof. Now Leonidas (the father of Cleomenes) being deceassed, and he himselfe also come vnto the crowne, finding that the citizens of SPARTA at that time were very dissolute, that the rich men followed their pleasure and profite, taking no care for the common wealth, that the poore men also for very want and need, went with no good life and courage to the warres, neither cared for the bringing vp of their children; and that he himselfe had but the name of a king, and the Ephori the absolute authoritie to do what they listed; at his first coming to his kingdome, he determined to alter the whole state and gouernment of the common wealth. Who hauing a friend called Xenares, that had bene his louer in his youth (which the LACEDÆMONIANS called Empnistæ, as much as inspired) he began to sound his opinion, asking what maner of man king Agis had bin, and by what reason, and whose aduice he had followed in his attempt for the reformation of the commonwealth, Xenares at the first did not willingly rehearse these things vnto him, declaring euery thing what had passed. But when he found that Cleomenes was affected vnto king Agis intent, and still desired to heare of it, then Xenares sharply and angerly reproued him, and told him he was not wise, nor well aduised: and at length would no more come and talke with him as he was wont; yet making no man priuy why he abstained from coming to him, but told them that asked him, he knew a cause well enough why. Xenares now hauing thus refused him, and thinking all the rest would do the like: to bring this matter to passe, he tooke this resolution with himselfe. Because he thought he might the rather do it in warre, then in peace, he set the citie of SPARTA and the ACHAIANS at variance together: who did themselues giue the first occasion to be complained vpon. For Aratus being the President and chiefe of al the ACHAIANS, had practised a long time to bring al PELOPONNESVS into one bodie: and had therefore onely sustained great troubles in warres, and at home in peace: thinking that there was no other way to deliuer them from forraine warres. Now when he had wonne all the other people to be of his opinion, there remained no more but the ELIANS, the LACEDÆMONIANS, and a few of the ARCADIANS, which were subiect to the LACEDÆMONIANS. When king Leonidas was dead, Aratus began to inuade the ARCADIANS, those specially that bordered vpon the ARGIVES, to proue how the LACEDÆMONIANS would take it, making no account of Cleomenes, being but a young king, and had no experience of warres. Thereupon the Ephori sent Cleomenes vnto ATHÆNIVM (a temple of Minerua hard by the citie of BELBINA) with an armie to take it, because it was a passage and entry into the countrey of LACONIA; howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the MEGALIPOLITANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS. Cleomenes got it, & fortified it. Aratus making no complaint otherwise of the matter, stole out one night with his army to set vpon the TEGEANS and ORCHOMENIANS, hoping to haue taken those cities by treason. But the traitors that were of his confederacie, their hearts failed them when they should haue gone about it, so that Aratus returned, hauing lost his iourney, thinking that this secret attempt of his was not discouered. But Cleomenes finely wrote vnto him as his friend, and asked him, whether he had led his armie by night. Aratus returned answer againe, that vnderstanding Cleomenes meant to fortifie BELBINA, he went forth with his armie, thinking to haue let him. Cleomenes wrote againe vnto him, and said, he did beleeue that which he spake was true: howbeit he earnestly requested him (if it were no trouble to him) to aduertise him why he brought scaling ladders and lights after him. Aratus smiling at this mocke, asked what this young man was. Democrites LACEDÆMONIAN being a banished man out of his countrey, answered: if thou hast any thing to do against the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou hadst need make hast, before this young Cockrell haue on his spurres. Then Cleomenes being in the field in the countrey of ARCADIA, with a few horsemen and three hundred footemen onely, the Ephori being afraid of warres, sent for him to returne againe. His backe was no sooner turned, obeying their commandement, but Aratus suddenly tooke the citie of CAPHYES. Thereupon the Ephori incontinently sent Cleomenes backe againe with his armie: who tooke the fort of METHYDRIVM, and burnt the borders of the ARGIVES. The ACHAIANS came against him with an armie of twentie thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen led by Aristomachus. Cleomenes met with them by the citie of PALANTIVM, and offered battell. But Aratus quaking at the hardinesse of this young man, would not suffer Aristomachus to hazard battell, but went his way derided by the ACHAIANS, and despised by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who in all were not aboue fiue thousand fighting men. Cleomenes courage being now lift vp, and brauely speaking to his citizens, he remembred them of a saying of one of their ancient kings, that the LACEDÆMONIANS neuer enquired what number their enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after, after, the ACHAIANS making warre with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was sent to aide them, and met with the armie of the ACHAIANS by the mountaine Lyceum, as they were in their returne; he setting vpon them, gaue them the ouerthrow, slue a great number of them, and tooke many also prisoners that the rumor ran through GREECE, how Aratus selfwas slain. Cleomenes wisely taking the occasion which this victory gaue him, he went straight to the city of MANTINEA, and taking it vpon a sudden, when no man knew of his comming, he put a strong garrison into it. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hearts failing them, and resisting Cleomenes enterprises, ouer wearying them with warres, he went about to send Archidamus, king Agis brother, being then at MESSINA, vnto whom the kingdome of right belonged by the other house; supposing that he shold easily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the authority of the two kings, if both of them ioyned together. Which when the murtherers of king Agis vnderstood, being afraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be reuenged of them, they secretly receiued him into the citie, and found the meanes to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him straight to death, whether it was vnwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainely testifieth) or else with his priuitie suffering them to make him away, by perswasion of his friends. But it is a cleare case, the city was burdened withall, because probable matter fell out, that they had compelled Cleomenes to do it. Neuertheless, he holding, still his first determination, to alter the state of the common wealth of SPARTA, as soone as he could possible, he so fed the Ephores with money, that he brought them to be contented he should make warre. He had also wonne many other citizens by the meanes of his mother Cratesiclea, who furnisht him with mony, that he lacked not to honour him withall: and further, maried as it is reported (though otherwise she meant not to marry) for her sons sake, vnto one of the valianteſt men of all the citie. So Cleomenes leading his army into the field, wan a place within the territorie of MEGALIPOLIS, called LEVCTRA. The ACHAIANS also, being quickly come to their aide, led by Aratus, they straight fought a battell by the citie selfe, where Cleomenes had the worst on the one side of his armie. Howbeit Aratus would not suffer the ACHAIANS to follow them, because of bogges and quauemires, but sounded the retraite. But Lysiadas a MEGALIPOLITAN being angry withal, caused the horsemen he had about him to follow the chase, who pursued so fiercely, that they came amongst vines, wals and ditches, where he was driuen to disperse his men, and yet could not get out. Cleomenes perceiuing it, sent the light horsemen of the TARENTINES and CRETANS against him: of whom Lysiadas valiantly fighting was slaine. Then the LACEDÆMONIANS being couragious for this victory, came with great cries; and giuing a fierce charge vpon the ACHAIANS, ouerthrew their whole armie, and slue a maruellous number of them: but yet Cleomenes at their request suffered them to take vp the dead bodies of their men to burie them. For Lysiadas corpes, he caused it to be brought vnto him, and putting a purple robe vpon it, and a crown on his head, sent it in this array vnto the very gates of the city of MEGALIPOLIS. It was that selfe Lysiadas, who giuing ouer the tyranny and gouernment of MEGALIPOLIS, made it a popular state, and free citie, and ioyned it to the ACHAIANS. After this victory, Cleomenes that determined greater matters and attempts, perswaded himselfe that if he might once come to stablish the affaires of the common welth at SPARTA to his mind, he might then easily ouercome the ACHAIANS, brake with his father in law Megistonus, and told him that it was necessarie to take away the authoritie of the Ephores, and to make diuision of the lands among the SPARTANS: and then being brought to equalitie, to encourage them to recouer the Empire of GREECE againe vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, which their predecessors before them held and enioyed. Megistonus granting his good will and furtherance, ioyned two or three of his friends more vnto him. It chanced at that time, that one of the Ephores lying in the temple of Pasiphaë, had a maruellous dreame in the night. For he thought he saw but one chaire standing where the Ephori did vse to sit to giue audience, and that the other foure which were wont to be there, were taken away; and that maruelling at it, he heard a voice out of the temple that said, That was the best for SPARTA. He declaring this dreame the next morning vnto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feele him, or that he had heard some inkling of his intent. But when he perswaded himselfe that the other meant good faith, and lyed not vnto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpose; and taking with him vnto the camp, all those SPARTANS which he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and took the cities of HERÆA and ALEA, confederates of the ACHAIANS, & victualled

Cleomenes did set the Lacedemonians and Achaians together by the eares.

ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the city of MANTINEA. In fine, he ſo wearied and ouerharried ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS by long iourneys, that at length they beſought him he wold let them remaine in ARCADIA, to repoſe themſelues there. In the meane time, Cleomenes with his ſtrangers which he had hired, returned again vnto SPARTA, and imparted his intent by the way vnto them he truſted beſt, and marched at his owne eaſe, that he might take the Ephores at ſupper. When he came neare vnto the citie, he ſent Euryclidas before, into the hall of the Ephores, as though ho brought them newes out of the campe from him. After him, he ſent alſo Therician and Phœbis, and two other that had bene brought vp with him, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a few ſouldiers. Now whileſt Euryclidas was talking with the Ephores, they alſo came in vpon them with their ſwords drawne, and did ſet vpon the Ephores. Ageſilaus was hurt firſt of all, and falling downe, made as though he had bene ſlaine; but by litle and litle he crept out of the hall and got ſecretly into a chappell conſecrated vnto Feare, the which was wont euer to be kept ſhut, but then by chance was left open: when he was come in, he ſhut the doore faſt to him. The other foure of the Ephores were ſlaine preſently, and aboue ten moe beſides, which came to defend them. Furthermore, for them that ſate ſtil and ſtirred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keepe any man that was deſirous to go out of the citie: but moreouer, they pardoned Ageſilaus, who came the next morning out of the chappell of Feare. Amongſt the LACEDÆMONIANS in the citie of SPARTA, there are not onely temples of Feare and Death, but alſo of Laughter, and of many other ſuch paſſions of the mind. They do worſhip Feare, not as other ſpirits and diuels that are hurtfull, but becauſe they are perſwaded that nothing preſerueth a common wealth better than feare. Wherefore the Ephori (as Ariſtotle witneſſeth) when they are created, do by publike proclamation command all the SPARTANS to ſhaue their chinnes, and to obey the law, leſt they ſhould make them feele the rigour of the law. They brought in the ſhauing of their chins, in my opinion, to enure yong men to obey the Magiſtrates euen in trifles. Moreouer, it ſeemes that men in old time did eſteeme fortitude to be no taking away of feare, but rather a feare and lothneſſe to incurre ſhame. For commonly thoſe that are moſt afraid to offend the law, are in the field moſt valiant againſt their enemie, and ſhun no perill to winne fame and honeſt reputation. And therefore it was wiſely ſaid of one:

That feare cannot be without ſhamefaſtneſſe.

And ſo Homer in a certaine place made Hellen ſay vnto king Priamus:

Of truth I do confeſſe deare father in law,
You are the man of whom I ſtand in aw,
And reuerence moſt of all that euer I ſaw.

And in another place, ſpeaking of the GRECIAN ſouldiers, he ſaith thus:

For feare of their Captaines they ſpake not a word.

For men do vſe to reuerence them whom they feare. And this was the cauſe why the chappell of Feare was by the hall of the Ephores, hauing in maner a princely and abſolute authoritie. The next morning Cleomenes baniſhed by trumpet foure ſcore citizens of SPARTA, and ouerthrew all the chaires of the Ephores but one onely, the which he reſerued for himſelfe to ſit in to giue audience. Then calling the people to counſell, he gaue them account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had ioyned the Senators with the kings, and how the citie had bene gouerned a long time by them, without helpe of any other officers. Notwithſtanding afterwards the city hauing great warres with the MESSINIANS the kings being alwayes employed in that warre, whereby they could not attend the affaires of the commonwealth at home, did chuſe certaine of their friends to ſit in iudgement in their ſteads, to determine controuerſies of law, which were called Ephores, and did gouerne long time as the kings miniſters; howbeit that afterwards, by litle and litle, they tooke vpon them abſolute gouernment by themſelues. And for manifeſt proofe hereof, you ſee that at this preſent time when the Ephori do ſend for the king, the firſt and ſecond time he refuſed to come, but the third time he riſeth and goeth vnto them. The firſt man that gaue the Ephores this authoritie, was Aſteropus, one of the Ephores, many yeares after the firſt inſtitution of the kings: and yet if they had gouerned diſcreetly, peraduenture they might haue continued longer. But they licentiouſly abuſing their authoritie, by ſuppreſſing the lawfull gouernours inſtituted of old time, taking vpon them to baniſh ſome of their kings, and putting other of them alſo to death, without law and iuſtice, & threatning others that deſire desire to restore that noble and former blessed gouernment vnto SPARTA againe: all these things I say, are in no wise to be suffered any longer. And therefore if it had bin possible to haue banished all these plagues of the commonwealth out of SPARTA, brought from forraine nations, (I meane, pleasures, pastimes, money, debts, and vsuries, and others yet more ancient, pouertie and riches) he might then haue esteemed himselfe the happiest king that euer was, if like a good Phisitian he had cured his country in that infection without griefe or sorow. But in that he was constrained to begin with bloud, he followed Lycurgus example, who being neither king nor other Magistrate, but a priuate citizen onely, taking vpon him the authoritie of the king, boldly came into the market place with force and armed men, and made king Charilaus that then reigned, so affraid, that he was driuen to take sanctuarie in one of the temples. But the king being a Prince of a noble nature, and louing the honour of his countrey, tooke part with Lycurgus, adding to his aduice and counsell, for the alteration of the state of the gouernment of the common wealth, which he did confirme. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lycurgus saw it was a hard thing to alter the commonwealth without force & feare: the which he notwithstanding had vsed with as great modestie and discretion as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profite and wealth of LACEDÆMON, giuing all the lands of the countrey also to be equally deuided amongst them, and setting all men cleare that were in debt. And furthermore, that he would make a choice and proofe of the strangers, to make them free citizens of SPARTA whom he knew to be honest men, thereby to defend their city the better by force of armes: to the end that from henceforth we may no more see our countrey of LACONIA spoiled by the ÆTOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lacke of men to defend themselues against them. Then he began first himselfe to make all his goods common, and after him Megistonus his father in law, and consequently all his other friends. Then he caused the land also to be deuided, and ordained euery banished man a part, whom he himselfe had exiled, promising that he would receiue them againe into the citie, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the citizens of SPARTA, with the choicest honest men their neighbours, he made foure thousand footemen well armed, and taught them to vse their pikes with both hands, in stead of their darts with one hand, and to carie their targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwards he tooke order for the education of children, and to restore the ancient LACONIAN discipline againe: and did all these things in manner by the helpe of Sphærus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickly set vp again schoole-houses for children, and also brought them to the old order of diet: and all, but a very few, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old institution of life. Then because the name of one king should not offend any man, he made his brother Euclidas king with him. But this was the first time that euer the two kings were of one house but then. Furthermore, vnderstanding that the ACHAIANS and Aratus were of opinion, that he durst not come out of LACEDÆMON, for feare to leaue it in peril of reuolting, because of the late change & alteration in the commonwealth, he thought it an honourable attempt of him to make his enemies see the readines and good will of his army. Therupon he inuaded the territories of the MEGALIPOLITANS, and brought away a great prey and bootie, after he had done great hurt vnto his enemies. Then hauing taking certaine plaiers and minstrels that came from MESSINA, he set vp a stage within the enemies country, made a game of 40 Minas for the victor and sate a whole day to looke vpon them, for no pleasure he tooke in the fight of it, but more to despite the enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger then they to make such a Maygame in their owne country, in despite of them. For otherwise of all the armies of the GRECIANS, or kings in all GREECE, there was no armie but his only that was without players, minstrels, fooles, and iuglers: for his campe onely was cleane of such rabble and foolerie, and all the young men fell to some exercises of their bodies, and the old men also to teach them. And if they chanced to haue any vacant time, then they would pleasantly be one merrie with another, in giuing some pretie fine mocke after the LACONIAN manner. And what profite they got by that kind of exercise, we haue written it at large in Lycurgus life. But of al these things, the king himself was their schoolemaster and example, shewing himselfe very temperate of life, and plaine without curiositie, no more then any priuate souldier of all his campe: the which were great helps vnto him in his enterprises he made in GREECE. For the GRECIANS hauing cause of suite and negotiation with other kings and princes, did not wonder so much at their pompe and riches, as they did abhor and detest their pride and insolencie: so disdainfully they would answer them that had to do with them. But contrarily when they went vnto Cleomenes, who was a king in name and deed as they were, finding no purple robes nor ſtately mantles, nor rich imbrodered beds, nor a Prince to be ſpoken to but by meſſengers, gentlemen vſhers, and ſupplications, and yet with a great ado: and ſeeing him alſo come plainely apparelled vnto them, with a good countenance, and courteouſly anſwering the matters they came for: he thereby did marueilouſly win their hearts and goodwils, that when they returned home, they ſaid he only was the worthie king that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his diet at his boord, that was very ſtraight and LACONIAN like, keeping onely three boords: and if he chanced to feaſt any Ambaſſadours or other his friends, that came to ſee him, he then added too, two other boords; & beſides made his men ſee that his fare ſhould be amended, not with paſtrie and conſerues, but with more ſtore of meate, and ſome better wine then ordinarie. For he one day reproued one of his friends, that bidding ſtrangers to ſupper, he gaue them nothing but blacke broth, and browne bread only, according to the LACONIAN manner. Now, ſaid he, we may not vſe ſtrangers ſo hardly after our manner. The boord being taken vp, another litle table was brought with three feet, whereupon they ſet a bowle of copper full of wine, and two ſiluer cups of a pottle a peece, and certain other few ſiluer pots beſides: ſo euery man dranke what they liſted, and no man was forced to drink more then he would. Furthermore, there was no ſport, nor any pleaſant ſong ſung to make the companie merry, for it needed not. For Cleomenes ſelfe would entertaine them with ſome pretie queſtions or pleaſant tale: wherby, as his talke was not ſeuere and without pleaſure, ſo was it alſo pleaſant without inſolencie. For he was of opinion, that to win men by gifts or mony as other kings & princes did, was but baſe and coynelike: but to ſeek their good wils by courteous meanes and pleaſantneſſe, and therewith to meane good faith, that he thought moſt fit and honorable for a Prince. For this was his mind, that there was no other difference betwixt a friend and hireling, but that the one is won with money, and the other with ciuilitie and good entertainment. The firſt therefore that receiued king Cleomenes into their citie, were the MANTINEANS, who opened him the gates in the night, and helping him to driue out the garriſon of the ACHAIANS, they yeelded themſelues vnto him. But he referring them to the vſe and gouernement of their owne lawes and liberty, departed from thence the ſame day, and went vnto the citie of TEGEA. Shortly after, he compaſſed about ARCADIA, and came vnto PHERES in ARCADIA, determining one of the two, either to giue the ACHAIANS battell, or to bring Aratus out of fauour with the people, for that he had ſuffered him to ſpoile and deſtroy their countrey. Hyperbatas was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, but Aratus did beare all the ſway and authoritie. Then the ACHAIANS coming into the field with all their people armed, and encamping by the citie of DYMES, neare vnto the temple of Hecatombaum, Cleomenes going thither, lay betwixt the city of DYMES that was againſt him, and the campe of his enemies; which men thought a very vnwiſe part of him. Howbeit valiantly prouoking the ACHAIANS, he procured them to the battell, ouerthrew them, made them flie, and ſlue a great number in the field, and took many of them alſo priſoners. Departing from thence, he went & ſet vpon the city of LANGON, and draue the garriſon of the ACHAIANS out of it, and reſtored the citie againe vnto the ELIANS. The ACHAIANS being then in very hard ſtate, Aratus that of cuſtome was wont to be their Generall (or at the leaſt once in two yeares) refuſed now to take the charge, notwithſtanding the ACHAIANS did ſpecially pray and intreate him; the which was an ill act of him, to let another ſteere the rudder, in ſo dangerous a ſtorme and tempeſt. Therefore the ACHAIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Cleomenes to treat peace; vnto whom it ſeemed he gaue a very ſharpe anſwer. After that he ſent vnto them, and willed them only to reſigne the ſigniorie of GREECE vnto him: and that for all other matters he wold deale reaſonably with them, & preſently deliuer them vp their townes and priſoners againe, which he had taken of theirs. The ACHAIANS being glad of peace with theſe conditions, wrote vnto Cleomenes that he ſhould come vnto the city of LERNA, where the diet and generall aſſembly ſhould be kept to conſult thereon. It chanced then that Cleomenes marching thither, being very hote, dranke cold water, and fel on ſuch a bleeding withall, that his voice was taken from him, and he almoſt ſtifled. Wherefore he ſent the ACHAIANS their chiefeſt priſoners home againe, proroging the Parliament till another time, and returned backe to LACEDÆMON. It is ſuppoſed certainely, that this let of his coming to the diet, was the only cauſe of the vtter deſtruction of GREECE: the which otherwiſe was in good way to haue riſen againe, to haue bene deliuered from the preſent miſeries, and extreme pride and couetouſneſſe

touſneſſe of the MACEDONIANS. For Aratus, either for that he truſted not Cleomenes, or for that he was affraid of his power, or that he otherwiſe enuied his honour and proſperitie, to ſee him riſen to ſuch incredible greatneſſe in ſo ſhort a time; and thinking it alſo too great ſhame and diſhonour to him, to ſuffer this yong man in a moment to depriue him of his great honour and power, which he had poſſeſſed ſo long time, by the ſpace of thirtie yeares together, ruling all GRECE: firſt he ſought by force to terrifie the ACHAIANS, and to make them breake off from this peace. But in fine, finding that they little regarded his threates, and that he could not preuaile with them, for that they were affraid of Cleomenes valiantneſſe and courage; whoſe requeſt they thought reaſonable, for that he ſought but to reſtore PELOPONNESVS vnto her former ancient ſtate againe: he fell then into a practiſe farre vnhoneſt for a GRECIAN, very infamous for himſelfe, but moſt diſhonourable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Antigonus into GRECE, and in his age filled the country of PELOPONNESVS with MACEDONIANS, whom he himſelf in his youth had driuen thence, had taken from them the caſtle of CORINTH, and had alwaies bene an enemy of the kings (but ſpecially of Antigonus, of whom before he had ſpoken all the ill he could, as appeareth in his writings, ſaying that he tooke maruellous paines, and did put himſelfe into many dangers, to deliuer the city of ATHENS from the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS.) And yet notwithſtanding he brought them armed with his owne hands, not into his countrey onely, but into his owne houſe, yea euen into the Ladies chambers and cloſets: diſdaining that the king of LACEDÆMON, deſcending of the bloud royall of Hercules (who ſetting vp againe the ancient manner of life of his countrey, did temper it as an inſtrument of muſicke out of tune, and brought it to the good, ancient, and ſober diſcipline, and DORICAN life inſtituted by Lycurgus) ſhould be called and written king of the SICYONIANS, and of the TRICCÆIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with browne bread & with the plain courſe caps of ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS, and that went about to take away riches (which was the chiefeſt matter they did accuſe Cleomenes for) and to prouide for the poore, he went and put himſelfe and all ACHAIA vnto the crowne and diademe, the purple robe, and proud imperious commandement of the MACEDONIANS, fearing leſt men ſhould thinke that Cleomenes could command him. Furthermore his folly was ſuch, that hauing garlands of flowers on his head, he did ſacrifice vnto Antigonus, and ſing ſongs in praiſe of his honor, as if he had bin a god, where he was but a rotten man conſumed away. This that we haue written of Aratus (who was indued with many noble vertues, and a worthy GRECIAN) is not ſo much to accuſe him, as to make vs ſee the frailtie and weakneſſe of mans nature: the which, though it haue neuer ſo excellent vertues, cannot yet bring forth ſuch perfect fruite, but that it hath euer ſome maime and blemiſh. Now when the ACHAIANS were met againe in the citie of ARGOS, to hold the ſeſſion of their parliament before proroged, and Cleomenes alſo being come from TEGEA, to be at that parliament, euery man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before on the chiefeſt articles of the capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by faire words or force would grant the people to bring that he deſired, ſent to let him vnderſtand, that he ſhould but come himſelfe alone into the citie, and for ſafety of his perſon, they would giue him three hundred hoſtages: or otherwiſe, if he would not leaue his armie, that then they would giue audience without the city, in the places of exerciſes, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their anſwer, he told them they had done him great wrong; for they ſhould haue aduertiſed him of it before he had taken his iourney, and not now when he was almoſt hard at their gates, to ſend him backe againe, with a flea in his eare. Thereupon he wrote a letter vnto the Councell of the ACHAIANS, altogether full of complaints againſt Aratus. On the other ſide alſo, Aratus in his Oration to the counſell, inueighed with bitter words againſt Cleomenes. Thereupon Cleomenes departing with ſpeede, ſent an Herauld to proclaime warres againſt the ACHAIANS, not in the citie of ARGOS, but in the citie of ÆGION, (as Aratus writeth) meaning to ſet vpon them being vnprouided. Hereupon all ACHAIA was in an vprore: for diuers cities did preſently reuolt againſt the ACHAIANS, becauſe the common people hoped after the diuiſion of lands, and diſcharging of their debts. The Noblemen alſo in many places were offended with Aratus, becauſe he practiſed to bring the MACEDONIANS into the country of PELOPONNESVS. Cleomenes therefore hoping well for all theſe reſpects, brought his army into ACHAIA, and at his firſt comming tooke the citie of PALLENA, and draue out the garriſon of the ACHAIANS: and after that, wan alſo the cities of PHENEVM, and PENTELIVM. Now the ACHAIANS feareing ſome treaſon in CORINTH and SICYONE, ſent certaine horſemen out of the citie of ARGOS, to keepe thoſe cities. The ARGIVES in the meane time, attending the celebration of the feaſt at the games Nemeea, Cleomenes thinking (which fell out true) that if he went to ARGOS, he ſhould find the citie full of people that were come to ſee the feaſts and games, and that aſſailing them vpon the ſodaine, he ſhould put them in a maruellous feare: brought his army in the night hard to the wals of the city of ARGOS, and at his firſt coming wan a place they call Aſpis, a very ſtrong place about the Theater, and ill to come vnto. The ARGIVES were ſo amazed at it, that no man would take vpon him to defend the city, but receiued Cleomenes garriſon, and gaue him twenty hoſtages, promiſing thenceforth to be true confederates vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, vnder his charge and conduct. The which doubtleſſe wan him great fame, and increaſed his power: for that the ancient kings of LACEDÆMON, could neuer before with any policie or deuice, winne the city of ARGOS. For king Pyrrhus one of the moſt valianteſt & warlikeſt Princes that euer was, entring the city of ARGOS by force, could not keepe it, but was ſlaine there, and the moſt part of his army: wherby euery man wondered greatly at the diligence and counſell of Cleomenes. And where euery man did mocke him before, when Cleomenes ſaid that he would follow Solon and Lycurgus, in making the citizens goods common, and diſcharging all debts: they were then clearely perſwaded, that he only was the cauſe and meane of that great change which they ſaw in the courage of the SPARTANS, who were before ſo weake and out of heart, that they hauing no courage to defend themſelues, the ÆTOLIANS entring LACONIA with an armie, tooke away at one time fifty thouſand ſlaues. Wherupon an old man of SPARTA pleaſantly ſaid at that time, that their enemies had done them a great pleaſure, to rid their cõtry of LACONIA of ſuch a rabble of raſcals. Shortly after, they being entred againe into the former ancient diſcipline of Lycurgus, as if Lycurgus ſelfe had bene aliue to haue trained them vnto it, they ſhewed themſelues very valiant, and obedient alſo vnto their Magiſtrates; whereby they recouered again the commandement of all GREECE, and the countrey alſo of PELOPONNESVS. After Cleomenes had taken the city of ARGOS, the cities alſo of CLEONES & PHLIVNTH, did yeeld themſelues vnto him. Aratus in the meane time remained at CORINTH, and there did buſily accuſe them which were ſuſpected to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS. But when newes was brought him that ARGOS was taken, and that he perceiued alſo the city of CORINTH did leane vnto Cleomenes part, and draue away the ACHAIANS, he then calling the people to counſell in CORINTH, ſecretly ſtole to one of the gates of the citie, and cauſing his horſe to be brought vnto him, took his backe, & gallopped for life vnto the city of SICYONE. When the CORINTHIANS heard of it, they tooke their horſebacks alſo, ſtriuing who ſhould be there ſooneſt, & poſted in ſuch haſt vnto Cleomenes at the city of ARGOS, that many of thẽ (as Aratus writeth) killed their horſes by the way: howbeit Cleomenes was very much offended with them, for that they had let him ſcape their hands. But Aratus ſaith further, that Magiſtonus came vnto him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great ſumme of money to deliuer him the caſtle of CORINTH, wherein there was a great garriſon of the ACHAIANS. But he anſwered againe, that things were not in his power, but rather that he was ſubiect to their power. Now Cleomenes departing frõ the city of ARGOS, ouercame the TROEZENIANS, the EPIDAVRIANS, and the HERMIONIANS. After that, he came vnto CORINTH, and preſently intrenched the caſtle there round about, and ſending for Aratus friends and factors, commanded them to keepe his houſe and goods carefully for him; and ſent Trytimallus MESSINIAN againe vnto him, to pray him to be contented that the caſtle might be kept indifferently betwixt the ACHAIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, promiſing him priuatly to double the penſion that king Ptolomy gaue him. But Aratus refuſing it, ſent his ſonne vnto Antigonus with other hoſtages, and perſwaded the ACHAIANS to deliuer vp the caſtle of CORINTH into Antigonus hands. Cleomenes vnderſtanding it, entred with his armie into the country of the SICYONIANS, and deſtroyed it as he went, and took Aratus goods and money of the gift of the CORINTHIANS by decree. Now Antigonus in the meane time being paſſed the mountaine of Gerania with a great power, Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the ISTHMVS or the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, but the wayes of the mountaines of Onienes; determining to keepe euery one of them againſt the MACEDONIANS, with intent to conſume them rather by time then to fight a battell with an armie, ſo good ſouldiers, and well trained as they were. Cleomenes following this determination, did put Antigonus to great trouble, becauſe he had not in time prouided for corne, and could not win the paſſage by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with

with ſuch guard and ſouldiers. Then Antigonus ſtealing ſecretly into the hauen of LECHÆVM, he was ſtoutly repulſed, and loſt a number of his men: whereupon Cleomenes and his men being couragious for this victory, went quietly to ſupper. Antigonus on the other ſide fel into deſpaire to ſee him brought by neceſſitie into ſuch hard termes. Wherefore he determined to go to the temple of Iuno, and from thence to paſſe his armie by ſea into the citie of SICYONE, the which required a long time, and great preparation. But the ſame night there came ſome of Aratus friends of the ARGIVES, who coming from ARGOS by ſea, brought newes that the ARGIVES were rebelled againſt Cleomenes. The practiſer of this rebellion was one Ariſtoteles, who eaſily brought the people vnto it, that were already offended with Cleomenes, that had promiſed to paſſe a law for the clearing of debts, but performed it not according to their expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thouſand and fiue hundred men which Antigonus gaue him, went by ſea vnto EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit Ariſtoteles taried not his coming, but taking them of the citie with him, went and beſieged the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS within the caſtell, being aided by Timoxenus, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiuing aduertiſement hereof, about the ſecond watch of the night, ſent for Megiſtonus in haſt, and commanded him in anger ſpeedily to go and aide their men that were in the citie of ARGOS. For it was Megiſtonus himſelfe that promiſed Cleomenes the fidelitie of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driuing them out of the citie, which he ſuſpected. So ſending him away forthwith with two thouſand men, he attended Antigonus, and comforted the CORINTHIANS the beſt he could: aduertiſing them that it was but a little mutinie of a few, that chanced in the citie of ARGOS. Megiſtonus being come to ARGOS, and ſlaine in battell, fighting for the LACEDÆMONIANS in garriſon there, who being in great diſtreſſe, and ſcant able to keep the caſtel againſt the enemies) ſent ſundrie meſſengers vnto Cleomenes, to pray him to ſend them immediate aide. Cleomenes then being affraid that the enemies hauing taken ARGOS, would ſtoppe his way to returne backe into his countrey, who hauing opportunitie ſafely to ſpoile LACONIA, and alſo to beſiege the citie ſelfe of SPARTA that had but a few men to defend it, he departed with his armie from CORINTH. Immediatly after came Antigonus and tooke it from him, and put a ſtrong garriſon into it. When Cleomenes came before the citie of ARGOS, he ſcaled the walles, and breaking the vaults and arches of the place called Aſpis, entred into the citie, and ioyned with his garriſon there, which yet reſiſted the ACHAIANS: and taking other parts of the ſame alſo, aſſaulted the walles, and cleared the ſtreets in ſuch ſort, that not an enemie durſt be ſeene, for feare of the archers of the CRETANS. In the meane time, when he ſaw Antigonus a farre off, coming downe the hilles into the valley with his footemen, and that his horſemen alſo came vpon the ſpurre into the citie, deſpairing then that he could any longer keepe it, he gathered all his men together, and ſafely going downe by the walles, retired without loſſe of anie man. So, when in ſhort time he had conquered much, and had almoſt wonne all within PELOPONNESVS, in ſhorter ſpace alſo he loſt all againe. For, of the confederates that were in his campe, ſome did preſently forſake him, others alſo immediatly after ſurrendred vp the townes vnto Antigonus. Cleomenes being thus oppreſſed with the fortune of warre, when he came backe to TEGEA with the reſt of his armie, newes came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, which grieued him as much as the loſſe of all his conqueſts: for he was aduertiſed of the death of his wife Agiates, whom he loued ſo dearely, that in the middeſt of his chiefeſt proſperitie & victories, he made often iourneys to SPARTA to ſee her. It could not be but a marueilous griefe vnto Cleomenes, who being a young man, had loſt ſo vertuous and faire a yong Ladie, ſo dearely beloued of him; and yet he gaue not place to his ſorrow, neither did griefe ouercome his noble courage, but he vſed the ſelfe ſame voice, apparell, and countenance that he did before. Then taking order with his priuate captaines about his affaires, and hauing prouided alſo for the ſafety of the TEGEANS, he went the next morning by break of day vnto SPARTA. After he had priuatly lamented & ſorowed for his wiues death, with his mother and children, he preſently bent his mind againe to publike cauſes. Now Cleomenes had ſent vnto Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, who had promiſed him aide, but vpon demand, to haue his mother and children in pledge. So he was a long time before he would for ſhame make his mother priuie vnto it, and went oftentimes of purpoſe to let her vnderſtand it: but when he came he had not the heart to breake it to her. She firſt ſuſpecting the thing, asked Cleomenes friends, if her ſonne had not ſomewhat to ſay vnto her, that he durſt not vtter. Whereupon, in fine he gaue the venture, and brake the matter to her. When she heard it, she fell a laughing, and told him: Why, how cometh it to passe, that thou hast kept it thus long, and wouldest not tell me? Come, come, said she, put me straight into a ship, and send me whither thou wilt, that this bodie of mine may do some good vnto my country, before crooked age consume my life without profite. Then all things being prepared for their iourney, they went by land, accompanied with the armie, vnto the head of Tænarus: where Cratesiclea being ready to imbarke, she tooke Cleomenes aside into the temple of Neptune, and embracing and kissing him, perceiuing that his heart yearned for sorow of her departure, she said vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, let no man see for shame when we come out of the temple, that we haue wept and dishonored SPARTA: for that onely is in our power; as for the rest, as it pleaseth the gods so let it be. When she had spoken these words, and fashioned her countenance againe, she went then to take her ship with a little sonne of Cleomenes, and commanded the master of the shippe to hoise saile. Now when she was arriued in ÆGYPT, and vnderstood that king Ptolemy receiued Ambassadours from Antigonus, and were in talke to make peace with him: and hearing also that Cleomenes being requested by the ACHAIANS to make peace with them, durst not hearken to it, and end that warre, without king Ptolemyes consent, and because of his mother: she wrote vnto him, that he should not spare to do any thing that should be expedient for the honour of SPARTA, without feare of displeasing Ptolemy, or for regard of an old woman, and a young boy. Such was the noble mind of this worthie Lady in her sonne Cleomenes aduersitie. Furthermore, Antigonus hauing taken the citie of TEGEA, and sacked the other cities of ORCHOMENE & MANTINEA, Cleomenes seeing himselfe brought to defend the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumisse all the ILOTES, (which were the slaues of LACEDÆMON) paying fiue Attica Minas a man. With that mony he made the summe of fiue hundred talents, and armed two thousand of these freed slaues after the MACEDONIAN fashion to fight against the LEVCASPIDES (to wit, the white shields of Antigonus:) and then there fell into his mind a maruellous great enterprise, vnlooked for of euery man. The citie of MEGALIPOLIS) at that time being as great as SPARTA, and hauing the aide of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand, (whom the ACHAIANS as it seemed had brought in, chiefly at the request of the MEGALIPOLITANS) Cleomenes determining to sacke this citie, and knowing that to bring it to passe, nothing was more requisite then celeritie, he commanded his souldiers to victuall themselues for fiue dayes: and marching with the choise of all his armie towards SELASIA, as though he had meant to haue spoiled the ARGIVES, sodainly turning from thence, he inuaded the countrie of the MEGALIPOLITANS; and supping by ROETIVM, went straight by ELICVNTA vnto the citie. When he was come neare vnto it, he sent Panteas before with speede, with two bands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commanded him to take a certaine peece of the wall betweene two towers, which he knew was not kept nor guarded; and he followed him also with the rest of his army coming on faire and softly. When Panteas came thither, finding not onely that place of the wall without guard or watch which Cleomenes had told him of, but also the most part of that side without defence, he tooke some part of the wall at his first coming, and manned it: and ouerthrew another place of it also, putting them all to the sword that did defend it: and then came Cleomenes, and was within the citie with his armie, before the MEGALIPOLITANS knew of his coming. At length, the citizens vnderstanding that the citie was taken, some fled in haste, conueying such light things as came to hand, in so great a feare: and the others also arming themselues, ran together to resist the enemies. But though they valiantly fought to repulse them out of the citie, and yet preuailed not, they gaue the rest leisure thereby to flie and saue themselues, so that there remained not behind aboue fiue thousand men: for all the rest were fled with their wiues and children, into the citie of MESSINA. The most part of them also that fought with the enemies, saued themselues, and very few were taken, the chiefest whereof were Lysandridas and Thearidas the noblest persons that were amongst the MEGALIPOLITANS; wherefore when the souldiers had taken them, they brought them vnto Cleomenes. Lysandridas when he saw Cleomenes a good way off, cryed out aloud vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMON, this day thou hast an occasion offered thee to do a more famous princely act then that which thou hast already done, and that will make thy name also more glorious. Cleomenes musing what he would request: Well (quoth he) what is that thou requirest? One thing I will tell thee beforehand, thou shalt not make me restore your citie to you againe. Yet, quoth Lysandridas, let me request thus much then, that ye do not destroy it, but rather replenish it with friends and confederates, derates, which hereafter will be true and faithfull to you: and that shall you do, giuing the MEGALIPOLITANS their city againe, and preseruing such a number of people as haue forsaken it. Cleomenes pausing a while, answered, It was a hard thing to beleeue that: but yet, quoth he, let honour take place with vs before profit. After that he sent an Herald straight vnto MESSINA vnto them that were fled thither, and told them that he was contented to offer them their citie againe, so that they would become good friends & confederates of ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS, forsaking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopœmen would by no meanes suffer ỹ MEGALIPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor also to leaue their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he meant not to giue them their citie againe, but to take them also with their citie: and therefore draue Thearidas and Lysandridas out of MESSINA, that moued this practise. It was that Philopœmen that afterwards was the chiefest man of the ACHAIANS, and that wanne such fame and honour among the GRECIANS, as we haue particularly declared in his life. This word being brought to Cleomenes, who had kept the city from spoyling vntill that time, he was then so throughly offended, that he gaue the goods in prey to the soldiers, sent away their goodly tables, images, and pictures vnto SPARTA, and defaced the chiefest parts of the city, and then returned home againe, being afraid of Antigonus & the ACHAIANS. Howbeit they stirred not because of the parliament that was kept at that time in the city of ÆGIVM; where Aratus being in the pulpit for Orations, and holding his gowne a long time before his face, the people maruelling at it, willed him to tell what he ayled: he answered them: MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and razed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the sodainnesse of this great losse, straight brake off their parliament and assembly. But Antigonus thinking to aide them, sent presently for all his garrisons, who being long a comming, he willed them to stay where they were, and he himselfe taking a few soldiers with him, went vnto the city of ARGOS. Therefore the second enterprise of Cleomenes seemeth at the first sight a very rash and desperate attempt: howbeit Polybius writeth, that it was an attempt of great wisdome and policie. For Cleomenes vnderstanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in garrisons in diuerse places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the city of ARGOS with a certaine number of footemen that were strangers, he inuaded the countrey of the ARGIVES: with his armie, perswading himselfe, that either Antigonus would for shame come & fight with him, or if he did not, that thē he should put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES: which indeed came so to passe. The ARGIVES seeing their country spoiled by Cleomenes, were in a maruellous rage, and gathering together at Antigonus lodging, they cried out vnto him, either to go into the field & fight with the enemie; or else if he were afraid, to resigne his office of Generall of GRECE vnto others that were valianter then himselfe. But Antigonus like a wise and excellent Captaine, thinking it a dishonor to him, rashly to put himselfe in danger, and his friends also, though he were prouoked with many iniuries and opprobrious words, would not go into the field, but stood constant in his first determination. Then Cleomenes hauing brought his armie hard to the walles of the city of ARGOS, and spoiled and destroyed the country, round about, without let or danger he safely returned home againe. Within a while after, Cleomenes being aduertised that Antigonus was come vnto TEGEA, with intent to inuade the country of LACONIA, he going another way with his army (vnwitting to his enemies) they wondred when they saw him in the morning by the city of ARGOS, spoiling their country, and cutting down their corne, not with sickles or swords as others do vse, but with long poles in forme of sithes, wherwith the soldiers as they went sporting wise, ouerthrew and spoiled it. But when they came to the place of exercises in the suburbs, called Cyllabaris, certaine of the soldiers going about to haue set it on fire, Cleomenes would not suffer them; and told them, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honestly done. Now Antigonus presently returned backe againe, being minded first to haue gone directly to the city of ARGOS but sodainly altering his mind, did campe vpon the top of hils and mountaines. Cleomenes seeming not to be afraid of him, sent Heralds to him to desire the keyes of the temple of Iuno, and then after he had done sacrifice, he would depart his way. Thus mocking Antigonus, after he had sacrificed vnto the goddesse, vnder the temple that was shut vp, he sent his army vnto PHLIVNTA; and hauing driuen away the garrison out of OLOGVNTA, he came vnto the city of ORCHOMENE, hauing not onely encouraged his citizens, but gotten euen amongst the enemies themselues, a fame also to bee a noble Captaine, and worthie to mannage great affaires. For euery man iudged him to be a skilfull souldier, and a valiant Captaine, that with the power of one only city, did maintaine warre against the kingdome of MACEDON, against all the people of PELOPONNESVS, and against the treasure of so great a king: and withall, not onely to keepe his own country of LACONIA vnfoyled, but far otherwise to hurt his enemies countries, and to take so many great cities of theirs. But he that first said, that money was the sinew of all things, spake it chiefly in my opinion, in respect of the wars. Demades the Orator said on a time, when the ATHENIANS commanded certaine gallies should be put out of the arsenall into ỹ sea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked mony: He that rules the prowe, must first see before him: meaning, munition and victuals must be prouided, before the ships be set out. And it is reported also, that the ancient Archidamus, when the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS at the beginning of the war of PELOPONNESVS required, that they might be seised at a certaine rate, answered: The charges of warre haue no certaine stint. For like as wrestlers that exercise their bodies continually in games, are better able to wrestle, & ouerthrow them with time, that haue no strength but onely art and slight: euen so king Antigonus, who by the greatnesse of his kingdome defrayed the charge of this warre, did weary and ouercome Cleomenes at the length, because he lacked mony, both to pay the strangers that serued him, and also to maintaine his owne citizens. For otherwise doubtlesse the time serued his turne well, because the troubles that fell vpon Antigonus in his realme, did make him to be sent for home. For the barbarous people his neighbours, in his absence did spoyle and destroy the realme of MACEDON, and specially the ILLYRIANS of the high country that came downe then with a great armie: wherupon the MACEDONIANS being spoyled & harried on al sides by them, they sent post vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come home. If these letters had bin brought him but a little before the battell, as they came afterwards, Antigonus had gone his way, and left the ACHAIANS. But fortune that alwaies striketh the stroke in all weightiest causes, gaue such speed and fauour vnto him, that immediatly after the battell was fought at SELASIA, (where Cleomenes lost his armie and city) the very messengers arriued that came for Antigonus to come home; the which made the ouerthrow of king Cleomenes so much more lamentable. For if he had delayed battell but two daies longer, when the MACEDONIANS had bene gone, he might haue made what peace he would with the ACHAIANS: but for lacke of money, he was driuen (as Polybius writeth) to giue battell with twenty thousand men, against thirty thousand: where he shewed himselfe an excellent and skilfull Captaine, and where his citizens also fought like valiant men, and the strangers in like case did shew themselues good soldiers. But his only ouerthrow was by the manner of his enemies weapons, and the force of their battell of footemen. But Phylarchus writeth, that treason was the cause of his ouerthrow. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS, which he had in his army, to steale vpon the wing of his enemies army, where Euclidas, king Cleomenes brother was, to compasse him in behind, whilest he did set the rest of his men in battell. When Cleomenes was got vp vpon some hill to looke about him, to see the countenance of the enemie, and seeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS, he was then afraid of Antigonus, that he went about some stratageme of warre. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heede of stratagemes and secret ambushes, and commanded him to looke to the rereward of his armie, and to be very circumspect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed before (as it is reported) with money, told him that all was cleare in the rereward, and bad him looke to ouerthrow his enemies before him. Cleomenes trusting this report, set forward against Antigonus, and in the end, his citizens of SPARTA which he had about him, gaue such a fierce charge vpon the squadron of the MACEDONIAN footemen, that they draue them backe fiue furlongs off. But in the meane time, Euclidas his brother, in the other wing of his armie, being compassed in behind, Cleomenes turning him backe, and seeing the ouerthrow, cried out aloud: Alas good brother, thou art but slaine, yet thou diest valiantly, and honestly, and thy death shall be a worthie example vnto all posterity, and shall be sung by the praises of the women of SPARTA. So Euclides and his men being slaine, the enemies came straight to set vpon Cleomenes wing, Cleomenes then seeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no longer resist the enemie, fled, and saued himselfe. Many of the strangers also that serued him, were slaine at this battell: and of sixe thousand SPARTANS, there were left aliue but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned vnto SPARTA, the citizens comming to see him, he gaue them counsell to yeeld themselues vnto Antigonus the conquerour: and for himselfe, if either aliue or dead he could do any any thing for the honour and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly do it. The women of the city alſo comming vnto them that flying had eſcaped with him, when he ſaw them vnarme the men, and bring them drink to refreſh them with, he alſo went home to his own houſe. Then a maid of the houſe, which he had taken in the city of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had entertained euer ſince the death of his wife) came vnto him as her maner was, to refreſh him comming hot from the battell: howbeit he would not drink though he was extreme dry, nor ſit being very weary, but armed as he was, laid his armes croſſe vpon a pillar, and leaning his head vpon it, repoſed himſelfe a litle: and caſting in his mind all the waies that were to be thought of, he tooke his friends with him, and went to the hauen of Gythium, and there hauing his ſhips which he had appointed for the purpoſe, he hoiſſed ſaile, and departed his way. Immediatly after his departure, came Antigonus into the city of SPARTA, and courteouſly entreated the citizens and inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly deſpiſe the ancient honour and dignity of SPARTA, but referring them to their owne lawes and gouernement: when he had ſacrificed to the gods for his victory, he departed from thence the third day, newes being brought him that the warre was very great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous people did ſpoile his country. Now a diſeaſe took him, whereof he died afterwards, which appeared at firſt like, mixt with a ſore catarre: but yet he yeelded not to his diſeaſe, and bare it out, that fighting for his countrey, and obtaining a famous victory, with great ſlaughter of the barbarous people, he might yet dye honorably; as indeed he did, by Philarchus teſtimony, who ſaith, that with the force of his voice fiercely crying out in the middeſt of his fight, he tare his lungs and lights, worſe then they were before. Yet in the ſchooles it is ſaid, that after he had won the battell, he was ſo ioyfull of it, that crying out: O bleſſed day, he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, & a great feauer took him withall, that he died of it. Thus much touching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Iſle of CYTHERA, went & caſt anker in another Iland, called ÆGLALIA. Then determining to ſaile ouer to the city of CYRENA, Therycion, one of Cleomenes friends (a man that in warres ſhewed himſelfe very valiant, but a boaſter beſides of his owne doings) tooke Cleomenes aſide, and ſaid thus vnto him: Truly ô king, we haue loſt an honorable occaſion to die in battel, though euery man hath heard vs vaunt and ſay, that Antigonus ſhould neuer ouercome the king of SPARTA aliue, but dead. A ſecond occaſion yet is offered vs to die, with much leſſe honour and fame notwithſtanding then the firſt. Whither do we ſaile to no purpoſe? Why do we flie the death at hand, and ſeeke it ſo farre off? If it be no ſhame nor diſhonor for the poſterity and race of Hercules to ſerue the ſucceſſors of Philip and Alexander, let vs ſaue then our labour, and long dangerous ſailing, and go yeeld our ſelues vnto Antigonus; who in likelihood will better vſe vs then Ptolomy, becauſe the MACEDONIANS are farre more noble perſons then the EGYPTIANS. And if we diſdaine to be commanded by them which haue ouercome vs in battell, why then will we make him Lord of vs that hath not ouercome vs: in ſtead of one, to make vs inferiour vnto both, flying Antigonus, and ſeruing king Ptolomy? Can we ſay that we goe into ÆGYPT, in reſpect to ſee your mother there? A ioyfull ſight no doubt, when ſhe ſhall ſhew king Ptolomies wiues her ſon, that before was a king, a priſoner and fugitiue now. Were it not better for vs, that hauing yet LACONIA our country in ſight, and our ſwords beſides in our owne hands, to deliuer vs from this great miſery, and ſo doing to excuſe our ſelues with them that are ſlaine at SELASIA for defence of SPARTA: then cowardly loſing our time in ÆGYPT, to enquire whom Antigonus left his Lieutenant and Gouernor in LACEDÆMON? Therycion ending his oration, Cleomenes anſwered him thus: Doeſt thou thinke it a glory for thee to ſeeke death, which is the eaſieſt matter, and the preſenteſt vnto any man, that can be: and yet wretch that thou art, thou flyeſt now more cowardly and ſhamefully then from the battell? For diuerſe valiant men, and farre better then our ſelues, haue often yeelded vnto their enemies, either by ſome misfortune, or compelled by greater number, and multitude of men: but he, ſay I, that ſubmitteth himſelfe vnto paine and miſerie, or to reproach and praiſe of men, he cannot but confeſſe that he is ouercome by his own vnhappineſſe. For when a man will willingly kill himſelfe, he muſt not do it to be rid of paines and labour, but it muſt haue an honourable reſpect and action. For to liue or die for his owne reſpect, that cannot but be diſhonourable: the which now thou perſwadeſt me vnto, to make me flye this preſent miſerie we are in, without any honour or profit in our death. And therefore, I am of opinion, that we ſhould not yet caſt off the hope we haue to ſerue our country in time to come: but when all hope faileth vs, then we may eaſily make our ſelues away when we

liſt. Thereunto Therycion gaue no anſwer, but aſſoone as he found oportunity to ſlip from Cleomenes, he went to the ſea ſide, & ſlue himſelfe. Cleomenes hoiſſing ſaile from the Ile of ÆGIALIA, went into AFRICKE, & was brought by the kings ſeruants vnto ỹ city of ALEXANDRIA. King Ptolomy at his firſt comming, gaue Cleomenes no ſpeciall good, but indifferent entertainement: but after that he had ſhewed himſelfe to be of great wiſdome and iudgement, and that Ptolomy ſaw in the ſimplicity of his LACONIAN life, he had alſo a noble diſpoſition and courage, nothing degenerating from the princely race and bloud of Hercules, and that he yeelded not to his aduerſity, he tooke more delight in his company then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly that he had made no more account of him before, but had ſuffered him to be ouerthrown by Antigonus, who through this victory of him, had maruellouſly enlarged his honour and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honor as could be, promiſed that he would ſend him with ſhips and money into GREECE, and put him againe into his kingdome: and further, gaue him an annuall penſion in the meane time, of foure and twenty talents, with the which he ſimply and ſoberly entertained himſelfe and his men about him: and beſtowed all the reſt vpon his countriemen that came out of GREECE into ÆGYPT. But now old king Ptolomy deceaſſing before he could performe the promiſe he made vnto Cleomenes, to ſend him into GREECE, the realme falling thẽ into great laſciuiouſneſſe, drunkenneſſe, & into the gouernment of women, his caſe & miſery was cleane forgotten. For the yong king his ſon was ſo giuen ouer to women and wine, that when he was moſt ſober and in his beſt wits, he moſt diſpoſed himſelf to make feaſts and ſacrifices, and to haue the taber playing in his Court, to gather people together, like a ſtage player or iugler; whileſt one Agathoclea his lemman, and her mother, and Oenanthes a baud, did rule all the affaires of the ſtate. But when he came to be king, it appeared he had need of Cleomenes: becauſe he was afraid of his brother Magas, who by his mothers meanes, was very wel eſteemed of among ſoldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomenes to him, and made him of his priuie Councell, where he deuiſed by practiſe, which way to kill his brother. All other his friends that were of counſel with him, did coũſell him to do it: but Cleomenes onely vehemently diſſwaded him from it, and told him, that if it were poſſible, rather more brethren ſhould be begotten vnto ỹ king for the ſafety of his perſon, & for deuiding of the affaires of the kingdome betweene them. Amongſt the kings familiars that were chiefeſt about him, there was one Soſibius that ſaid vnto Cleomenes: So long as his brother Magas liued, the ſouldiers that be ſtrangers, whom the king entertained, would neuer be true to him. Cleomenes anſwered him, for that matter there was no danger: for, ſaith he, of thoſe hired ſtrangers, there are three thouſand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knew at the twinckling of an eye would be at his commandement, to come with their armour and weapon where he would appoint them. Theſe words of Cleomenes at that time ſhewed his faith and goodwill he bare vnto the king, and the force he was of beſides. But afterwards, Ptolomies fearefulneſſe increaſing his miſtruſt, (as it commonly happeneth, that they that lack wit, thinke it the beſt ſafetie to be fearefull of euery wagging of a ſtraw, & to miſtruſt euery man) the remembrance of Cleomenes words made him much ſuſpected of the Courtiers, vnderſtanding that he could doe ſo much with the ſoldiers that were ſtrangers: inſomuch as ſome of them ſaid: See (meaning Cleomenes) there is a Lyon amongſt ſheepe. Indeed conſidering his faſhions and behauiour, they might well ſay ſo of him: for he would looke through his fingers as though he ſaw nothing, and yet ſaw al what they did. In fine, he required an army & ſhips of the king: and vnderſtanding alſo that Antigonus was dead, and that the ACHAIANS & ÆTOLIANS were at great wars together, & that the affairs of his country did call him home, all PELOPONNESVS being in armes & vprore, he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But neuer a man would giue care vnto him, & the king alſo heard nothing of it, becauſe he was continually entertained among ladies, with banquets, dancing, and maskes. But Soſibius that ruled all the realme, thought, that to keepe Cleomenes againſt his will, were a hard thing, and alſo dangerous: and to let him go alſo, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a ſtirring mind, and one that knew the vices & imperfections of their gouernment, he thought that alſo no ſafe way, ſith no gifts nor preſents that could be offered him, could ſoften him. For as the holy bull (which they call in ÆGYPT, Apis) that is full fed in goodly paſture, doth yet deſire to follow his natural courſe and liberty, to runne and leape at his pleaſure, and plainely ſheweth, that it is a griefe to him to be kept ſtill by the Prieſt: euen ſo the courtly pleaſures did nothing delight Cleomenes, but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

Cleomenes flieth into AEgypt vnto king Ptolomy.

It

It irkt his noble heart to sit at home in slothfull rest,
When martiall matters were in hand, the which he liked best.

Now Cleomenes standing in these termes, there arriued in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras MESSINIAN, who maliced Cleomenes in his heart, but yet shewed as though he loued him. This Nicagoras on a time had sold Cleomenes certaine land, but was not payed for it, either because he had no present money, or else by occasion of the warres which gaue him no leysure to make payment. Cleomenes one day by chance walking vpon the sands, he saw Nicagoras landing out of his ship, being newly arriued; and knowing him, he curteously welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into ÆGYPT. Nicagoras gently saluting him againe, told him, that he had brought the king excellent horse of seruice. Cleomenes smiling, told him, Thou hadst bene better haue brought him some curtisans and dancers, for they would haue pleased the king better. Nicagoras faintly laughed at his answer, but within few daies after he did put him in remembrance of the land he sold him, and prayed him then that he would helpe him to mony, telling him that he would not haue prest him for it, but that he had sustained losse by merchandise. Cleomenes answered him, that all his pension was spent he had of the king. Nicagoras being offended with this answer, he went and told Sosibius of the mocke Cleomenes gaue the king. Sosibius was glad of this occasion, but yet desiring further matter to make the king offended with Cleomenes, he perswaded Nicagoras to write a letter to the king against Cleomenes, as though he had conspired to take the city of CYRENA, if the king had giuen him ships, money, and men of warre. When Nicagoras had written this letter, he tooke ship, and hoised saile. Foure daies after his departure, Sosibius brought his letter to the king, as though he had but newly receiued it. The king vpon sight of it, was so offended with Cleomenes, that he gaue present order he should be shut vp in a great house, where he should haue his ordinary diet allowed him, howbeit that he should keepe his house. This grieued Cleomenes much, but yet he was worse afraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Ptolomy the son of Chrysermus, one of the kings familiars, who had oftentimes before bene very conuersant & familiar with Cleomenes, and did frankly talke together in all matters, Cleomenes one day sent for him, to pray him to come vnto him. Ptolomy came at his request, and familiarly discoursing together, went about to disswade him from all the suspitions he had, and excused the king also for that he had done vnto him: so taking his leaue he left him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the gate; where he sharply tooke vp the soldiers, saying, that they were very negligent and careless in looking to such a fearefull beast as he was, and so ill to be taken if he once scaped their hands. Cleomenes heard what he said, and went to his lodging againe, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very words againe vnto his friends. Then all the SPARTANS conuerting their good hope into anger, determined to be reuenged of the iniury Ptolomy had done them, and to die like noble SPARTANS, not tarying till they should be brought to the shambles like fat weathers, to be sold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonour vnto Cleomenes, hauing refused to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince & warrier, to tarie the kings pleasure till he had left his drunkennesse and dancing, and then to come and put him to death. They being fully resolued hereof, as you haue heard, king Ptolomy by chance went vnto the city of CANOBVS, and first they gaue out in ALEXANDRIA, that the king minded to set Cleomenes at liberty. Then Cleomenes friends obseruing the custome of the kings of ÆGYPT, when they meant to set a prisoner at liberty (which was, to send the prisoners meat, & presents before to their supper) did send vnto him such maner of presents & so deceiued the soldiers that had the keeping of him, saying, that they brought those presents from the king. For Cleomenes himselfe did sacrifice vnto the gods, and sent vnto the souldiers that kept him, part of those presents that were sent vnto him, and supping with his friends that night, made merry with them, euery man being crowned with garlands. Some say, that he made the more hast to execute his enterprise sooner then he would haue done, by means of one of his men that was priuy vnto his conspiracy: who went euery night to lie with a woman he kept, and therefore was afraid lest he would bewray them. Cleomenes about noone, perceiuing the soldiers had taken in their cups, and that they were asleepe, he put on his coate, and vnripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his sword drawne in his hand, accompanied with his friends, following him in that sort, which were thirty in all. Amongst them there was one called Hippotas, who being lame, went very liuely out with them at the first: but when he saw they went faire & softly because of him, he praied thē to kil him, because they should not hinder their enterprise for a lame man, that could do them no seruice. Notwithstanding, by chance they met with a townes man a horse back, that came hard by their doore, whom they pluckt frō his horse, and cast Hippotas vpon him: and then ran through the city, and cryed to the people, Liberty, liberty. Now the people had no other courage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes, and wondered at his valiantnesse: but otherwise to follow him, or to further his enterprise, not a man of them had any heart in them. Thus running vp and downe the towne, they met with Ptolomy (the same whom we said before was the son of Chrysermus) as he came out of the Court: whereupon three of them setting on him, slue him presently. There was also another Ptolomy that was Gouernour and Lieutenant of the city of ALEXANDRIA: who hearing a rumour of this stirre, came vnto them in his coach. They went and met him, and first hauing driuen away his guard and soldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his coach, and slue him also. After that they went towards the castle, with intent to set al the prisoners there at liberty to take their part. Howbeit the iaylors that kept them had so strongly locked vp the prison doores, that Cleomenes was repulsed and put by his purpose. Thus wandering vp and downe the city, no man neither came to ioyne with him, nor to resist him, for euery man fled for feare of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going vp and downe, he turned him to his friends, and said vnto them: It is no maruel though women command such a cowardly people, that flie in this sort from their liberty. Thereupon he prayed them al to die like men, and like those that were brought vp with him, and that were worthy of the fame of his so noble deeds. Then the first man that made himselfe be slaine, was Hippotas, who died of a wound one of the young men of his companie gaue him with a sword at his request. After him euery man slue themselues, one after another, without any feare at all, sauing Panteas, who was the first man that entred the city of MEGALIPOLIS. He was a faire yong man, and had bene very well brought vp in the LACONIAN discipline, and better then any of his yeares. Cleomenes did loue him dearely, and commanded him that when he should see he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill himselfe last of all. Now they all being layed on the ground, he searched them one after another with the point of his sword, to see if there were any of them yet left aliue: and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heele amongst others, and saw that he did yet knit his browes, he kissed him, & sate downe by him. Then perceiuing that he had yeelded vp the ghost, embracing him when he was dead, he also slue himselfe, and fell vpon him. Thus Cleomenes hauing reigned king of SPARTA sixteene yeares, being the same manner of man we haue described him to be, he ended his daies in this sort as ye heare. Now his death being presently bruited through the citie, Cratesiclea his mother, though otherwise she had a noble mind, did notwithstanding a litle forget her greatnes, through the extreme sorrow she felt for the death of her son: and so embracing Cleomenes sons, she fell to bitter lamentation. But the eldest of his sonnes (no man mistrusting any such matter) found means to get out of her hands, and running vp to the top of the house, cast himselfe headlong downe to the ground, that his head was all broken and splitted; yet died not, but was taken vp crying, and angry with them, that they would not suffer him to die. This news being brought to king Ptolomy, he cōmanded they should first flea Cleomenes, and then hang vp his body, and also that they should put his children, his mother, and all her women waiting on her to death, among the which was Panteas wife, one of the faireſt and courteousest women in her time. They had not bene long maried before, when these mischiefes lighted vpon them, at what time their loue was then in greatest force. Her parents then would not let her depart, and imbarke with her husband, but had locked her vp, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit, shortly after she found the meanes to get her a horse, and some mony, and stole away in the night, and galloped towards the hauen of Tænarus; where finding a ship ready bound for ÆGYPT, she imbarked and went to seeke her husband, with whom she gladly and louingly led her life, forsaking her owne country, to liue in a strange Realme. Now whē the Sergeants came to take Cratesiclea to put her to death, Panteas wife led her by the arme, carying vp her traine, and did comfort her; although Cratesiclea otherwise was not afraid to die, but only asked this fauor, that she might die before her litle children. This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the hangman first slue her children before her eyes, and then her selfe afterwards, who in such great griefe and sorrow, said no more but thus: Alas my poore children, what is become of you? And Panteas wife also, being a mighty tall woman, girding her clothes to her, tooke vp the slaine bodies one after another, and wrapped them vp in such things as she could get, speaking neuer a word, nor shewing

ſhewing any ſigne or token of griefe. And in fine, hauing prepared her ſelfe to die, and plucked off her attire her ſelfe, without ſuffering any other to come neare her, or to ſee her, but the hangman that was appointed to ſtrike off her head, in this ſort ſhe died as conſtantly, as the ſtouteſt man liuing could haue done; and had ſo couered her body, that no man needed after her death to touch her, ſo carefull was ſhe to her end, to keepe her honeſty, which ſhe had alwaies kept in her life: and in her death was mindfull of her honour, wherewith ſhe decked her body in her life time. Thus theſe LACEDÆMONIAN Ladies playing their parts in this pitifull tragedy, contending at the time of death, euen with the courage of the ſlaine SPARTANS their countrey men, which of them ſhould dye moſt conſtantly, left a manifeſt proofe and teſtimony, that fortune hath no power ouer fortitude and courage. Shortly after, thoſe that were appointed to keepe the body of king Cleomenes that hung vpon the croſſe, they ſpied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that couered all his face, in ſo much as no rauening fowle durſt come neare him to eate of it: whereupon the king fell into a ſuperſtitious feare, being afraid that he had offended the gods. Hereupon, the Ladies in his court began to make many ſacrifices of purification, for the clearing of this ſinne: perſwading themſelues, that they had put a man to death beloued of the gods, and that he had ſomething more in him then a man. The ALEXANDRIANS thereupon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers vnto Cleomenes, as vnto a demy god, calling him the ſonne of the gods: vntill that the learned men brought them from that errour, declaring vnto them, that like as of oxen being dead and rotten there breed bees, and of horſe alſo come waſpes, and of aſſes likewiſe bettels: euen ſo mens bodies, when the marow melteth and gathereth together, do bring forth Serpents.

TIBERIVS AND CAIVS Gracchi.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you the hiſtory of the liues of theſe two GRECIANS, Agis and Cleomenes aforeſaid, we muſt alſo write the hiſtory of two ROMAINES; the which is no leſſe lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chanced vnto Tiberius and Caius, both of them the ſonnes of Tiberius Gracchus. He hauing bene twiſe Conſull, and once Cenſor, and hauing had the honour of two triumphes, had notwithſtanding more honour and fame onely for his valiantneſſe, for the which he was thought worthy to marry with Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, who ouercame Hannibal after the death of his father: though while he liued he was neuer his friend, but rather his enemy. It is reported, that Tiberius on a time found two ſnakes in his bed, and that the ſoothſayers and wiſards hauing conſidered the ſignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and alſo to let them both eſcape, but one onely: aſſuring him that if he killed the male, he ſhould not liue long after: and if he killed the female, that then his wife Cornelia ſhould die. Tiberius then louing his wife dearely, thinking it meeter for him alſo, that he being the elder of both, and ſhe yet a young woman, ſhould die before her, he ſlue the male, and let the female eſcape; howbeit he died ſoone after, leauing twelue children aliue, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her husband, taking vpon her the rule of her houſe and children, led ſuch a chaſt life, was ſo good to her children, and of ſo noble a mind, that euery man thought Tiberius a wiſe man for that he died, and left her behind him. She remaining widow, king Ptolemy made ſuite vnto her, and would haue made her his wife and Queene: but ſhe refuſed, and in her widowhood loſt all her children, but one daughter (whom ſhe beſtowed vpon the yonger Scipio African) and Tiberius, and Caius, whoſe liues we preſently write. Thoſe ſhe carefully brought vp, that they being become more ciuill, and better conditioned then any other ROMAINES in their time, euery man iudged, that education preuailed more in them then nature. For, as in the fauours and pictures of Caſtor and Pollux, there is a certaine difference diſcerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for wreſtling, and the other for running: euen ſo betweene theſe two yong brethren, amongſt other the great likeneſſe betweene them, being both happily borne to be valiant, to be temperate, to be liberall, to be learned, and to be nobly minded, there grew notwithſtanding great difference in their actions and doings in the commonwealth: the which I thinke conuenient to declare, before I proceed any further. Firſt of all, for the fauour of the face, the looke and mouing of the body, Tiberius was much more mild and tractable, and Caius more hot and earneſt. For the firſt in his Orations was very modeſt, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMAINES was the firſt that in his Oration ietted vp & downe the pulpit, and that plucked his gowne ouer his ſhoulders: as they write of Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the firſt of all Orators

Orators that opened his gowne, and clapped his hand on his thigh in his Oration. Furthermore, Caius words, and the vehemency of his perſwaſion, were terrible and full of paſſion; but Tiberius words in contrarie maner, were mild, moued men more to compaſſion, being very proper, and excellently applied; where Caius words were full of fineneſſe and curioſity. The like difference alſo was betweene them in their fare and diet. For Tiberius alwaies kept a conuenient ordinarie: and Caius alſo in reſpect of other ROMAINES, liued very temperately, but in reſpect of his brothers fare, curiouſly and ſuperfluouſly. Inſomuch as Druſus on a time reproued him, becauſe he had bought certaine Dolphins of ſiluer, to the value of a thouſand two hundred and fiftie Drachmaes for euery pound weight. And now, as touching the maners and naturall diſpoſition of them both agreeing with the diuerſity of their tongues, the one being mild & plauſible, and the other hot and cholericke: in ſo much that otherwhile forgetting himſelfe in his Oration, againſt his will he would be very earneſt and ſtraine his voice beyond his compaſſe, and ſo with great vncomelineſſe confound his words. Yet finding his own fault, he deuiſed this remedy. He had a ſeruant called Licinius, a good wiſe man, who with an inſtrument of muſicke he had, by the which they teach men to riſe and fall in their tunes, when he was in his Oration, he euer ſtood behind him; and when he perceiued that his maſters voice was a litle too loud, and that through choler he exceeded his ordinary ſpeech, he played a ſoft ſtop behind him, at the ſound whereof Caius immediatly fell from his extremity, and eaſily came to himſelfe againe. And here was the diuerſity betweene them. Otherwiſe, for their hardineſſe againſt their enemies, iuſtice vnto their tenants, the care and paines in their offices of charge, and alſo their continency againſt voluptuouſnes, in all theſe they were both alike. For age, Tiberius was elder by nine yeares, by reaſon whereof their ſeuerall authority and doings in the commonwealth fell out at ſundry times. And this was one of the chiefeſt cauſes why their doings proſpered not, becauſe they had not both authority in one ſelfe time, neither could they ioyne their power together: the which if it had met at one ſelfe time, had bene of great force, and peraduenture inuincible. Wherefore we muſt write particularly of them both, but firſt of all we muſt begin with the elder. He, when he came to mans ſtate, had ſuch a name & eſtimation, that immediatly they made him fellow in the colledge of the Prieſts which at ROME are called Augures (being thoſe that haue the charge to conſider of ſignes & predictions of things to come) more for his valiantnes then for nobility. The ſame doth Appius Clodius witneſſe vnto vs, one that hath bene both Conſull and Cenſor, and alſo preſident of the Senate, and of greater authority then any man in his time. This Appius at a ſupper when al the Augures were together, after he had ſaluted Tiberius, & made very much of him, he offered him his daughter in mariage. Tiberius was very glad of the offer, & therewithall the mariage was preſently concluded betweene them. Thereupon Appius coming home to his houſe, at the threſhold of his doore he called aloud for his wife, and told her: Antiſtia, I haue beſtowed our daughter Clodia. She wondering at it, O gods ſaid ſhe, & what needed al this haſte? what couldeſt thou haue done more, if thou haddeſt gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her huſband? I know that ſome referre this hiſtory vnto Tiberius, father of theſe two men we write of, and vnto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the moſt part of writers agree with that we write at this preſent. And Polybius himſelf alſo writeth, that after the death of Scipio AFRICAN, his friends being met together, they choſe Tiberius before all the other yong men of the city to mary him vnto Cornelia, being free, and vnpromiſed, or beſtowed vpon any man by her father. Now Tiberius the yonger being in the wars in AFRICKE vnder Scipio the ſecond, who had maried his ſiſter; lying in the tent with him, he found his Captaine indued with many noble gifts of nature, to allure mens hearts to deſire to follow his valiantneſſe. So in a ſhort time he did excell all the yong men of his time, as well in obedience, as in the valiantneſſe of his perſon: in ſo much that he was the firſt man that ſcaled the wals of the enemies, as Fannius reporteth, who ſaith that he ſcaled the wals with him, and did helpe him in that valiant enterpriſe. So that being preſent, all the campe were in loue with him: and when he was abſent, euery man wiſhed for him againe. After this warre was ended, he was choſen Treaſurer, and it was his chance to goe againſt the NVMANTINES, with Caius Mancinus one of the Conſuls, who was an honeſt man, but yet had the worſt lucke of any Captaine the ROMAINES had. Notwithſtanding, Tiberius wiſedome and valiantneſſe, in this extreme ill lucke of his Captaine, did not only appeare with great glory to him, but alſo moſt wonderfull, by the great obedience and reuerence he bare vnto his Captaine: though his misfortunes did ſo trouble and grieue him, that he could not tell himſelfe

whether he was Captaine or not. For when he was ouerthrowne in great foughten fields, he departed in the night, and left his campe. The NVMANTINES hearing of it, firſt tooke his camp, and then ranne after them that fled, and ſetting vpon the rereward, ſlue them, and enuironed all his armie. So that they were driuen into ſtraight and narrow places, whereout they could by no meanes eſcape. Thereupon Mancinus deſpairing that he could get out by force, he ſent a Herauld to the enemies to treate of peace. The NVMANTINES made anſwer, that they would truſt no man but Tiberius onely, and therefore they willed he ſhould be ſent vnto them. They deſired that, partly for the loue they bare vnto the vertues of the yong man, becauſe there was no talke of any other in all this warre but of him: and partly alſo, as remembring his father Tiberius, who making warres in SPAINE, and hauing there ſubdued many nations, he granted the NVMANTINES peace, the which he cauſed the ROMAINES afterwards to confirme & ratifie. Hereupon Tiberius was ſent to ſpeake with them, and partly obtaining that he deſired, and partly alſo granting them that they required, he concluded peace with them, whereby aſſuredly he ſaued the liues of twenty thouſand ROMAINE citizens, beſides ſlaues and other ſtragglers that willingly followed the campe. This notwithſtanding, the NVMANTINES took the ſpoile of all the goods they found in the ROMAINES campe, among the which they found Tiberius booke of account touching the mony diſburſed of the treaſure in his charge. Tiberius being maruellous deſirous to haue his booke againe, returned backe to NVMANTIA with two or three of his friends only, though the army of the ROMAINES were gone farre on their way. So comming to the towne, he ſpake vnto the gouernours of the city, and prayed them to redeliuer him his bookes of account, becauſe his malicious enemies ſhould not accuſe him, calling him to account for his doings. The NVMANTINES were very glad of this good hap, and prayed him to come into the towne. He ſtanding ſtill in doubt with himſelfe what to do, whether he ſhould goe into the towne, or not: the gouernours of the city came to him, and taking him by the hand, prayed he would think they were not his enemies, but good friends, and that he would truſt them. Whereupon Tiberius thought beſt to yeeld to their perſwaſion, being deſirous alſo to haue his bookes againe, and the rather, for feare of offending the NVMANTINES, if he ſhould haue denied and miſtruſted them. When he was brought into the city, they prouided his dinner, and were very earneſt with him, intreating him to dine with them. Then they gaue him his bookes againe, and offered him moreouer to take what he would of all the ſpoiles they had gotten in the campe of the ROMAINES. Howbeit of all that, he would take nothing but frankinſence, which he vſed, when he did any ſacrifice for his countrey: and then taking his leaue of them, with thankes he returned. When he was returned to ROME, all this peace concluded was vtterly miſliked, as diſhonorable to the maieſtie of the Empire of ROME. Yet the parents and friends of them that had ſerued in this warre, making the greateſt part of the people, they gathered about Tiberius, ſaying, that what faults were committed in this ſeruice, they were to impute it vnto the Conſull Mancinus, and not vnto Tiberius, who had ſaued ſuch a number of ROMAINES liues. Notwithſtanding, they that were offended with this diſhonorable peace, would that therein they ſhould follow the example of their forefathers in the like caſe. For they ſent backe their Captaines naked vnto their enemies, becauſe they were contented the SAMNITES ſhould ſpoile them of that they had, to eſcape with life. Moreouer, they did not only ſend them the Captaines and Conſuls, but all thoſe alſo that bare any office in the field, and had conſented vnto that condition: to the end they might lay all the periurie and breach of peace vpon them. Herein therefore did manifeſtly appeare, the loue and goodwill the people did beare vnto Tiberius: for they gaue order, that the Conſull Mancinus ſhould be ſent naked and bound vnto the NVMANTINES, and for Tiberius ſake they pardoned all the reſt. I thinke Scipio, who bare great ſway at that time in ROME, and was a man of greateſt account, did helpe him at a pinch, who notwithſtanding was ill thought of, becauſe he did not alſo ſaue the Conſull Mancinus, and confirme the peace concluded with the NVMANTINES, conſidering it was made by Tiberius his friend and kinſman. But theſe miſlikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius friends, and certaine men, which ſtirred him vp againſt Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice betweene them, neither followed there any hurt vpon it. And ſurely I am perſwaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into thoſe troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio AFRICAN had bene preſent, when he paſſed thoſe things he preferred. But Scipio was then in warres at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, when Tiberius vpon this occaſion paſſed theſe lawes. When the ROMAINES in old time had ouercome any of their

their neighbours, for ranſome they tooke oftentimes a great deale of their land from them, part whereof they ſold by the crier, for the benefit of the commonwealth; and part alſo they reſerued to their ſtate as a demeane, which afterwards was let out to farme for a ſmall rent yearely, to the poore citizens that had no lands. Howbeit the rich men inhanced the rents, and ſo beganne to thruſt out the poore men. Thereupon was an ordinance made, that no citizen of Rome ſhould haue aboue fiue hundred acres of land. This law for a time did bridle the couetouſneſſe of the rich men, and did eaſe the poore alſo that dwelt in the countrey, vpon the farmes they had taken vp of the commonwealth, and ſo liued with their own, or with that their anceſtors had from the beginning. But in proceſſe of time, their rich neighbors, by names of other men, got their farmes ouer their heads, and in the end, the moſt of them were openly ſeene in it in their owne names. Whereupon, the poore people being thus turned out of all, went with faint courage afterwards to the warre, nor cared any more for bringing vp their children. So that in ſhort time, the free men left Italy, and ſlaues and barbarous people did repleniſh it, whom the rich men made to plough thoſe lands which they had taken from the Romaines. Caius Lælius, one of Scipioes friends, gaue an attempt to reforme this abuſe: but becauſe the chiefeſt of the city were againſt him, fearing it would breake out to ſome vprore, he deſiſted from his purpoſe, & therfore he was called Lælius the wiſe. But Tiberius being choſen Tribune, he did forthwith preferre the reformation aforeſaid, being allured vnto it (as diuers writers report) by Diophanes the Orator, and Bloſſius the Philoſopher: of the which, Diophanes was baniſhed from the city of Mitylene, and Bloſſius the Italian from the city of Cvmes; who was ſcholler and familiar vnto Antipater of Tarsvs at Rome, by whom he was honored for certaine works of Philoſophy he dedicated vnto him. And ſome alſo do accuſe their mother Cornelia, who did twit her ſonsin the teeth, that the Romaines did yet call her Scipioes mother in law, and not the mother of the Gracchi. Other ſay it was Spurius Poſthumius, a cõpanion of Tiberius, & one that cõtended with him in eloquẽce. For Tiberius returning from the wars, and finding him farre beyond him in fame and reputation, and well beloued of euery one, he ſought to excell him by attempting this noble enterpriſe, and of ſo great expectation. His owne brother Caius in a certaine booke, wrote, that as he went to the wars of Nvmantia, paſſing through Thvscan, he found the countrey in maner vnhabited: and they that did follow the plough, or keepe beaſts, were the moſt of them ſlaues, and barbarous people, come out of a ſtrange country. Whereupon euer after it ranne in his mind to bring this enterpriſe to paſſe, which brought great troubles to their houſe. But in fine, it was the people only that moſt ſet his heart on fire to couet honor, and that haſtened his determination: firſt bringing him to it by bils ſet vp on euery wall, in euery porch, & vpon the tombes, praying him by them to cauſe the poore citizens of Rome to haue their lands reſtored, which were belõging to the cõmonwealth. This notwithſtanding he himſelf made not the law alone of his own head, but did it by the counſell and aduice of the chiefeſt men of Rome, for vertue and eſtimation: among the which, Craſſus the high Biſhop was one, and Mutius Scævola the Lawyer, that then was Conſull, and Appius Clodius his father in law. And truly it ſeemeth, that neuer law was made with greater fauour, then that which he preferred againſt ſo great iniuſtice and auarice. For thoſe that ſhould haue bene puniſhed for tranſgreſſing the law, and ſhould haue had the lands taken from them by force, which they vniuſtly kept againſt the Law of Rome, & that ſhould alſo haue bene amerced for it, he ordained that they ſhould be payed by the commonwealth to the value of the lands, which they held vniuſtly; and ſo ſhould leaue them to the poore citizens againe that had no land, and lacked helpe and reliefe. Now, though the reformation eſtabliſhed by this law, was done with ſuch great fauour, the people notwithſtanding were contented, and would forget all that was paſt, ſo that they might haue no more wrong offered them in time to come. But the rich men, and men of great poſſeſſions, hated the law for their auarice, and for ſpite and ſelfewill (which would not let them yeeld) they were at deadly food with the Lawyer that had preferred the law, and ſought by all deuice they could to diſſwade the people from it: telling them that Tiberius brought in this law Agraria againe, to diſturbe the commonwealth, and to make ſome alteration in the ſtate. But they preuailed not: for Tiberius defending the matter, which of it ſelfe was good and iuſt, with ſuch eloquence as might haue iuſtified an euill cauſe, was inuincible: and no man was able to argue againſt him to confute him, when ſpeaking in the behalfe of the poore citizens of Rome (the people being gathered round about the pulpit for Orations) he told them, that the wild beaſts through

ITALY had their dens and caues of abode, and that the men that fought, and were slaine for their country, had nothing else but aire and light; and so were compelled to wander vp and downe with their wiues and children, hauing no resting place nor house to put their heads in: and that the Captaines do but mocke their souldiers, when they encourage them in battell to fight valiantly for the graues, the temples, their owne houses, and their predecessors. For, said he, of such a number of poore citizens as there be, there cannot a man of them shew any ancient house or tombe of their ancestors: because the poore men do go to the wars, and be slaine for the rich mens pleasures & wealth: besides, they falsly call them Lords of the earth, where they haue not a handfull of ground that is theirs. These and such other like words being vttered before all the people with such vehemency and troth, did so moue the common people withall, and put them in such a rage, that there was no aduersary of his able to withstand him. Therfore, leauing to contrarie and denie the law by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in Marcus Octauius, colleague & fellow Tribune with Tiberius in office, who was a graue and wise yong man, & Tiberius very familiar friend. So that the first time they came to him, to oppose him against the cõfirmation of this law, he prayed thẽ to hold him excused, because Tiberius was his very friend. But in the end, being compelled vnto it through the great number of the rich men that were importunate with him, he did withstand Tiberius law, the which was inough to ouerthrow it. For if any one of the Tribunes speake against it, though al the other passe with it, he ouerthroweth it: because they all can do nothing, if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no further in this first fauorable law, but in a rage preferred another more gratefull to the common people, as also more extreme against the rich. In that law he ordained, that whosoeuer had any lands contrary to the ancient lawes of ROME, that he should presently depart from them. But thereupon there fell out continuall brawles in the pulpit for Orations, against Octauius: in the which, though they were very earnest & vehemẽt one against another, yet there passed no fowle words frõ them (how hot soeuer they were one with another) that should shame his companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought vp, breedeth such a stay and knowledge in a man, not only in things of pleasure to make him regard his credite, both in word and deed, but in passion and anger also, and in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereupon Tiberius finding that this law among others touched Octauius, because he enioyed a great deale of land that was the commonwealths, he prayed him secretly to contend no more against him; promising him to giue him of his owne, the value of those lands which he should be driuen to forsake, although he was not very able to performe it. But when he saw Octauius would not be perswaded, he then preferred a law, that al magistrates & officers should cease their authority, til the law was either past, or reiected, by voices of the people: and thereupon he set his owne seale vpon the doores of the temple of Saturne, where the coffers of the treasure lay, because the treasurers themselues during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, vpõ great penalties to be forfeited by the Prætors or any other magistrate of authority that should breake this order. Hereupon, all the Magistrates fearing this penalty, did leaue to exercise their office for the time. But then the rich men that were of great liuings, changed their apparell, and walked very sadly vp and downe the market place, and layed secret waite to take Tiberius, hauing hired men to kill him: which caused Tiberius himselfe, openly before them all, to weare a short dagger vnder his long gowne, properly called in Latine, Dolon. When the day came that his law should be established, Tiberius called the people to giue their voices: and the rich men on the other side, they tooke away the pots by force, wherein the papers of mens voices were throwne, so that there was like to fall out a stirre vpon it. For the faction of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of people that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not bene for Manlius and Fuluius, both the which had bene Consuls; who went vnto him, and besought him with the teares in their eyes, and holding vp their hands, that he would let the law alone. Tiberius thereupon, foreseeing the instant danger of some great mischiefe, as also for the reuerẽce he bare vnto two such noble persons, he stayed a litle, and asked them what they would haue him to do. They made answer, that they were not able to counsell him in a matter of so great weight, but they prayed him notwithstanding, he would be contented to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. Thereupon he granted them presently. But afterwards perceiuing that the Senate sate vpon it, and had determined nothing, because the rich men were of too great authority, he entred into another deuice that was neither honest nor meet; which was, to depriue Octauius of his Tribuneship

Marcus Octauius Tribune, did w thstand Tiberius law.

The modest contention betwixt Tiberius and Octauius.

Tribuneſhip, knowing that otherwiſe he could not poſſibly come to paſſe the law. But before he tooke that courſe, he openly intreated him in the face of the people with courteous words, and tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to ſtand no more againſt him; and to do the people this pleaſure, which required a matter iuſt and reaſonable, and only requeſted this ſmall recompence for the great paines they tooke in ſeruice abroad for their countrey. Octauius denied him plainly. Then ſaid Tiberius openly, that both of them being brethren in one ſelfe place and authority, and contrary one to another in a matter of ſo great weight, this contention could not be poſſibly ended, without ciuill warre: and that he could ſee no way to remedie it, vnleſſe one of them two were depoſed from their office. Thereupon he bad Octauius begin firſt with him, and he would riſe from the bench with a good will, and become a priuate man, if the people were ſo contented. Octauius would do nothing in it. Tiberius then replied, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his mind, vpon a better breath and conſideration: and ſo diſmiſſed the aſſembly for that day. The next morning the people being againe aſſembled, Tiberius going vp to his ſeate, attempted againe to perſwade Octauius to leaue off. In fine, finding him ſtill a man vnremoueable, he referred the matter to the voices of the people, whether they were contented Octauius ſhould be depoſed from his office. Now there were fiue and thirty tribes of the people, of the which ſeuenteen of them had already paſſed their voices againſt Octauius, ſo that there remained but one tribe more to put him out of his office. Then Tiberius made them ſtay for proceeding any further, and prayed Octauius again, embracing him before all the people, with all the intreatie poſſible, that for ſelfewill ſake he would not ſuffer ſuch an open ſhame to be done vnto him, as to be put out of his office, neither alſo to make him the occaſion and inſtrument of ſo pitifull a deed. They ſay that Octauius at this laſt intreatie was ſomewhat moued and won by his perſwaſions, and that weeping, he ſtayed a long time, and made no anſwer. But when he looked vpon the rich men that ſtood in a great company together, he was aſhamed (I think) to haue their ill wils, and rather betooke himſelfe to the loſſe of his office, and ſo bad Tiberius do what he would. Thereupon he being depriued by voices of the people, Tiberius commanded one of his infranchiſed bondmen to pull him out of the pulpit for Orations: for he vſed his infranchiſed bondmen in ſtead of Sergeants. This made the ſight ſo much more lamentable, to ſee Octauius thus ſhamefully pluckt away by force. Yea furthermore, the common people would haue runne vpon him, but the rich men came to reſcue him, and would not ſuffer them to doe him further hurt. So Octauius ſaued himſelfe running away alone, after he had bene reſcued thus from the fury of the people. Moreouer, there was a faithfull ſeruant of Octauius, who ſtepping before his maſter to ſaue him from hurt, had his eies pulled out againſt Tiberius mind, who ranne to the reſcue with all ſpeed when he heard the noiſe. After that, the law Agraria paſſed for diuiſion of lands, and three Commiſſioners were appointed to make inquirie and diſtribution thereof. The Commiſſioners appointed were theſe: Tiberius himſelfe, Appius Clodius his father in law, and Caius Gracchus his brother, who were not at that time in Rome, but in the campe with Scipio African, at the ſiege of the citie of Numantia. Thus Tiberius very quietly paſſed ouer theſe matters, and no man durſt withſtand him: and furthermore, he ſubſtituted in Octauius place no man of quality, but onely one of his followers, called Mutius. For which cauſe the Noble men were ſore offended with him, and fearing the increaſe of his greatneſſe, they being in the Senate houſe did what they could poſſible to do him deſpite and ſhame. For when Tiberius demaunded a tent at the charge of the common-wealth, when he ſhould goe abroad to make diuiſion of theſe lands, as they vſually granted vnto others, that many times went in farre meaner commiſſions, they flatly denied him; and through the procurement of P. Naſica (who being a great landed man in his countrey, ſhewed himſelfe in this action his mortall enemie, taking it grieuouſly to be compelled to depart from his land) onely granted him nine of their oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the people on the other ſide were all in an vprore againſt the rich. In ſo much as one of Tiberius friends being dead vpon the ſudden, vpon whoſe bodie being dead there appeared very ill ſignes, the common people ranne ſuddenly to his buriall, and cried out, that he was poyſoned. And ſo taking vp the Beere whereon his body lay vpon their ſhoulders, they were preſent at the fire of his funerals, where immediatly appeared certaine ſignes to make them ſuſpect, that indeed there was vehement cauſe of preſumption he was poyſoned. For his belly burſt, whereout there iſſued ſuch abundance of corrupt humors, that they put out the firſt fire, and made them fetch another, the which also they could not make to burne, vntill that they were compelled to carry the body into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much ado to make it burne. Tiberius seeing that, to make the common people mutine the more, he put on mourning apparell, and brought his sonnes before them, and besought the people to be good vnto them and their mother, as one that despaired of his health and safetie. About that time died Attalus, sirnamed Philopater, and Eudemus PERGAMENIAN brought his will to ROME, in the which he made the people of ROME his heire. Wherefore Tiberius, still to increase the good will of the common people towards him, preferred a law immediatly, that the ready money that came by the inheritance of this king, should be distributed among the poore citizens, on whose lot it should fall to haue any part of the diuision of the lands of the common-wealth to furnish them towards house, and to set vp their tillage. Furthermore, he sayd, that concerning the townes and cities of the kingdome of Attalus, the Senate had nothing to do to take any order with them, but that the people were to dispose of them, and that he himselfe would put it out. That made him againe more hated of the Senate then before, in so much as there was one Pompey a Senator, that standing vp, said, that he was next neighbour vnto Tiberius, and that by reason of his neighbourhood he knew that Eudemus PERGAMENIAN had giuen him one of king Attalus royall bands, with a purple gowne besides, for a token that he should one day be king of ROME. And Quintus Metellus also reproued him, for that his father being Censor, the ROMAINES hauing supped in the towne, and repairing euery man home to his house, they did put out their torches and lights, because men seeing them returne, they should not thinke they taried too long in company banqueting: and that in contrary manner, the seditious and needie rabble of the common people did light his son home, and accompany him all night long vp and downe the towne. At that time there was one Titus Annius, a man that had no goodnesse nor honestie in him, howbeit taken for a great reasoner, and for a subtill questioner and answerer. He prouoked Tiberius to answer him, whether he had not committed a shamefull fact against his companion and brother Tribune, to defame him that by the lawes of ROME should haue bene holy and vntouched. The people tooke this prouocation very angrily, and Tiberius also comming out, and hauing assembled the people, commanded them to bring this Annius before him, that he might be endited in the market place. But he finding himselfe farre inferiour vnto Tiberius both in dignity and eloquence, ranne to his fine subtill questions, to take a man at his word: and prayed Tiberius before he did proceed to his accusation, that he would first answer him to a question he would aske him. Tiberius bad him say what he would. So silence being made, Annius asked him: If thou wouldest defame me, and offer me iniurie, and that I called one of thy companions to helpe me, and he should rise to take my part, and anger thee: wouldest thou therefore put him out of his office? It is reported, that Tiberius was so grauelled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his Orations of any man, yet at that time he held his peace, and had no power to speake, and therefore he presently dismissed the assembly. Afterwards, vnderstanding that of all the things he did, the deposing of Octauius from his office was thought (not onely of the Nobility, but of the common people also) as foule and wilfull a part as euer he played, for that thereby he had imbased and vtterly ouerthrowne the dignity of the Tribunes, the which was alwaies had in great veneration vntil that present time: to excuse himself therfore, he made an excellent Oration to the people, whereof we will set downe some speciall points, that you may the better discerne thereby the force and effect of his eloquence. The Tribuneship (said he) indeed was a holy and sacred thing, as particularly consecrated to the people, and established for their benefit and safetie: where contrariwise, if the Tribune do offer the people any wrong, he thereby minisheth their power, and taketh away the meanes from them to declare their wils by voices; besides that he doth also imbase his owne authority, leauing to doe the thing for the which his authority was first giuen him. Or otherwise we could not chuse, but suffer a Tribune, if it pleased him, to ouerthrow the Capitoll, or to set fire on the Arsenall; and yet notwithstanding this wicked part, if it were committed, he should be Tribune of the people still, though a leud Tribune. But when he goeth about to take away the authority and power of the people, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this against all reason, thinke you, that a Tribune when he list, may take a Consull, and commit him to prison? and that the people should not withstand the authority of the Tribune, who gaue him the same, when he would vse his authority to the preiudice of

of the people? for the people are they that do chuſe both Conſull and Tribune. Furthermore, the kingly dignitie (becauſe in the ſame is contained the abſolute authority & power of all other kinds of magiſtrates and offices together) is conſecrated with very great and holy ceremonies, drawing very neare vnto the godhead: and yet the people expulſed king Tarquin, becauſe he vſed his authoritie with crueltie; and for the iniurie he offered one man onely, the moſt ancient rule and gouernment (by the which the foundation of Rome was firſt layed) was vtterly aboliſhed. And who is there in all ỹ city of Rome to be reckoned ſo holy as the Veſtall Nuns, which haue the cuſtodie and keeping of the euerlaſting fire? and yet if any of theſe be taken in fornication, ſhe is buried aliue for her offence: for when they are not holy to the gods, they loſe the libertie they haue, in reſpect of ſeruing the gods. Euen ſo alſo it is vnmeete, that the Tribune if he offend the people, ſhould for the peoples ſake be reuerenced any more, ſeeing that through his owne folly he had depriued himſelf of that authority they gaue him. And if it be ſo that he was choſen Tribune by the moſt part of the tribes of the people, then by greater reaſō is he iuſtly depriued that by all the whole tribes together is forſaken & depoſed. There is nothing more holy nor inuiolate then things offered vp vnto the gods: and yet it was neuer ſeene that any man did forbid the people to take thē, to remoue & tranſport them from place to place, as they thought good. Euen ſo, they may as lawfully transferre the office of the Tribune vnto any other, as any other offering conſecrated to ỹ gods. Furthermore, it is manifeſt that any Officer or Magiſtrate may lawfully depoſe himſelfe: for it hath bene often ſeene, that men in office haue depriued themſelues, or otherwiſe haue ſued to be diſcharged. This was the effect of Tiberius purgation. Now his friends perceiuing the threats the rich & noblemen gaue out againſt him, they wiſhed him for the ſafety of his perſon, to make ſuite to be Tribune againe the next yeare. Whereupon he began to flatter the common people again afreſh, by new lawes which he preferred: by the which he tooke away the time and number of yeares preſcribed, when euery citizen of Rome was bound to go to the wars being called, and his name billed. He made it lawfull alſo for men to appeale from ſentence of the Iudges vnto the people, and thruſt in alſo amongſt the Senators (which then had abſolute authority to iudge among themſelues) a like number of the Romaine Knights, and by this meanes ſought to weaken and imbaſe the authority of the Senate, increaſing alſo the power of the people, more of malice then any reaſon, or for any iuſtice or benefit to the common-wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voices of the people for the confirmation of his new lawes, finding that his enemies were the ſtronger in the aſſembly, becauſe al the people were not yet come together, he fell a quarelling with his brethren the Tribunes, alwaies to winne them; and yet in the end brake vp the aſſembly, commanding them to returne the next morning. There hee would be the firſt man in the market place, apparelled all in blacke, his face beblubbered with teares, and looking heauily vpon the matter, praying the people aſſembled to haue compaſſion vpon him, ſaying, that he was afraid leſt his enemies would come in the night, and ouerthrow his houſe to kill him. Thereupon the people were ſo moued withall, that many of them came and brought their tents, and lay about his houſe to watch it. At the breake of the day, the keeper of the chickens (by ſignes of the which they do deuine of things to come) brought them vnto him, and caſt them downe meate before them. None of them would come out of the cage but one onely, and yet with much ado, ſhaking the cage: and when it came out, it would eate no meate, but onely lift vp her left wing, and put forth her legge, and ſo ranne into the cage againe. This ſigne made Tiberius remember another he had had before. He had a maruellous faire helmet and very rich, which he wore in the wars: vnder it were crept two ſnakes vnwares to any, and layed egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberius wonder the more, becauſe of the ill ſignes of the chickens: notwithſtanding, he went out of his houſe when he heard that the people were aſſembled in the Capitoll; but as he went out, he hit his foote ſuch a blow againſt a ſtone at the threſhold of the doore, that he brake the naile of his great toe, which fell in ſuch a bleeding that it bled through his ſhooe. Againe, he had not gone far, but he ſaw vpon the top of a houſe on his left hand, a couple of rauens fighting together: and notwithſtanding that there paſt a great number of people by, yet a ſtone which one of theſe rauens caſt from them, came and fell hard at Tiberius foot. The fall thereof ſtayd the ſtouteſt man he had about him. But Bloſſius the Philoſopher of Cvmes that did accompany him, told him it were a great ſhame for him, and enough to kill the hearts of all his followers, that Tiberius being the ſonne of Gracchus, and nephew of Scipio the African, and the chiefe man beſides of all the peoples ſide, for feare of a rauen, ſhould not obey his citizens that called him: and how that his enemies and ill willers would not make a laughing ſport of it, but would plainly tell the people, that this was a tricke of a tyrant that reigned indeed, and that for pride and diſdaine did abuſe the peoples good wils. Furthermore, diuers meſſengers came vnto him, and ſaid, that his friends that were in the Capitoll, ſent to pray him to make haſte, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honourably receiued: for the people ſeeing him comming, cried out for ioy to welcome him; and when he was gotten vp to his ſeate, they ſhewed themſelues both carefull and louing towards him, looking warily that none came neare him, but ſuch as they knew well. When Mutius began againe to call the tribes of the people to giue their voices, he could not proceed according to the accuſtomed order in the like caſe, for the great noiſe the hindmoſt people made, thruſting forward, and being driuen backe, and one mingling with another. In the meane time Fluuius Flaccus, one of the Senators, got vp into a place where all the people might ſee him, and when he ſaw that his voice could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a ſigne with his hand that he had ſome matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberius ſtraight bad them make a lane through the preaſſe. So, with much adoe, Flauius came at length vnto him, and told him, that the rich men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Conſull to their wils, determined themſelues to come and kill him, hauing a great number of their friends and bond-men armed for the purpoſe. Tiberius immediatly declared this conſpiracie vnto his friends and followers, who ſtraight girt their long gownes vnto them, and brake the Sergeants iauelins which they caried in their hands to make roome among the people, and tooke the trunchions of the ſame to reſiſt thoſe that would ſet vpon them. The people alſo that ſtood furtheſt off, maruelled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a ſigne to tell them the danger he was in, layed both his hands on his head, becauſe they could not heare his voice for the great noiſe they made. His enemies ſeeing the ſigne he gaue, ranne preſently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a royall band or diademe of the people, and that it was an euident ſigne, becauſe they ſaw him clappe his hands vpon his head. This tale troubled all the company. Whereupon Naſica beſought the Conſull, chiefe of the Senate, to helpe the common-wealth, and to take away this tyrant. The Conſull gently anſwered againe, that he would vſe no force, neither put any citizen to death, but lawfully condemned: as alſo he would not receiue Tiberius, nor protect him, if the people by his perſwaſion or commandement ſhould commit any act contrary to the law. Naſica then riſing in anger, Sith the matter is ſo (ſaid he) that the Conſull regardeth not the common-wealth, all you then that will defend the authority of the law, follow me. Thereupon he caſt the skirt of his gowne ouer his head, and went ſtraight to the Capitoll. They that followed him alſo tooke their gownes and wrapped them about their armes, and laid at as many as they might, to make them giue way: and yet very few of the people durſt meete with ſuch ſtates as they were to ſtay them, becauſe they were the chiefeſt men of the city; but euery man flying from them, they fell one on anothers neck for haſt. They that followed them, had brought from home great leauers and clubs, and as they went they took vp feete of treſtles and chaires which the people had ouerthrowne and broken, running away, and hied them apace to meete with Tiberius, ſtriking at them that ſtood in their way: ſo that in ſhort ſpace they had diſperſed all the common people, and many were ſlaine flying. Tiberius ſeeing that, betooke him to his legges to ſaue himſelfe; but as he was flying, one tooke him by the gowne and ſtayed him: but he leauing his gowne behind him, ranne in his coate, and running fell vpon them that were downe before. So, as he was riſing vp againe, the firſt man that ſtrake him, and that was plainly ſeene ſtrike him, was one of the Tribunes his brethren, called Publius Satureius, who gaue him a great rap on the head with the foote of a chaire; and the ſecond blow he had, was giuen him by Lucius Rufus that boaſted of it, as if he had done a notable act. In this tumult, there were ſlaine aboue three hundred men, and were all killed with ſtaues and ſtones, and not one man hurt with any iron. This was the firſt ſedition among the citizens of Rome, that fell out with murther & bloudſhed, ſince the expulſion of the kings. But for al other former diſſentions (which were no trifles) they were eaſily pacified, either party giuing place to other: the Senate for feare of the Commoners, and the people for reuerence they bare to the Senate. And it ſeemeth that Tiberius himſelf wold eaſily haue yeelded alſo, if they had proceeded by faire meanes and perſwaſion, ſo they had meant good faith, and would haue killed no man: for at that time he had had not in all aboue 3000 men of the people about him. But ſurely it ſeemes this conſpiracie was executed againſt him, more for very ſpite and malice the rich men did beare him, then for any other apparent cauſe they preſuppoſed againſt him. For proofe hereof may be alledged, the barbarous cruelty they vſed to his body being dead. For they would not ſuffer his owne brother to haue his body to bury it by night, who made earneſt ſuite vnto them for it; but they threw him amongſt the other bodies into the riuer, and yet this was not the worſt. For, ſome of his friends they baniſhed without forme of law, & others they put to death which they could meet withal. Among the which they ſlue Diophanes the Orator, and one Caius Billius, whom they incloſed in a pipe among ſnakes and ſerpents, and put him to death in this ſort. Bloſſius alſo the Philoſopher of CYMES, was brought before the Conſuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly confeſſed vnto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commanded him. When Naſica did aske him, And what if he had commanded thee to ſet fire on the Capitoll? He made him anſwer, that Tiberius would neuer haue giuen him any ſuch commandement. And when diuers others alſo were ſtill in hand with him about that queſtion: But if he had commanded thee? I would ſure haue done it, ſaid he: for he would neuer haue commanded me to haue done it, if it had not bin for the commoditie of the people. Thus he ſcaped at that time, and afterwards fled into ASIA vnto Ariſtonicus, whom misfortune hauing ouerthrowne, he ſlue himſelfe. Now, the Senate to pacifie the people at that preſent time, did no more withſtand the law Agraria, for diuiſion of the lands of the commonwealth, but ſuffered the people to appoint another Commiſſioner for that purpoſe in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Craſſus was choſen, being allyed vnto Tiberius, for Caius Gracchus (Tiberius brother) had maried his daughter Licinia. Yet Cornelius Nepos ſaith, that it was not Craſſus daughter Caius maried, but the daughter of Brutus, that triumphed for the LVSITANIANS. Howbeit the beſt writers & authority agree with that we write. But whatſoeuer was done, the people were maruellouſly offended with his death; and men might eaſily perceiue that they looked but for time and oportunity to be reuenged, and did preſently threaten Naſica to accuſe him. Whereupon the Senate fearing ſome trouble towards him, deuiſed away (vpon no occaſion) to ſend him into ASIA. For the common people did not diſſemble ỹ malice they bare him when they met him, but were very round with him, and called him tyrant, & murderer, excommunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the bloud of the holy Tribune, and within the moſt ſacred Temple of all the city. So in the end he was inforced to forſake ROME, though by his office he was bound to ſolemnize all the greateſt ſacrifices, becauſe he was then chiefe biſhop of ROME. Thus, trauelling out of his country like a meane man, and troubled in his mind, he died ſhortly after, not far from the city of PERGAMVS. Truly, it is not greatly to be wondred at, though the people ſo much hated Naſica, conſidering that Scipio the AFRICAN himſelfe (whom the people of ROME for iuſter cauſes had loued better then any man elſe whatſoeuer) was like to haue loſt all the peoples good will they bare him, becauſe that being at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, when news was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this verſe of Homer:

Such end vpon him euer light,
Which in ſuch doings doth delight.

Furthermore, being asked in the aſſembly of the people, by Caius and Fuluius, what he thought of Tiberius death: he anſwered them, that he did not like his doings. After that the people handled him very churliſhly, and did euer breake off his Oration, which they neuer did before: and he himſelfe alſo would reuile the people euen in the aſſembly. Now Caius Gracchus at the firſt becauſe he feared the enemies of his dead brother, or otherwiſe, for that he ſought meanes to make them more hated of the people, he abſented himſelfe for a time out of the common aſſembly, and kept at home, and medled not, as a man contented to liue meanely, without buſying himſelfe in the commonwealth: inſomuch as he made men thinke and report both, that he did vtterly miſlike thoſe matters which his brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine yeares yonger then his brother Tiberius, who was not thirtie yeares old when he was ſlaine. But in proceſſe of time, he made his manners and conditions (by litle and litle) appeare, who hated ſloth and curioſity, and was leaſt of all giuen vnto any couetous mind of getting: for he gaue himſelfe to be eloquent, as preparing him wings afterwards to practiſe in the common-wealth. So that it appeared plainly, that when time came, he would not ſtand ſtill and looke on. When one Vectius a friend of his was ſued, he took vpon him to defend his cauſe in court. The people that were preſent, and heard him ſpeake, they leaped for ioy to see him: for he had such an eloquent tongue, that all the Orators besides were but children to him. Hereupon the rich men began to be afraid againe, and whispered among themselues, that it behoued them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chanced so that he was chosen Treasurer, and it was his fortune to go into the Ile of SARDINIA, with the Consull Orestes. His enemies were glad of that, and he himselfe was not sorie for it. For he was a martiall man, & as skilfull in armes as he was else an excellent Orator: but yet he was afraid to come into the pulpit for Orations, and misliked to deale in matters of state, albeit he could not altogether denie the people, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cause therefore he was very glad of this voyage, that he might absent himselfe for a time out of ROME: though diuers were of opinion, that he was more popular, and desirous of the common peoples good will and fauour, then his brother had bene before him. But indeed he was cleane contrary: for it appeared that at the first he was drawne rather against his will, then of any speciall desire he had to deale in the common wealth. Cicero the Orator also saith, that Caius was bent altogether to flie from office in the commonwealth, and to liue quietly as a priuate man. But Tiberius (Caius brother) appeared to him in his sleepe, and calling him by his name, said vnto him: Brother, why doest thou prolong time, for thou canst not possibly escape? For we were both predestinated to one manner of life and death, for procuring the benefit of the people. Now when Caius arriued in SARDINIA, he shewed all the proofes that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the yong men of his age in hardinesse against his enemies, in iustice to his inferiors, and in loue and obedience towards the Consull his Captaine: but in temperance, sobriety, and in painfulnesse, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The winter by chance fell out very sharpe, and full of sickenesse in SARDINIA: whereupon the Consull sent vnto the cities to helpe his souldiers with some clothes: but the townes sent in post to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegation reasonable, whereupon they wrote to the Consull to find some other meanes to clothe his people. The Consul could make no other shift for them, and so the poore souldiers in the meane time smarted for it. But Caius Gracchus went himselfe vnto the cities, and so perswaded them, that they of themselues sent to the ROMAINES camp such things as they lacked. This being caried to ROME, it was thought straight it was a pretie beginning to creepe into the peoples fauour, and indeed it made the Senate also afraid. In the necke of that, there arriued Ambassadors of AFRICKE at ROME, sent from King Micipsa, who told the Senate that the King their master, for Caius Gracchus sake, had sent their army corne into SARDINIA. The Senators were so offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadors out of the Senate, and so gaue order that other souldiers should be sent in their places that were in SARDINIA: and that Orestes should still remaine Consull there, meaning also to continue Caius their Treasurer. But when he heard of it, he straight tooke sea, and returned to ROME in choler. When men saw Caius returned to ROME vnlooked for, he was reproued for it, not onely by his enemies, but by the common people also, who thought his returne very strange before his Captaine, vnder whom he was Treasurer. He being accused hereof before the Censors, prayed he might be heard. So, answering his accusation, he so turned the peoples minds that heard him, that they all said, he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had serued twelue yeares in the warres, where others were enforced to remaine but ten yeares: and that he had continued Treasurer vnder his Captaine the space of three yeares, where the law gaue him liberty to returne at the end of the yeare. And that he alone of all men else that had bene in the wars, had caried his purse full, and brought it home emptie; where others hauing drunke the wine which they caried thither in vessels, had afterwards brought them home full of gold and siluer. Afterwards they went about to accuse him as accessary to a conspiracy that was reuealed in ỹ city of FREGELLES. But hauing cleared all that suspition, & being discharged, he presently made suite to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of quality his sworne enemies. On the other side also he had so great fauour of ỹ common people, that there came men out of all parts of ITALY to be at his election, and that such a number of them, as there was no lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the field of Mars not being large enough to hold such a multitude of people, there were that gaue their voices vpon the top of houses. Now the Noblemen could no otherwise let the people of their will, nor preuent Caius of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, he was onely pronounced the fourth. But when he was once possest officer, he became immediatly the chiefe man, because he was as eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of calamity offered him: which made him bold to ſpeake, bewailing the death of his brother. For what matters ſoeuer he ſpake of, he alwaies fell in talke of that, remembring them what matters had paſſed, and laying before them the examples of their anceſtors, who in old time had made war with the PHALISCES, by the meanes of one Genutius Tribune of the people, vnto whom they had offered iniury: who alſo did condemne Caius Veturius to death, becauſe that he onely would not giue a Tribune place, coming through the market place. Where theſe, ſaid he, in your preſence, and before your faces, haue ſlaine my brother Tiberius with ſtaues, & haue dragged his body from the mount of the Capitoll, all the citie ouer, to throw it into the riuer: and with him alſo haue moſt cruelly ſlaine all his friends they could come by, without any law or iuſtice at all. And yet by an ancient cuſtome of long time obſerued in this city of ROME, when any man is accuſed of treaſon, & that of duty he muſt appeare at the time appointed him, they do notwithſtanding in the morning ſend a trumpet to his houſe, to ſummon him to appeare; and moreouer the Iudges were not wont to condemne him, before this ceremony was performed: ſo carefull and reſpectiue were our predeceſſors, where it touched the life of any ROMAINE. Now Caius hauing firſt ſtirred vp the people with theſe perſwaſions (for he had a maruellous loud voice) he preferred two lawes:

Caius Gracchus lawes.

The firſt, that he that had once bene put out of office by the people, ſhould neuer after be capable of any other office.

The ſecond, that if any Conſull had baniſhed any citizen without lawfull accuſation, the ſentence and hearing of the matter ſhould pertaine to the people.

The firſt of theſe two lawes did plainely defame Octauius, whom Tiberius his brother had by the people depoſed from the Tribuneſhip. The ſecond alſo touched Popilius, who being Prætor, had baniſhed his brother Tiberius friends; whereupon he ſtaid not the triall, but willingly exiled himſelfe out of ITALY. And touching the firſt law, Caius himſelfe did afterwards reuoke it, declaring vnto the people that he had ſaued Octauius at the requeſt of his mother Cornelia. The people were very glad of it, and confirmed it, honouring her no leſſe for reſpect of her ſons, then alſo for Scipioes ſake her father. For afterwards they caſt her image in braſſe, & ſet it vp with this inſcription: Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many common matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, and eloquently pleaded in her behalfe, by Caius againſt her aduerſaries. As when he ſaid vnto one of them: How dareſt thou preſume to ſpeake euill of Cornelia, that had Tiberius to her ſonne? And the other partie alſo that ſlandered her, being ſorely ſuſpected for a Sodomite: And art thou ſo impudent, ſaid he, to ſhew thy face before Cornelia? Haſt thou brought forth children as ſhe hath done? And yet it is well knowne to all men in ROME, that ſhe being but a woman, hath liued longer without a man, then thou that art a man. Thus were Caius words ſharpe and ſtinging, and many ſuch like are to be gathered out of his writings. Furthermore, he made many other lawes afterwards to increaſe the peoples authority, and to imbaſe the Senates greatneſſe.

Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, honored of the people of Rome.

Other lawes preferred by Caius Gracchus.

The firſt was, for the reſtoring of the Colonies to ROME, in diuiding the lands of the common-wealth vnto the poore citizens that ſhould inhabit there.

The other, that they ſhould apparell the ſouldiers at the charge of the common-wealth, and that it ſhould not be deducted out of their pay: and alſo, that no citizen ſhould be billed to ſerue in the wars, vnder ſeuenteene yeares of age at the leaſt.

Another law was, for their confederates of ITALY, that through all ITALY they ſhould haue as free voices in the election of any Magiſtrate, as the naturall citizens of ROME it ſelfe.

Another, ſetting a reaſonable price of the corne that ſhould be diſtributed vnto the poore people.

Another touching iudgement, whereby he did greatly miniſh the authority of the Senate. For before, the Senators were onely Iudges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honoured and feared of the people, and the ROMAINE Kinghts: and now he ioyned three hundred ROMAINE Knights vnto the other three hundred Senators, and brought it ſo to paſſe, that all matters iudiciall ſhould be equally iudged among thoſe ſixe hundred men. After he had paſſed this law, it is reported he was very curious in obſeruing all other things, but this one thing ſpecially, that where all other Orators ſpeaking to the people turned them towards the pallace where the Senatours ſate, and to that ſide of the market place which is called Comitium: he in contrary manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwards towards ỹ other ſide of the market place; & after that kept it constantly, and neuer failed. Thus by a litle turning & alte ring of his look only, he remoued a great matter. For he so transferred all the gouernment of ỹ commonwealth from the Senate vnto the iudgement of the people, to teach the Orators by his exãple, that in their orations they shold behold the people, not the Senate. Now, the people hauing not onely confirmed the law he made touching the Iudges, but giuen him also full power and authority to chuse among the ROMAINE Knights such Iudges as he liked of, he found thereby he had absolute power in his owne hands, insomuch as the Senators themselues did aske counsel of him. So did he euer giue good counsell, and did preferre matters meete for their honour. As amongst others, the law he made touching certaine wheate that Fabius Vice-prætor had sent out of SPAINE, which was a good and honourable act; he perswaded the Senate that the corne might be sold, and so to send backe againe the money thereof vnto the townes and cities from whence the corne came: and therwithall to punish Fabius for that he made the Empire of ROME hatefull and intollerable vnto the prouinces and subiects of the same. This matter wan him great loue and commendation of all the prouinces subiect to ROME. Furthermore, he made lawes for the restoring of the decayed townes, for mending of high waies, for building of garners for prouision of corne. And to bring all these things to passe, he himselfe tooke vpon him the only care and enterprise, being neuer wearied with any paines taken in ordering of so great affaires. For, he followed all those things so earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand: insomuch that they who most hated and feared him, wondred much to see his diligence and quick dispatch in matters. The people also wondred much to behold him onely, seeing alwaies such a number of labourers, artificers, ambassadors, officers, souldiers, & learned men, whom he easily satisfied and dispatched, keeping still his estate, and yet vsing great courtesie and ciuility, entertaining euery one of them priuatly: so that he made his accusers to be found liers, that said he was a stately man and very cruell. Thus he wanne the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his conuersation and deeds then he was otherwise in his Orations. But the greatest paines and care he tooke vpon him was, in seeing the high waies mended, the which he would haue as well done, as profitably done. For he would cast the causies by the line in the softest ground in the fields, and then would paue them with hard stone, and cast a great deale of grauell vpon it, which he caused to be brought thither. When he found any low or watery places which the riuers had eaten into, he raised them vp, or else made bridges ouer them, with an euen height equall to either side of the causie; so that all his work caried a goodly leuell withall, euen by the line or plummet, which was a pleasure to behold. Furthermore, he deuided these high waies by miles, euery mile containing eight furlongs, and at euery miles end he set vp a stone for a marke. At either end also of these high waies thus paued, he set certaine stones of conuenient height, a pretie way asunder, to help ỹ trauellers by to take their horse backs again without any helpe. The people for these things highly praising & extolling him, and being ready to make shew of their loue & good will to him any maner of way, he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make vnto them, the which if it would please them to grant him, he would think they did him a maruellous pleasure: & if they denied him also, he cared not much. Then euery man thought it was the Consulship he meant to aske, and that he would sue to be Tribune and Consull together. But when the day came to chuse the Consuls, euery man looking attentiuely what he would doe, they maruelled when they saw him come downe the field of Mars, and brought Caius Fannius with his friends, to further his sute for the Consulship. Therein he serued Fannius turne, for he was presently chosen Consull: and Caius Gracchus was the second time chosen Tribune againe, not at his own suite, but by the good will of the people. Caius perceiuing that the Senators were his open enemies, and that Fannius the Consull was but a slack friend vnto him, he began againe to curry fauour with the common people, and to prefer new laws, setting forth the law of the Colonies, that they should send of the poore citizens to repleniish the cities of TARENTVM & CAPVA, and that they should grant all the LATINS the freedome of ROME. The Senate perceiuing his power grew great, and that in the end he would be so strong that they could not withstand him, they deuised a new and strange way to plucke the peoples good will from him, in granting them things not altogether very honest. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Caius called Liuius Drusus, a man nobly borne, and as well brought vp as any other ROMAINE: who for wealth and eloquence was not inferiour to the greatest men of estimation in ROME. The chiefest Senators went vnto him, and perswaded him him to take part with them against Caius, not to vse any force or violence against the people to withstand them in any thing, but contrarily to grant them those things which were more honestie for them to deny them with their ill wil. Liuius offering to pleasure ỹ Senate with his authority, preferred lawes neither honourable nor profitable to the common-wealth, and were to no other end, but contending with Caius who should most flatter the people of them two, as plaiers do in their common playes, to shew the people pastime. Whereby the Senate shewed that they did not so much mislike Caius doings, as for the desire they had to ouerthrow him and his great credit with the people. For where Caius preferred but the replenishing of the two cities, & desired to send the honestest citizens thither, they obiected against him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other side also they fauoured Drusus, who preferred a law, that they should replenish twelue Colonies, and should send to euery one of them three thousand of the poorest citizens. And where they hated Caius for that he had charged the poore citizens with an annuall rent for the lands that were deuided vnto them, Liuius in contrary manner did please them by disburdening them of that rent and paiment, letting them haue the lands scotfree. Furthermore also, where Caius did anger the people, because he gaue al ỹ LATINES the freedom of ROME to giue their voices in chusing of Magistrates as freely as the naturall ROMAINES, when Drusus on the other side had preferred a law that thenceforth no ROMAIN should whip any souldier of the LATINS with rods to the wars, they liked the law, & past it. Liuius also in euery law he put forth said in all his orations, that he did it by the counsel of the Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people: & this was all the good he did in his office vnto the commonwealth. For by his meanes the people were better pleased with the Senate, & where they did before hate al the noblemen of the Senate, Liuius took away that malice, when the people saw that all that he propounded, was for the preferment & benefit of the commonwealth, with the consent and furtherance of the Senate. The only thing also that perswaded the people to thinke that Drusus meant vprightly, and that he only respected the profit of the common people, was, that he neuer preferred any law for himself, or for his own benefit. For in the restoring of these Colonies which he preferred, he alwaies sent other Commissioners, and gaue them the charge of it, and would neuer finger any mony himselfe: where Caius tooke vpon him the charge and care of all things himselfe, and specially of the greatest matters. Rubrius also another Tribune, hauing preferred a law for the reedifying and replenishing of CARTHAGE againe with people, the which Scipio had razed & destroyed, it was Caius hap to be appointed one of the Commissioners for it: whereupon he took ship & sailed into AFRIKE. Drusus in the meane time taking occasion of his absence, did as much as might be to seeke the fauour of the common people, and specially by accusing Fuluius who was one of the best friends Caius had, and whom they had also chosen Commissioner with him for the diuision of these lands among the citizens whom they sent to replenish these Colonies. This Fuluius was a seditious man, and therefore maruellously hated of the Senate, and withall suspected also of them that took part with the people, that he secretly practised to make their confederates of ITALY to rebell. But yet they had no euident proofe of it to iustifie it against him, more then that which he himselfe did verifie, because he seemed to be offended with the peace and quietnes they enioyed. And this was one of the chiefest causes of Caius ouerthrow, because that Fuluius was partly hated for his sake. For when Scipio AFRICAN was found dead one morning in his house, without any manifest cause how he should come to his death so sodainly, (sauing that there appeared certaine blind markes of stripes on his body, that had bene giuen him, as we haue declared at large in his life) the most part of the suspition of his death was laid to Fuluius, being his mortall enemie, & because the same day they had bene at great words together in the pulpit for Oratiõs. So was Caius Gracchus also partly suspected for it. Howsoeuer it was, such a horrible murther as this, of so famous and worthy a man as any was in ROME, was yet notwithstanding neuer reuenged, neither any inquirie made of it, because the common people would not suffer the accusation to go forward, fearing lest Caius would be found in fault, if the matter should go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caius at that time being in AFRICKE about the reedifying and replenishing of the city of CARTHAGE again, the which he named IVNONIA, the voice goeth that he had many ill signes & tokens appeared vnto him. For the staffe of his ensigne was broken with a vehement blast of wind, and with the force of the ensigne bearer that held it fast on the other side. There came a flaw of wind also that caried away the sacrifices vpon the altars, & blew them quite out of the circuit which was marked out for the

compasse of the city. Furthermore, the wolues came and tooke away the markes which they had set downe to limit the bounds of their circuite, and caried them quite away. This notwithstanding, Caius hauing dispatched all things in the space of threescore and ten daies, he returned incontinently to ROME, vnderstanding that Fuluius was oppressed by Drusus, and that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Hostilius that was all in all for the Nobility, and a man of great credite with the Senate, being the yeare before put by the Consulship by Caius practise, who caused Fannius to be chosen, he had good hope this yeare to speed, for the great number of friends that furthered his suite. So that if he could obtaine it, he was fully bent to set Caius beside the saddle, and the rather, because his estimation and countenance he was wont to haue among the people, began now to decay, for that they were full of such deuices as his were: because there were diuers others that preferred the like to please the people withall, & yet with the Senates great good will and fauour. So Caius being returned to ROME, he remoued from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house vnder the market place, to shew himself thereby the lowlier and more popular, because many of the meaner sort of the people dwelt thereabouts. Then he purposed to go forward with the rest of his lawes, & to make the people to establish them, a great number of people repairing to ROME out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counselled the Consull Fannius to make proclamation, that all those which were no naturall ROMAINS, resident & abiding within the city selfe of ROME, that they should depart out of ROME. Besides all this there was a strange proclamation made, and neuer seene before: that none of all the friends and confederates of the ROMAINES for certaine daies should come into ROME. But Caius on the other side set vp bils on euery post, accusing the Consul for making so wicked a proclamation: and further, promised the confederates of ROME to aide them, if they would remaine there against the Consuls proclamation. But yet he performed it not: for when he saw one of Fannius sergeants carie a friend of his to prison, he held on his way, and would see nothing, neither did he helpe him: either of likelihood because he feared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or else because he was loth (as he said) to picke any quarrell with his enemies, which sought it of him. Furthermore, he chanced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this occasion. The people were to see the pastime of the sword-players or fencers at the sharpe, within the very market place, and there were diuers of the officers that to see the sport, did set vp scaffolds round about, to take money for the standing. Caius commanded them to take them downe againe, because the poore men might see the sport without any cost. But not a man of thē would yeeld to it. Wherefore he staid till the night before the pastime should be, and then he tooke all his labourers he had vnder him, and went and ouerthrew the scaffolds euery one of them: so that the next morning all the market place was cleare for the common people to see the pastime at their pleasure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him maruellously, and tooke him for a worthy man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, and tooke him for a bold presumptuous man. This seemeth to be ỹ chiefe cause why he was put from his third Tribuneship, where he had the most voices on his side: because his colleagues, to be reuenged of the part he had played them, of malice and spite made false report of the voices. Howbeit there is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulse, and it is reported he spake somewhat too proudly to his enemies that were merrie with the matter, and laughed him to scorne: that they laughed a SARDONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkely his deedes were intangled. Furthermore, his enemies hauing chosen Opimius Consull, they began immediatly to reuoke diuers of Caius lawes: as amongst the rest, his doings at CARTHAGE for the redifying of that citie, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, because they might haue iust occasion of anger to kill him. Caius notwithstanding did patiently beare it at the first: but afterwards his friends, and specially Fuluius, did encourage him so, that he began again to gather men to resist the Consull. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, secretly hiring a great number of strangers which she sent vnto ROME, as if they had bin reapers, or haruest men. And this is that she wrote secretly in her letter vnto her son in ciphers. And yet other write to the contrary, that she was very angry he did attempt those things. When the day came that they should proceed to the reuocation of his lawes, both parties met by breake of day at the Capitol. There when the Consul Opimius had done sacrifice, one of Caius sergeants called Quintus Antylius, carying the intrailes of the beast sacrificed, said vnto Fuluius, and others of his tribe

tribe that were about him: giue place to honeſt men, vile citizens that ye be. Some ſay alſo, that beſides theſe iniurious words, in ſcorne and contempt he held out his naked arme to make them aſhamed: whereupon they ſlue him preſently in the field with great bodkins to write with, which they had purpoſely made for that intent. So the common people were maruellouſly offended for this murther, and the chiefe men of both ſides alſo were diuerſly affected. For Caius was very ſorrie for it, and bitterly reproued them that were about him, ſaying, that they had giuen their enemies the occaſion they looked for, to ſet vpon them. Opimius the Conſull in contrarie manner, taking this occaſion, roſe vpon it, & did ſtirre vp the people to be reuenged. But there fell a ſhowre of raine at that time that parted them. The next morning the Conſull hauing aſſembled the Senate by breake of day, as he was diſpatching cauſes within, ſome had taken the body of Antyllius, and laid it naked vpon the beere, and ſo caried it through the market place (as it was agreed vpon before amongſt them) and brought it to the Senate doore, where they began to make great mone and lamentation, Opimius knowing the meaning of it, but yet he diſſembled it, and ſeemed to wonder at it. Wherupon the Senatours went out to ſee what it was, and finding this Beere in the market place, ſome fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cryed out, that it was a ſhamefull act, and in no wiſe to be ſuffered. But on the other ſide, this did reuiue the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickedneſſe of the ambitious Noblemen: who hauing themſelues before ſlaine Tiberius Gracchus that was Tribune, and within the Capitoll it ſelfe, and had alſo caſt his body into the riuer, did now make an honourable ſhew openly in the market place, of the body of the Sergeant Antyllius (who though he were wrongfully ſlaine, yet had himſelfe giuen them the cauſe that ſlue him, to do that they did) and all the whole Senate were about the Beere to bewaile his death, and to honor the funerals of a hireling, to make the people alſo kill him that was only left the protector and defender of the people. After this, they went againe into the Capitoll, and there made a decree, whereby they gaue the Conſul Opimius extraordinary power and authority, by abſolute power to prouide for the ſafetie of the commonwealth, to preſerue the city, and to ſuppreſſe the tyrants. This decree being eſtabliſhed, the Conſull preſently commanded the Senators that were preſent there, to go arme themſelues: and appointed the Romaine Knights, that the next morning betimes euery man ſhould bring two of their men armed with them. Fuluius on the other ſide prepared his force againſt them, and aſſembled the common people together. Caius alſo returning from the market place, ſtaid before the image of his father, and looked earneſtly vpon it without euer a word ſpeaking, onely he burſt out a weeping, and fetching a great ſigh, went his way. This made the people that ſaw him to pitie him: ſo that they talked among themſelues, that they were but beaſts and cowards at ſuch a ſtraight to forſake ſo worthy a man. Thereupon they went to his houſe, ſtayed there all night and watched before his gate: not as they did that watched with Fuluius, that paſſed away the night in guzling and drinking drunk, crying out, and making noiſe, Fuluius himſelfe being drunke firſt of all, who both ſpake and did many things farre vnmeete for his calling. For on the other ſide, they that watched Caius were very ſorowfull, and made no noiſe, euen as in a common calamity of their countrey, deuiſing with themſelues what would fall out vpon it, waking and ſleeping one after another by turnes. When the day brake, they with Fulnius did awake him, who ſlept yet ſoundly for the wine he dranke ouer night, and they armed themſelues with the ſpoiles of the Gaules that hung round about his houſe, whom he had ouercome in battell the ſame yeare he was Conſull: and with great cries, and thundering threats they went to take the mount Auentine. But Caius would not arme himſelfe, but went out of his houſe in a long gowne, as if he would haue gone ſimply into the market place according to his wonted manner, ſauing that he caried a ſhort dagger at his girdle vnder his gowne. So as he was going out of his houſe, his wife ſtaid him at the doore, and holding him by the one hand, and a little child of his in her other hand, ſhe ſaid thus vnto him: Alas Caius, thou doeſt not now go as thou wert wont, a Tribune into the market place to ſpeake to the people, neither to preferre any new lawes: neither doeſt thou go vnto an honeſt warre, that if vnfortunately that ſhould happen to thee that is common to al men, I might yet at the leaſt mourne for thy death with honor. But thou goeſt to put thy ſelfe into bloudy butchers hands, who moſt cruelly haue ſlaine thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goeſt a naked man vnarmed, intending rather to ſuffer then to do hurt. Beſides, thy death can bring no benefit to the Common-wealth. For the worſer part hath now the vpper hand, conſidering that ſentence paſſeth by force of ſword. Had thy brother

As Licinia was making this pitifull mone vnto him, Caius faire and ſoftly pulled his hand from her, and left her giuing her neuer a word, but went on with his friends. But ſhe reaching after him to pull him by the gowne, fell to the ground, and lay flatling there a great while, ſpeaking neuer a word, vntil at length her ſeruants tooke her vp in a ſwoune, and caried her ſo vnto her brother Craſſus. Now Fuluius ſent his ſon to the Conſull with an Heraulds rod to offer peace. Fuluius, by the perſwaſion of Caius, when all their faction were met, ſent his yonger ſon (which was a pretie faire boy) with an Heraulds rod in his hand for his ſafetie. This boy humbly preſenting his duty, with the teares in his eyes, before the Conſull and Senate, offered them peace. The moſt of them that were preſent thought very well of it. But Opimius made anſwer, ſaying, that it became them not to ſend meſſengers, thinking with faire words to win the Senate: but it was their duty to come themſelues in perſon like ſubiects, and offenders to make their triall, and ſo to craue pardon, and to ſeeke to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commanded the boy he ſhould not returne againe to them, but with this condition he had preſcribed. Caius (as it is reported) was ready to go and cleare himſelfe vnto the Senate: but the reſidue would not ſuffer him to go. Whereupon Fuluius ſent his ſonne back againe vnto them, to ſpeake for them as he had done before. But Opimius that was deſirous to fight, cauſed the boy to be taken, and committed him to ſafe cuſtody, & then went preſently againſt Fuluius with a great number of footmen well armed, and of CRETAN archers beſides; who with their arrowes did more trouble and hurt their enemies, then with any thing elſe, that within a while they all began to flie. Fuluius on the other ſide fled into an old hot-houſe that no body made reckoning of, and there being found ſhortly after, they ſlue him and his eldeſt ſonne. Now for Caius, he fought not at all, but being madde with himſelfe, and grieued to ſee ſuch bloudſhed, he got him into the temple of Diana, where he would haue killed himſelfe, had not his very good friends Pomponius and Licinius ſaued him. For both they being with him at that time, tooke his ſword from him, and counſelled him to flie. It is reported that then he fell downe on his knees, & holding vp both his hands vnto the goddeſſe, he beſought her that the people might neuer come out of bondage, to be reuenged of this their ingratitude and treaſon. For the common people (or the moſt part of them) plainely turned their coates, when they heard proclamation made, that al men had pardon granted them that would returne. So Caius fled vpon it, and his enemies followed him ſo neare, that they ouertooke him vpon the woodden bridge, where two of his friends that were with him ſtaid, to defend him againſt his purſuers, and bad him in the meane time make ſhift for himſelfe, whilſt they fought with them vpon the bridge: and ſo they did, and kept them that not a man got the bridge of them vntil they were both ſlaine. Now there was none that fled with Caius, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithſtanding, euery man did ſtill encourage and counſell him, as they do men to win a game, but no man would helpe him, nor offer him any horſe though he often required it, becauſe he ſaw his enemies ſo neare vnto him. This notwithſtanding, by their defence that were ſlaine vpon the bridge, he got ground on them ſo, that he had leiſure to creepe into a litle groue of wood which was conſecrated to the Furies. There his ſeruant Philocrates ſlue him, and then ſlue himſelfe alſo, and fell dead vpon him. Other write notwithſtanding, that both the maſter and ſeruant were ouertaken, and taken aliue: and that his ſeruant did ſo ſtraight embrace his maſter, that none of the enemies could ſtrike him for all the blowes they gaue, before he was ſlaine himſelfe. So one of the murtherers ſtrake off Caius Gracchus head to carie to the Conſull. Howbeit one of Opimius friends called Septimuleius, took the head from the other by the way, becauſe proclamation was made by trumpet before they fought, that whoſoeuer brought the heads of Fuluius and Caius, they ſhould be paid the weight of them in gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius caried Caius head vpon the top of his ſpeare vnto Opimius: whereupon the ſcales being brought to weigh it, it was found to weigh ſeuenteene pound weight and two third parts of a pound: becauſe Septimuleius beſides the horrible murder he had committed, had alſo holpen it with this villanie, that he had taken out his braine, and in lieu thereof had filled his ſcull with Lead. Now the other alſo that brought Fuluius head, becauſe they were poore men, they had nothing. The bodies of theſe two men, Caius Gracchus and Fuluius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thouſand that were ſlaine) were all throwne into the riuer, their

their goods confiscate, and their widowes forbidden to mourne for their death. Furthermore, they took from Licinia Caius wife, her ioynter: but yet they dealt more cruelly and beastly with the young boy, Fuluius sonne; who had neither lift vp his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but onely came to them to make peace before they fought; whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battel ended they put him to death. But yet that which most of all grieued the people was the temple of Concord, the which Opimius caused to be built: for it appeared that he boasted, and in maner triumphed, that he had slaine so many citizens of ROME. And therefore there were that in the night wrote vnder the inscription of the temple these verses:

The temple of Concord built by Opimius the Consull.

A furious fact and full of beastly shame
This temple built, that beareth Concords name.

This Opimius was the first man at ROME, that being Consull, vsurped the absolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or iustice condemned three thousand citizens of ROME, besides Fulvius Flaccus, (who had also bene Consul, and had receiued the honour of triumph) and Caius Gracchus a yong man in like case, who in vertue and reputation excelled al the men of his years. This notwithstanding could not keepe Opimius from theeuerie and extortion. For when he was sent Ambassador vnto Iugurth king of NVMIDIA, he was bribed with mony: and thereupon being accused, he was most shamefully conuicted, and condemned, Wherefore he ended his daies with this reproch and infamy, hated and mocked of all the people: because at the time of the ouerthrow he dealt beastly with them that fought for his quarrell. But shortly after it appeared to the world how much they lamented the losse of the two brethren of the Gracchi. For they made images and statues of them, and caused them to be set vp in an open and honourable place, consecrating the places where they had bene slaine: and many of them also came and offered to them of their first fruites and flowers, according to the time of the yeare, and went thither to make their prayers on their knees, as vnto ỹ temples of the gods. Their mother Cornelia, as writers report, did beare this calamity with a noble heart: and as for the chappels which they built and consecrated vnto them in the place where they were slaine, she said no more, but that they had such graues as they had deserued. Afterwards she dwelt continually by the mount of Misene, and neuer changed her maner of life. She had many friends, and because she was a noble Ladie, and loued euer to welcome strangers, she kept a very good house, and therefore had alwaies great repaire vnto her, of GRECIANS and learned men: besides, there was no king nor prince but both receiued gifts from her, & sent her again. They that frequented her company delighted maruellously to heare her report the deeds & maner of her fathers life, Scipio AFRICAN: but yet they wondred more, to heare her tell the acts and death of her two sonnes, Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, without shedding teare, or making any shew of lamentation or griefe, no more then if she had told an history vnto them that had requested her. Insomuch as some writers report, that age, or her great misfortunes, had ouercome and taken her reason and sense from her to feele any sorrow. But indeed they were senselesse to say so, not vnderstanding how that to be nobly borne and vertuously brought vp, doth make men temperatly to digest sorrow: and that fortune oftentimes ouercomes vertue which regardeth honestie in all respects, but yet with any aduersity she cannot take away the temperance from them whereby they patiently beare it.

THE COMPARISON OF Tiberius and Caius Gracchi, with Agis and Cleomenes.

The wisdome of the Gracchi

NOw that we be come to the end of this history, we are to compare the liues of these two men the one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi, their enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could not deny but that they were the best giuen to vertue, and as well taught and brought vp as any ROMAINES that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the vpper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they hauing bene very ill brought vp both for learning and good manners, for lacke where of the oldest men, were almost spoiled, yet did they notwithstanding make themselues the first masters and example of sobriety, temperance, and simplicity of life. Furthermore, the two first hauing liued in that time when ROME flourished most in honour and vertuous desires, they were more then ashamed to forsake the vertues inherited from their ancestors. These two last also being borne of fathers that had a cleane contrary disposition, & finding their country altogether without any order, & infected with dissolute life, were not therfore any whit the more slack in their desire to do well. Furthermore, the greatest praise they gaue vnto the two Gracchi, was, their abstinence & integrity from taking of mony al the time they were in office, & dealt in matters of state, euer keeping their hands cleane, and tooke not a penny wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on the other side was offended if any man praised him, for that he took nothing frō another man: seeing that he dispossessed himselfe of his owne goods, and gaue it to his citizens, which amounted in ready coyne to the value of sixe hundred talents. Whereby men may easily iudge, how grieuous a sinne he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man, seeing that he thought it a kind of auarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was maruellous great difference in their alterations, and renewing of the state, which they did both preferre. For the acts of the two ROMAINES were to mend high waies and to reedifie and repleniſh decayed townes: and the worthiest act Tiberius did, was the law Agraria, which he brought in for deuiding of the lands of the commonwealth amongst the poore citizens. And the best act his brother Caius also did, was the mingling of the Iudges, adding to the three hundred Senators three three hundred ROMAINE Knights to be indifferent Iudges with them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrary manner were of opinion, that to reforme ſmall faults, and to redreſſe them by litle and litle, was (as Plato ſaid) to cut off one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards ſeuen in the place: and therefore they tooke vpon them a change and innouation, euen at once to root out all the miſchiefes of their country, (or to ſpeake more truly, to take away the diſorder which brought in all vice & miſchiefe to the commonwealth,) and ſo to reſtore the city of SPARTA againe to her former ancient honourable eſtate. Now this may be ſaid againe for the gouernment of the Gracchi, that the chiefeſt men of ROME were euer againſt their purpoſes. Where, in that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the nobleſt ground that could be, and that was the ancient lawes and ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equality: the firſt, inſtituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo. Furthermore, by the alterations of the firſt, ROME became no greater then it was before. Where, by that which Cleomenes did, all GREECE in ſhort time ſaw that SPARTA commanded all the reſt of PELOPONNESVS, and fought at that time againſt thoſe that were of greateſt power in all GREECE, ſo the ſigniorie thereof. Whereby their only marke and purpoſe was, to rid all GREECE from the wars of the GAVLES and ILLYRIANS, and to reſtore it againe to the honeſt gouernment of the race and line of Hercules. Their deaths (me thinkes) do ſhew great difference of their courages. For the Gracchi fighting with their owne citizens, were ſlaine flying. Of theſe two alſo, Agis, becauſe he would put neuer a citizen to death, was ſlaine in manner voluntarily: and Cleomenes receiuing iniurie ſtood to his defence, and when he had no oportunity to do it, he ſtourly killed himſelfe. And ſo may it be ſaid on the other ſide, that Agis did neuer any notable act of a Captaine or ſoldier, becauſe he was ſlaine before he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on the other ſide, may be oppoſed the ſcaling of the wals of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the firſt man that at the aſſault got vp vpon the wall, which was no ſmall exploit: and the peace which he made alſo at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, whereby he ſaued twenty thouſand fighting men of the ROMAINES, the which had no meanes otherwiſe to ſaue their liues. And Caius alſo in the ſelfe ſame war, at the ſiege of NVMANTIA, and afterwards in SARDINIA, did many noble feats of war; ſo that there is no doubt, but if they had not bene ſlaine ſo ſoone as they were, they might haue bene compared with the excelleteſt Captaines that euer were in ROME. Againe, touching their doings in ciuill policie, it appeareth that Agis dealt more ſlackly, being abuſed by Ageſilaus: who likewiſe deceiued the poore citizens of the diuiſion of the lands which he had promiſed them. In fine, for lacke of courage, becauſe he was very yong, he left the things vndone which he had purpoſed to haue performed. On the other ſide, Cleomenes went too roundly to work, to renue the ancient gouernment of the common-wealth againe, by killing the Ephores with too much cruelty, whom he might eaſily haue wonne, or otherwiſe by force haue gotten the vpper hand. For it is not the part of a wiſe Phiſitian, nor of a good gouernour of a common-wealth to vſe the ſword, but in great extremity, where there is no other helpe nor remedie: and there lacked iudgement in them both, but worſt of all in the one, for iniury is euer ioyned with crueltie. The Gracchi on the other ſide, neither the one nor the other began to imbrue their hands in the bloud of their citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caius, yet he would neuer defend himſelfe: and where it was knowne that he was very valiant in battell with his ſword in his hand againſt the enemie, he ſhewed himſelfe as cold againe in the vprore againſt his citizens. For he went out of his houſe vnarmed, & fled when he ſaw them fight, being more circumſpect not to do hurt, then not to ſuffer any. Therfore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearefull to offend any man. For they were driuen either to yeeld to them that followed them, or elſe if they ſtayed, to ſtand to their defence, becauſe they might keepe themſelues from hurt. And where they accuſe Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greateſt that euer he did, was when he depoſed Octauius his colleague from the Tribuneſhip, and that he himſelf made ſuite for the ſecond. And as for Caius, they falſly accuſed him for the death of Antyllius the Sergeant, who indeed was ſlaine vnknowne to him, and to his great griefe. Where Cleomenes on the other ſide, though we ſhould forget the murther he committed vpon the Ephores, yet he ſet ſlaues at liberty, and ruled the kingdome in maner himſelfe alone: but yet for manners ſake only he ioyned his own brother with him, which was of the ſelfe ſame houſe. And when he had perſwaded Archidamus, (who was next heire to the kingdome of the other royall houſe) to be bold to returne home from MESSINA vnto SPARTA, he ſuffered him to be

ſlaine; and becauſe he did not reuenge his death, he did confirme their opinion that thought he was conſenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other ſide, whoſe example he did counterfeit to follow, becauſe he did willingly reſigne the kingdome vnto his brothers ſon Charilaus, & being afraid alſo, that if the young child ſhould chance to miſcarie, they would ſuſpect him for his death, he exiled himſelfe out of his owne country a long time, trauelling vp and downe, and returned not to SPARTA againe, before Charilaus had gotten a ſon to ſucceed him in his kingdome. But we cannot ſet another GRECIAN by Lycurgus comparable vnto him. We haue declared alſo that amongſt Cleomenes deeds, there were many other greater alterations then theſe, & alſo many other breaches of the law. So they that do condemne the manners of the one and the other, ſay, that the two GRECIANS from the beginning had an aſpiring mind to be tyrants, ſtill practiſing warres: whereas the two ROMAINES onely, euen by their moſt mortall enemies, could be blamed for nothing elſe, but for an extreme ambition; and did confeſſe that they were too earneſt & vehement aboue their nature, in any ſtrife or contention they had with their aduerſaries; and that they yeelded vnto their choler and paſſion, as vnto ill winds, which brought them to do thoſe things they did in the end. For what more iuſt and honeſt intent could they haue had, then the firſt was: had not the rich men (euen through ſtoutneſſe and authority to ouerthrow the lawes) brought them againſt their wils into quarrell: the one to ſaue his life, the other to reuenge his brothers death, who was ſlaine without order, iuſtice, or the authority of any Officer? Thus thou mayeſt thy ſelfe ſee the difference that was betwixt the GRECIANS and the ROMAINS: and now to tell you plainely my opinion of both, I think that Tiberius was the ſtouteſt of the foure; that the yong king Agis offended leaſt; and that for boldneſſe and courage, Caius came nothing neare vnto Cleomenes.

THE LIFE OF Demoſthenes.

True happineſſe conſiſteth in the mind and manners of man, not in any place or country.

HE that made the litle booke of the praiſe of Alcibiades, touching the victory he wanne at the horſe race of the Olympian games, (were it the Poet Euripides, as ſome thinke, or any other) my friend Soſius, ſaid: that to make a man happie, he muſt of neceſſity be borne in ſome famous city. But to tell you what I thinke hereof, doubtleſſe, true happineſſe chiefly conſiſteth in the vertue and qualities of the mind, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be borne in a pelting village, or in a famous city: no more then it is for one to be borne of a faire or foule mother. For it were a madneſſe to thinke that the little village of IVLIDE, being the leaſt part of the Ile of CEO (the whole Iland of it ſelfe being but a ſmal thing) and

and that the Isle of ÆGINA (which is of so small a length, that a certaine ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might be taken away, because it was but as a straw in the sight of the hauen of Piræa) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comedians: and not breed an honest, iust, and wise man, and of noble courage. For, as we haue reason to think that arts and sciences which were first deuised and inuented to make some things necessary for mens vse, or otherwise to win fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in litle poore villages: so are we to iudge also, that vertue, like a strong and fruitfull plant, can take roote, and bring forth in euery place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with paines. And therefore if we chance to offend, and liue not as we should, we cannot accuse the meanesse of our countrie where we were borne, but we must iustly accuse our selues. Surely he that hath taken vpon him to put forth any worke, or to write any history, in the which he is to thrust many strange things vnknowne to his countrey, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, but dispersed abroad in diuerse places, and to be gathered out of diuerse books and authorities: first of all, he must needes remaine in some great and famous city throughly inhabited, where men do delight in good and vertuous things, because there are commonly plenty of all sorts of bookes: and that perusing them, and hearing talke also of many things besides, which other Historiographers peraduenture haue not written of, and which will carie so much more credit, because men that are aliue may presently speake of them as of their owne knowledge; whereby he may make his worke perfect in euery point, hauing many and diuerse necessary things contained in it. But I my selfe that dwell in a poore litle towne, and yet do remaine there willingly lest it should become lesse, whilest I was in ITALY, and at ROME, I had no leysure to studie and exercise the Latine tongue, aswell for the great businesse I had then to do, as also to satisfie them that came to learne Philosophie of me: so that euen somewhat too late & now in my latter time, I began to take Latine bookes in hand. And thereby a strange thing to tell you, but yet true) I learned not, nor vnderstood matters so much by the words, as I came to vnderstand the words, by common experience and knowledge I had in things. But furthermore, to know how to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to speake it readily, or to vnderstand the figures, translations, and fine ioyning of the simple words one with another, which do beautifie and set forth the tongue, surely I iudge it to be a maruellous pleasant and sweete thing; but withall it requireth a long and labourſome studie, meete for those that haue better leysure then I haue, and that haue yong yeares on their backes to follow such pleasure. Therefore in this present booke, which is the fifth of this worke, where I haue taken vpon me to compare the liues of Noble men one with another: vndertaking to write the liues of Demosthenes and Cicero, we will consider and examine their nature, manners and conditions, by their acts and deeds in the gouernment of the common-wealth, not meaning otherwise to conferre their works and writings of eloquence, neither to define which of them two were sharper or sweeter in his oration. For as the Poet Iohn saith:

Expedient for an Historiographer to be in a famous city.

Plutarchs country very litle.

In this behalfe a man may rightly say,
The Dolphines in their proper soyle do play.

The which Cecilius litle vnderstanding, being a man very rash in all his doings, hath vnaduisedly written and set forth in print, a comparison of Demosthenes eloquence with Ciceroes. But if it were an easie matter for euery man to know himselfe, then the gods indeed haue giuen vs no commandement, neither could men haue said that it came from heauen. But for my opinion, me thinks Fortune euen from the beginning hath framed, in maner, of one selfe mold Demosthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures fashioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as both of them to be ambitious, both of them to loue the liberty of their country, & both of them very fearefull in any danger of wars. And likewise their fortunes seeme to me, to be both much alike. For it is hard to find two Orators againe, that being so meanely borne as they, haue come to be of so great power and authority as they two; nor that haue deserued the ill will of kings & noblemen so much as they haue done, nor that haue lost their daughters, nor that haue bene banished their countries, and that haue bene restored againe with honor, and that againe haue fled, and haue bene taken againe, nor that haue ended their liues for the liberty of their country. So that it is hard to be iudged, whether Nature haue made them liker in maners, or Fortune in their doings: as if they had both like cunning workmasters striued one with the other, to whom they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two.

Demosthenes compared with Cicero.

The parentage of Demosthenes.

Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was (as Theopompus writeth) one of the chiefe men of the city, and they called him Machæropœus, to wit, a maker of sword blades, because he had a great shop where he kept a number of slaues to forge them. But touching Æschines the Orators report of his mother, who said that she was the daughter of one Gelon, (that fled from ATHENS being accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother, I am not able to say whether it be true, or deuised of malice to do him despite. Howsoeuer it was, it is true that his father died, leauing him but seuen yeares old, and left him reasonable well: for his goods came to little lesse then the value of fifteene talents. Howbeit his guardians did him great wrong, for they stole a great part of his goods themselues; and did let the rest runne to nought, as hauing litle care of it, for they would not pay his schoolemasters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learne the liberall sciences which are vsually taught vnto honest mens sons: and to further that want also, he was but a weakling and very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him go to schoole, neither also durst his masters keepe him too hard to it, because he was but a sickly child at the first, and very weake. And it is reported also, that the surname of Battalus was giuen him in mockery by other schoole boyes his companions, because of his weaknesse of body. This Battalus (as diuerse men do report) was an effeminate player on the flute, against whom the Poet Antiphanes to mocke him, deuised a litle play. Others also do write of one Battalus, a dissolute Orator, and that wrote lasciuious verses: and it seemeth that the ATHENIANS at that time did call a certaine part of mans body vncomely to be named, Battalus.

Demosthenes why surnamed Argas.

Now for Argas (which surname men say was also giuen him) he was so called, either for his rude and beastly manners (because some Poets do call a snake Argas) or else for his manner of speech, which was very vnpleasant to the eare; for Argas is ỹ name of a Poet that made alwaies bawdy and il-fauoured songs. But hereof enough, as Plato said. Furthermore, the occasion (as it is reported) that moued him to giue himselfe to eloquence, was this. Callistratus the Oratour was to defend the cause of one Oropus before the Iudges, & euery man longed greatly for this day of pleading, both for the excellency of the Orator, that then bare ỹ bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accusation, which was manifestly knowne to all. Demosthenes hearing his schoolemasters agree together to go to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his schoolmaster to be so good as to let him go with him. His master granted him, and being acquainted with the keepers of the hall doore where this matter was to be pleaded, he so intreated thē, that they placed their scholer in a very good place, where being at his ease, he might both heare and see all that was done, and no man could see him. Thereupon when Demosthenes had heard the case pleaded, he was greatly in loue with the honor which the Orator had gotten, when he saw how he was waited vpon home with such a traine of people after him: but yet he wondered more at the force of his great eloquence, that could so turne and conuey all things at his pleasure. Thereupon he left the studie of all other sciences, and all other exercises of wit and body, which other children are brought vp in: and began to labor continually, and to frame himselfe to make Orations, with intent one day to be an Orator among the rest. His master that taught him Rhetoricke was Isæus, notwithstanding that Isocrates also kept a schoole of Rhetoricke at that time: either because that being an orphane he was not able to pay the wages that Isocrates demanded of his scholers, which was ten Minas: or rather for that he found Isæus maner of speech more proper for the vse of the eloquence he desired, because it was more fine and subtil. Yet Hermippus writeth notwithstanding, that he had read certaine bookes hauing no name of any author, which declared that Demosthenes had bene Platoes scholer, & that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation & eloquence. And he writeth also of one Cteſibius, who reporteth that Demosthenes had secretly read Isocrates works of Rhetoricke, and also Alcidamus bookes, by meanes of one Callias SYRACVSAN, and others. Wherefore when he came out of his wardship, he began to put his guardians in suite, and to write Orations and pleas against them: who in contrary manner did euer vse delaies and excuses, to saue themselues for giuing vp any account vnto him, of his goods and patrimonie left him. And thus following this exercise (as Thucydides writeth) it prospered so well with him, that in the end he obtained it, but not without great paines and danger: and yet with all that he could do, he could not recouer all that his father left him, by a good deale. So hauing now gotten some boldnesse, and being vsed also to speake in open presence, and withall, hauing a feeling and delight of the estimation that is wonne by eloquence in pleading, afterwards he attempted to put forward himself, and to practise in matters of state. For, as there

goeth a tale of one Laomedon an ORCHOMENIAN, who hauing a grieuous paine in the ſplene, by aduice of the Phiſitians was willed to runne long courſes to helpe him: and that following their order, he became in the end ſo luſtie and nimble of body, that afterwards he would needs make one to run for games, and indeed grew to be the ſwifteſt runner of all men in his time. Euen ſo the like chanced vnto Demoſthenes. For at the firſt, beginning to practiſe Oratory for recouery of his goods, and thereby hauing gotten good skill and knowledge how to pleade, he afterwards tooke vpon him to ſpeake to the people in aſſemblies, touching the gouernment of the common wealth, euen as he ſhould haue contended for ſome game or price; and at length did excell all the Orators at that time that got vp into the pulpit for Orations: notwithſtanding that when he firſt ventured to ſpeake openly, the people made ſuch a noiſe, that he could ſcant be heard; and beſides they mocked him for his maner of ſpeech that was ſo ſtrange, becauſe he vſed ſo many long confuſed periods; and his matter he ſpake of was ſo intricate with arguments one vpon another, that they were tedious, and made men weary to heare him. And furthermore, he had a very ſoft voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had alſo a ſhort breath, the which made that men could not well vnderſtand what he meant; for his long periods in his Oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at ỹ end of his ſentence. So that at length perceiuing he was thus reiected, he gaue ouer to ſpeake any more before the people, and halfe in deſpaire withdrew himſelfe into the hauen of Piræa. There Eunomus the THESSALIAN being a very old man, found him, and ſharply reproued him, and told him, that he did himſelfe great wrong, conſidering, that hauing a maner of ſpeech much like vnto Pericles, he drowned himſelfe by his faint heart; becauſe he did not ſeeke the way to be bold againſt the noiſe of the common people, and to arme his body to away with the paines and burthen of publike Orations, but ſuffering it to grow feebler for lacke of vſe and practiſe. Furthermore, being once againe repulſed & whiſtled at, as he returned home hanging downe his head for ſhame, and vtterly diſcouraged, Satyrus an excellent player of comedies being his familiar friend, followed him, and went to ſpeake with him. Demoſthenes made his complaint vnto him, that where he had taken more paines then all the Orators beſides, and had almoſt euen worne himſelfe to the bones with ſtudie, yet he could by no meanes deuiſe to pleaſe the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bib all the day long, & marriners that vnderſtood nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the pulpit with Orations: and on the other ſide that they made no account of him. Satyrus then anſwered him, Thou ſayeſt true Demoſthenes, but care not for this, I wil helpe it ſtraight, and take away the cauſe of all this, ſo thou wilt but tell me without booke certaine verſes of Euripides, or of Sophocles. Thereupon Demoſthenes preſently rehearſed ſome vnto him, that came into his mind. Satyrus repeating them after him, gaue them quite another grace, with ſuch a pronunciation, comely geſture, and modeſt countenance becoming the verſes, that Demoſthenes thought them cleane changed. Whereby perceiuing how much the action (to wit, the comely maner and geſture in his Oration) doth giue grace and comlineſſe in his pleading, he then thought it but a triſle, and almoſt nothing to ſpeake of, to exerciſe to pleade well, vnleſſe therewithall he did alſo ſtudie to haue a good pronunciation and geſture. Thereupon he built him a celler vnder the ground, the which was whole euen in my time, and he would daily go downe into it, to faſhion his geſture and pronunciation, and alſo to exerciſe his voice; and that with ſuch earneſt affection, that oftentimes he would be there two or three moneths one after another, and did ſhaue his head of purpoſe, becauſe he durſt not go abroad in that ſort, although his will was good. And yet he tooke his theame and matter to declaime vpon, and to practiſe to pleade, of the matters he had had in hand before, or elſe vpon occaſion of ſuch talke as he had with them that came to ſee him, while he kept his houſe. For they were no ſooner gone from him, but he went downe into his celler, and repeated from the firſt to the laſt all matters that had paſſed betweene him and his friends in talke together, and alledged alſo both his owne and their anſwers. And if peraduenture he had bene at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeate it by himſelf: and would finely couch and conuey it into proper ſentences, and thus change and alter euery way any matter that he had heard, or talked with others. Thereof came the opinion men had of him, that he had no very quicke capacity by nature, and that his eloquence was not naturall, but artificially gotten with extreme labour. And for proofe hereof, they make this probable reaſon, that they neuer ſaw Demoſthenes make any Oration on the ſudden, and that oftentimes when hee was ſet in the aſſembly, the people would call him by his name, to ſay his opinion touching the matter of counſell then in hand: howbeit that he neuer roſe vpon their call, vnleſſe he had firſt ſtudied the matter well he would ſpeake of. So that all the other Orators would many times giue him a taunt for it: as Pythias among other, that taunting him on a time, told him, his reaſons ſmelled of the lampe. Yea, replied Demoſthenes ſharply againe: ſo is there great difference Pythias, betwixt thy labour and mine by lamp-light. And himſelfe alſo ſpeaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told thē plainly, that he did not alwaies write at length al that he would ſpeake, neither did he alſo offer to ſpeake, before he had made briefes of that he would ſpeake. He ſaid furthermore, that it was a token the man loued the people well, that would be carefull before what he would ſay to them. For this preparatiue (quoth he) doth ſhew that he doth honor and reuerence them. In contrary maner alſo, he that paſſeth not how the people take his words, it is a plaine token that he deſpiſeth their authority, and that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to vſe force againſt them rather then reaſon & perſwaſion. But yet further to enlarge the proofes, that Demoſthenes had no hart to make any oration on the ſudden, they do alleadge this reaſon: That Demades many times roſe vp on the ſudden to maintaine Demoſthenes reaſons, when the people otherwhile did reiect him: and that Demoſthenes on the other ſide, did neuer riſe to make Demades words good, which he had ſpoken in his behalfe. But now might a man aske againe: If Demoſthenes was ſo timorous to ſpeake before the people vpon the ſudden, what meant Æſchines then to ſay, that he was maruellous bold in his words? and how chanceth it, that he riſing vpon the ſudden, did preſently anſwer the Orator Python BIZANTINE in the field, that was very luſty in ſpeech (and rough like a vehement running ſtreame) againſt the ATHENIANS? and how chanced it that Lamachus MYRRHENIAN, hauing made an oration in the praiſe of Philip and Alexander kings of MACEDON, in the which he ſpake all the ill he could of the THEBANS, and of the OLYNTHIANS: & when he had read and pronounced it in the open aſſembly of the Olympian games, Demoſthenes vpon the inſtant riſing vp on his feete, declared, as if he had read ſome hiſtory, and pointed as it were with his finger vnto all the whole aſſembly, the notable great ſeruice and worthy deeds the which the CHALCIDIANS had done in former times, for the benefit and honor of GRECE? And in contrary maner alſo, what miſchiefe and inconuenience came by meanes of the flatterers that altogether gaue themſelues to curry fauour with the MACEDONIANS? With theſe and ſuch like perſwaſions, Demoſthenes made ſuch ſtirre amongſt the people, that the Orator Lamachus being afraid of the ſudden vprore, did ſecretly conuey himſelfe out of the aſſembly. But yet to tell you what I thinke; Demoſthenes in my opinion faſhioning himſelfe euen from the beginning, to follow Pericles ſteps and examples, he thought that for other qualities he had, they were not ſo requiſite for him; and that he would counterfeit his grauity and ſober countenance, and to be wiſe, not to ſpeake ouer-lightly to euery matter at all aduentures: iudging, that by that maner of wiſedome he came to be great. And like as he would not let ſlip any good occaſion to ſpeake, where it might be for his credit: ſo would he not likewiſe ouer-raſhly hazard his credit and reputation to the mercy of fortune. And to proue this true, the orations which he made vpon the ſudden without premeditation before, do ſhew more boldneſſe & courage then thoſe which he had written and ſtudied long before, if we may beleeue the reports of Eratoſthenes, Demetrius PHALERIAN, and of the other comicall Poets. For Eratoſthenes ſaid, that he would be often caried away with choler and fury. Demetrius alſo ſaith, that ſpeaking one day to the people, he ſware a great oath in rime, as if he had bene poſſeſſed with ſome diuine ſpirit, and ſaid:

By ſea and land, by riuers, ſprings and ponds.

There are alſo certaine comicall Poets that do call him Ropoperperethra, as who would ſay, a great babler that ſpeaketh all things that commeth to his tongues end. Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rhetoricke called Antitheton: which is, oppoſition, with ſaying, Sic recepit ſicut cepit, which ſignifieth, he tooke it as he found it.) In the vſe of this figure Demoſthenes much pleaſed himſelfe, vnleſſe the Poet Antiphanes ſpeaketh it of pleaſure, deriding the counſell he gaue the people, not to take the Ile of HALONESVS of king Philip, as of gift, but to receiue it as their owne reſtored. And yet euery body did grant, that Demades of his owne naturall wit, without art, was inuincible: and that many times ſpeaking vpon the ſudden, he did vtterly ouerthrow Demoſthenes long ſtudied reaſons. And Ariſto of the Ile of CHIO, hath written Theophraſtus iudgement of the Orators of that time. Who being asked what manner of Orator he thought Demoſthenes: he anſwered, worthie of this city. Then againe, how he thought thought of Demades: aboue this city, ſaid he. The ſame Philoſopher writeth alſo, that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN (one of thoſe that practiſed at that time in the commonwealth) gaue this ſentence: that Demoſthenes indeed was a great Orator, but Phocions tongue had a ſharper vnderſtanding, becauſe in few words he comprehended much matter. And to this purpoſe, they ſay that Demoſthenes himſelfe ſaid alſo, that as oft as he ſaw Phocion get vp into the pulpit for Orations to ſpeake againſt him, he was wont to ſay to his friends: See, the axe of my words riſeth. And yet it is hard to iudge, whether he ſpake that in reſpect of his tongue, or rather for ỹ eſtimation he had gotten, becauſe of his great wiſdome: thinking (as indeed it is true) that one word onely, the twinckling of an eye, or a nod of the head, of ſuch a man (that through his worthines had attained that credit) hath more force to perſwade then all the fine reaſons and deuices of Rhetoricke. But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth, that he heard Demoſthenes himſelfe ſay, being very old, that he did helpe them by theſe meanes. Firſt, touching the ſtammering of his tongue, which was very fat, & made him that he could not pronounce all ſyllables diſtinctly, he did helpe it by putting of little pibble ſtones into his mouth, which he found vpon the ſands by the riuers ſide, & ſo pronounced with open mouth the Orations he had without booke. And for his ſmall and ſoft voice, he made that louder, by running vp ſteepe and high hils, vttering euen with full breath ſome Orations or verſes that he had without book. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great looking-glaſſe in his houſe, and euer ſtanding on his feet before it, he would learne & exerciſe himſelfe to pronounce his Orations. For proofe hereof it is reported, that there came a man vnto him on a time, & prayed his helpe to defend his cauſe, & told him that one had beaten him: and that Demoſthenes ſaid againe vnto him, I do not beleeue this is true thou telleſt me, for ſurely the other did neuer beate thee. The plaintife then thruſting out his voice aloud, ſaid: What, hath he not beaten me? Yes indeed, quoth Demoſthenes then: I beleeue it now, for I heare the voice of a man that was beaten indeed. Thus he thought that the ſound of the voice, the pronunciatiõ or geſture in one ſort or other, were things of force to credit or diſcredit that a man ſaith. His countenance when he pleaded before the people, did marueilouſly pleaſe the common ſort: but the noble men and men of vnderſtanding, found it too baſe and meane, as Demetrius Phalerius ſaid, amongſt others. And Hermippus writeth, that one called Æſion, being asked of the ancient orators, & of thoſe of his time, anſwered: that euery man that had ſeene them, would haue wondred with what honor, reuerence and modeſty, they ſpake vnto the people; howbeit that Demoſthenes Orations (whoſoeuer read them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therefore we may eaſily iudge, that the Orations Demoſthenes wrote are very ſeuere and ſharpe. This notwithſtanding, otherwhiles he would giue many pleaſant & witty anſwers vpon the ſudden. As when Demades one day ſaid vnto him, Demoſthenes will teach me: after the common prouerbe, the Sow will teach Minerua. He anſwered ſtraight againe: This Minerua not long ſince was in Collitus ſtreet taken in adultery. A certaine theefe alſo called Chalcus (as much to ſay, as of copper) ſtepping forth to ſay ſomewhat of Demoſthenes late ſitting vp a nights, and that he wrote & ſtudied the moſt part of the night by lamp-light: Indeed, quoth Demoſthenes, I know it grieues thee to ſee my lampe burne all night: and therefore my Lords of ATHENS, me thinks you ſhold not wonder to ſee ſuch robberies in your city, conſidering we haue theeues of copper, & the wals of our houſes be but of clay. We could tell you of diuers others of his like pleaſant & witty anſwers, but theſe may ſuffice for this preſent: and therfore we wil proceed to conſider further of his nature and conditions, by his acts and deeds in the affaires of the commonwealth. Now Demoſthenes firſt beginning when he came to deale in the affaires of the ſtate, was in the time of the war made with the PHOCIANS, as himſelfe reporteth: and as appeareth further in his Orations which he made againſt Philip: of the which, the laſt were made after the war was ended, and the firſt do touch alſo ſome particular doings of the ſame. He made the Oration againſt Midias, when he was but 32 yeares old, and was of ſmall countenance & reputation in the commonwealth: the want whereof was the chiefeſt cauſe (as I thinke) that induced him to take meny for the iniury he had done him, and to let his action fall againſt him:

He was not of a mild and gentle mind,
But fierce and haſtie to reuenge by kind.

But, knowing that it was no ſmall enterpriſe, nor that could take effect by a man of ſo ſmall power and authority as himſelfe, to ouerthrow a man ſo wealthy, ſo befriended, and ſo eloquent as Midias, he therefore yeelded himſelfe vnto thoſe that did ſpeake and intreate for him. Neither do I think that the three thouſand Drachmaes which he receiued, could haue bridled the bitterneſſe of his nature, if otherwiſe he had ſeene any hope or likelihood that he could haue preuailed againſt him. Now at his firſt coming vnto the commonwealth, taking a noble matter in hand, to ſpeake againſt Philip, for the defence and maintenance of the lawes and liberties of the GRECIANS, he behaued himſelf ſo worthily, that in ſhort ſpace he wā him maruellous fame for his great eloquence and plaine manner of ſpeech. Thereby he was maruellouſly honored alſo through all GREECE, and greatly eſteemed with the king of PERSIA: and Philip himſelfe made more account of him then of all the Orators in ATHENS; and his greateſt foes which were moſt againſt him, were driuen to confeſſe, that they had to do with a famous man. For, in the Orations which Æſchines and Hyperides made to accuſe him, they write thus of him. And therfore I maruel what Theopompus meant, when he wrote that Demoſthenes had a ſubtill vnconſtant mind, and could not long continue with one kind of men, nor in one mind for matters of ſtate. But in cōtrary maner, in my iudgement he continued conſtant ſtill to the end, in one ſelfe maner and order, vnto the which he had betaken himſelfe at the beginning: and that not onely he neuer changed all his life time, but to the contrary, he loſt his life, becauſe he would be no changeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuſe himſelfe for that he had oft turned coate in matters of gouernmēt, ſaid, that he went oftentimes againſt his owne ſayings, as matters fell out: but neuer againſt the benefit of the commonwealth. And Melanopus alſo, who was euer againſt Calliſtratus, hauing his mouth many times ſtopped with mony, he would vp to the pulpit for Orations, and tell the people, that indeed Calliſtratus, which maintaineth the contrarie opinion againſt me, is my enemy, and yet I yeeld vnto him for this time: for, the benefit of the commonwealth muſt cary it. And another alſo, Nicodemus MESSENIAN, who being firſt of Caſſanders ſide, tooke part afterwards with Demetrius, & then ſaid, that he did not ſpeake againſt himſelf, but that it was meet he ſhould obey his ſuperiors. They cannot detect Demoſthenes with the like, that he did euer halt or yeeld either in word or deed. For he euer continued firme and conſtant in one mind in his Orations. Inſomuch that Panætius the Philoſopher ſaith, that the moſt part of all his Orations are grounded vpon this maxime and principle: that for it ſelfe, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honeſt. As, the Oration of the crowne, the which he made againſt Ariſtocrates: that alſo which he made for the franches and freedome: and in fine, all his Orations againſt Philip of MACEDON; in all thoſe he doth not perſwade his countrimen to take that which is moſt pleaſant, eaſieſt, or moſt profitable: but he proueth that oftentimes honeſty is to be preferred aboue ſafety or health. So that, had he in al his Orations & doings ioyned to his honeſtie, courteſie, and franke ſpeech, valiantneſſe in wars, and cleane hands from bribery, he might deſeruedly haue bene compared, not with Mirocles, Polyeuctus, Hyperides and other Orators: but euen with the higheſt, with Cimon, Thucidides, and Pericles. For Phocion, who tooke the worſt way in gouernment of the commonwealth, becauſe he was ſuſpected that he tooke part with the MACEDONIANS: yet for valiantneſſe, wiſedome and iuſtice, he was euer thought as honeſt a man as Ephialtes, and Ariſtides. But Demoſthenes on the other ſide (as Demetrius ſaith) was no man to truſt to for wars, neither had he any power to refuſe gifts and bribes. For though he would neuer be corrupted by Philip king of MACEDON, yet he was bribed with gold and ſiluer that was brought from the cities of SVSA and ECBATANA; and was very ready to praiſe and commend the deeds of their anceſtors, but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honeſteſt man of all other Orators in his time, excepting Phocion. And beſides, he did euer ſpeake more boldly and plainly vnto the people then any man elſe, and would openly contrarie their minds, and ſharply reproue the ATHENIANS for their faults, as appeareth by his orations. Theopompus alſo writeth, that the people on a time would haue had him to accuſe a man, whom they would needs haue condemned. But he refuſing to do it, the people were offended, and did mutine againſt him. Thereupon he riſing vp, ſaid openly vnto them: My Lords ATHENIANS, I will alwaies counſell you to that which I thinke beſt for the benefit of the common-wealth, although it be againſt your minds: but falſly to accuſe one to ſatisfie your minds, though you command me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did againſt Antiphon, ſheweth plainely, that he was no people-pleaſer, and that he did leane more vnto the authority of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the people in the aſſembly of the city, Demoſthenes notwithſtanding tooke him, and called him againe into the court of the Areopagites, and did not paſſe for the peoples ill will, but there conuinced him for promiſing Philip of MACEDON to burne the Arſenall of ATHENS: ſo

ſo by ſentence of that court he was condemned, and ſuffered for it. He did alſo accuſe the Nun Theorides for many lewd parts committed, and amongſt others, for that ſhe taught ſlaues to deceiue their maſters: and ſo following the matter againſt her, ſhe was condemned to death, and executed. It is thought alſo, that he made the Oration Apollodorus ſpake againſt the Prætor Timotheus, and proued therby that he was a debtor to the commonwealth, and ſo a naughty man; and that he wrote thoſe Orations alſo intituled to Formio and Stephanus, for the which he was iuſtly reproued. For Formio pleaded againſt Apollodorus with the Oration which Demoſthenes ſelfe had made for him; which was euen alike, as if out of one ſelfe cutlers ſhop he had ſold his enemies ſwords one to kil another: and for his knowne Orations, thoſe which he made againſt Androcion, Timocrates and Ariſtocrates, he cauſed them to giue them vnto others, when he had not yet dealt in matters of ſtate. For indeed when he did put them forth, he was not paſſing ſeuen or eight and twenty yeares old. The Oration which he had made againſt Ariſtogiton, and the other alſo of liberty, againſt Cteſippus the ſon of Chabrias, he ſpake them, as he ſaith himſelf (or as others write) openly vnto the people, becauſe he intended to marry Chabrias mother: howbeit he did not, but maried a SAMIAN womã, as Demetrius MAGNESIAN writeth in his book he made, intituled Synonyma. But that he wrote againſt Æſchines, where he accuſeth him that he dealt falſly when he was ambaſſador, it is not known whether it was recited or not, although Idomeneus writeth, that there lacked but thirty voices only to haue quit Æſchines. But in this me thinks he ſpake not truly, and doth but coniecture it by that one and the other haue ſaid in their Orations againſt the crowne, in the which neither the one nor the other do ſay preciſely, that this accuſation proceeded to iudgement. But let other that liſt decide this doubt. Now before the war began, it was euident inough, to which part Demoſthenes would incline in the commonwealth. For, he would neuer leaue to reproue and withſtand Philips doings. Therefore he being more ſpoken of in Philips court then any man elſe, he was ſent vnto him ỹ tenth perſon with nine others in ambaſſage. Philip gaue them all audience one after another: howbeit he was more carefull and circumſpect to anſwer Demoſthenes Oration then all the reſt. But otherwiſe out of that place, he did not Demoſthenes ſo much honor, nor gaue him ſo good entertainment, as to his other companions: for Philip ſhewed more kindneſſe, and gaue better countenance vnto Æſchines and Philocrates then vnto him. Wherfore when they did highly praiſe Philip, & ſaid that he was a wel ſpoken Prince, a faire man, and would drinke freely, and be pleaſant in company, Demoſthenes ſmiled at it, and turned all things to the worſt, ſaying, that thoſe qualities were nothing commendable nor meete for a king. For the firſt was a quality meet for a pleader, the ſecond for a woman, & the third for a ſponge. In fine, wars falling out betweene them, becauſe Philip of the one ſide could not liue in peace, & the ATHENIANS on the other ſide were ſtill incenſed & ſtirred vp by Demoſthenes daily Orations, the ATHENIANS firſt ſent into ỹ Ile of EVBOEA (the which by meanes of certaine priuate tyrants that had taken the townes, became ſubiect againe vnto Philip) following a decree Demoſthenes had preferred, and ſo went to expulſe the MACEDONIANS againe. After that alſo he cauſed them to ſend aide vnto the BYZANTINES, and to the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made war. For he ſo perſwaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did beare vnto thoſe two nations, and the faults which either of both the cities had cõmitted againſt them in the wars, touching the rebellion of their confederates: and he cauſed them to ſend them aide, which kept them from Philips force and power. Furthermore, going afterwards vnto al the great cities of GREECE as Ambaſſadour, he did ſo ſolicite and perſwade them, that he brought them all in a maner to be againſt Philip. So that the armie which their tribe ſhould find at their common charge, was 15000 footmen, all ſtrangers, and 2000 horſemen, beſides the citizens of euery city which ſhould alſo ſerue in the warres at their charge; and the mony alſo leauied for the maintenance of this war, was very willingly diſburſed. Theophraſtus writeth, that it was at that time their confederates did pray that they would ſet down a certaine ſumme of mony, what euery city ſhould pay: and that Crobylus an Orator ſhould make anſwer, that the warre had no certaine maintenance: inferring that the charges of warre was infinite. Now all GREECE being in armes, attending what ſhould happen, and all theſe people and cities being vnited in one league together, as the EVBOEIANS, the ATHENIANS, the CORINTHIANS, the MEGARIANS, the LEVCADIANS, and thoſe of CORFV: the greateſt matter Demoſthenes had to doe, was to perſwade the THEBANES alſo to enter into this league, becauſe their countrey confined and bordered with ATTICA; beſides, their force and power was of great importance, for that they caried the fame of all GREECE at that time, for the valiantest ſoldiers. But it was no trifling matter to win the THEBANS, and to make them breake with Philip, who but lately before had bound them vnto him by many great pleaſures which he had done to them in the war of the PHOCIANS: beſides alſo that betwixt ATHENS and THEBES, by reaſon of vicinity, there fell out daily quarrels and debates, the which with euery little thing were ſoone renued. This notwithſtanding Philip being proud of the victory he had won by the city of AMPHISSE, when he came & inuaded the country of ELATIA, and was entred into PHOCIDE, the ATHENIANS were then ſo amazed with it, that no man durſt occupy the pulpit for Orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole aſſembly ſtanding in a doubt with great ſilence, Demoſthenes onely ſtept vp, and did againe giue them counſell to ſeeke to make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and ſo did further encourage the people, and put them in good hope, as he was alwaies wont to do. Then with others he was ſent Ambaſſadour vnto THEBES: and Philip alſo for his part, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the THEBANS, Amyntas & Clearchus, two gentlemen MACEDONIANS, and with them Daochus, Theſſalus, and Thracydæus, to anſwer and withſtand the perſwaſions of the ATHENIAN Ambaſſadors. Thereupon the THEBANS began to aduiſe themſelues for the beſt, and laid before their eyes the miſerable fruites and calamities of war, their wounds being yet greene and vncured, which they got by the wars of PHOCIDE. Notwithſtanding, the great force of Demoſthenes eloquence (as Theopompus writeth) did ſo inflame the THEBANS courage with deſire of honour, that it trode vnder their feete all maner of conſiderations, and did ſo rauiſh them with the loue and deſire of honeſty, that they caſt at their heeles all feare of danger, all remembrance of pleaſures receiued, & all reaſon perſwading the contrary. This act of an Orator was of ſo great force, that Philip forthwith ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the GRECIANS, to intreat for peace, and all GREECE was vp to ſee what would become of this ſtirre. Thus, not onely the Captaines of ATHENS obeyed Demoſthenes, doing all that he commanded them, but the gouernours alſo of THEBES and of all the country of BOEOTIA beſides. And the aſſemblies alſo of the councell of THEBES were as well gouerned by him as the aſſemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloued both of the one and the other, & hauing alike authority to command both, and not vndeſeruedly, as Theopompus ſaith, but by iuſt deſert. But ſome fatall deſtinie, and the reuolution of times had determined the finall end of the liberty of GREECE at that time, cleane contrarie to his purpoſe and intent. There were alſo many celeſtiall ſignes that did foreſhew and prognoſticate what end ſhould enſue thereof. And amongſt others, Apolloes Nunne gaue theſe dreadfull Oracles: and this old prophecy of the SIBYLS was commonly ſung in euery bodies mouth:

What time the bloudy battell ſhall be fought at Thermodon,
God grant I may be farre away; or elſe (to looke thereon)
Haue Eagles wings to ſoare aboue, among the cloudes on hie:
For there the vanquiſht ſide ſhall weepe, and Conquerer ſhall die.

Men do report that this Thermodon is a litle riuer of the country of CHERONEA, which falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus: howbeit at this preſent time there is neuer a riuer nor brooke in all our countrey, that I know, called Thermodon. And I thinke, that that riuer which we call now Hæmon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the temple of Hercules, where the GRECIANS lay in camp. And it may be, that becauſe it was filled with dead bodies, and that it ranne bloud at the day of the battell, it changed her name, and was ſirnamed Hæmon, becauſe Hæma in the Greeke tongue, ſignifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithſtanding that this Thermodon was no riuer, but that certaine men ſetting vp their tent, and trenching it about, found a litle image of ſtone, whereupon were engrauen theſe letters: whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who caried an AMAZON hurt in his armes; and that for this image of Thermodon, they do ſing ſuch another old Oracle as this:

Ye Ernes and Rauens tarry till the field of Thermodon:
There will be ſtore of carkaſſes of men to feede vpon.

This notwithſtanding, it is very hard to tell the troth of theſe things. But Demoſthenes truſting to the valiantneſſe and power of the GRECIANS, and being maruellouſly incouraged to ſee ſuch a great number of valiant and reſolute men, ſo willing to fight with the enemie, he bad them be of good courage, and not to buzze about ſuch Oracles, and to giue eare to ſuch prophecies. And furthermore he told them plainely, that hee did miſtruſt the Nunne Pythea did leane vnto vnto Philip, as fauouring him, and did put the THEBANS in mind of their Captaine Epaminondas, and the ATHENIANS of Pericles; and perſwaded them, that thoſe two famous men were alwaies of opinion, that ſuch prophecies were no other but a fine cloake for cowards, and that taking no heed to them, they did diſpatch their matters according to their owne diſcretion. Vntill this preſent time, Demoſthenes ſhewed himſelfe alwaies an honeſt man. But when it came to the battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valiant act any thing anſwerable to the orations whereby he had perſwaded the people. For he left his ranke, and cowardly caſt away his weapons to runne the lighter, and was not aſhamed at all (as Pythias ſaid) of the words written vpon his ſhield in golden letters, which were, Good fortune. Now Philip hauing won the battell, he was at that preſent ſo ioyfull, that he fell to commit many fond parts. For after he had drunke well with his friends, he went into the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, and there in mockerie began to ſing the beginning of the decree which Demoſthenes had preferred (by the which the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed warres againſt him) riſing and falling with his voice, and dancing it in meaſure with his foote:

Demoſthenes the ſonne of Demoſthenes Pæanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to waxe ſober, and leauing his drunkenneſſe, when he had remembred himſelfe what danger he had bene in, then his haire ſtood bolt vpright vpon his head, conſidering the force and power of ſuch an Orator, that in a peece of a day had enforced him to hazard his Realme and life at a battell. Now Demoſthenes fame was ſo great, that it was caried euen to the great king of PERSIANS court, who wrote vnto his Lieutenants and gouernors, that they ſhould feed Demoſthenes with mony, and ſhould procure to entertaine him aboue all the men in GREECE, as he that could beſt withdraw Philip, and trouble him with the warres and tumults of GREECE. And this was afterwards proued by letters found of Demoſthenes himſelfe, the which came to king Alexanders hands in the city of SARDIS, and by other writings alſo of the gouernours and Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, in the which were named directly the expreſſe ſummes of money which had bene ſent and giuen vnto him. Now the GRECIANS being thus ouerthrowne by battel, the other Orators, aduerſaries vnto Demoſthenes in the commonwealth, began to ſet vpon him, and to prepare to accuſe him. But the people did not only cleare him of all the accuſations obiected againſt him, but did continue to honour him more then before, and to call him to aſſemblies, as one that loued the honour and benefit of his country. So that when the bones of their countrimen which were ſlaine at the battell of CHÆRONEA, were brought to be openly buried according to the cuſtome, the people gaue him the honour to make the funerall Oration in praiſe of the dead, and made no ſhew of ſorow or griefe for the loſſe they had receiued (as Theopompus witneſſeth, and doth nobly declare,) but rather in contrary maner ſhewed that they did not repent them in following of his counſell, but did honor him that gaue it. Demoſthenes then did make the funerall Oration. But afterwards in all the decrees he preferred to the people, he would neuer ſubſcribe any, to preuent the ſiniſter lucke and misfortune of his name, but did paſſe it vnder his friends names one after another, vntill he grew couragious againe, ſhortly after that he vnderſtood of the death of Philip, who was ſlaine immediatly after the victory he wan at CHÆRONEA. And it ſeemeth this was the meaning of the prophecy or Oracle in the two laſt verſes:

The vanquiſhed bewailes his luckleſſe lot,
And he that winnes, with life eſcapeth not.

Now Demoſthenes hearing of Philips death, before the newes were openly knowne, to preuent them, he would put the people againe in good hope of better lucke to come. Thereupon he went with a chearefull countenance into the aſſembly of the councell, and told them there, that he had a certaine dreame that promiſed great good hap, and that out of hand vnto the ATHENIANS: and immediatly after, the meſſengers arriued, and brought certaine newes of king Philips death. Thereupon the ATHENIANS made ſacrifices of ioy to the gods for this happie newes, & appointed a crowne vnto Pauſanias that had ſlaine him. Demoſthenes alſo came abroad in his beſt gowne, and crowned with flowers, ſeuen daies after the death of his daughter, as Æſchines reporteth: who reproueth him for it, and noteth him to be a man hauing litle loue or charitie vnto his owne children. But indeed Æſchines ſelfe deſerueth more blame, to haue ſuch a tender womaniſh heart, as to beleeue, that weeping and lamenting are ſignes of a gentle and charitable nature, condemning them that with patience and conſtancie doe paſſe away ſuch miſ-

fortunes. But now to the ATHENIANS againe. I can neither thinke nor say that they did wisely to shew such open signes of ioy as to weare crownes and garlands vpon their heads, nor also, to sacrifice vnto the gods for the death of a Prince, that behaued himselfe so princely and curteously vnto them in the victories he had won of them. For though indeed all cruelty be subiect to the reuenge of the gods, yet is this an act of a vile and base mind, to honor a man while he liued, and to make him free of their city; and now that another had slaine him, they to be in such an exceeding iolity withall, and to exceed the bounds of modesty so far, as to rampe in maner with both their feete vpon the dead, and to sing songs of victory, as if they themselues had bene the men that had valiantly slaine him. In contrary manner also, I praise and commend the constancy and courage of Demosthenes, that he leauing the teares and lamentation of his home trouble vnto women, did himselfe in the meane time that he thought was for the benefit of the commonwealth: and in my opinion, I thinke he did therein like a man of courage, and worthy to be a gouernor of a commonwealth, neuer to stoupe nor yeeld, but alwaies to be found stable and constant, for the benefit of the commonwealth, reiecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in respect of the seruice of his countrey; and to keepe his honour much more carefully, then common players vse to do, when they play the parts of Kings and Princes, whom we see neither weepe nor laugh when they list, though they be on the stage, but when the matter of the play falleth out to giue them iust occasion. But we omit those reasons, if there be no reason (as indeed there is not) to leaue and forsake a man in his sorrow and trouble, without giuing him some words of comfort, but rather to deuise some matter to asswage his sorrow, & to withdraw his mind from that, to thinke vpon some pleasanter thing: euen as they should keepe sore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them greene and darker. And from whence can a man take greater comfort for his troubles and griefes at home, when the common wealth doth well, then to ioyne their priuate griefes with common ioyes, to the end that the better may obscure and take away the worse? But thus farre I digressed from my history, enlarging this matter, because Æschines in his oration touching this matter, did moue the peoples hearts too much vnto womanish sorow. But now to the rest. The cities of GREECE being againe stirred vp by Demosthenes, made a new league againe together: and the THEBANS also hauing armed themselues by his practise, did one day set vpon the garrison of MACEDONIANS within their city, and slue many of them. The ATHENIANS prepared also to maintaine warre on the THEBANS behalfe, and Demosthenes was daily at all the assembles of councell, in the pulpit, perswading the people with his orations: and he wrote also into ASIA vnto the king of PERSIAES Lieutenants and Captaines, to make warre with Alexander on their side, calling him child, and Margites, as much to say, as foole. But after that Alexanaer hauing set all his things at stay within his Realme, came himselfe in person with his army, and inuaded the country of BOEOTIA, then fell the pride of the ATHENIANS greatly, and Demosthenes also plied the pulpit no more as he was wont. At length the poore THEBANS being left vnto themselues forsaken of euery man, they were compelled themselues alone to beare the brunt of this warre, and so came their city to vtter ruine and destruction. Thereby the ATHENIANS being in a maruellous feare and perplexity, did suddenly chuse Ambassadors to send vnto this yong king, and Demosthenes chiefly among others: who being afraid of Alexanders fury and wrath, durst not go to him, but returned from mount Cytharon, and gaue vp the Ambassade. But Alexander sent to summon the ATHENIANS, to send vnto him ten of their Orators, as Idomeneus and Duris both do write: or eight, as the most writers and best historiographers do report, which were these: Demosthenes, Polyeuctus, Ephialtes, Lycurgus, Myrocles, Damon, Callisthenes and Charidemus. At which time they write that Demosthenes told the people of ATHENS, the fable of the Sheepe and Wolues, how that the Wolues came on a time, and willed the Sheepe, if they would haue peace with them, to deliuer them their mastiues that kept them. And so he compared himselfe and his companions that trauelled for the benefit of the people, vnto the dogges that keepe the flockes of sheepe, and called Alexander the Wolfe. Moreouer, said he, like as you see these corne masters bringing a sample of their corne in a dish or napkin to shew you, and by that litle do sell all that they haue: so I thinke you will all wonder, that deliuering of vs, you shall also deliuer your selues into the hands of your enemies. Aristobulus of CASSANDRIA reporteth this matter thus. Now the ATHENIANS being in consultation, not knowing how to resolue, Demades hauing taken fiue talents of them whom Alexander demaunded, did offer himselfe, and promised promiſed to go in this Ambaſſage vnto Alexander, and to intreate for them; either becauſe he truſted in the loue the king did beare him, or elſe for that he thought he hoped he ſhould finde him pacified, as a Lyon glutted with the bloud of beaſts which he had ſlaine. Howſoeuer it happened, he perſwaded the people to ſend him vnto Alexander, whom he ſo handled, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the city of ATHENS. Thereupon Alexander being retired, Demades and his fellowes bare all the ſway & authority, and Demoſthenes was vnder foot. Indeed when Agis king of LACEDÆMON, came with his armie into the field, he began a litle to rouze himſelfe, and to lift vp his head: but he ſhrunke collar againe ſoone after, becauſe the ATHENIANS would not riſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who were ouerthrowne, & Agis ſlaine in battell. At that time was the cauſe of the crowne pleaded againſt Cteſiphon, and the plea was written a litle before the battell of CHÆRONEA, in the yeare when Charondas was Prouoſt of ATHENS: howbeit no ſentence was giuen till ten yeares after, when Ariſtophon was Prouoſt. This was ſuch an open iudgement, and ſo famous, as neuer was any, as well for the great fame of the Orators that pleaded in emulation one of the other, as alſo for the worthineſſe of the Iudges that gaue ſentence thereof: who did not leaue Demoſthenes to his enemies, although indeed they were of greater power then he, and were alſo ſupported with the fauour and good will of the MACEDONIANS: but they did notwithſtanding ſo well quit him, that Æſchines had not ſo much as the fift part of mens voices and opinions on his ſide. Wherefore immediatly after the ſentence giuen, he went out of ATHENS for ſhame, and trauelled into the country of IONIA, and vnto the RHODES, where he did teach Rhetoricke. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders ſeruice, came vnto ATHENS, being to be charged with many foule matters he had committed by his exceeding prodigality: and alſo becauſe he feared Alexanders furie, who was growne ſeuere and cruell vnto his chiefeſt ſeruants. He coming now amongſt the ATHENIANS with ſtore of gold and ſiluer, the Orators being greedy and deſirous of the gold & ſiluer he had brought, began ſtraight to ſpeake for him, and did counſell the people to receiue and protect a poore ſuter that came to them for ſuccour. But Demoſthenes gaue counſell to the contrary, and bad them rather driue him out of the city, and take heed they brought not warres vpon their backes, for a matter that not onely was not neceſſarie, but furthermore meerely vniuſt. But within few daies after, an inuentorie being taken of all Harpalus goods, he perceiuing that Demoſthenes tooke great pleaſure to ſee a cup of the kings, and conſidered very curiouſly the faſhion and workmanſhip vpon it, he gaue it him in his hand, to iudge what it weyed. Demoſthenes peyzing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was ſo heauie: ſo he asked how many pound weight it weyed. Harpalus ſmiling, anſwered him: It will bring thee twenty talents. So when night was come, he ſent him the cup, with the twenty talents. This Harpalus was a very wiſe man, and found ſtraight by Demoſthenes countenance that he loued money, and could preſently iudge his nature by ſeeing his pleaſant countenance, and his eyes ſtill vpon the cup. So Demoſthenes refuſed not his gift, and being ouercome withall, as if he had receiued a garriſon into his houſe, he took Harpalus part. The next morning, he went into the aſſembly of the people, hauing his necke bound vp with wooll and rolles. So when they called him by his name to ſtep vp into the pulpit, to ſpeake to the people as he had done before, he made a ſigne with his head, that he had an impediment in his voice, and that he could not ſpeake. But wiſe men laughing at his fine excuſe, told him, that it was no ſquinance that had ſtopped his weſell that night, as he would make them beleeue: but it was Harpalus money which he had receiued, that made him in that caſe. Afterwards when the people vnderſtood that he was corrupted, Demoſthenes going about to excuſe himſelfe, they would not abide to heare him, but made a noiſe and exclamation againſt him. Thereupon there roſe vp a pleaſant conceited man, and ſaid: Why my maſters, do ye refuſe to heare a man that hath * ſuch a golden tongue? The people thereupon did immediatly baniſh Harpalus; and fearing leſt king Alexander would require an account of the gold and ſiluer which the Orators had robbed and pilfered away among them, they made very diligent ſearch and inquiry in euery mans houſe, excepting Gallicles houſe, the ſonne of Arrenidas; whoſe houſe they would by no meanes haue ſearched, becauſe he was but newly maried, and had his new ſpouſe in his houſe, as Theopompus writeth. Now Demoſthenes deſiring to ſhew that he was in no fault, preferred a decree, that the court of the Areopagites ſhould heare the matter, and puniſh them that were found faultie, and therewithall ſtraight offered himſelfe to be tried. Howbeit he was one of the firſt whom the court condemned in the ſumme

of fiftie talents, and for lacke of payment, they put him in prison: where he could not endure long both for shame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as also for his sickly bodie. So he brake prison, partly without the priuity of his keepers, and partly also with their consent: for they were willing he should make a scape. Some do report, that he fled not farre from the city: where it was told him, that certaine of his enemies followed him, whereupon he would haue hidden himselfe from them. But they themselues first called him by his name, and comming to him, praied him to take mony of them, which they had brought him from their houses to helpe him in his banishment: and that therefore they ran after him. Then they did comfort him the best they could, and perswaded him to be of good cheere, & not to despaire for the misfortune that was come to him. This did pierce his heart the more for sorrow, that he answered them: Why, would you not haue me be sorie for my misfortune, that compelleth me to forsake the city, where indeed I haue so courteous enemies, that it is hard for me to find any where so good friends? So he took his banishment vnmanly, and remained the most part of his banishment in the city of Ægina, or at the city of Troezen, where oftentimes he would cast his eyes towards the country of Attica, and weepe bitterly. And some haue written certaine words he spake, which shewed no mind of a man of courage, nor were answerable to the noble things he was wont to perswade in his orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of Athens, he looked backe againe, and holding vp his hands to the Castle, said in this sort: O Lady Minerua, Lady patroneſſe of this city: why doest thou delight in three so mischieuous beasts: the Owle, the Dragon, and the People? Besides, he perswaded the yong men that came to see him, & that were with him, neuer to meddle in matters of state; assuring them, that if they had offered him two waies at the first, the one to go into the assembly of the people, to make Orations in the pulpit, and the other to be put to death presently; and that he had knowne as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to suffer that medleth with the affaires of the state, the feare, the enuie, the accusations, and troubles in the same, he would rather haue chosen the way to haue suffered death. So, Demosthenes continuing in his exile, king Alexander died, and all Greece was vp againe: insomuch as Leosthenes being a man of great valour, had shut vp Antipater in the city of Lamea, and there kept him straightly besieged. Then Pytheas and Callimedon, sirnamed Carabos, two Orators, and both of them banished from Athens, they tooke part with Antipater, and went from towne to towne with his Ambassadors and friends, perswading the Grecians not to stir, neither to take part with the Athenians. But Demosthenes in contrary manner, ioyning with the Ambassadors sent from Athens into euery quarter to solicite ẏ cities of Greece, to seeke to recouer their liberty, he did aide them the best he could, to solicite the Grecians, to take armes with the Athenians, to driue the Macedonians out of Greece. And Phylarchus writeth that Demosthenes encountered with Pytheas words in an open assembly of the people in a certaine towne of Arcadia. Pytheas hauing spoken before him, had said: Like as we presume alwaies that there is some sicknes in the house whither we do see Asses milke brought: so must that towne of necessity be sicke, wherein the Ambassadors of Athens do enter. Demosthenes answered him againe, turning his comparison against him: That indeed they brought Asses milke, where there was need to recouer health: and euen so, the Ambassadours of Athens were sent to heale and cure them that were sicke. The people at Athens vnderstanding what Demosthenes had done, they so reioyced at it, that presently they gaue order in the field, that his banishment should be reuoked. He that perswaded the decree of his reuocation, was called Damon Pæanian, that was his nephew: and thereupon the Athenians sent him a galley to bring him to Athens, from the city of Ægina. So Demosthenes being arriued at the hauen of Piræa, there was neither gouernour, Priest, nor almost any townes man left in the city, but went out to the hauen to welcome him home. So that Demetrius Magnesian writeth, that Demosthenes then lifting vp his hands vnto heauen, said, that he thought himselfe happie for the honour of that iourney, that the returne from his banishment was farre more honourable then Alcibiades returne in the like case had bene. For Alcibiades was called home by force: and he was sent for with the good will of the citizens. This notwithstanding, he remained still condemned for his fine: for by the law, the people could not dispence withall, nor remit it. Howbeit they deuised a way to deceiue the law: for they had a manner to giue certaine money vnto them that did prepare and set out the Altar of Iupiter sauiour, for the day of the solemnitie of the sacrifice, the which they did yearely celebrate vnto him:

him: ſo they gaue him the charge to make this preparation for the ſumme of fiftie talents, being the ſumme of the fine aforeſaid wherein he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the good hap of his reſtitution to his country and goods: for the affaires of the GRECIANS were immediatly after brought to vtter ruine. For the battell of CRANON which they loſt, was in the moneth Munychion (to wit, Iuly:) and in the moneth Bœdromion next enſuing (to wit, Auguſt) the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS entred into the fort of Munychia. And in the moneth Pyanepſion (to wit, the October following) Demoſthenes died in this maner. When newes came to ATHENS, that Antipater and Craterus were coming thither with a great armie, Demoſthenes and his friends got out of the towne a litle before they entred; the people by Demades perſwaſion, hauing condemned them to die. So, euery man making ſhift for himſelfe, Antipater ſent ſoldiers after them to take them: and of them Archias was Captaine, ſirnamed Phygadotheras, as much to ſay, as a hunter of the baniſhed men. It is reported that this Archias was borne in the city of THVRIES, and that he had bene ſometimes a common player of tragedies: and that Polus alſo who was borne in ŷ city of ÆGINA (the excellenteſt craftsmaſter in that faculty of al men) was his ſcholer. Yet Hermippus doth place him amongſt the number of the ſcholers of Lacritus the Orator. And Demetrius alſo writeth, that he had bene at Anaximenes ſchoole. Now this Archias hauing found the Orator Hyperides in the city of ÆGINA, Ariſtonicus MARATHONIAN, & Hymeræus the brother of Demetrius the PHALERIAN, which had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Aiax, he tooke them out of the temple by force, and ſent them vnto Antipater, who was at that time in the city of CLEONES, where he did put them all to death: and ſome ſay, that he did cut off Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demoſthenes had taken ſanctuary in the Ile of CALAVRIA, he tooke litle pinnaces, with a certaine number of THRACIAN ſouldiers, and being come thither, he ſought to perſwade Demoſthenes to be contented to goe with him vnto Antipater, promiſing him that he ſhould haue no hurt. Demoſthenes had a ſtrange dreame the night before, and thought that he had played a tragedy contending with Archias, and that he handled himſelfe ſo well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commend him, and gaue him the honour to be the beſt player: howbeit that otherwiſe he was not ſo well furniſhed as Archias & his players, & that in all manner of furniture he did far exceed them. The next morning when Archias came to ſpeake with him, and vſing gentle words vnto him, thinking thereby to winne him by faire meanes to leaue the ſanctuarie, Demoſthenes looking him full in the face, ſitting ſtill where he was, without remouing, ſaid vnto him: O Archias, thou diddeſt neuer perſwade me when thou plaiedſt a play, neither ſhalt thou now perſwade me, though thou promiſe me. Then Archias began to be angry with him, and to threaten him. O ſaid Demoſthenes, now thou ſpeakeſt in good earneſt, without diſſimulation, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commanded thee: for before, thou ſpakeſt in the clouds, and farre from thy thought: but I pray thee ſtay a while, till I haue written ſomewhat to my friends. After he had ſaid ſo, he went into the temple as though he would haue diſpatched ſome letters, and did put the end of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his maner was when he did vſe to write any thing, and held the end of the quill in his mouth a prety while together: then he caſt his gowne ouer his head, & layed him downe. Archias ſouldiers ſeeing that, being at the doore of the temple, laughed him to ſcorne (thinking he had done ſo for that he was afraid to dye) calling him coward, and beaſt. Archias alſo coming to him, prayed him to riſe, and began to vſe the former perſwaſions to him, promiſing him that he would make Antipater his friend. Then Demoſthenes feeling the poyſon worke, caſt open his gowne, and boldly looking Archias in the face, ſaid vnto him: Now when thou wilt, play Creons part, and throw my body to the dogs, without further graue or buriall. For my part, ô god Neptune, I do go out of thy temple being yet aliue, becauſe I will not prophane it with my death: but Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS, haue not ſpared to defile thy ſanctuary with bloud and cruell murther. Hauing ſpoken theſe words, he prayed them to ſtay him vp by his arme-holes, for his feete began already to faile him; and thinking to go forward, as he paſt by the Altar of Neptune, he fell downe, and giuing one gaſpe, gaue vp the ghoſt. Now touching the poyſon, Ariſto reporteth, that he ſucked and drew it vp into his mouth out of his quill, as we haue ſaid before. But one Pappus (from whom Hermippus hath taken his hiſtorie) writeth, that when he was laid on the ground before the Altar, they found the beginning of a letter which ſaid: Demoſthenes vnto Antipater, but no more. Now his death being thus ſudden, the THRACIAN ſoldiers that were at the temple doore, reported that they ſaw him plucke the poyſon which he put into his mouth, out of a litle cloth he had, thinking to them that it had bene a peece of gold he had ſwallowed downe. Howbeit a maid of the houſe that ſerued him, being examined about it, told them, that he had caried it about him a long time for a preſeruatiue for him. Eratoſthenes writeth, that he kept this poyſon in a litle boxe of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arme. There are many writers alſo that do report his death diuerſly, but to recite them all were in vaine: ſauing that there was one called Demochares (who was Demoſthenes very friend) who ſaid, that he died not ſo ſuddenly by poyſon, but that it was the ſpeciall fauour of the gods (to preſerue him from the cruelty of the MACEDONIANS) that ſuddenly tooke him out of his life, and made him feele ſo litle paine. Demoſthenes died the ſixteenth day of the moneth Pynepſion (to wit, October) on the which day they do celebrate at ATHENS the feaſt of Ceres, called Teſmophoria, which is the dolefulleſt feaſt of al the yeare: on the which day alſo, the women remaine all day long in the temple of the goddeſſe, without meate or drinke. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS to honour him according to his deſerts, did caſt his image in braſſe, and made a law beſides, that the oldeſt man of his houſe ſhould for euer be kept within the pallace, at the charge of the commonwealth: and ingraued theſe verſes alſo vpon the baſe of his image:

The time of Demoſthenes death.

The Athenians honored Demoſthenes after his death

Hadſt thou Demoſthenes had ſtrength according to thy heart,
The Macedons ſhould not haue wrought the Greekes ſuch woe and ſmart.

For they that thinke that it was Demoſthenes himſelfe that made theſe verſes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, before he tooke his poyſon, are greatly deceiued. But yet a litle before my firſt comming to ATHENS, there went a report that ſuch a thing happened: A certaine ſouldier being ſent for to come vnto the Captaine, did put ſuch peeces of gold as he had into the hands of Demoſthenes ſtatue, which had both his hands ioyned together: and there grew hard by it a great Plane tree, diuerſe leaues whereof either blowne off with wind by chance, or elſe put there of purpoſe by the ſoldier, couered ſo this gold, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: vntill ſuch time as the ſoldier came againe, and found it as he left it. Hereupon this matter running abroad in euery mans mouth, there were diuerſe men that tooke occaſion of this ſubiect, to make Epigrams in the praiſe of Demoſthenes, as one who in his life was neuer corrupted. Furthermore, Demades did not long enioy the honour he thought he had newly gotten. For the iuſtice of the gods, reuenger of the death of Demoſthenes, brought him into MACEDON, to receiue iuſt puniſhment by death, of thoſe whom he diſhoneſtly flattered: being before growne hatefull to them, & afterwards committed a fault whereby he could not eſcape. For there were letters of his taken, by the which he did perſwade and pray * Perdiccas, to make himſelfe king of MACEDON, and to deliuer GREECE from bondage, ſaying, that it hung but by a thred, and yet it was halfe rotten, meaning thereby, Antipater. Dinarchus CORINTHIAN accuſed him, that he wrote theſe letters: the which ſo grieuouſly offended Caſſander, that firſt he ſlue his owne ſonne in his armes, & then commanded they ſhould afterward kill Demades, making him feele then by thoſe miſeries (which are the cruelleſt that can happen vnto man) that traitors betraying their owne countrey, do firſt of all betray themſelues. Demoſthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would neuer beleeue him. Thus, my friend Soſius you haue what we can deliuer you, by reading, or report, touching Demoſthenes life and doings.

Marcus Tullius Cicero.

AS touching Ciceroes mother, whose name was Heluia, it is reported she was a Gentlewoman borne, and liued alwaies very honestly: but for his father, the reports of him are diuers and infinite. For some say, that he was borne and brought vp in a Fullers shop: others report, that he came of Tullus Appius, who while he liued was honoured among the VOLSCES as king, and made very sharpe and cruell warres with the ROMAINES. But surely it seemes to me, that ỳ first of that name called Cicero, was some famous man, and that for his sake his of-spring continued still that sirname, and were glad to keepe it; though many men scorned it, because Cicer in English signifieth a cich pease: and Cicero had a thing vpon the tip of his nose, as it had bene a litle wart, much like to a cich pease, whereupon they sirnamed him Cicero. But this Cicero, whose life we write of now, nobly answered certaine of his friends on a time giuing him counsell to change his name, when he first made suite for office, and began to practise in matters of state: that he would endeuour himselfe to make the name of Ciceroes more noble and famous, then the Scauri or Catuli. After that, Cicero being made Treasurer in SICILE, he gaue an offering of certaine siluer plate vnto the gods, and at large engraued on it his two first names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his third name, he pleasantly commanded the workman to cut out the forme and fashion of a cich pease. Thus much they write of his name. Now for his birth, it was said that his mother was brought to bed of him without any paine, the third day of Ianuarie: on which day the Magistrates and Gouernours of ROME do vse at this present, yearely to make solemne prayers and sacrifices vnto the gods, for the health and prosperity of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an image to his nurse, that did prognosticate vnto her, she gaue a child sucke, which in time to come should doe great good vnto all the ROMAINES. Now though such things may seeme but dreames and fables vnto many, yet Cicero himselfe shortly after proued this Prophesie true: because that when he came of age to learne, he grew so toward, and wanne such fame among the boyes, for his excellent wit and quicke capacity. For thereupon came the other boyes fathers themselues to the schoole to see his face, and to be eye-witnesses of the report that went of him, of his sharpe and quicke

wit to learne. But others of the rude and baſer ſort of men were offended with their ſonnes, becauſe to honour Cicero, they did alwaies put him in the midſt betweene them, as they went in the ſtreetes. Cicero indeed had ſuch a naturall wit and vnderſtanding as Plato thought meete for learning, and apt for the ſtudie of Philoſophie. For he gaue himſelfe to all kind of knowledge, & there was no Art nor any of the liberall ſciences that he diſdained: notwithſtanding in his firſt yong yeares he was apter and better diſpoſed to the ſtudie of Poetrie then any other. There is a pretie Poem of his in verſes of eight ſtaues, called Pontius Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boy. After that, being giuen more earneſtly vnto this ſtudie, he was not only thought the beſt Orator, but the beſt Poet alſo of all the Romaines in his time: and yet doth the excellency of his eloquence, & commendation of his tongue continue euen to this day, notwithſtanding the great alteration and change of the Latine tongue. But his Poetrie hath loſt the name and eſtimation of it, becauſe there were many after him that became far more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childiſh ſtudies, he became then Philoes ſcholer, the Academicke Philoſopher, the onely ſcholer of all Clitomachus ſcholers, whom the Romaines eſteemed ſo much for his eloquence, & loued more for his gentle behauiour and conuerſation. He gaue himſelfe alſo to be a follower of Mutius Scæuola, who at that time was a great man in Rome, and Prince of the Senate, and who did alſo inſtruct Cicero in the lawes of Rome. He did alſo follow Sylla for a time, in the wars of the Marsians. But when he ſaw that the Commonwealth of Rome fell to ciuill wars, and from ciuill wars to a Monarchie, then he returned againe to his book and contemplatiue life, and frequented the learned men of Greece, and alwaies ſtudied with them, vntill Sylla had gotten the vpper hand, and that he ſaw all the commonwealth againe at ſome ſtay. About that time, Sylla cauſing the goods of one that was ſaid to be ſlaine, to be ſold by the Crier, (being one of the outlawes and proſcripts, to wit, baniſhed by bils ſet vp on poſtes,) Chryſogonus, one of Syllaes freed bondmen, and in great fauour with his maſter, bought them for the ſumme of two thouſand Drachmaes. Therewithall the ſonne and heire of the dead perſon called Roſcius, being maruellouſly offended, he ſhewed that it was too ſhamefull an abuſe: for his fathers goods amounted to the ſumme of two hundred and fiftie talents. Sylla finding himſelfe thus openly touched with publike fraud and deceit, for the only gratifying of his man, he procured Chryſogonus to accuſe him, that he had killed his owne father. Neuer an Orator durſt ſpeake in Roſcius behalfe to defend his cauſe, but ſhrunke backe, fearing Syllaes cruelty and ſeuerity. Wherefore poore Roſcius the yong man, ſeeing euery man forſake him, had no other refuge but to go to Cicero, whom his friends did counſell and perſwade boldly to take vpon him the defence of Roſcius cauſe: for he ſhould neuer haue a happier occaſion, nor ſo noble a beginning to bring himſelfe into eſtimation, as this. Thereupon Cicero determined to take his cauſe in hand, and did handle it ſo wel, that he obtained the thing he ſued for: whereby he wan him great fame and credit. But yet being afraid of Syllaes diſpleaſure, he abſented himſelf from Rome, and went into Greece, giuing it out that his trauell was for a diſeaſe he had vpon him. Indeed Cicero was dog-leane, a litle eater, and would alſo eate late, becauſe of the great weakneſſe of his ſtomacke: but yet he had a good loud voice, though it was ſomewhat harſh, and lacked grace and comelineſſe. Furthermore, he was ſo earneſt and vehement in his Oration, that he mounted ſtill with his voice into the higheſt tunes: inſomuch that men were afraid it would one day put him in hazard of his life. When he came to Athens, he went to heare Antiochus of the city of Ascalon, and fell in great liking with his ſweet tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwiſe he miſliked new opinions in Philoſophie. For Antiochus had then forſaken the opinions of the new Academicke Philoſophers, and the ſect of Carneades: being moued thereunto, either through the manifeſt proofe of things, or by his certaine iudgement, or (as ſome ſay) for that of an ambition or diſſention againſt the ſcholers and followers of Clitomachus and Philo, he had reproued the reſolutions of the Academicks, which he had of long time defended, onely to leane for the moſt part to the Stoicks opinions. Howbeit Cicero had moſt affection vnto the Academickes, and did ſtudie that ſect more then all the reſt, of purpoſe, that if he ſaw he were forbidden to practiſe in the commonwealth at Rome, he would then go to Athens (leauing all pleas and affaires of the common wealth) to beſtow the reſt of his time quietly in the ſtudie of Philoſophie. At length, when he heard newes of Syllaes death, and ſaw that his bodie was growne to good ſtate and health by exerciſe, and that his voice became daily more and more to fill mens eares with a ſweet and pleaſant ſound, and yet was loud enough for the conſtitution of his body:

receiuing letters daily from his friends at Rome, that prayed him to returne home; and moreouer, Antiochus ſelfe alſo earneſtly perſwading him to practiſe in the common-wealth, he began againe to fall to the ſtudie of Rhetoricke, and to frame himſelfe to be eloquent, being a neceſſary thing for an Oratour, and did continually exerciſe himſelfe in making Orations vpon any ſpeech or propoſition, and ſo frequented the chiefe Oratours and maſters of eloquence that were at that time. To this end therefore he went into Asia vnto Rhodes, and amongſt the Orators of Asia he frequented Xenocles Adramettin, and Dionyſius, Magnesian, and ſtudied alſo with Menippus Carian: at Rhodes he heard Apollonius Molon, and the Philoſopher Poſidonius. And it is reported alſo, that Apollonius wanting the Latine tongue, he did pray Cicero for exerciſe ſake to declame in Greeke. Cicero was very well contented with it, thinking that thereby his faults ſhould be the better corrected. When he had ended his declamation, all thoſe that were preſent were amazed to heare him, and euery man praiſed him one after another. Howbeit Apollonius all the while Cicero ſpake, did neuer ſhew any glad countenance: and when he had ended, he ſtayed a great while, and ſaid neuer a word. Cicero miſliking withall, Apollonius at length ſaid vnto him: As for me Cicero, I doe not onely praiſe thee, but more then that, I wonder at thee: and yet I am ſorie for poore Greece, to ſee that learning and eloquence (which were the two onely gifts and honours left vs) are by thee obtained with vs, and caried vnto the Romaines. Now Cicero being very well diſpoſed to go with good hope to practiſe at Rome, he was a litle diſcouraged by an Oracle that was told him. For inquiring of the god Apollo Delphian, how he might do to winne fame and eſtimation, the Nunne Pythias anſwered him, he ſhould obtaine it, ſo that in his doings he would rather follow the diſpoſition of his owne nature then the opinion of the common people. Wherefore when he came to Rome, at the firſt he proceeded very warily, and diſcreetly, and did vnwillingly ſeeke for any Office, and when he did, he was not greatly eſteemed: for they commonly called him the Grecian, and ſcholer, which are two words which the Artificers (and ſuch baſe Mechanicall people at Rome) haue euer ready at their tongues end. Now he being by nature ambitious of honor, and prickt forward alſo by the perſwaſion of his father & friends, in the end he began to pleade; and there obtained not the chiefeſt place by litle and litle, but ſo ſoone as he fell to practiſe, he was immediatly eſteemed aboue all other Oratours and pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reported notwithſtanding, that for his geſture and pronunciation, hauing the ſelfe ſame defects of nature at the beginning, which Demoſthenes had, to reforme them, he carefully ſtudied to counterfeit Roſcius, an excellent Comedian, and Æſope alſo a player of Tragedies. Of this Æſope men write, that he playing one day Atreus part vpon a ſtage (who determined with himſelfe how he might be reuenged of his brother Thyeſtes) a ſeruant by chance hauing occaſion to runne ſuddenly by him, he forgetting himſelfe, ſtriuing to ſhew the vehement paſſion and furie of this king, gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with the ſcepter in his hand, that he ſlue him dead in the place. Euen ſo Ciceroes words were of great force to perſwade, by meanes of his grace and pronunciation. For he mocking the Oratours that thruſt out their heads, and cried in their Orations, was wont to ſay, that they were like to lame men, who were driuen to ride, becauſe they could not go on foote: euen ſo (ſaid he) they crie out becauſe they cannot ſpeake. Truly pleaſant taunts do grace an Oratour, and ſheweth a fine wit: but yet Cicero vſed them ſo commonly, that they were offenſiue vnto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious ſcoffer and ſpitefull man. He was choſen Treaſurer in the time of dearth, when there was great ſcarcitie of corne at Rome: and the prouince of Sicile fell to his lot. At his firſt coming thither, the Sicilians miſliked him very much, becauſe he compelled them to ſend corne vnto Rome: but after they had found his diligence, iuſtice, and lenity, they honoured him aboue any Gouernour that euer was ſent from Rome. Now there were diuerſe young Gentlemen of Rome: of noble houſes, who being accuſed for ſundry faults committed in wars againſt their honour and martiall diſcipline, had bene ſent backe againe vnto the Prætor of Sicile: for whom Cicero pleaded, and did ſo excellently defend their cauſe, that they were pardoned euery man. Thereupon, thinking well of himſelfe, when his time was expired, he went to Rome, and by the way there hapned a prety ieſt vnto him. As he paſſed through the countrey of Campania (otherwiſe called the land of labour) he met by chance with one of the chiefeſt Romaines of all his friends. So falling in talke with him, he asked him what they ſaid of him at Rome, and what they thought of his doings: imagining that all Rome had bene full of the glorie of his name and deeds. His friend asked him againe: And where haſt thou bene Cicero all this while, that we haue not ſeene thee at Rome? This killed his heart ſtraight, when he ſaw that the report of his name and doings, entring into the city of Rome as into an infinite ſea, was ſo ſuddenly vaniſhed away againe, without any other fame or ſpeech. But after that, when he looked into himſelfe, and ſaw that in reaſon he tooke an infinite labor in hand to attaine to glory, wherin he ſaw no certaine end wherby to attaine vnto it, it cut off a great part of the ambition he had in his head: and yet the great pleaſure he tooke to heare his owne praiſe, and to be ouermuch giuen to deſire of honour and eſtimation, theſe two things continued with him euen to his dying day, and did eftſoones make him ſwarue from iuſtice. Furthermore, when he began throughly to practiſe in the affaires of the ſtate, he thought it an ill thing that Artificers and crafts men ſhould haue many ſorts of inſtruments and tools without life, to know the names of euery one of them, the places where they ſhould take them, and the vſe whereto they ſhould employ them: and that a man of knowledge and quality (who doth all things with the helpe and ſeruice of men) ſhould be ſlothfull and careleſſe to learne to know the names of his citizens. Therefore he gaue himſelfe to know, not onely mens names of quality, but the ſtreets alſo they dwelt in, what part of the city ſoeuer it was: their goodly houſes in the country, the friends they made of, and the neighbours whom they companied with. So that when he went abroad into Italy, whereſoeuer he became, Cicero could ſhew and name his friends houſes. He was not very rich, and yet he had enough to ſerue his turne: the which made men muſe the more at him, and they loued him the better, becauſe he tooke no fee nor gift for his pleading, what cauſe ſoeuer he tooke in hand, but then ſpecially, when he defended a matter againſt Verres. This Verres had bene Prætor of Sicilia, & had committed many lewd parts there, for the which the Sicilians did accuſe him. Cicero taking vpon him to defend their cauſe, made Verres to be condemned, not by pleading, but in maner without pleading, and in this ſort. The Prætors being his iudges, and fauouring Verres, had made ſo many reiornements and delayes, that they had driuen it off to the laſt day of hearing. Cicero perceiuing then he ſhould not haue time to ſpeake all that he had to ſay againſt him, and that thereby nothing ſhould be done and iudged, he roſe vp and ſaid, that there needed no further plea in this matter, but only brought forth the witneſſes before the Iudges; and hauing cauſed their depoſitions to be taken, he prayed they would proceed to ſentence, according to their euidence giuen on that behalfe. Yet ſome doe report, that Cicero gaue many pleaſant taunts and girds, in pleading the accuſation of the Sicilians againſt Verres. The Romaines do call a Bore, Verres. There was one Cæcilius, the ſon of a freed bondman, who was ſuſpected to hold with the ſuperſtition of the Ievves. This Cæcilius would haue put by ŷ Sicilians from following the accuſation of Verres, and would haue had the matter of his accuſation only referred to him, for the proſecuting of it againſt him. Cicero ſcorning his ſuire, ſaid vnto him: What hath a Ievve to do with a Bore? This Verres had a ſonne ſomwhat aboue twenty yeares of age, who (as the report went) had a very ill name for his beauty. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mocke Cicero, ſaying, that he was too effeminate: Thy children (ſaid he) are to be reproued of that ſecretly at home. In this accuſation, Hortenſius the Oratour durſt not directly defend Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to anſwer for him, for he had a Sphinx of Yuorie giuen him by Verres for his reward. Thereupon Cicero gaue him a pretie nip by the way: but Hortenſius not vnderſtanding him, ſaid, he could not skill of dark ſpeeches. Well, ſaid Cicero, yet haſt thou a Sphinx in thy houſe. In the end Verres being condemned, and a fine ſet on his head to the value of threeſcore and fifteene Myriades, Cicero notwithſtanding was ſuſpected to be bribed with money for agreeing to caſt him in ſo ſmall a ſumme. But yet when he came to be Ædilis, the Sicilians to ſhew themſelues thankfull to him, both brought and ſent him many preſents out of Sicile. Of all that he tooke nothing to his owne vſe, but only beſtowed their liberality in bringing downe ŷ prices of victuals at Rome. He had a goodly houſe within the confines of the city of Arpos, a farme alſo by Naples, & another about the city of Pompeii: but all theſe were no great things. Afterwards he had alſo the ioynter of his wife Terentia, which amounted to the ſumme of twelue Myriades, and beſides all this, there came to him by inheritance, eleuen Myriades of their Denarij. Thereupon he liued very honeſtly & ſoberly, without exceſſe, with his familiar friends that loued him, both Grecians and Romaines, and would neuer go to ſupper till after Sunne ſet, not ſo much for any great buſineſſe he had, as for the weakeneſſe of his ſtomack. But otherwiſe he was very curious, & careſull

full of his perſon, and would be rubbed & annointed, and he would vſe alſo to walke a certaine number of turnes by proportion: and ſo exerciſing his body in that ſort, he was neuer ſicke, and beſides was alſo very ſtrong and luſtie of body, able to abide great paines and ſorrowes which he fell into afterwards. He gaue his fathers chiefe manſion houſe to his brother, and went to dwell himſelfe in the mount Palatine: becauſe ſuch as came to waite vpon him to do him honor, ſhould not take the paines to go ſo farre to ſee him. For he had as many men daily at his gate euery morning, as either Craſſus had for his wealth, or Pompey for his eſtimatiõ among ỹ ſoldiers, both of them being at that time the chiefeſt men of Rome. Yea furthermore, Pompeys ſelfe came vnto Cicero, becauſe his Orations ſtood him to great purpoſe, for the increaſe of his honor and authority. Now when Cicero came to make ſuite to be Prætor (which is, to be as an ordinary Iudge) though he had many competitors, and fellow ſuiters with him, yet was he firſt choſen afore thẽ all: and he did ſo honeſtly behaue himſelfe in that Office, that they did not ſo much as once ſuſpect him of briberie or extortion. And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that Licinius Macer (a man that of himſelf was of great power, and yet fauoured and ſupported beſides by Craſſus) was accuſed before Cicero of theft and extortion in his Office: but he truſting much to his ſuppoſed credit, and the great ſuite and labour his friends made for him, went home to his houſe before ſentence pronounced againſt him, (the Iudges being yet to giue their opinions) and there ſpeedily trimmed his beard, and put a new gowne vpon his backe, as though he had bene ſure to haue bene quit of his accuſation; and then returned againe into the market place. But Craſſus went to meete him, and told him, all the Iudges had condemned him. Licinius Macer tooke ſuch a griefe and conceit vpon it, that he went home to his houſe againe, laid him downe on his bed, and neuer roſe after. This iudgement wan Cicero great fame, for they praiſed him exceedingly for the great paines he tooke, to ſee iuſtice duly executed. Another alſo called Vatinius, (a bedlem fellow, and one that behaued himſelf very vnreuerently to the magiſtrates in his pleading, and beſides had a ſwollen neck) came very arrogantly one day vnto Cicero being in his Prætoriall ſeate, and asked him a thing which Cicero would not grant him there, but would thinke of it at better leyſure. Thereupon Vatinius told him, that he would not be ſcrupulous to grant that, if he were Prætor. Cicero turning to him, anſwered him againe: No more haue I (ſaid he) ſuch a ſwollen necke as thou haſt. Towards the end of his Office, two or three daies before his time expired, there was one accuſed Manilius before him, that he alſo had robbed the commonwealth. This Manilius was very well beloued of the common people, who were perſwaded that he was put in ſuite, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to deſpite Pompey with, whoſe familiar friend he was. So he required certaine daies to anſwer the matter he was accuſed of: but Cicero would giue him no further reſpite, but to anſwer it the next day. The people therewith were maruellouſly offended, becauſe the other Prætors in ſuch like caſes, were wont to giue ten daies reſpite vnto others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Iudges, and alſo accuſed him vnto them, he beſought Cicero to heare him patiently. Cicero made him anſwer, that hauing alwaies vſed as much fauour and courteſie as he poſſibly might by law, vnto thoſe that were accuſed, he thought he ſhould offer Manilius too great wrong, if he ſhould not do the like to him: wherefore, becauſe he had but one day more to continue Prætor in office, he had purpoſely giuen him that day to make his anſwer before him. For he ſaid, that to leaue his accuſation to the hearing of an other Prætor, he could not haue bene thought a man that had borne him good will, and meant to pleaſure him. Theſe words did maruellouſly change the peoples opinion and affection towards him, and euery man ſpeaking well of him, they prayed him to defend Manilius cauſe. He willingly granted them: and coming from the bench, ſtanding at the barre like an Oratour to pleade for him, he made a notable Oration, and ſpake both boldly and ſharply againſt the chiefe men of the city, and thoſe ſpecially that did enuie Pompey. This notwithſtanding, when he came to ſue to be Conſull, he found as great fauour amongſt the Nobility, as he did with the communaltie. For they did further his ſuite, for the common-wealths ſake, vpon this occaſion. The change and alteration of gouernment the which Sylla brought in, was thought ſtrange at the firſt among the people: but now men by proceſſe of time being vſed to it, it was throughly eſtabliſhed, and no man miſliked it. At that time many men practiſed to ſubuert the gouernment, not for the benefit of the commonwealth, but to ſerue their owne couetous minds. For Pompey being then in the Eaſt parts, made warres with the kings of Pontvs and Armenia, and had not left ſufficient force at Rome to reſiſt

these seditious persons, that sought nothing but rebellion. These men had made Lucius Catiline their Captaine, a desperate man to attempt any great enterprise, subtill and malicious of nature. He was accused before (besides many other vile faults) for deflouring of his owne daughter, and killing his brother: and being afraid to be put in suite for it, he prayed Sylla to put his brother amongst the number of the outlawes (or proscripts) as if he had bene then aliue. These wicked rebels hauing chosen them such a Captaine, were sworne and bound one to another in this manner. They killed a man, and did eate of his flesh together, and had besides corrupted the most part of all the youth. For Catiline their Captaine suffered euery man to take his pleasure, as his × youth was inclined vnto, as to banquet, to follow harlots; and gaue them mony largely to bestow in these vaine expences. Furthermore, all THVSCAN began to rise, and the most part of GAVLE also, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALIE. The city of ROME it selfe was also in great danger of rising, for the inequality of the goods of the inhabitants. For the Noblemen and of greatest courage, had spent all their lands in plaies and feasts, or in buildings & common works, which they built at their owne charge, to curry fauor with the common people, that they might obtaine the chiefe offices: so that thereby they became very poore, and their goods were in the hands of the meane men and wretches. Thus the state of ROME stood in great hazard of vprore, the which any man might easily haue procured that durst haue taken vpon him any change or alteration of gouernment, there was then such diuision among them in the state. Catiline notwithstanding, to prouide him of a strong bulwarke to prosecute his intent, came to sue to be Consull, hoping that he should be chosen with Caius Antonius, a man that of himself was apt neither to do any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that could be a great strength and aide vnto him that would attempt any thing. Diuerse noble & wise men foreseeing that, did procure Cicero to sue for the Consulship. The people accepted him, and reiected Catiline. Antonius and Cicero therupon were created Consuls, although that Cicero of all the suiters for ỹ Consulship was but only a Knights son, and not the son of a Senatour of ROME. Now, though the common people vnderstood not the secret practise and meaning of Catiline, yet at the beginning of Ciceroes Consulship, there fell out great trouble and contention in the commonwealth. For they of the one side, whom Sylla had by his ordinances deposed from their dignities and offices in ROME (who were no small men, neither few in number) began to creepe into the peoples good wil, alledging many true and iust reasons against the tyrannicall power of Sylla: howbeit spoken in ill time, when it was out of time to make any change or alteration in the commonwealth. The Tribunes on the other side preferred lawes and ordinances to further this deuice. They preferred the law to choose the Decemuiri, with soueraigne power and authority through all ITALY and SYRIA, and also through all the countries and prouinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of ROME: to sell, and release all lands belonging to the state of ROME, to accuse any man whom they thought good, to banish any man, to restore ỹ Colonies with people, to take what mony they would out of the Treasurie, to leauie men of warre, and to keepe them in pay as long as they thought good. For this great and absolute power of the Decemuiri, there were many men of great account that fauoured this law, but Antonius chiefly, being colleague and fellow Consull with Cicero, for he had good hope to be chosen one of these ten Commissioners: and furthermore, it was thought that he was priuie vnto Catilines conspiracie, and that he misliked it not, because he was so much in debt, And this was it that the Noblemen most feared of all other things. Thereupon Cicero, to prouide first to preuent this danger, granted to him the prouince of the Realme of MACEDON: and the prouince of GAVLE being offered vnto himselfe, he refused it. By this good turne he wan Antonius like a hired player, making him to promise him that he would assist and aide him for the benefit of the commonwealth, and that he would say no more, then he should will him. When he had brought him to this, and had won him to his mind, he then began to be the bolder, and more stoutly to resist them that were authors of this innouation and new lawes. Cicero therefore in open Senate, did one day sharply reproue and inueigh against this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes would haue established. And thereby he did so terrifie the authors thereof, that there was not one man durst speake against him. This notwithstanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted once againe to haue it to passe, and appointed the Consuls to appeare before the people. Howbeit Cicero being nothing abashed at it, he commanded the Senate to follow him. So he did not only ouerthrow this law of the Decemuiri, which the Tribunes did preferre, but furthermore they were vtterly discouraged discouraged & out of hope to bring any of their matters to passe they intended, he strooke them so dead with his eloquence. For Cicero onely of all men in ROME made the ROMAINES know, how much eloquence doth grace and beautifie that which is honest,& how inuincible right and iustice are, being eloquently set forth: and also how that a man that will be counted a wise gouernour of a commonweale, should alwaies in his doings rather preferre profit, then seeke to currie fauour with the common people: yet so to vse his words, that the thing which is profitable, may not be also vnpleasant. And to proue his sweet and pleasant tongue, may be alledged that which he did in the time of his Consulship, touching the placing of men at the Theater to see the pastimes. For before, the knights of ROME did sit mingled one with another amongst the common people,& tooke their place as they came. The first that made the difference betweene them, was * Marcus Otho, at that time Prætor: who made a law, by the which he appointed seuerall seates for the knights, where they might from thenceforth see the pastimes. The people tooke this grieuously, as a thing done to discountenance them: insomuch that Otho comming afterwards into the Theater, al the common people fell a whistling at him, to shame him withal. The knights also in contrariwise made him roome among them, with great clapping of hands, in token of honor. Therewith the people fell a whistling lowder then before, and the knights in like maner to clapping of their hands, and so grew to words one with another, that all the Theater was straight in vprore with it. Cicero vnderstanding it, went thither himselfe, and calling the people to the temple of the goddesse Bellona, he there so sharply reproued them, and therwith so perswaded them, that returning presently to the Theater, they did then welcome and receiue Otho with clapping of their hands, and contended with the knights which of them should do him greatest honour. But now againe, the rebels of Catilines conspiracie (who were pretily cooled at the first for the feare they stood in) began to be lusty againe, and to gather together, boldly incouraging one another to broach their practise, before Pompey returned, who was said to be on the way towards ROME with his army. But besides them, those souldiers that had serued before in the wars vnder Sylla, being dispersed vp and downe ITALIE (but specially the best souldiers among them dwelling in the good townes of THVSCAN) did stirre vp Catiline to hasten the enterprise, perswading themselues that they should once againe haue goods enough at home, to spoile and ransacke at their pleasure. These souldiers hauing one Manlius to their Captaine, that had borne office in the field vnder Sylla, conspired with Catiline, and came to ROME to assist him in his suite: who purposed once againe to demaund the Consulship, being determined at the election to kill Cicero, in the tumult and hurly burly. The gods also did plainly shew by earth-quakes, lightning and thunder, and by vision of spirits that did appeare, the secret practise and conspiracie: besides also, there fell out manifest coniectures and proofes by men that came to reueale them, howbeit they had no power sufficient to encounter so noble a man, and of so great power as Catiline was. Cicero therfore deferring the day of election, called Catiline into the Senate, & did there examine him of that which was reported of him. Catiline supposing there were many in the Senate that had good wils to rebell, and also because he would shew himselfe ready vnto them that were of his conspiracie, he gaue Cicero a gentle answer, and said thus: What do I offend, said he, if that being two bodies in this towne, the one leane and weake, and throughly rotten, & hath a head; and the other being great, strong, and of power, hauing no head, I do giue it one? meaning vnder this darke answer, to signifie the people and Senate. This answer being made, Cicero was more afraid then before, insomuch that he put on a brigantine for the safety of his body, & was accompanied with the chiefest men of ROME, and a great number of yong men besides going with him from his house into the field of Mars, where the elections were made: and had of purpose left open his iacket loose at the coller, that his brigantine he had on might be seen; therby to let euery mā that saw him, know the danger he was in. Euery man misliked it when they saw it, and came about him to defend him, if any offered to assaile him. But it so came to passe, that by voices of the people, Catiline was againe reiected from the Consulship, and Syllanus and Murana chosen Consuls. Shortly after this election, the souldiers of THVSCAN being ioyned, which should haue come to Catiline, and the day appointed being at hand to broach their enterprise, about midnight, there came three of the chiefest men of ROME to Ciceroes house (Marcus Crassus, Marcus Marcellus, and Scipio Metellus) and knocking at his gate, called his porter, & bad him wake his master presently, and tell him how they three were at the gate to speake with him, about a matter of importance. At night after supper, Crassus porter brought his master a packet of letters, deliuered him by a ſtranger vnknown, which were directed vnto diuers perſons; among the which, one of them had no name ſubſcribed, but was onely directed vnto Craſſus himſelfe. The effect of the letter was, that there ſhould be made a great ſlaughter in Rome by Catiline, & therefore he prayed him that he would depart out of Rome to ſaue himſelfe. Craſſus hauing read his own letter, would not open the reſt, but went forthwith vnto Cicero, partly for feare of the danger, & partly alſo to cleare himſelfe of the ſuſpition they had of him for the friendſhip that was betwixt him and Catiline. Cicero counſelling with them what was to be done, the next morning aſſembled the Senate very early, and carying the letters with him, he did deliuer them according to their direction, & commanded they ſhould reade them out aloud. All theſe letters, and euery one of them particularly, did bewray the conſpiracy. Furthermore, Quintus Arrius a man of authority, and that had bene Prætor, told openly the ſouldiers and men of war that were leauied in Thvscan. And it is reported alſo, that Manlius was in the field with a great number of ſouldiers about the cities of Thvscan, gaping dayly to heare newes of ſome change at Rome. All theſe things being throughly conſidered, a decree paſſed by the Senate, that they ſhould referre the care of the commonwealth vnto the Conſuls, to the end that with abſolute authority they might (as we las they could) prouide for the ſafety and preſeruation thereof. Such manner of decree and authority, was not often ſeene concluded of in the Senate, but in time of preſent feare and danger. Now Cicero hauing this abſolute power, he referred all forreine matters to Quintus Metellus charge, & did himſelfe take vpon him the care and gouernment of al ciuill affaires within Rome. On the day time when he went vp and downe the towne, he had ſuch a troupe of men after him, that when he came through ŷ great market place, he almoſt filled it with his traine that followed him. Thereupon Catiline would no longer delay time, but reſolued to go himſelfe vnto Manlius, where their army lay. But before he departed, he had drawne into his confederacy one Martius, and another called Cethegus, whom he commanded betimes in the morning to goe to Ciceroes houſe with ſhort daggers to kill him, pretending to come to ſalute him, and to giue him a good morow. But there was a noble woman of Rome called Fuluia, who went ouernight vnto Cicero, and bad him beware of that Cethegus, who indeed came the next morning betimes vnto him; and being denied to be let in, he began to chafe & raile before the gate. This made him the more to be ſuſpected. In the end Cicero comming out of his houſe, called the Senate to the temple of Iupiter Stator, (as much to ſay as, Stayer) which ſtandeth at the vpper end of the holy ſtreet as they go to the mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he meant to cleare himſelfe of the ſuſpition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that would ſit downe by him, but they did all riſe from the bench where Catiline had taken his place. And further, when he began to ſpeake, he could haue no audience for the great noiſe they made againſt him. So at length Cicero roſe, and commanded him to auoid out of Rome, ſaying, that there muſt needs be a ſeparation of wals betweene them two, conſidering that the one vſed but words, and the other force of armes. Catiline therupon immediatly departing the city with three hundred armed men, was no ſooner out of the precinct of the walles, but he made his Sergeants cary axes and bundels of rods before him, as if he had bene a Conſull lawfully created; and did diſplay his enſignes of warre, and ſo went in this order to ſeeke Manlius. When they were ioyned, he had not much leſſe then twenty thouſand men together, with the which he went to practiſe the townes to rebell. Now open warre being thus proclaimed, Antonius, Ciceroes colleague and fellow Conſull, was ſent againſt him to fight with him. In the meane ſpace, Cornelius Lentulus, ſirnamed Sura (a man of a noble houſe, but of a wicked diſpoſition, and that for his ill life was put off the Senate) aſſembled all the reſt which were of Catilines conſpiracie, and that remained behind him in Rome, and bad them be afraid of nothing. He was then Prætor the ſecond time, as the maner is when any man comes to recouer againe the dignity of a Senator which he had loſt. It is reported, that this ſirname of Sura was giuen him vpon this occaſion. He being Treaſurer in Syllaes Dictatorſhip, did fondly waſt and conſume a maruellous ſumme of mony of the common treaſure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demanding an account of him before the Senate, he careleſly and contemptuouſly ſtepped forth, ſaying, he could make him no other account, but ſhewed him the calfe of his leg, as children do when they make a fault at tennis. And thereof it came, that euer after that they called him Sura, becauſe Sura in Latine ſignifieth the calfe of the leg. Another time alſo being accuſed for a leud part he had committed, he bribed ſome of the Iudges with money; and being onely quit by two voices more which he had in his fauour, he ſaid, Fuluia bewrayeth Catilines intent to kill Cicero.

Catiline departed.

C Lentulus was called Sura.

ſaid, he had loſt his money he had giuen to one of thoſe two Iudges, becauſe it was enough for him to be cleared by one voice more. This mã being of this diſpoſition, was firſt of all incenſed by Catiline, and laſtly marred by certaine wizards & falſe prognoſticators that had mocked him with a vaine hope, ſinging verſes vnto him which they had famed and deuiſed, and falſe prophecies alſo, which they bare him in hand they had taken out of Sybilles books of prophecie, which ſaid, that there ſhould reigne three Cornelij at Rome, of the which, two had already fulfilled the prophecie, Cinna and Sylla; and for the third, fortune laid it vpon him, and therefore bad him goe through withall, and not to dreame it out, loſing oportunity as Catiline had done. Now this Lentulus vndertook no ſmall enterpriſe, but had an intent with him to kill all the whole Senate, and as many other citizens as they could murther, and to ſet fire on Rome, ſparing none but Pompeys ſonnes, whom they would reſerue for pledges, to make their peace afterwards with Pompey: for the rumor was very great and certain alſo, that he returned from very great wars and conqueſts which he had made in the Eaſt countries. So they layd a plot to put their treaſon in execution, in one of the nights of Saturnes feaſts. Further, they had brought flaxe and brimſtone, and a great number of armours and weapons into Cethegus houſe. Beſides all this prouiſion, they had appointed a hundred men in an hundred parts of the city, to the end that fire being raiſed in many places at one time, it ſhould the ſooner runne through the whole city. Other men alſo were appointed to ſtop the pipes and water conduits which brought water to Rome, and to kill thoſe alſo that came for water to quench the fire. In all this ſtir, by chance there were two Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, whoſe country at that time did much miſlike of the Romaines, and were vnwiling to be ſubiect vnto them. Lentulus thought theſe men very fit inſtruments to cauſe all Gavle to rebell. Thereupon practiſing with them, he wan them to be of their conſpiracie, and gaue them letters directed to the Councell of their country, and in them did promiſe them freedome. He ſent other letters alſo vnto Catiline, and perſwaded him to proclaime liberty to all bondmen, and to come with all the ſpeed he could to Rome: and ſent with them one Titus of the city of Crotona, to carrie theſe letters. But all their counſels and purpoſes (like fooles that neuer met together but at feaſts, drinking drunke with light women) were eaſily found out by Cicero, who had a carefull eye vpon them, and very wiſely and diſcreetly ſaw through them. For he had appointed men out of the city to ſpie their doings, which followed them to ſee what they intended. Furthermore, he ſpake ſecretly with ſome he truſted, (the which others alſo took to be of the conſpiracie) and knew by them that Lentulus and Cethegus had practiſed with the Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, and drawne them into their conſpiracie. At length he watched them one night ſo narrowly, that he tooke the Ambaſſadors, and Titus Crotonian with the letters he caried, by helpe of the Ambaſſadors of the Allobroges, which had ſecretly informed him of all before. The next morning by breake of day, Cicero aſſembled the Senate in ỹ temple of Concord, and there openly read the letters, and heard the euidence of the witneſſes. Further, there was one Iunius Syllanus a Senator that gaue in euidence, that ſome heard Cethegus ſay, that they ſhould kill three Conſuls and foure Prætors. Piſo a Senator alſo, and that had bene Conſull, told in maner the ſelfe ſame tale. And Caius Sulpitius a Prætor, that was ſent into Cethegus houſe, reported that he had found great ſtore of darts, armor, daggers, and ſwords new made. Laſtly, the Senate hauing promiſed Titus Crotonian he ſhould haue no hurt, ſo he would tell what he knew of this conſpiracie, Lentulus thereby was conuinced, and driuen to giue vp his office of Prætor before the Senate, and changing his purple gowne, to take another meete for his miſerable ſtate. This being done, Lentulus and his conſorts were committed to ward to the Prætors houſes. Now growing towards euening, the people waiting about the place where the Senate was aſſembled, Cicero at length came out, and told them what they had done within. Thervpon he was conueyed by all the people vnto a friends houſe of his hard by: for that his owne houſe was occupied by the Ladies of the city, who were buſie, ſolemnly celebrating a ſecret ſacrifice in the honour of the goddeſſe, called of the Romaines the Good goddeſſe, and of the Grecians Gynæcia, to wit, feminine: vnto her this yearly ſacrifice is done at the Cõſuls houſe, by the wife or mother of the Conſull then being, the Veſtall Nunnes being preſent at it. Now Cicero being come into his neighbors houſe, began to bethinke him what courſe he were beſt to take in this matter. For to puniſh the offenders with ſeuerity, according to their deſerts, he was afraid to do it, both becauſe he was of a courteous nature, as alſo for that he would not ſeeme to be glad to haue occaſion to ſhew his abſolute power and authority, to puniſh (as he might) with rigour, citizens that were of the nobleſt houſes of the city, and that had beſides many friends. And contrariwiſe alſo, being remiſſe in ſo weighty a matter as this, he was afraid of the danger that might enſue of their raſhnes, miſtruſting that if he ſhould puniſh them with leſſe then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were wel rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and deſperate then euer they were, adding moreouer the ſting and ſpite of a new malice vnto their accuſtomed wickedneſſe; beſides that he himſelfe ſhould be thought a coward and timorous man, whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cicero being perplexed thus with theſe doubts, there appeared a miracle to ỹ Ladies, doing ſacrifice at home in his houſe. For the fire being thought to be cleane out vpon the Altar where they had ſacrificed, there ſuddenly roſe out of the imbers of the rindes or barks which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amazed al the other Ladies. Howbeit the Veſtall Nuns willed Terentia (Ciceroes wife) to go ſtraight vnto her husband, & to bid him not to be afraid to execute that boldly which he had conſidered of, for the benefit of the cõmonwealth; & that the goddeſſe had raiſed this great flame, to ſhew him that he ſhould haue great honor by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timorous nor faint hearted woman, but very ambitious, & furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her husband of the affaires of the ſtate, then otherwiſe ſhe had acquainted him with her houſewifery in the houſe, as Cicero himſelfe reporteth, ſhe went to make report thereof vnto him, & prayed him to do execution of thoſe men. The like did Quintus Cicero his brother, & alſo Publius Nigidius his friend and fellow ſtudent with him in Philoſophie, and whoſe counſell alſo Cicero followed much in the gouernment of the commonwealth. The next morning the matter being propounded to the arbiterment of the Senate, how theſe malefactors ſhould be puniſhed,

Syllanus ſentence of the conſpirators.

Syllanus being asked his opinion firſt, ſaid, that they ſhould be put in priſon, and from thence to ſuffer execution. Others likewiſe that followed him were al of that mind, but Caius Cæſar, that afterwards came to be Dictator, & was then but a yong man, and began to come forward, but yet ſuch a one, as by his behauior & the hope he had, took ſuch a courſe, that afterwards he brought the commonwealth of Rome into an abſolute Monarchie. For at that time Cicero had vehement ſuſpitions of Cæſar, but no apparent proofe to conuince him. And ſome ſay, that it was brought ſo neare, as he was almoſt conuicted, but yet ſaued himſelf. Others write to the contrary, that Cicero wittingly diſſembled, that he either heard or knew any ſignes which were told him againſt Cæſar, being afraid indeed of his friends & eſtimation. For it was a cleare caſe, that if they had accuſed Cæſar with the reſt, he vndoubtedly had ſooner ſaued al their liues then he ſhould haue loſt

his own. Now when Cæſar came to deliuer his opinion touching the puniſhment of theſe priſoners, he ſtood vp & ſaid, that he did not think it good to put them to death, but to confiſcate their goods; and as for their perſons, that they ſhould beſtow them in priſon, ſome in one place, ſome in another, in ſuch cities of Italy as pleaſed Cicero beſt, vntill the warre of Catiline were ended. This ſentence being very mild, and the author thereof maruellous eloquent to make it good, Cicero himſelfe added thereunto a counterpoiſe, inclining vnto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the firſt, and partly alſo the opinion of Cæſar. His friends thinking that Cæſars opinion was the ſafeſt for Cicero, becauſe therby he ſhould deſerue leſſe blame for that he had not put the priſoners to death, they followed rather the ſecond. Wherupon Syllanus alſo recanted that he had ſpokẽ, & expounded his opiniõ, ſaying, that when he ſpake they ſhold be put to death, he meant nothing ſo, but thought the laſt puniſhment a Senator of Rome could haue, was the priſon. But the firſt that contraried this opinion, was Catulus Luctatius, and after him Cato, who with vehement words enforced Cæſars ſuſpition, and furthermore filled al the Senate with wrath and outrage: ſo that euen vpon the inſtant it was decreed by moſt voices, that they ſhould ſuffer death. But Cæſar ſtept vp againe, and ſpake againſt the confiſcation of their goods, miſliking that they ſhould reiect the gentleſt part of his opinion, and that contrariwiſe they ſhould ſticke vnto the ſeuereſt onely: howbeit becauſe the greateſt number preuailed againſt him, he called the Tribunes to aid him, to the end they ſhould withſtand it; but they would giue no eare vnto him. Cicero thereupon yeelding of himſelfe, did remit the confiſcation of their goods, & went with the Senate to fetch the priſoners, who were not all in one houſe, but euery Prætor had one of them. So he went firſt to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy ſtreete and the market place, accompanied with the chiefeſt men of the citie, who compaſſed him round about, and guarded his perſon. The people ſeeing that, quaked and trembled for feare, paſſed by, and ſaid neuer a word: and ſpecially the young men, who thought thought it had bene some solemne mystery for the health of their country, that was so accompanied with the chiefe Magistrate, and the Noblemen of the city, with terrour and feare. So when he had passed through the market place, and was come to the prison, he deliuered Lentulus into the hands of the hang-man, and commanded him to do execution. Afterwards also Cethegus, and then all the rest, one after another, whom he brought to the prison himselfe, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, seeing diuers of their accomplices in a troupe together in the market place, who knew nothing what he had done, and watched only till night were come, supposing then to take away their companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet aliue, he turned vnto them, and said aloud, They liued. This is a phrase of speech which the Romaines vse sometime, when they will finely conuey the hardnesse of the speech. to say he is dead. When night was come, and that he was going homeward, as he came through the market place, the people did waite vpon him no more with silence as before, but with great cries of his praise, and clapping of hands in euery place he went, and called him sauiour, and second founder of Rome. Besides all this, at euery mans doore there were linkes and torches lighted, that it was as light in the streetes as at noone dayes. The very women also did put lights out of the tops of their houses to do him honour, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long traine of the chiefest men of the city, (of the which many of them had ended great warres, for the which they had triumphed, and had obtained many famous conquests to the Empire of Rome, both by sea and land) confessing between themselues one to another, that the Romaines were greatly bound to many Captaines & Generals of armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches and spoiles, and increase of their power which they had wonne: howbeit that they were to thanke Cicero onely for their health and preseruation, hauing saued them from so great and extreme a danger. Not for that they thought it so wonderfull an act to haue stricken dead the enterprise of the conspirators, and also to haue punished the offenders by death: but because the conspiracy of Catiline, being so great and dangerous an insurrection as euer was any, he had quenched it, & pluckt it vp by the roots, with so small hurt, and without vprore, trouble, or actuall seditiō. For the most part of them that were gathered together about Catiline, when they heard that Lentulus and all the rest were put to death, they presently forsooke him: and Catiline himselfe also fighting a battell with them he had about him, against Antonius the other Consull with Cicero, he was slaine in the field, and all his army defeated. This notwithstanding, there were many that spake ill of Cicero for this fact, and meant to make him repent it, hauing for their heads Cæsar, (who was alreadie chosen Prætor for the yeare to come) Metellus and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They so soone as they were chosen Tribunes, would not once suffer Cicero to speake to the people, notwithstanding that he was yet in his office of Consull for certain daies. And furthermore, to let him that he should not speake vnto the people, they did set their benches vpon the pulpit for orations, which they call at Rome Rostra: and would neuer suffer him to set foot in it, but only to resigne his office, and that done, to come downe againe immediatly. He granted thereunto, and went vp to the pulpit vpon that condition. So silence being made him, he made an oth, not like vnto other Consuls othes when they resigne their office in like maner, but strange, and neuer heard of before, swearing that he had saued the city of Rome, and preserued all his countrey and the Empire of Rome from vtter ruine and destruction. All the people that were present confirmed it, and sware the like oth. Wherewithall Cæsar and the other Tribunes his enemies were so offended with him, that they deuised to breed him some new stir and trouble: and amongst others, they made a decree, that Pompey should be sent for with his army to bridle the tyranny of Cicero. Cato (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the cōmonwealth, opposing himself against al their practises, with the like authority and power that they had being a Tribune and brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not only easily breake all their deuices, but also in a goodly oration he made in a full assembly of the people, he so highly praised & extolled Ciceroes Consulship vnto them, and the things he did in his office, that they gaue him the greatest honours that euer were decreed or granted vnto any man liuing. For by decree of the people he was called, Father of the countrey, as Cato himselfe had called him in his oration: the which name was neuer giuen to any man, but onely vnto him; and also he bare greater sway in Rome at that time then any man beside him. This notwithstanding, he made himselfe enuied and misliked of many men, not for any ill act he did, or meant to do, but only because he did too much boast of himselfe. For he neuer was in any assembly of people, Senate, or iudgement, but euery mans head was full still to heare the sound of Catiline and Lentulus brought in for sport, & filling the bookes and workes he compiled besides full of his owne praises: the which made his sweet and pleasant stile tedious, and troublesome to those that heard him, as though this misfortune euer followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worme of ambition, and extreme couetous desire of honor in his head, yet did he not malice or enuie any others glory, but would very frankly praise excellent men, as well those that had bene before him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his writings. They haue writtē also certaine notable words he spake of some ancient men in old time, as of Aristotle, that he was like a golden flowing riuer: and of Plato, that if Iupiter himselfe would speake, he would speake like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: and of Demosthenes Orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked best: The longest, said he. There be diuers writers also, who to shew that they were great folowers of Demosthenes, do follow Ciceroes saying in a certaine Epistle he wrote vnto one of his friends, wherein he said, that Demosthenes slept in some of his Orations: but yet they forgot to tell how highly he praised him in that place; & that he calleth the Orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he took great paines, and studied more then all the rest) PHILIPPIANS: to follow those which Demosthenes wrote against Philip king of MACEDON. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his time, either in eloquence or in learning, whose fame he hath not cōmended in writing, or otherwise in honorable speech of him. For he obtained of Cæsar, when he had ỹ Empire of ROME in his hands, that Cratippus the PERIPATETICK Philosopher was made citizē of ROME. Further, he procured that by decree of the court of the Areopagites, he was intreated to remaine at ATHENS, to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great honor & ornament vnto their city. There are extāt also of Ciceroes Epistles vnto Herodes, & others vnto his son, willing him to follow Cratippus in his study and knowledge. He wrote another letter also vnto Gorgias the Rhetoritian, and forbad him his sons company; because he vnderstood he inticed him to drunkennesse, and to other great dishonesty. Of all his Epistles he wrote in Greeke, there is but that only written in choler, and another which he wrote vnto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, & to taunt him in his letter, because (as it seemed) he was a man of very leud life and conuersation. But in contrary maner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding himselfe grieued with him, for that he was negligēt in procuring the BYZANTINES to ordaine some publike honours in his behalfe: that, me thinkes, proceeded of ouermuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and only because he would be commended for his eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munatius cause before the Iudges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his, it is reported, that he was so angry with him, that he told him, What Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine accusatiō, not for thine innocency, but for a mist I cast before the Iudges eies, that made them they could not discerne the fault? Another time also, hauing openly praised Marcus Crassus in the pulpit, with good audience of the people, shortly after he spake to the contrary all the euill he could of him, in the same place. Why, how now, said Crassus, didst thou not thy selfe highly praise me in this place, the last day? I cannot deny it, said Cicero: but indeed I tooke an ill matter in hand to shew mine eloquence. Another time Crassus chanced to say in an open assembly, that none of all the Crassi of his house had euer liued aboue threescore yeares: and afterwards againe repenting himselfe, he called it in againe, and said, Sure I knew not what I did, when I said so. Cicero answered him againe: Thou knewest well enough the people were glad to heare it, and therefore thou spakest it to please them. Another time Crassus liking the opinion of the STOICK Philosophers, that said, the wise man was euer rich, Cicero answered him, and bad him consider whether they meant not thereby, that the wise man had all things. Crassus couetousnesse was defamed of euery man. Of Crassus sonnes, one of them did much resemble Actius, and therefore his mother had an ill name by him: one day this sonne of Crassus made an Oration before the Senate, which diuers of them commended very much. So, Cicero being asked how he liked it: Me thinkes, said he, it is * Actius of Crassus. About this time, Crassus being ready to take his iourney into SYRIA, he desired to haue Cicero his friend rather then his enemy. Therefore one night making much of him, he told Cicero that he would come and suppe with him. Cicero said, he should be welcome. Shortly after, some of his friends told him of

Ciceroes Consulship praised by Cato. Cicero the first man called, Father of the country.

Cicero too much giuen to praise himselfe.

Ciceroes subtill and pleasant sayings.

Vatinius,

Vatinius, how he was desirous to be made friends with him, for he was his enemy. What, quoth Cicero, and will he come to supper too? Thus he vsed Crassus. Now this Vatinius hauing a swolne necke, one day pleading before Cicero, he called him the swolne Orator. Another time when he heard say that he was dead, and then that he was aliue againe: A vengeance on him, said he, that hath lyed so shamefully. Another time when Cæsar had made a law for the deuiding of the lands of CAMPANIA vnto the souldiers, diuerse of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very old man) said, he would neuer grant it while he liued. Cicero pleasantly answered againe, Alas, tarie a litle, the good old man will not trouble you long. Another time there was one Octauius, supposed to be an * AFRICAN borne: he when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, said, that he heard him not: Cicero presently answered him againe, And yet hast thou a hole bored through thine eare. Another time Metellus Nepos told him, that he had ouerthrowne moe men by his witnesse then he had saued by his eloquence. I grant, said Cicero, for indeed I haue more faith, then eloquence in me. So was there also a young man that was suspected to haue poisoned his father with a tart, that boasted he would reuile Cicero: I had rather haue that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy tart. Publius Sextius also hauing a matter before the Iudges, entertained Cicero, with other of his Counsellers: but yet he would speake all himselfe, and giue none of the Oratours leaue to say any thing. In the end, when they saw plainly that the Iudges would discharge him, being ready to giue sentence, Cicero said vnto him, Bestirre thee hardly to day, for to morrow Sextius thou shalt be a priuate man. Another, one Publius Cotta, who would faine haue bene thought a wise Lawyer, and yet had little wit and vnderstanding, Cicero appealed to him as a witnesse in a matter; and being examined, he answered he knew nothing of it. Cicero replied to him againe: Thou thinkest peraduenture they aske thee touching the law. Againe, Metellus Nepos, in a certaine disputation he had with Cicero, did many times repeate, Who is thy father? Cicero answered him againe: Thy mother hath made this question harder for thee to answer. This Nepos mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as subtill witted and vnconstant. For he being Tribune, left in a geere the exercise of his office, and went into SYRIA to Pompey vpon no occasion: and as fondly againe he returned thence vpon a sodaine. His schoolemaster Philager also being dead, he buried him very honestly, and set a crow of stone vpon the top of his tombe. Cicero seeing it, told him, Thou hast done very wisely: for thy Master hath taught thee rather to flie, then to speake. Another time Appius Clodius pleading a matter, said in his preamble, that his friend had earnestly requested him to imploy al his knowledge, diligence, and faith vpon this matter. O gods, said Cicero, and hast thou shewed thy selfe so hard hearted to thy friend, as to performe nothing of all that he requested thee? Now to vse these fine taunts and girds to his enemies, it was a part of a good Oratour: but so commonly to gird euery man to make the people laugh, that wanne him great ill-will of many, as shall appeare by some examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two sonnes in law, who were both banished: Cicero therfore called him Adrastus. Lucius Cotta by chance also was Censor at that time, when Cicero sued to be Consul: and following his suite at the day of election, he was a thirst, and was driuen to drinke. But while he dranke, all his friends stood about him, and after he had drunke, he said vnto them: It is well done of ye (said he) to be affrayd lest the Censor should be angrie with me because I drinke water: for it was reported the Censor loued wine well. Another time Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three fowle daughters of his with him, he cryed out aloud:

This man hath gotten children in despite of Phœbus.

It was thought in ROME that Marcus Gellius was not borne of free parents by father and mother, who reading certaine letters one day in the Senate very loude: Cicero said vnto them that were about him, Wonder not at him, quoth he, for this man hath bene a Cryer in his daies. Faustus, the sonne of Sylla Dictator at ROME, which set vp billes outlawing diuerse ROMAINES, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without danger where they found them, this man after he had spent the most part of his fathers goods, was so sore in debt, that he was driuen to sell his houshold stuffe, by billes set vp on euery post. Cicero when he saw them, Yea marrie, said he, these billes please me better, then those which his father set vp. These taunts and common quippes without purpose, made diuerse men to malice him. The great ill-will that Clodius bare him, beganne vpon this occasion. Clodius was of a noble house, a young man, and very wild and insolent: he being in loue with Pompeia Cæsars wife, found the meanes secretly to get into Cæsars house, apparelled like a young singing wench, because on that day the Ladies of Rome did solemnly celebrate a secret sacrifice in Cæsars house, which is not lawfull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he should not haue bene knowne, because he was but a young man, without any haire on his face, and that by this meanes he might come to Pompeia amongst the other women. He being gotten into this great house by night, not knowing the roomes and chambers in it, there was one of Cæsars mothers maides of her chamber, called Aurelia, who seeing him wandring vp and downe the house in this sort, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to answer, he said he sought for Aura, one of Pompeiaes maides. The maide perceiued straight it was no womans voice, and therewithall gaue a great shrich, and called the other women, the which did see the gates fast shut, and then sought euery corner vp and downe, so that at length they found him in the maides chamber, with whom he came in. His offence was straight blowne abroad in the city, whereupon Cæsar put his wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accused Clodius, and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy ceremonies of the sacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, being one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had euer accompanied him to guard him, if any man would haue offered him iniurie in the busie time of the conspiracie of Catiline. Clodius stoutly denied the matter he was burdened with, and said that he was not in Rome at that time, but farre from thence. Howbeit Cicero gaue euidence against him, and deposed, that the selfe same day he came home to his house vnto him, to speake with him about certaine matters. This indeed was true, though it seemeth Cicero gaue not this euidence so much for the truthes sake, as to please his wife Terentia: for she hated Clodius to the death, because of his sister Clodia that would haue maried Cicero, and did secretly practise the mariage by one Tullius, who was Ciceroes very friend; and because he repaired very often to this Clodia that dwelt hard by Cicero, Terentia began to suspect him. Terentia being a cruell woman, and wearing her husbands breeches, allured Cicero to set vpon Clodius in his aduersity, and to witnesse against him, as many other honest men of the city also did: Some that he was periured, others that he committed a thousand lewd parts, that he bribed the people with money, that he had enticed and deflowred many women. Lucullus also brought forth certaine maidens, which deposed that Clodius had deflowred the youngest of his owne sisters, she being in the house with him, and maried. And there went a great rumour also, that he knew his two other sisters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and maried vnto king Martius: and the other Clodia, whom Metellus Celer had maried, and whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: because one of her paramours sent her a purse full of Quadrines (which are little peeces of copper money) in stead of siluer. Clodius was slandered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithstanding, the people were very much offended with them that gaue euidence against him, and accused him. The Iudges being affraid of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his iudgement, for the safety of their persons: and in the tables where they wrote their sentences, their letters for the most part were confusedly set downe. This notwithstanding, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number: and it was reported also that some of them were close fisted. Catulus therfore meeting with some of them going home, after they had giuen their sentence, told them: Surely ye had good reason to be well guarded for your safety, for you were afraid your mony should haue bin taken from you, which you tooke for bribes. And Cicero said vnto Clodius, who reproued him that his witnesse was not true he gaue against him: Cleane contrary, quoth Cicero, for fiue and twenty of the Iudges haue beleeued me, being so many that haue condemned thee; and the thirty would not beleeue thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingred mony. Notwithstanding in this iudgement Cæsar neuer gaue euidence against Clodius: and said moreouer, that he did not thinke his wife had committed any adultery: howbeit that he had put her away, because he would that Cæsars wife should not only be cleane from any dishonestie, but also void of all suspition. Clodius being quit of this accusation and trouble, and hauing also found meanes to be chosen Tribune, he began straight to persecute Cicero, changing all things, and stirring vp all manner of people against him. First he wanne the good will of the common people by deuising of new lawes which he preferred for their benefit and commodity: to both the Consuls he granted great & large prouinces: vnto Piso, Macedon, and to Gabinius, Syria. He made also many poore men free Citizens, and had alwaies about him a great number of slaues armed. At that present time there were three notable men in Rome, which carried carried all the ſway: Craſſus that ſhewed himſelfe an open enemy vnto Cicero: Pompey the other, made much both of the one and the other: the third was Cæſar, who was prepared for his iourny into GAVLE with an army. Cicero did leane vnto him, (though he knew him no faſt friend of his, and that he miſtruſted him for matters paſt in Catilines conſpiracy) & prayed him that he might go to the wars with him, as one of his Lieutenants. Cæſar granted him. Thereupon Clodius perceiuing that by this meanes he got him out of the danger of his office of Tribuneſhip for that yeare, he made faire weather with him (as though he meant to reconcile himſelfe vnto him) and told him that he had cauſe rather to thinke ill of Terentia, for that he had done againſt him, then of himſelfe; and alwaies ſpake very courteouſly of him as occaſion fell out, and ſaid, he did think nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a little grieue him, that being a friend, he was offered vnkindneſſe by a friend. Theſe ſweet words made Cicero no more afraid, ſo that he gaue vp his Lieutenancie vnto Cæſar, & began againe to plead as he did before. Cæſar took this in ſuch diſdain, that he hartened Clodius the more againſt him, and beſides, made Pompey his enemy. And Cæſar himſelfe alſo ſaid before all the people, that he thought Cicero had put Lentulus, Cethegus, and the reſt vniuſtly to death, and contrary to law, without lawfull triall and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accuſed. Therupon Cicero ſeeing himſelfe accuſed for this fact, he changed his vſuall gowne he wore, and put on a mourning gowne: and ſo ſuffering his beard and haire of his head to grow without any combing, he went in this humble manner, and ſued to the people. But Clodius was euer about him in euery place and ſtreet he went, hauing a ſight of raſcals and knaues with him, that ſhamefully mocked him for that he had changed his gowne and countenance in that ſort, and oftentimes they caſt dirt and ſtones at him, breaking his talke and requeſts he made vnto the people. This notwithſtanding, all the Knights of ROME did in manner change their gownes with him for company, & of them there were commonly 20 thouſand yong gentlemen of noble houſe which followed him with their haire about their eares, and were ſuiters to the people for him. Furthermore, the Senate aſſembled to decree that the people ſhould mourne in blacks, as in a common calamitie: but the Conſuls were againſt it. And Clodius on the other ſide was with a band of armed men about the Senate, ſo that many of the Senatours ranne out of the Senate, crying and tearing their clothes for ſorrow. Howbeit, theſe men ſeeing all that, were nothing the more moued with pitie and ſhame, but either Cicero muſt needs abſent himſelfe, or elſe determine to fight with Clodius. Then went Cicero to intreat Pompey to aide him, but he abſented himſelfe of purpoſe out of the city, becauſe he would not be intreated, and lay at one of his houſes in the country, neare vnto the city of ALBA. So he firſt of all ſent Piſo his ſonne in law vnto him to intreate him, and afterwards went himſelfe in perſon to him. But Pompey being told that he was come, had not the heart to ſuffer him to come to him, to look him in the face: for he had bene paſt all ſhame to haue refuſed the requeſt of ſo worthy a man, who had before ſhewed him ſuch pleaſure, & alſo done and ſaid ſo many things in his fauour. Howbeit Pompey being the ſonne in law to Cæſar, did vnfortunatly (at his requeſt) forſake him at his need, vnto whom he was bound for ſo many infinite pleaſures, as he had receiued of him afore: and therefore when he heard ſay he came to him, he went out at his back-gate, and would not ſpeake with him. So Cicero ſeeing himſelfe betraied of him, and now hauing no other refuge to whom he might repaire vnto, he put himſelfe into the hands of the two Conſuls. Of them two, Gabinius was euer cruell and churliſh vnto him, but Piſo on the other ſide ſpake alwaies very courteouſly vnto him, and prayed him to abſent himſelfe for a time, and to giue place a litle to Clodius furie, and patiently to beare the change of the time. For in ſo doing, he might come againe another time to be the preſeruer of his countrey, which was now for his ſake in tumult and ſedition. Cicero vpon this anſwer of the Conſull, conſulted with his friends; among the which Lucullus gaue him aduice to tarie, and ſaid that he ſhould be the ſtronger. But all the reſt were of contrarie opinion, and would haue him to get him away with ſpeed, for the people would ſhortly wiſh for him againe, when they had once bene beaten with Clodius furie and follie. Cicero liked beſt to follow this counſell. Whereupon hauing had a ſtatue of Minerua a long time in his houſe, the which he greatly reuerenced, he carried her himſelfe, and gaue her to the Capitoll, with this inſcription: Vnto Minerua Protectour of ROME. So his friends hauing giuen him ſafe conduct, he went out of ROME about midnigh, and tooke his way through the countrey of LVKE by land, meaning to goe into SICILE. When it was knowne in ROME that he was fled, Clodius did preſently ba-niſh him by decree of the people, and cauſed billes of inhibition to be ſet vp, that no man ſhould ſecretly receiue him within fiue hundred miles compaſſe of ITALIE. Howbeit, diuers men reuerencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition: but when they had vſed him with all manner of courteſie poſſible, they did conduct him beſides at his departure, ſauing one city only in LVKE, called at that time HIPPONIVM, and now VIBONE: where a SICILIAN called Vibius (vnto whom Cicero before had done many pleaſures, and ſpecially among others, had made him Maſter of the workes in the yeare that he was Conſull) would not once receiue him into his houſe, but promiſed him he would appoint him a place in the countrey that he might go vnto. And Caius Virgilius alſo, at that time Prætor and Gouernour of SICILE, who before had ſhewed himſelfe his very great friend, wrote then vnto him, that he ſhould not come neare vnto SICILE. This grieued him to the heart. Thereupon he went directly vnto the city of BRVNDVSIVM, and there imbarked to paſſe ouer the ſea vnto DYRRACHIVM, & at the firſt had wind at will, but when he was in the maine ſea, the wind turned, and brought him backe againe to the place from whence he came. But after that, he hoiſſed ſaile againe, and the report went, that at his arriuall at DYRRACHIVM when he tooke land, the earth ſhooke vnder him, and the ſea gaue backe together: whereby the Soothſayers interpreted, that his exile ſhould not be long, becauſe both the one and the other was a token of change. Yet Cicero, notwithſtanding that many men came to ſee him for the good will they bare him, and that the cities of GREECE contended who ſhould moſt honour him, he was alwaies ſadde, and could not be merry, but caſt his eyes ſtill towards ITALY, as paſſionate louers do towards the women they loue: ſhewing himſelfe faint hearted, and tooke this aduerſity more baſely then was looked for of one ſo well ſtudied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes prayed his friends, not to call him Oratour, but rather Philoſopher; ſaying, that Philoſophie was his chiefeſt profeſſion, and that for his eloquence he did not vſe it, but as a neceſſary inſtrument to one that pleadeth in the Commonwealth. But glory and opinion hath great power to take mans reaſon from him, euen like a colour, from the minds of them that are common pleaders in matters of ſtate, and to make them feele the ſelfe ſame paſſions that common people do, by daily frequenting their company: vnleſſe they take great heed of them, and that they come to practiſe in the Commonwealth with this reſolute mind, to haue to do with the like matters that the common people haue, but not to entangle themſelues with the like paſſions and moodes, by the which their matters do riſe. Now Clodius was not contented that he had baniſhed Cicero out of ITALIE, but further, he burnt all his houſes in the country, and his houſe alſo in ROME ſtanding in the market place, of the which he built a Temple of Liberty, and cauſed his goods to be ſold by the Cryer: ſo that the Cryer was occupied all day long crying the goods to be ſold, and no man offered to buy any of them. The chiefeſt men of the city beginning to bee affraid of theſe violent parts, and hauing the common people at his commandement, whom he had made very bold and inſolent, he began to inueigh againſt Pompey, and ſpake ill of his doings in the time of his warres, the which euery man elſe but himſelfe did commend. Pompey then was very angry with himſelfe that he had ſo forſaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the meanes he could to call him home againe from his baniſhment. Clodius was againſt it all he could. The Senate notwithſtanding with one full conſent ordained, that nothing ſhould be eſtabliſhed for the Commonwealth, before Ciceroes baniſhment were firſt repealed. Lentulus was at that time Conſull, and there grew ſuch an vprore and ſtir vpon it, that ſome of the Tribunes were hurt in the market place, and Quintus Cicero (the brother of Cicero) was beaten down and hidden vnder the dead bodies. Then the people began to change their mindes. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the firſt man that durſt venture vpon Clodius, and bring him by force to be tryed before the Iudges. Pompey himſelfe alſo hauing gotten a great number of men about him, aſwell of the city of ROME as of other townes adioyning to it, being ſtrongly guarded with them, he came out of his houſe, and compelled Clodius to get him out of the market place, and then called the people to giue their voices for the calling home againe of Cicero. It is reported that the people neuer paſſed thing with ſo great goodwill, nor ſo wholly together, as the returne of Cicero. And the Senate for their parts alſo, in the behalfe of Cicero, ordained, that the cities which had honoured and receiued Cicero in his exile, ſhould be greatly commended: and that his houſes which Clodius had ouerthrowne and razed, ſhould be reedified at the charge of the commonwealth. So Cicero returned the ſixteenth moneth after his baniſhment, and the townes and cities he

he came by, ſhewed themſelues ſo ioyfull of his returne, that all manner of men went to meete and honour him, with ſo great loue and affection, that Ciceroes report thereof afterwards came indeed ſhort of the very truth as it was. For he ſaid, that ITALIE brought him into ROME vpon their ſhoulders. Inſomuch as Craſſus himſelfe, who before his baniſhment was his enemie, went then with very goodwill vnto him, and became his friend, ſaying: That he did it for the loue of his ſonne, who loued Cicero with all his heart. Now Cicero being returned, he found a time when Clodius was out of the city, and went with a good company of his friends vnto the Capitoll, and there tooke away the tables, and brake them, in the which Clodius had written all his acts that he had paſſed & done in the time of his Tribuneſhip. Clodius would afterwards haue accuſed Cicero for it, But Cicero anſwered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, becauſe he was of the PATRICIANS, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribuneſhip was voide, and of none effect. Therewith Cato was offended, and ſpake againſt him, not for that he liked of Clodius doings, (but to the contrarie, vtterly miſliked all that he did) but becauſe he thought it out of all reaſon, that the Senate ſhould cancell all thoſe things which he had done and paſſed in his Tribuneſhip, and ſpecially, becauſe amongſt the reſt, that was there which he himſelfe had done in the Iſle of CYPRVS, and in the city of BYZANTIVM. Hereupon there grew ſome ſtrangeneſſe betwixt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithſtanding brake not out to open enmitie: but onely to an abſtinence of their wonted familiarity, and acceſſe one to another. Shortly after, Milo ſlue Clodius. Milo being accuſed of murther, prayed Cicero to pleade his cauſe. The Senate fearing that this accuſation of Milo, (who was a hardie man, and of quality beſides) would moue ſome ſedition and vprore in the city, they gaue commiſſion to Pompey to ſee iuſtice executed as well in this cauſe as in other offences, that the city might be quiet, and iudgement alſo executed with ſafetie. Thereupon Pompey the night before tooke the higheſt places of the market place, by his ſouldiers that were armed, whom he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicero would be affraid to ſee ſuch a number of harneſſed men about him, being no vſuall matter, and that it might peraduenture hinder him to pleade his cauſe well, he prayed him he would come betimes in the morning in his Litter into the market place, and there to ſtay the coming of the Iudges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearefull in warres, but timorous alſo in pleading. For indeed he neuer beganne to ſpeake, but it was in feare: and when his eloquence was come to the beſt proofe and perfection, he neuer left his trembling and timorouſneſſe. Inſomuch that pleading a caſe for Mutius Muræna (accuſed by Cato) ſtriuing to excell Hortenſius, whoſe pleading was very well thought of, he tooke no reſt all night, and what through watching and the trouble of his mind, he was not very well, ſo that he was not ſo well liked for his pleading as Hortenſius. So, going to defend Miloes cauſe, when he came out of his Litter, and ſaw Pompey ſet aloft as it had bene in a campe, and the market place compaſſed about with armed men, gliſtering in euery corner, it ſo amated him, that he could ſcant faſhion himſelfe to ſpeake; all the parts of him did ſo quake and tremble, and his voice could not come to him. But Milo on the other ſide ſtood boldly by him himſelfe, without any feare at all of the iudgement of his cauſe, neither did he let his haire grow, as other men accuſed did: neither did he weare any mourning gowne, the which was (as it ſeemed) one of the chiefeſt cauſes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timorouſneſſe of Cicero came rather of the good will he bare vnto his friends, then of any cowardly mind of himſelfe. He was alſo choſen one of the Prieſts of the Soothſayers, which they call Augures, in the roome of Publius Craſſus the younger, who was ſlaine in the Realme of PARTHIA. Afterwards, the Prouince of SILICIA being appointed to him, with an army of twelue thouſand footmen, and two thouſand and fiue hundred horſemen, he tooke the ſea to go thither. So when he was arriued there, he brought CAPPADOCIA againe into the ſubiection and obedience of king Ariobarzanes, according to his commiſſion and commandement giuen by the Senate: moreouer, both there and elſwhere he tooke as excellent good order as could be deuiſed, in reducing of things to quietneſſe without wars. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIANS were growne ſomewhat ſtout and vnruly, by the ouerthrow the ROMAINES had of the PARTHIANS, and by reaſon of the riſing and rebellion in SYRIA, he brought them vnto reaſon by gentle perſwaſions: and neuer receiued gifts that were ſent him, no not from Kings and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden the Prouinces of the feaſtes and banquets they were wont to make other Gouernours before him. On the other ſide alſo, he would euer haue the company of good and learned men at his

table and would vſe them well, without curioſity and exceſſe. He had neuer porter to his gate, nor was ſeene by any man in his bed: for he would alwaies riſe at the breake of day, and would walke or ſtand before his doore. He would courteouſly receiue all them that came to ſalute and viſit him. Further they report of him, that he neuer cauſed man to be beaten with roddes, nor to teare his owne garments. In his anger he neuer reuiled any man, neither did deſpitefully ſet fine vpon any mans head. Finding many things alſo belonging to the Commonwealth, which priuate men had ſtolne and imbezeled to their own vſe, he reſtored again vnto the cities, whereby they grew very rich and wealthie: and yet did ſaue their honour and credite that had taken them away, and did them no other hurt, but onely conſtrained them to reſtore that which was the Commonwealths. He made a little warre alſo, and draue away the theeues that kept about the mountaine Amanus, for the which exploit his ſouldiers called him Imperator, to ſay, chiefe Captain. About that time there was an orator called Cæcilius, who wrote vnto him from Rome, to pray him to ſend him ſome Leopards or Panthers out of Silicia, becauſe he would ſhew the people ſome paſtime with them. Cicero boaſting of his doings, wrote to him again, that there were no more Leopards in Silicia, but that they were all fled into Caria for anger, that ſeeing all things quiet in Silicia, they had leyſure now to hunt them. So when he returned towards Rome, from the charge of his gouernment, he came by Rhodes, & ſtayed a few daies at Athens with great delight, to remember how pleaſantly he liued there before, at what time he ſtudied there. Thither came to him the chiefeſt learned men of the city, and his friends alſo, with whom he was acquainted at his firſt being there. In fine, hauing receiued all the honourable intertainment in Greece that could be, he returned vnto Rome, where at his ariual he found great factions kindled, the which men ſaw plainly would grow in the end to ciuill war. Thereupon the Senate hauing decreed that he ſhould enter in triumph into the city, he anſwered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cæſars coach in triumph. So he trauelled very earneſtly betweene Pompey and Cæſar, eftſoones writing vnto Cæſar, and alſo ſpeaking vnto Pompey that was preſent, ſeeking all the meanes he could, to take vp the quarrell and miſliking betwixt them two. But it was ſo impoſſible a matter, that there was no ſpeech of agreement would take place. So Pompey hearing that Cæſar was not farre from Rome, he durſt no longer abide in Rome, but fled with diuers of the greateſt men in Rome. Cicero would not follow him when he fled, and therfore men thought he would take part with Cæſar: but this is certaine, that he was in a maruellous perplexity, and could not eaſily determine what way to take. Wherupon he wrote in his Epiſtles: What way ſhould I take? Pompey hath the iuſter and honeſter cauſe of warre, but Cæſar can better execute, and prouide for himſelfe and his friends with better ſafetie: ſo that I haue meanes enough to flie, but none to whom I might repaire. In all this ſtirre, there was one of Cæſars friends called Trebatius, which wrote a letter vnto Cicero, and told him that Cæſar wiſhed him in any caſe to come to him, and to run with him the hope & fortune he vndertooke: but if he excuſed himſelfe by his age, that then he ſhould get him into Greece, and there to be quiet from them both. Cicero maruelling that Cæſar wrote not to him himſelfe, anſwered in anger, that he would do nothing vnworthy of his acts all the daies of his life thitherto: and to this effect he wrote in his letters. Now Cæſar being gon into Spaine, Cicero imbarked preſently to go to Pompey. So when he came vnto him, euery man was very glad of his comming, but Cato. Howbeit Cato ſecretly reproued him for coming vnto Pompey, ſaying: that for himſelfe he had bene without all honeſty at that time to haue forſaken that part the which he had alwaies taken and followed from the beginning of his firſt practiſe in the commonwealth: but for him, on the other ſide, that it had bene better for the ſafety of his country, & chiefly for all his friends, that he had bene a newter to both, and ſo to haue taken things as they had fallen out: and that he had no maner of reaſon nor inſtant cauſe to make him to become Cæſars enemy, and by comming thither to put himſelf into ſo great perill. Theſe perſwaſions of Cato ouerthrew all Ciceroes purpoſe and determination, beſides that Pompey himſelfe did not employ him in any matter of ſeruice or importance. But hereof himſelfe was more in fault then Pompey, becauſe he confeſſed openly that it did repent him he was come thither. Furthermore, he ſcorned and diſdained all Pompeys preparations and counſels, the which indeed made him to be had in iealouſie and ſuſpition. Alſo he would euer be fleering and gibing at thoſe that tooke Pompeys part, though he had no liſt himſelfe to be merrie. He would alſo go vp and downe the campe very ſad and heauie, but yet he would euer haue one ieaſt or other to make men laugh, although they had as little luſt to be merie as he: and ſurely, it ſhall do no hurt to call ſome of them to mind in this place. Domitius being very deſirous to preferre a Gentleman to haue charge of men, to recommend him, he ſaid, he was an honeſt, wiſe, and ſober man, Whereto Cicero preſently anſwered: Why doeſt thou not keepe him then to bring vp thy children? Another time when they commended Theophanes LESBIAN, (that was maſter of all the artificers, of the campe) becauſe he had notably comforted the RHODIANS when they had receiued a great loſſe of their nauie: See, ſaid Cicero, what a goodly thing it is to haue a GRECIAN, maſter of artificers in the campe? When both battels came to ioyne together, and that Cæſar had in manner all the aduantage, and kept them as good as beſieged, Lentulus told him on a time, that he heard ſay, all Cæſars friends were mad, and melancholy men. Why? quoth Cicero to him againe: doeſt thou ſay that they do enuie Cæſar? Another called Martius, coming lately out of ITALY, ſaid, that there ran a rumour in ROME, that Pompey was beſieged. What? quoth Cicero to him againe: and didſt thou take ſhip to come and ſee him thy ſelfe, becauſe thou mighteſt beleeue it when thou hadſt ſeene it? Pompey being ouerthrowne, one Nonius ſaid, there was yet good hope left, becauſe they had taken ſeuen Eagles within Pompeys campe. Thy perſwaſion were not ill, quoth Cicero, ſo we were to fight but with pies and dawes. Labienus repoſed all his truſt in certaine Oracles, that Pompey of neceſſity muſt haue the vpper hand. Yea ſaid Cicero, but for all this goodly ſtratageme of war, we haue not long ſince loſt our whole campe. After the battell of PHARSALIA, where Cicero was not by reaſon of his ſickneſſe: Pompey being fled, and Cato at that time at DYRRACHIVM, where he had gathered a great number of men of war, and had alſo prepared a great nauie, he praied Cicero to take charge of all this armie, as it pertained vnto him, hauing bene Conſull. Cicero did not onely refuſe it, but alſo told them, he would meddle no more with this war. But this was inough to haue made him bin ſlaine: for the yonger Pompey and his friends called him traitor, and drew their ſwords vpon him to kill him, which they had done, had not Cato ſtepped betweene them and him; and yet had he much ado to ſaue him, & to conuey him ſafely out of the camp. When Cicero came to BRVNDVSIVM, he ſtayed there a certaine time for Cæſars coming, who came but ſlowly, by reaſon of his troubles he had in ASIA, as alſo in ÆGYPT. Howbeit newes was brought at length that Cæſar was arriued at TARENTVM, & that he came by land vnto BRVNDVSIVM: Cicero departed thence to go meete him, not miſtruſting that Cæſar would not pardon him, but rather being aſhamed to come to his enemie being a conquerour, before ſuch a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to do or ſpeake any thing vnſeemely to his calling: for Cæſar ſeeing him comming towards him farre before the reſt that came with him, he lighted from his horſe and imbraced him, and walked a great way on foot with him, ſtill talking with him only; and euer after he did him great honour, and made much of him. Inſomuch as Cicero hauing written a booke in praiſe of Cato, Cæſar on the other ſide wrote another, and praiſed the eloquence and life of Cicero, matching it with the life of Pericles, and Theramines. Ciceros booke was intituled, Cato and Cæſars booke called Anticato, as much to ſay, againſt Cato. They ſay further, that Quintus Ligarius being accuſed to haue bene in the field againſt Cæſar, Cicero tooke vpon him to defend his cauſe: and that Cæſar ſaid vnto his friends about him, What hurt is it for vs to heare Cicero ſpeak, whom we haue not heard of long time? for otherwiſe Ligarius (in my opinion) ſtandeth alreadie a condemned man, for I know him to be a valiant man, and mine enemie. But when Cicero had begun his Oration, he moued Cæſar maruellouſly, he had ſo ſweete a grace, and ſuch force in his words, that it is reported Cæſar changed colour often, and ſhewed plainely by his countenance, that there was a maruellous alteration in all the parts of him. For, in the end when the Orator came to touch the battel of PHARSALIA, then was Cæſar ſo troubled, that his body ſhooke withall, and beſides, certaine bookes he had fell out of his hands, and he was driuen againſt his will to ſet Ligarius at liberty. Afterwards, when the common-wealth of ROME came to be a kingdome, Cicero leauing to practiſe any more in the ſtate, he gaue himſelfe to reade Philoſophy to the yong men that came to heare him: by whoſe acceſſe vnto him (becauſe they were the chiefeſt of the nobility in ROME) he came againe to beare as great ſway and authority in ROME as euer he had done before. His ſtudie and endeuour was, to write matters of Philoſophie dialogue wiſe, and to tranſlate out of Greeke into Latine, taking paines to bring all the Greeke words, which are proper vnto Logicke and naturall cauſes, into Latine. For he was the firſt man by report, that gaue Latine names vnto theſe Greeke words, which are proper vnto Philoſophers, as, φαντασία, he termed, Viſio. Κατάθεσις, Aſſenſus. Comprehenſio. Τὸ ἄτομον, Corpus indiuiduum. Τὸ ἁπλοῦν, Corpus ſimplex. Τὸ κενὸν, Vacuum, and many other ſuch like words. But though he were not the firſt, yet was it he that moſt did deuiſe and vſe them, and turned ſome of them by tranſlation, others into proper termes: ſo that at length they came to be well taken, knowne, and vnderſtood of euery man. And for his readineſſe in writing of verſes, he would vſe them many times for his recreation: for it is reported, that whenſoeuer he took in hand to make any, he would diſpatch 500 of them in a night. Now al that time of his recreation and pleaſure, he would commonly be at ſome of his houſes in the country, which he had neare vnto THVSCVLVM, frō whence he would write vnto his friēds, that he led Laertes life: either ſpoken merily as the maner was, or elſe pricked forward with ambitiō, deſiring to returne againe to be practiſer in the commonwealth, being weary with the preſent time & ſtate thereof. Howſoeuer it was, he came oftentimes to ROME, only to ſee Cæſar to keepe him his friend; and would euer be the firſt man to confirme any honors decreed vnto him, & was alwaies ſtudious to vtter ſome new matter to praiſe him & his doings. As that was he ſaid touching the ſtatues of Pompey, the which being ouerthrowne, Cæſar commanded them to be ſet vp againe, and ſo they were. For Cicero ſaid, that by that courteſie in ſetting vp of Pompeys ſtatues againe, he did eſtabliſh his owne. So Cicero being determined to write all the ROMAINE hiſtory, and to mingle with it many of the GRECIANS doings, adding therunto all the fables and deuices which they do write & report, he was hindred of his purpoſe againſt his will, by many open & priuate troubles that came vpon him at once: whereof notwithſtanding he himſelf was cauſe of the moſt of them. For firſt of all, he did put away his wife Terentia, becauſe ſhe had made but ſmall account of him in all the warres: ſo that he departed from ROME hauing no neceſſary thing with him to entertaine him out of his country; and yet when he came backe againe into ITALY, ſhe neuer ſhewed any ſparke of loue or goodwill towards him. For ſhe neuer came to BRVNDVSIVM to him, where he remained a long time: and worſe then that, his daughter hauing the heart to take ſo long a iorney in hand to go to him, ſhe neither gaue her cōpany to conduct her, nor mony, nor other furniture conuenient for her; but ſo handled the matter, that Cicero at his returne to ROME found bare wals in his houſe and nothing in it, & yet greatly brought in debt beſides. And theſe were the honeſteſt cauſes alledged for their diuorſe. But beſides that Terentia denied all theſe, Cicero himſelfe gaue her a good occaſion to cleare her ſelf, becauſe he ſhortly after maried a yong maidē, being fallen in fancie with her (as Terentia ſaid) for her beauty: or, as Tyro his ſeruant wrote, for her riches, to the end that with her goods he might pay his debts. For ſhe was very rich, and Cicero alſo was appointed her gardian, ſhe being left ſole heire. Now, becauſe he ought a maruellous ſumme of mony, his parents and friends did counſell him to mary this yong maiden, notwithſtanding he was too old for her, becauſe that with her goods he might ſatisfie his creditors. But Antonius ſpeaking of this mariage of Cicero, in his anſweis & Orations he made againſt ỹ PHILIPPIANS, he doth reproue him for that he put away his wife, with whom he was growne old; being merry with him by the way, for that he had bene an idle man, and neuer went from the ſmoke of his chimney, nor had bene abroad in the wars in any ſeruice of his countrey or common-wealth. Shortly after that he had maried his ſecond wife, his daughter died in labour of child, in Lentulus houſe, whoſe ſecond wife ſhe was, being before maried vnto Piſo, who was her firſt husband. So the Philoſophers and learned men came of all ſides to comfort him: but he took her death ſo ſorowfully, that he put away his ſecond wife, becauſe he thought ſhe did reioyce at the death of his daughter. And thus much touching the ſtate & troubles of his houſe. Now touching the cōſpiracie againſt Cæſar, Cicero not made priuie to the conſpiracie againſt Cæſar.

he was not made priuy to it, although he was one of Brutus greateſt frieds, and that it grieued him to ſee things in that ſtate they were brought vnto, & albeit alſo he wiſhed for the times paſt, as much as any other man did. But indeed the conſpirators were afraid of his nature, that lacked hardineſſe: and of his age, the which oftentimes maketh the ſtouteſt & moſt hardieſt natures faint hearted and cowardly. Notwithſtanding, the conſpiracie being executed by Brutus and Caſſius, Cæſars friends being gathered together, euery man was affraid that the city would againe fall into ciuill wars. And Antonius alſo, who was Conſull at that time, did aſſemble the Senate, and made ſome ſpeech and motion then to draw things againe vnto quietneſſe. But Cicero hauing vſed diuers perſwaſions fit for the time, in the end he moued the Senate to decree (following the exāple of the ATHENIANS) a general obliuiō of things done againſt Cæſar, & to aſſigne vnto Brutus and Caſſius ſome gouernments of prouinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded: for the people of themſelues were ſorie, when they ſaw Cæſars body brought through the market place. And when Antonius also did shew them his gowne all bebloudied, cut, and thrust through with swords, then they were like mad men for anger, and sought vp and downe the market place if they could meete with any of them that had slaine him: and taking firebrands in their hands, they ranne to their houses to set them on fire. But the conspirators hauing preuented this danger, saued themselues: and fearing that if they taried at ROME, they should haue many such alarmes, they forsooke the city. Then Antonius began to looke aloft, and became fearefull to all men, as though he meant to make himselfe King: but yet most of all vnto Cicero aboue all others. For Antonius perceiuing that Cicero began againe to increase in credit and authority, and knowing that he was Brutus very friend, he did mislike to see him come neare him; and besides there was at that time some iealousie betwixt them, for the diuersity and difference of their maners and dispositions. Cicero being afraid of this, was first of all in mind to go with Dolabella to his prouince of SYRIA, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Consuls the next yeare following after Antonius, two noble Citizens, and Ciceroes great friends, Hirsius and Pansa, they intreated him not to forsake them, vndertaking that they would plucke downe this ouer-great power of Antonius, so he would remaine with them. But Cicero, neither beleeuing nor altogether mistrusting them, forsooke Dolabella, and promised Hircius and Pansa, that he would spend the sommer at ATHENS, & that he would returne againe to Rome so soone as they were entred into their Consulship. With this determination Cicero tooke the sea alone, to go into GREECE. But as it chanceth oftentimes, there was some let that kept him he could not saile, & newes came to him daily from ROME, (as the manner is,) that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authority and consent of the Senate, and that there lacked nothing but his person to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his dastardly feare, returned forthwith to ROME, not being deceiued in his first hope. For there came such a number of people out to meete him, that he could do nothing all day long but take them by the hands, and imbrace them, who to honour him, came to meete him at the gate of the city, as also by the way to bring him to his house. The next morning Antonius assembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refused to go, and kept his bed, faining that he was wearie with his iourny and paines he had taken the day before: but indeed the cause why he went not, was, for feare and suspition of an ambush that was laid for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his very good friends. Antonius was maruellously offended that they did wrongfully accuse him, for laying any ambush for him: and therfore sent souldiers to his house, & commanded them to bring him by force, or else to set his house on fire. After that time, Cicero and he were alwaies at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heed of another: vntill that young Cæsar returning from the city of APOLLONIA, came as lawfull heire vnto Iulius Cæsar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the summe of two thousand and fiue hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his hands of his fathers goods. Thereupon Philip who had maried the mother of this young Cæsar, and Marcellus who had also maried his sister, went with yong Cæsar vnto Cicero, and there agreed together, that Cicero should helpe yong Cæsar with the fauour of his authority and eloquence, as well towards the Senate, as also to the people: and that Cæsar in recompence of his goodwill should stand by Cicero, with his money and souldiers: for this yong Cæsar had many of his fathers souldiers about him, that had serued vnder him. Now there was another cause that made Cicero glad to imbrace the friendship of this yong Cæsar, and that was this. Whilest Pompey and Iulius Cæsar were aliue and in good case, Cicero dreamed one night that the Senators sons were called into the Capitoll, because Iupiter had appointed to shew them him that one day should come to be Lord and King of ROME, and that the ROMAINES being desirous to see who it should be, ran all vnto the temple: and that all the children likewise were waiting there in their goodly garded gownes of purple, vntil that sodainly the dores of the temple were open; and then that al the children arose one after another, and went and passed by the image of Iupiter, who looked vpon them all, and sent them away discontented, sauing this yong Cæsar, vnto whom he put forth his hand as he passed by, and said: My Lords of ROME, this child is he that shall end al your ciuill wars, when he commeth to be Lord of ROME. Some say, that Cicero had this vision in his dreame, and that he caried in good memory the looke of this child, howbeit that he knew him not: and that the next morning he went of purpose into the field of Mars, where these young boyes did exercise themselues, who, when he came thither, had broken vp from playing, and were going home: and Cicero and Octauius Cæsar ioyned in friendship.

Ciceroes dreame of Octauius adopted son of Iulius Cæsar.

that amongst them he first saw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him very well, and musing at him the more, asked him whose son he was. The boy answered, that he was ỹ son of one Octauius (a man otherwise of no great calling) and of Accia, the sister of Iulius Cæsar: who hauing no child, he made him his heire by his last will and testament, and left him al his lands & goods. After that time, it is reported, that Cicero was very glad to speake to him when he met with him, and that the boy also liked Ciceroes friendship, and making of him: for by good hap the boy was borne the same yeare that Cicero was Consull. And these be the reasons alledged, why Cicero did fauour this yong Cæsar. But in truth, first of all the great malice he bare vnto Antonius, & secondly his nature that was ambitious of honour, were (in my opinion) the chiefest causes why he became yong Cæsars friend: knowing that the force and power of his souldiers would greatly strengthen his authority and countenance in managing the affaires of the state; besides that the yong man could flatter him so well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epistles he wrote vnto Atticus, he sharply reproueth Cicero, saying, that for feare of Antonius he flattered this yong Cæsar: whereby it appeared, he did not so much seeke for the liberty of Rome, as he did procure himselfe a louing and gentle master. This notwithstanding Brutus brought with him Ciceroes son that studied Philosophy at Athens, and gaue him charge of men vnder him, and employed him in great affaires, wherein he shewed himselfe very forward and valiant. Now Ciceroes authority & power grew againe to be as great in Rome, as euer it was before. For he did what he thought good, and so vexed Antonius, that he draue him out of the city, and sent the two Consuls Hircius and Pansa against him, to fight with him: and caused the Senate also to decree, that yong Cæsar should haue sergeants to carie rods & axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prætor, as a man that fighteth for his country. After that Antonius had lost the battell, and that both the Consuls were slaine, both the armies came vnto Cæsar. The Senate then being afraid of this yong man that had so great good fortune, they practised by honours and gifts to call the armies from him, which he had about him, and so to minish the greatnesse of his power: saying, that their country now stood in no neede of force nor feare of defence, sith her enemy Antonius was fled and gone. Cæsar fearing this, sent men secretly vnto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls; and that when they should be in office, he should do and appoint what he thought good, hauing the yong man at his commandement, who desired no more but the honour only of the name. Cæsar himselfe confessed afterwards, that being afraid he should haue bene vtterly cast away, to haue bene left alone, he finely serued his turne by Ciceroes ambition, hauing perswaded him to require the Consulship through the helpe and assistance that he would giue him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a yong man, when he was cõtented to sue for the Consulship in his behalfe, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherfore his friends presently reproued him for it, and shortly after he perceiued he had vndone himselfe, and together also lost the liberty of his country. For this young man Octauius Cæsar being growne to be very great by his meanes and procurement, when he saw that he had the Consulship vpon him, he forsooke Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then ioyning his army with theirs, he deuided the Empire of Rome with them, as if it had bene lands left in common betweene them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and vpwards, whom they had appointed to be slaine. But the greatest difficulty and difference that fell out betweene them, was about the outlawing of Cicero. For Antonius would hearken to no peace betweene them, vnlesse Cicero were slaine first of all: Lepidus was also in the same mind with Antonius: but Cæsar was against them both. Their meeting was by the city of Bolonia, where they continued three daies together, they three onely secretly consulting in a place enuironed about with a little riuer. Some say that Cæsar stucke hard with Cicero the two first daies, but at the third, that he yeelded and forsooke him. The exchange they agreed vpon betweene them, was this. Cæsar forsooke Cicero: Lepidus, his owne brother Paulus: and Antonius Lucius Cæsar his vncle by the mothers side. Such place tooke wrath in them, as they regarded no kindred nor blood: and to speake more properly, they shewed that no brute or sauage beast is so cruell as man, if with his licentiousnesse he haue liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a house of his in the country, by the city of Thvscvlvm, hauing at home with him also his brother Q. Cicero. Newes being brought them thither of these proscriptions or outlawries, appointing men to be slaine, they determined to goe to Astyra, a place by the sea side where Cicero had another house, there to take sea, ſea, and from thence to go into MACEDON vnto Brutus. For there ran a rumour that Brutus was very ſtrong, and had a great power. So they cauſed themſelues to be conueyed thither in two Litters, both of them being ſo weake with ſorow and griefe, that they could not otherwiſe haue gone their waies. As they were on their way, both the Litters going as neare to each other as they could, they bewailed their miſerable eſtate: but Quintus chiefly, who took it moſt grieuouſly. For, remembring that he tooke no money with him when he came from his houſe, and that Cicero his brother alſo had very little for himſelfe, he thought it beſt that Cicero ſhould hold on his iourney, whileſt he himſelfe made an errand home to fetch ſuch things as he lacked, and ſo to make haſt againe to ouertake his brother. They both thought it beſt ſo, and then tenderly embracing one another, the teares falling from their eyes, they tooke leaue of each other. Within few daies after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his owne ſeruants, vnto them that made ſearch for him, he was cruelly ſlaine, and his ſonne with him. But Marcus Tullius Cicero being called vnto ASTYRA, and there finding a ſhip ready, imbarked immediatly, and ſailed along the coaſt vnto Mount Circe, hauing a good gale of wind. There the Mariners determining forthwith to make ſaile againe, he came a ſhoare, either for feare of ý ſea, or for that he had ſome hope that Ceſar had not altogether forſaken him: and therewithall returning towards ROME by land, he had gone about an hundred furlongs thence. But then being at a ſtraight how to reſolue, and ſodainly changing his mind, he would needs be caried backe againe to the ſea, where he continued all night maruellous ſorowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in mind to go ſecretly vnto Octauius Cæſars houſe, and to kill himſelfe by the hearth of his chimney, to make the furies of hell to reuenge his bloud: but being afraid to be intercepted by the way, and cruelly handled, he turned from that determination. Then falling into other vnaduiſed determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put himſelfe againe into his ſeruants hands, to be conueyed by ſea vnto another place called *CAPITES. There he had a very proper pleaſant ſomer houſe, where the North winds, called Eteſiæ, do giue a trimme freſh aire in the ſommer ſeaſon. In that place alſo there is a little temple dedicated vnto Apollo, not farre from the ſea ſide. From thence there came a great ſhole of crowes, making a maruellous noiſe, that came flying towards Ciceroes ſhip, which rowed vpon the ſhore. This ſhole of crowes came and lighted vpon the yard of their ſaile, ſome crying, and ſome pecking the cords with their billes: ſo that euery man iudged ſtraight, that this was a ſigne of ill lucke at hand. Cicero notwithſtanding this, came a ſhore, and went into his houſe, and laied him downe to ſee if he could ſleepe. But the moſt part of theſe crowes came and lighted vpon the chamber window where he lay, making a wonderfull great noiſe: and ſome of them got vnto Ciceroes bed where he lay, the clothes being caſt ouer his head, and they neuer left him, till by litle and litle they had with their billes pluckt off the clothes that couered his face. His men ſeeing that, and ſaying to themſelues that they were too vile beaſtes, if they would tary to ſee their maſter ſlaine before their eyes, (conſidering that bruite beaſts had care to ſaue his life, ſeeing him ſo vnworthily intreated) and that they ſhould not do the beſt they could to ſaue his life: partly by intreaty, and partly by force, they put him againe into his Litter to cary him to the ſea. But in the meane time came the murderers appointed to kill him. Herennius a Centurion, and Popilius Læna, Tribune of the ſouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thouſand men, whoſe cauſe Cicero had once pleaded before the Iudges, when he was accuſed for the murther of his owne father) hauing ſoldiers attending vpon them. So Ciceroes gate being ſhut, they entred the houſe by force, and miſſing him, they asked them of the houſe what was become of him. They anſwered they could not tell. Howbeit, there was a yong boy in the houſe called Philologus, a ſlaue infranchiſed by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought vp in the Latine tongue, and had taught him the liberall ſciences: he told this Herennius that his ſeruants carried him in a Litter towards the ſea, through dark narrow lanes, ſhadowed with wood on either ſide. Popilius the Colonell taking ſome ſoldiers with him, ranne about on the outſide of the lanes to take him at his coming out of them: and Herennius on the other ſide entred the lanes. Cicero hearing him coming, commanded his men to ſet downe his Litter, and taking his beard in his left hand, as his manner was, he ſtoutly looked the murtherers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face leane and wrinckled, for the extreme ſorrowes he had taken: diuerſe of them that were by, held their hands before their eyes, whileſt Herennius did cruelly murther him. So Cicero being threeſcore and foure yeares of age, thruſt his necke out of the Litter, and had his head cut off by Antonius commandement, and his hands alſo, which wrote the Orations (called the Philippians) against him. For so did Cicero call the Orations he wrote against him, for the malice he bare him: and they do yet continue the same name vntill this present time. When these poore dismembred members were brought to Rome, Antonius by chance was busily occupied at that time about the election of certaine Officers: who when he heard of them and saw them, he cryed out aloud, that now all his outlawries and proscriptions were executed: and thereupon commanded his head and his hands should straight be set vp ouer the pulpit for Orations, in the place called Rostra. This was a fearefull & horrible sight vnto the Romaines, who thought they saw not Ciceroes face, but an image of Antonius life and disposition: who among so many wicked deedes as he committed, yet he did one act onely that had some shew of goodnesse, which was this. He deliuered Philologus into the hands of Pomponia, the wife of Quintus Cicero: and when she had him, besides other cruell torments she made him abide, she compelled him to cut his owne flesh off by litle morsels, and to broile them, and then to eate them. Some Historiographers do thus report it: but Tyro who was a slaue infranchised by Cicero, made no mention of the treason of this Philologus. Howbeit I vnderstand that Cæsar Augustus long time after that, went one day to see one of his Nephewes, who had a booke in his hand of Ciceroes: and he fearing lest his vncle would be angry to find that booke in his hands, thought to hide it vnder his gowne. Cæsar saw it, and tooke it from him, and read the most part of it standing, and then deliuered it to the young boy, and said vnto him: He was a wise man indeed, my child, and loued his country well. After he had slaine Antonius, being Consull, he made Ciceroes sonne his colleague and fellow Consull with him, in whose time the Senate ordained that the images of Antonius should be throwne downe, and depriued his memorie of all other honours: adding further vnto this decree, that from thenceforth none of the house and familie of the Antonij should euer after beare the name of Marcus. So Gods iustice made the extreme reuenge and punishment of Antonius to fall into the house of Cicero.

THE COMPARISON OF Cicero with Demosthenes.

THis is as much as we could gather by our knowledge touching the notable actes and deedes worthie of memorie, written of Cicero and Demosthenes. Furthermore, leauing the comparison aside of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations, me thinkes I may say thus much of them: That Demosthenes did wholly employ all his wit and learning (naturall or artificiall) vnto the Art of Rhetoricke; and that in force and vertue of eloquence he did excell all the Oratours in his time: and for grauitie and magnificent style, all those also that onely write for shew or ostentation: and for sharpenesse and art, all the Sophisters, and masters of Rhetoricke. And that Cicero was a man generally learned in all sciences, and that that had ſtudied diuerſe books, as appeareth plainely by the ſundry books of Philoſophy of his owne making, written after the manner of the Academicke Philoſophers. Furthermore, they may ſee in his Orations he wrote in certaine cauſes to ſerue him when he pleaded, that he ſought occaſions in his by-talke to ſhew men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phraſes a man may diſcerne ſome ſparke of their maners and conditions. For Demoſthenes phraſe hath no maner of fineneſſe, ieſts, nor grace in it, but is altogether graue and harſh; and not only ſmelleth of the lampe, as Pythias ſaid when he mocked him, but ſheweth a great drinker of water, extreme paines, and therewith alſo a ſharpe and ſowre nature. But Cicero oftentimes fell from pleaſant taunts vnto plaine ſcurrility, and turning all his pleadings of matters of importance to ſport and laughter, hauing a grace in it, many times he did forget the comelineſſe that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Cælius, where he ſaith, It is no maruell if in ſo great abundance of wealth and fineneſſe he giue himſelfe a litle to take his pleaſure: and that it was a folly not to vſe pleaſures lawfull and tolerable, ſith the famouſeſt Philoſophers that euer were, did place the chiefe felicity of man, to be in pleaſure. And it is reported alſo that Marcus Cato hauing accuſed Muræna, Cicero being Conſul, defended his cauſe, and in his Oration pleaſantly girded all the ſect of the Stoick Philoſophers for Catoes ſake, for the ſtrange opinions they held, which they call Paradoxes: in ſo much as he made all the people and Iudges alſo fall on laughing a good. And Cato himſelfe alſo ſmiling a litle, ſaid vnto them that ſate by him: What a laughing and mocking Conſull haue we, my Lords? But letting that paſſe, it ſeemeth that Cicero was of a pleaſant and merry nature: for his face ſhewed euer great life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demoſthenes countenance on the other ſide, they might diſcerne a maruellous diligence and care, and a penſiue man, neuer weary with paine: inſomuch that his enemies (as he reporteth himſelfe) called him a peruerſe & froward man. Furthermore, in their writings is diſcerned, that the one ſpeaketh modeſtly in his own praiſe, ſo as no man can iuſtly be offended with him: and yet not alwaies, but when neceſſity enforceth him for ſome matter of great importance, but otherwiſe very diſcreet and modeſt to ſpeake of himſelfe. Cicero in contrary maner, vſing too often repetition of one ſelfe thing in all his Orations, ſhewed an extreme ambition of glory, when inceſſantly he cried out:

Ciceroes rare and diuerſe doctrines.

Demoſthenes and Ciceroes maners.

Let ſpeare and ſhield giue place to gowne,
And giue the tongue the lawrell crowne.

Demoſthenes modeſt in praiſing of himſelfe: Cicero too full of oſtentation.

Yet furthermore, he did not only praiſe his own acts and deeds, but the Orations alſo which he had written or pleaded, as if he ſhould haue contended againſt Iſocrates, or Anaximenes a maſter that taught Rhetoricke, and not to go about to reforme the people of Rome:

Which were both fierce and ſtout in armes,
And fit to worke their enemies harmes.

For, as it is requiſite for the gouernor of a common wealth to ſeeke authority by his eloquence: ſo, to couet the praiſe of his owne glorious tongue, or as it were to begge it, that ſheweth a baſe mind. And therefore in this point we muſt confeſſe that Demoſthenes is farre grauer, and of a nobler mind: who declared himſelf, that al his eloquence came only but by practiſe, the which alſo required the fauor of his auditory: and further, he thought them fooles and mad men (as indeed they be no leſſe) that therefore would make any boaſt of themſelues. In this they were both alike, that both of them had great credit & authority in their Orations to the people, and for obtaining that they would propound: inſomuch as Captains, & they that had armes in their hands, ſtood in need of their eloquence. As Chares, Diopithes, and Leoſthenes, they all were holpen of Demoſthenes: and Pompey, and Octauius Cæſar the yong man, of Cicero: as Cæſar himſelfe confeſſeth in his Commentaries he wrote vnto Agrippa and Mœcenas. But nothing ſheweth a mans nature and condition more (as it is reported, & ſo is it true) then when one is in authority: for that bewraieth his humor, and the affections of his mind, and layeth open alſo all the ſecret vices in him. Demoſthenes could neuer deliuer any ſuch proofe of himſelfe, becauſe he neuer bare any office, nor was called forward: for he was not Generall of the army which he himſelf had prepared againſt king Philip. Cicero on the other ſide being ſent Treaſurer into Sicile, and Proconſull into Cilicia and Cappadocia, in ſuch a time as couetouſneſſe reigned moſt, (in ſo much that the Captaines and gouernours whom they ſent to gouerne their prouinces, thinking it villanie and daſtardlines to rob, did violently take things by force; at what time alſo to take bribes was reckoned no ſhame, but to handle it diſcreetly, he was the better thought of, and beloued for it:)

Demoſthenes and Ciceroes cunning in their Orations in the common-wealth.

Authority ſheweth mans vertues and vices. Ciceroes abſtinence from money

he shewed plainly that he regarded not mony, and gaue forth many proofes of his courtesie and goodnesse. Furthermore, Cicero being created Consull by name, but Dictator in deed, hauing absolute power and authority ouer all things to suppresse the rebellion and conspiracie of Catiline, he proued Platoes prophecy true, which was: That cities are safe from danger, when the chiefe Magistrates and Gouernors (by some good diuine fortune) do gouerne with wisdome & iustice. Demosthenes was reproued for his corruption, and selling of his eloquence: because secretly he wrote one Oration for Phormio, & another in the selfe same matter for Apollodorus, they being both aduersaries. Further, he was defamed also for receiuing mony of ỹ king of PERSIA, and therewithall condemned for the mony which he had taken of Harpalus. And though some peraduenture would obiect, that the reports thereof (which are many) do lie: yet they cannot possibly denie this, that Demosthenes had no power to refraine frō looking on the presents which diuerse kings did offer him, praying him to accept them in good part for their sakes: neither was that the part of a man, that did take vsury by trafficke on the sea, the extremest yet of al other. In contrary maner (as we haue said before) it is certaine that Cicero being Treasurer, refused the gifts which the SICILIANS offered him there: and the presents also which the king of the CAPPADOCIANS offered him whilest he was Proconsull in CILICIA, and those especially which his friends pressed vpon him to take of them, being a great summe of mony, when he went as a banished man out of ROME. Furthermore, the banishment of the one was infamous to him, because by iudgement he was banished as a theefe. The banishment of the other was for as honourable an act as euer he did, being banished for ridding his countrey of wicked men. And therefore of Demosthenes, there was no speech after he was gone: but for Cicero, all the Senate changed their apparell into blacke, and determined that they would passe no decree by their authority, before Ciceroes banishment was reuoked by the people. Indeed Cicero idly passed his time of banishmēt, and did nothing all the while he was in MACEDON: and one of the chiefest acts that Demosthenes did, in all the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, was in his banishment. For he went into euery city, and did assist the Ambassador of the GRECIANS, and refused the Ambassadors of the MACEDONIANS. In the which he shewed himself a better citizen, then either Themistocles, or Alcibiades, in their like fortune and exile. So when he was called home, and returned, he fell againe to his old trade which he practised before, and was euer against Antipater, and the MACEDONIANS. Where Lælius in open Senate sharpely tooke vp Cicero, for that he sate still and said nothing, when that Octauius Cæsar the yong man made petition against the law, that he might sue for the Consulship, being so young, that he had neuer a haire on his face. And Brutus himselfe also doth greatly reproue Cicero in his letters, for that he had maintained and nourished a more grieuous and greater tyrannie, then that which they had put downe. And last of all, me thinketh the death of Cicero most pitifull, to see an old man caried vp and downe (with tender loue of his seruants) seeking all the waies that might be to flie death, which did not long preuent his naturall course: and in the end, old as he was, to see his head so pitifully cut off. Whereas Demosthenes, though he yeelded a little, intreating him that came to take him: yet for that he had prepared the poyson long before, that he had kept it long, and also vsed it as he did, he cannot but be maruellously commended for it. For sith the god Neptune denied him the benefit of his sanctuary, he betooke him to a greater, and that was death: whereby he saued himselfe out of the soldiers hands of the tyrant, and also scorned the bloudie cruelty of Antipater.

WHO first likened arts to our senses, seemeth to haue respected especially that one property of them both, in receiuing obiects of contrary quality: for, in the vse and end of their operation, there is great difference. The senses receiue indifferently, without discretion and iudgement, white and black, sweet and sowre, soft and hard: for their office is only to admit their seuerall obiects, and to carie and referre the iudgement thereof to the common sense. But arts being the perfection of reason, receiue and allow those things only which make for their operation, regarding and eschuing the contraries. The one chiefly, and for vse: the other by the way, and with intent to auoide them. So Phisick dealeth with diseases, Musick with discords, to the end to remoue them, and work their contraries. And the great Ladies of al other arts, temperance, iustice, and wisdom, do not only consider honesty, vprightnes, and profit: but examine withal, the nature & effects of leudnes, corruption and damage. And innocency, which vaunteth her want of experience in vndue practises, men call simplicity, and ignorance of things that be necessary and good to be knowne. And therfore the ancient LACEDÆMONIANS in their solemne feasts forced their ILOTES the bondmen, to ouercharge them selues with wine: and such they shewed them vnto their youth, by their apparent beastlinesse of drunken men, to worke in them an abhorring of so lothsome vice. Wherin although I cannot much praise them for humanity or wisdome, that corrupt and spoile one man, by example of him, to correct and reclaime another: yet (as I hope) it shall not be reprehended in me, if amongst the rest I put in one or two paire of such, as liuing in great place and account, haue increased their fame with infamy. Which in truth, I do not, to please and draw on the Reader with variety of report, but as Ismenias the THEBAN Musitian shewed his scholers, both those that strake a cleane stroke, with, Do so: & such as bungled it, with; Do not so; and Antigenidas thought men should like better, and with greater desire contend for skill, if they heard and discerned vntunable notes: so thinke I, we shall be the forwarder in reading and following the good, if we know the liues, and see the deformity of the wicked. This treaty cõtaineth the liues of Demetrius, surnamed the Fort-gainer, & M. Anthony the Triumuir, & great examples to confirme the saying of Plato: That from great minds both great vertues and great vices do proceed. They were both giuen ouer to women & wine, both valiant and liberall, both sumptuous and high minded: fortune serued them both alike, not onely in the course of their liues, in attempting great matters, somtimes with good, somtime with il successe, in getting and losing things of great consequence, ouerthrowing both when they feared not, restoring both when they hoped not: but also in their end there was no great difference, the one brought to his death by his mortall enemies, and the others fortune not ſo much vnlike. But now to our hiſtory. Antigonus had two ſonnes by his wife Stratonice, the daughter of Corræus, the one of them he named Demetrius, and the other Philip after his fathers name, Thus far the moſt writers do agree: howbeit ſome hold opinion, that Demetrius was not the ſonne of Antigonus, but his nephew. But becauſe his father died leauing him a child, and that his mother was ſtraight maried againe vnto Antigonus, thereupon came the report that he was Antigonus ſonne. Howners were ſuch, that they were both fearefull, and pleaſant vnto men that frequented him. For as he was moſt pleaſant in company hauing leiſure, & moſt giuen to banquetting, pleaſant life, and more wantonly giuen to follow luſt and pleaſure, then any king that euer was: ſo was he alwaies very carefull and diligent in diſpatching matters of importance. And therfore he maruellouſly commended, and alſo endeuoured to follow Dionyſius (as much to ſay, as Bacchus) aboue all the other gods, as he that had bene a wiſe and valiant Captaine in war, and that in peace inuented and vſed all the pleaſure that might be. He maruellouſly loued & reuerenced his father, and it ſeemeth that the dutifulneſſe he ſhewed vnto his mother, was more to diſcharge the due obedience and duty of a ſon, then otherwiſe to entertaine his father, for feare of his power, or hope to be his heire. And for proofe hereof we reade, that one day as he came home from hunting,

Demetrius loue to his father.

he went vnto his father Antigonus, giuing audience to certaine Ambaſſadors; and after he had done his duty to him, and kiſſed him, he ſate downe by him euen as he came from hunting, hauing his darts in his hand, which he caried out a hunting with him. Then Antigonus calling the Ambaſſadors aloud as they went their way, hauing receiued their anſwer: My Lords, ſaid he, you ſhall carie home this report of my ſonne and me, be witneſſes I pray you, how we liue one with another. As meaning to ſhew therby that the agreement betwixt the father and the ſonne together, is a great ſafety to the affaires of a king, as alſo a manifeſt proofe of his greatneſſe: ſo iealous propoſitions which they ſuppoſe, without proofe: euen ſo was this holden for a generall rule, to kill their brethren, for the ſafety of their eſtate. But further, to ſhew you more plainly that Demetrius was of a noble and courteous nature, and that he dearely loued his friends, we may alledge this example. Mithridates the ſonne of Ariobarzanes, was his familiar friend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonus court, and neuer practiſed any villany or treaſon to him, neither was he thought ſuch a man: yet Anti- gonus did ſomewhat ſuſpect him, becauſe of a dreame he had. He thought that being in a goodly great field, he ſowed of the ſcrapings of gold, and that of that ſeede, firſt of all came vp goodly wheate which had eares of gold: howbeit that ſhortly after returning that way againe, he found nothing but the ſtraw, and the eares of the wheate cut off; and that he being very angry and ſory for it, ſome told him, that Mithridates had cut off theſe golden eares, and had caried them with him into the Realme of PONT. Antigonus being maruellouſly troubled with this dreame, after he had made his ſonne ſweare vnto him that he would make no man aliue priuie to that he would tell him, he told him all his dreame what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this yong man Mithridates to death. Demetrius was maruellous ſorie for it, and therfore the next morning, this yong noble Prince going as he was wont, to paſſe the time away with Mithridates, he durſt not by word of mouth vtter that he knew, becauſe of his oath: howbeit, taking him aſide from his other familiars when they were both together by themſelues, he wrote on the ground with the end of his dart, Mithridates looking on him: Flie Mithridates.

Mithridates

Mithridates found ſtraight what he meant, and fled the very ſame night into CAPPADOCIA: and ſhortly after it was his deſtinie to fulfill Antigonus dreame. For he conquered many goodly countries, and it was he onely that eſtabliſhed the houſe of the kingdome of PONT, the which the ROMAINES afterwards ouerthrew, about the eight ſucceſſion. By theſe examples we may eaſily coniecture the good nature and curteſie of Demetrius. For like as the elements (according to Empedocles opinion) are euer at* ſtrife together, but ſpecially thoſe that are neareſt each to other: euen ſo, though all the ſucceſſors of Alexander were at continuall warres together, yet was it ſooneſt kindled, and moſt cruel betweene them which bordered neareſt vnto each other, & that by being neare neighbors had alwaies occaſion of brawle together, as fel out at that time betweene Antigonus and Ptolomie. This Antigonus lay moſt commonly in the countrie of PHRYGIA: who hauing intelligence that Ptolomie was gone into CYPRVS, and that he ouerranne all SYRIA, winning by force, or faire meanes, all the townes and cities ſubiect vnto him, he ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, being at that time but two and twenty yeares of age; and it was the firſt time that euer he took charge, as generall to his father, in matters of great importance. But he being a yong man, and that had no skill of warres, fighting a battel with an old ſouldier (trained vp in the diſcipline of warres vnder Alexander the great, & that through him, and in his name, had fought many great battels) was ſoone ouerthrowne, and his army put to flight, by the city of GAZA. At which ouerthrow were ſlaine fiue thouſand men, and almoſt eight thouſand taken: and beſides, Demetrius loſt his tents and pauilions, his gold and ſiluer, and to be ſhort, all his whole cariage. But Ptolomy ſent him all his things againe, and his friends alſo that were taken after the battell, with great courteous words: that he would not fight with them for all things together, but only for honor and Empire, Demetrius receiuing them at his hands, beſought the gods that he might not long liue a debter vnto Ptolomie for this great courteſie, but that he might quickly requite it with the like againe. Now Demetrius tooke not this ouerthrow like a yong man, though it was his firſt ſouldier-fare: but like an old & wiſe Captaine that had abidden many ouerthrowes, he vſed great diligence to gather men againe, to make new armors, & to keepe the cities and countries in his hands vnder obedience, and did traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers in armes, whom he had gathered together. Antigonus hauing newes of the ouerthrow of his ſon Demetrius, ſaid no more, but that Ptolomie had ouercome beardleſſe men: and that afterwards he ſhould fight with bearded men. But now, becauſe he would not diſcourage his ſonne altogether, who craued leaue once againe to fight a battell with Ptolomie, he granted him. So, ſhortly after came Cilles Ptolomies Generall, with a great puiſſant army, to driue him altogether out of SYRIA: for they made no great account of Demetrius, becauſe he had bene once ouerthrowne before. Howbeit Demetrius ſtole vpon him, gaue him charge on the ſodaine, and made him ſo afraid, that he tooke both the campe and the Generall, with ſeuen thouſand priſoners beſides, and wanne a maruellous treaſure of money: which made him a glad man, not ſo much for the gaine he ſhould haue by it, as for the oportunity he had thereby to come out of Ptolomies debt; nothing regarding the treaſure nor the honour he had gotten by this victory, but onely the benefit of his requitall of Ptolomies courteſie towards him. But yet he did nothing of his own head, before he had written to his father: and then receiuing full grant and commiſſion from him to diſpoſe of all things as he thought good, he ſent backe Cilles vnto Ptolomie, and all his other friends beſides, with great and rich gifts which he bountifully beſtowed on them. This misfortune and ouerthrow did vtterly put Ptolomie out of all SYRIA, and brought Antigonus alſo from the city of CELÆNES, for the exceeding ioy he had of this victory, as alſo for the great deſire he had to ſee his ſon. After that, he ſent Demetrius into ARABIA, againſt a people called ỹ NABATHÆNIANS, to cõquer thẽ: but there he was in great danger and diſtreſſe in the deſerts for lacke of water, howbeit he neuer ſhewed any ſigne that he was afraid. Therby he ſo aſtonied ỹ barbarous people, that he had leiſure inough to retire with ſafetie, & with a great booty of a thouſand camels, which he brought away with him. About that time Seleucus (whom Antigonus had driuen from BABYLON) returning thither againe, he came and conquered it without other aid then of himſelfe: & went with a great army againſt the people and nations confining vpon the INDIES, and the prouinces adioyning vnto mount Caucaſus, to conquer them. Thereupon Demetrius hoping to find MESOPOTAMIA, without any guard or defence, ſodainly paſſed ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and came vnlooked for vnto BABYLON, and there diſtreſſed the garriſon of Seleucus, that kept one of the caſtles or citadels of the city, being two of them: and then putting in ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers

to keepe them, he commanded the reſt of his men to get what they could, and to bring it away with them. After that he marched towards the ſea to returne home, leauing thereby the Realme and kingdome of Seleucus in better ſtate and ſafetie, then it was when he inuaded it. For it appeared that he had taken al the country from Seleucus, leauing him nothing in it, by ſpoiling and forraging all that was there. At this returne home, newes was brought him that Ptolomie lay at the ſiege of the citie of HALICARNASSVS: wherupon he drew thither with ſpeed to make him raiſe the ſiege, & therby ſaued the city from him. Now becauſe by this exploit they wan great fame, both of them (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a maruellous deſire to ſet all GREECE at liberty, the which Ptolomie and Caſſander kept in ſeruitude and bondage. Neuer King tooke in hand a more honourable nor iuſter warre and enterpriſe, then that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in oppreſſing of the barbarous people, he beſtowed it all in reſtoring the GRECIANS to their liberty; and onely to winne fame and honor by it. So, they being in conſultation what way to take, to bring their purpoſe and deſire to paſſe, and hauing taken order to begin firſt at ATHENS, one of Antigonus chiefeſt friends about him, told him, that he ſhould take the city, and place a good garriſon there for themſelues, if they could once win it: for (ſaid he) it will be a good bridge to paſſe further into all GREECE. Antigonus would not hearken to that, but ſaid, that the loue and good will of men was a ſurer bridge, and that the city of ATHENS was as a beacon to all the land, the which would immediatly make his doings ſhine through the world, as a creſſet light, vpon the top of a keepe or watch tower. Thus Demetrius hoiſed ſaile, hauing fiue thouſand ſiluer talents, and a fleete of two hundred and fiftie ſaile, and ſailed towards the city of ATHENS: in the which Demetrius PHALERIAN was Gouernour in the behalfe of Caſſander, and kept a ſtrong garriſon there within the hauen & caſtle of MVNICHIA. He had an excellent good wind to further his iourney, ſo that with this good foreſight and ſpeed he made, he arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, the fiue & twentieth day of the moneth Thargelion (now called May) before any man knew of his coming. Now when this fleete was within a kenning of the city, and leſſe, that they might eaſily ſee them from thence, euery man prepared himſelfe to receiue them, taking them to be Ptolomies ſhips. But in fine, the Captaines and Gouernours vnderſtanding too late who they were, did what they could to helpe themſelues: but they were all in hurly burly, as men compelled to fight out of order, to keepe their enemies from landing, and to repulſe them, coming ſo ſodainly vpon them. Demetrius hauing found the barre of the hauen open, launched in preſently. Then being come to the view of them all, and ſtanding vpon the hatches of his galley, he made ſignes with his hand that he prayed ſilence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimed aloud by one of his Heraulds, that his father had ſent him in a happy houre to deliuer the ATHENIANS from all their garriſons, and to reſtore them againe to their ancient liberty and freedome, to enioy their lawes and ancient gouernment of their forefathers. After the proclamation made, all the common people ſtraight threw downe their weapons and targets at their feete, to clap their hands with great ſhouts of ioy: praying him to land, and calling him aloud, their Sauiour, and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the ſtronger in, although he performed not that he promiſed, and alſo ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him to treate of peace. Demetrius receiued them very courteouſly, and ſent with them for pledge, one of the deareſt friends his father had, Ariſtodemus MILESIAN. Furthermore, he was not careleſſe of the health and ſafety of Demetrius PHALERIAN, who by reaſon of the change and alteration of the gouernment of the common-wealth of ATHENS, ſtood more in feare of the people of ATHENS, then of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, cauſed him to be conueyed (according to his deſire) vnto THEBES, with good and ſufficient ſafe conduct. And for Demetrius himſelfe, although he was very deſirous to ſee the city, he ſaid he would not come into it, before he had firſt reſtored it vnto her ancient liberty and freedome, and alſo driuen away the garriſon thence: and thereupon he caſt trenches round about ỹ caſtle of MVNYCHIA. In the meane ſeaſon becauſe he would not be idle, he hoiſed ſaile, and coaſted towards the city of MEGARA, within the which Caſſander alſo kept a ſtrong garriſon. Demetrius buſily following theſe matters, was aduertiſed that Crateſipolis, ſurnamed Polyporchon, (who had bene Alexanders wife) a Ladie of paſſing fame and beautie, and lay at that time in the city of PATRAS, would be glad to ſee him, he leauing his army within the territorie of ỹ MEGARIANS, took his iourny preſently vnto her, with a few of his lighteſt armed men; and yet he ſtole frō them, and made his tent to be ſet vp a good way frō them, becauſe this

Ladie might not be ſeene when ſhe came vnto him. Some of his enemies hauing preſent intelligence thereof, came and ſet vpon him before he knew it. Demetrius was ſo ſcared, that he had no further leyſure, but to caſt an ill-fauoured cloke about him, the firſt that came to hand, and diſguiſing himſelf to flie for life, and ſcaped very hardly, that he was not ſhamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie. But though they miſſed him, they tooke his tent and all his mony in it. After that, the city of MEGARA was taken and won from Caſſanders men, where Demetrius ſouldiers would haue ſacked all: howbeit the ATHENIANS made humble interceſſion for them, that they might not be ſpoiled. Demetrius thereupon, after that he had driuen out Caſſanders garriſon, he reſtored it againe to her former liberty. In doing that, he called to mind the Philoſopher Stilpo, a famous man in MEGARA, though he liued a quiet and contemplatiue life. He ſent for him, and asked him if any of his men had taken any thing of his. Stilpo anſwered him, they had not: for (quoth he) I ſaw no man that tooke my learning from me. This notwithſtanding, all the ſlaues of the city were in manner caried away. Another time, Demetrius making much of him, as he was going his way, ſaid vnto him. Well, Stilpo, I leaue you your city free. It is true, ô King (quoth he) for thou haſt left vs neuer a ſlaue. Shortly after, he returned againe vnto ATHENS, and laid ſiege to the caſtell of Munychia, the which he took, and draue out the garriſon, and afterwards razed it to the ground. After that, through the intreatie and earneſt deſire of the ATHENIANS, who prayed him to come and refreſh himſelfe in their city, he made his entrie into it, and cauſed all the people to aſſemble, & then reſtored vnto them their ancient lawes and liberty of their countrey; promiſing them beſides, that he would procure his father to ſend them an hundred and fiftie thouſand buſhels of wheat, and as much wood and timber as ſhould ſerue to make them an hundred and fiftie galleys. Thus the ATHENIANS, through Demetrius meanes, recouered the Democratia againe, (to wit, their popular gouernment) fiftéene yeares after they had loſt it; and liued all the time betweene their loſſe and reſtitution from the warre called Lamiacus warre, and the battell that was fought by the city of CRANON, in the ſtate of Oligarchia, to wit, vnder the gouernment of a few gouernours in ſight, but in truth a Monarchie or kingdome, becauſe they were vnder the gouernment of one man Demetrius PHALERIAN that had abſolute authority ouer them. But by this meanes they made their ſauiour & preſeruer of their country, Demetrius (who ſeemed to haue obtained ſuch honour and glory through his goodnes & liberaltiy) hatefull and odious to al men, for the ouergreat and vnmeaſurable honors which they gaue him. For firſt of all, they called Antigonus & Demetrius kings, who before that time had alwaies refuſed the name, and the which (among all other princely honors & prerogatiues granted) they that had deuided betweene them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durſt neuer once preſume to chalenge nor to take vpon them. So vnto them onely they gaue the ſtile and names of the gods ſauiours, and took away their yearely Maior, whom they called Eponymos, becauſe they did ſhew the yeares of old time by the names of them that had bene Maiors. Furthermore, in ſtead thereof they ordained in the councel of the city, that there ſhould yearely be choſen one by voices of the people, whom they ſhould name ỳ Prieſt of their ſauiors, whoſe name they ſhould write and ſubſcribe in al publike grants and couenants, to ſhew the yeare: and beſides all this, that they ſhould cauſe their pictures to be drawne in the veile or holy banner, in the which were ſet out the images of their gods, the patrons & protectors of their city. And furthermore they did conſecrate the place where Demetrius firſt came out of his coach, & there did ſet vp an altar, & called it Demetrius altar coming out of his coach: and vnto their tribes they added two other, ỳ ANTIGONIDES & the DEMETRIADES. Their great councell at large, which they created yearely of 500 men, was then firſt of al brought vnto 600, becauſe euery tribe muſt needs furniſh of themſelues fiftie Counſellers. But yet the ſtrangeſt act, and moſt new-found inuention of flattery, was that of Stratocles, (being the common flatterer and people-pleaſer) who put foorth this decree, by the which it was ordained: That thoſe whom the Common-wealth ſhould ſend vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, ſhould in ſtead of ambaſſadors be called Theori, as much to ſay, as, Miniſters of ỳ ſacrifices. For ſo were they called, whom they ſent to DELPHES to Apollo Pythias, or vnto ELIDE to Iupiter Olympias, at the common and ſolemne feaſts of all GREECE, to do the ordinary ſacrifices and oblations for the health and preſeruation of the cities. This Stratocles in all things elſe was a deſperate man, and one that had alwaies led a wicked and diſſolute life: and for his ſhameleſſe boldneſſe, he ſeemed wholly to defend the ſteps of Cleons foole-hardines and old inſolencie, which (when he liued) he ſhewed vnto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his houſe, called Phylacion. One day ſhe hauing bought for his ſupper, beaſts heads and neckes commonly eaten, he ſaid vnto her: Why, how now? thou haſt bought me acates which we toſſe like bals, that haue to do in the commonwealth. Another time when the armie of the ATHENIANS was ouerthrowne by ſea, by the Ile of AMORGOS, he would needs preuent the newes of this ouerthrow, and came through the ſtreet of Ceranicus crowned with garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENIANS had won the battell: and was alſo the author of a decree whereby they did ſacrifice vnto the gods, to giue them thankes for the victory; and meate was giuen amongſt euery tribe, in token of common ioy. But ſhortly after the meſſengers arriued, which brought report of the ſhipwracke and ouerthrow. The people were in an vprore withall, and ſent for Stratocles in a maruellous rage. But he with a face of braſſe came vnto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them: Well, and what hurt haue I done you, if I haue made you merrie theſe two daies? Such was Stratocles impudencie and raſhneſſe. But, as the Poet Ariſtophanes ſaith:

Stratocles cruell ſaying.

But hoter matters were that time in hand,
Then fire that waſteth both by ſea and land.

For there was another that paſſed Stratocles in knauerie, who procured a decree, that as often as Demetrius came into the city of ATHENS, he ſhould be receiued with all ceremonies and like ſolemnitie, as they vſe in the feaſts of Ceres and Bacchus: and further, that they ſhould giue vnto him that did excell all the reſt in ſumptuouſneſſe and riches at ſuch time as Demetrius made his entry into the city, ſo much mony out of the common treaſure as ſhould ſerue to make an image or other offering, which ſhould be conſecrated to the temples in memorie of his liberalitie. And laſt of all, they changed the name of the moneth Munichion, (to wit, the moneth of Ianuarie) and called it Demetrion: and the laſt day of the moneth, which they called before The new and old Moone, they then called it the Demetriade: and the feaſts of Bacchus alſo, called then Dionyſia, they preſently named Demetria. But the gods by diuers ſignes and tokens ſhewed plainly, that they were offended with theſe changes and alterations. For the holy banner, in the which (according to the order ſet downe) they had painted the images of Antigonus and Demetrius, with the pictures of Iupiter and Minerua, as they caried it a proceſſion through the ſtreet Ceranicus, it was torne aſunder in the middeſt by a tempeſt of wind. And furthermore, about ŷ altars which were ſet vp in the honor of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deale of Hemlocke, the which otherwiſe was vnpoſſible to grow there. On the feaſt day alſo of Bacchus, they were compelled to leaue the pompe or proceſſion for that day, it was ſuch an extreme hard froſt out of all ſeaſon: and beſides, there fell ſuch a mil-dew and great froſt vpon it, that not only their vines and oliues were killed with it, but alſo the moſt part of the wheate blades which were newly ſprung vp. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemie of the foreſaid Stratocles) in one of his Comedies writeth certaine verſes againſt him to this effect:

The moneth of Munychion altered, & called Demetrion for the honour of Demetrius name.

Wonders.

Hemlocke, the ſmall herbe, with the iuice whereof they poyſoned offenders at Athens.

Philippides the Poet.

The partie for whoſe wickedneſſe the veile was rent in twaine,
Which with the honor due to God did worſhip men moſt vaine,
Is he for whom our budding vines were blaſted with the froſt,
Thoſe things and not our Comedies haue vs ſo dearely coſt.

This Philippides was very well beloued of king Lyſimachus, inſomuch that for his ſake the king had done many pleaſures to the Commonwealth of ATHENS. For he loued him ſo dearely, that as often as he ſaw him, or met with him at the beginning of any warre, or matter of great importance, he was of opinion that he brought him good lucke. For indeed he did not ſo much eſteeme him for the excellencie of his art, but he was much more to be beloued and eſteemed for his vertuous and honeſt conditions. He was no troubleſome man, neither was he infected with the fineneſſe of courts, as he ſhewed one day when the king made much of him, and giuing him good countenance, ſaid vnto him: What wilt thou haue me giue thee of my things Philippides? Euen what it ſhall pleaſe thee, ô king, ſo it be none of thy ſecrets. Thus much we thought good to ſpeake of him in by-talke, becauſe an honeſt player of Comedies ſhould match with a ſhameleſſe and impudent Oratour of the people. But yet there was another Democlides, of the village of SPHETTVS, that dreamed out a more ſtrange kind of honour, touching the conſecration of their targets, which they dedicated to the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, that is to ſay, that they ſhould go and aske the oracle of Demetrius. But I will ſhew you the very effect and forme of the law, as it was ſet downe. In good houre, the people ordaine that he ſhould be choſen one of the Citizens

Philippides notable anſwer vnto king Lyſimachus, not deſiring to heare his ſecrets.

Citizens of ATHENS, which shall go vnto our sauiour: and after that he hath done due sacrifice vnto him, he shall aske Demetrius our sauiour, after what sort the people shall with greatest holinesse and deuotion, without delay, make consecration of their holiest gifts and offerings: and according to the Oracle it shall please him to giue them, the people shall duly execute it. Thus laying vpon Demetrius all these foolish mockeries, who besides was no great wise man, they made him a very foole. Demetrius being at that time at leysure in ATHENS, he maried a widow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and ancient house of Miltiades, and had bene maried before vnto one Opheltas Prince of the CYRENIANS, and after his death returned againe to ATHENS. The ATHENIANS were very glad of this mariage, and thought it the greatest honour that came to their city, supposing he had done it for their sakes. Howbeit he was soone won to be maried, for he had many wiues, but amongst them all he loued Phila best, and gaue her most honor and preheminence aboue them all, partly for the respect of her father Antipater; and partly also for that she had bene first maried vnto Craterus, whom the MACEDONIANS loued best when he liued, and most lamented after his death aboue all the other successors of Alexander. His father, I suppose, made him to marrie her by force, although indeed her yeares was not meete for him: for he was maruellous young, and she very old. And when Demetrius seemed not to be contented withall, his father rounded him softly in the eare with this saying:

Demetrius maried vnto Eurydice at Athens.

Demetrius had many wiues together. Phila Demetrius wife, Antipaters daughter, and Craterus widow.

Refuse no woman nere so old,
Whose mariage bringeth store of gold.

Wherein he cunningly alluded to these verses of Eurypides:

Refuse not to become a thrall,
Where lucre may ensue withall.

The iudgement of mariage, and obedience.

But so much did Demetrius honour his wife Phila, and all his other wiues he maried, that he was not ashamed to keepe a number of Curtizans, and other mens wiues besides: so that he only of all other Kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of lecherie. While these things passed on in this sort, he was commanded by his father to fight with Ptolomie for the Realme of CYPRVS. So there was no remedy but he must needs obey him, although otherwise he was very sory to leaue the warre he had begun, to set the GRECIANS at liberty, the which had bene far more honorable and famous. Howbeit, before he departed from ATHENS, he sent vnto Cleonides Ptolomies Generall, that kept the cities of CORINTH and SICYONE, to offer him money if he would set their cities at liberty. But Cleonides would not be dealt withall that way. Thereupon Demetrius straightway tooke sea, and sayled with all his army towards CYPRVS, where at his first comming he ouercame Menelaus Ptolomies brother. But shortly after, Ptolomie went thither in person with a great army both by sea and land, and there passed betwixt them fierce threatnings and proud words to each other. For Ptolomie sent to Demetrius to bid him depart if he were wise, before all his armie came together: which would tread him vnder their feet, and march vpō his belly if he taried their comming. Demetrius on the other side sent him word, that he would do him this fauor to let him escape, if he would sweare and promise vnto him to withdraw his garrisons which he had in the cities of CORINTH and SYCIONE. So the expectation of this battel made these two Princes not only very pensiue to fight one with the other, but also al the other Lords, Princes, & kings: becausse the successe thereof was vncertain, which of them two should preuaile. But euery man iudged this, that which of them obtained the victory, he should not only be Lord of the realme of CYPRVS & SYRIA, but therewith also of greater power then all the rest. Ptolomy in person with fiftie saile began to row against his enemy Demetrius, & commanded his brother Menelaus, that when he saw them fast grapled in fight together, he should launch out of the hauen of SALAMINA, and giue charge vpon the rereward of Demetrius ships, to breake their order, with the threescore galleys he had in charge. Demetrius on the other side prepared ten galleys against these threescore, thinking thē enow to choke vp the hauens mouth being but narrow, so that none of the galleys that were within could come out: and furthermore, he dispersed his army by land vpon the foreland points which reach vnto the sea, and went himselfe into the maine sea with nine score galleys, and gaue such a fierce charge vpon Ptolomie, that he valiantly made him flie. Who when he saw his army broken, fled as speedily as he could with eight galleys onely: for all the rest were either broken or sunke in fight, and those eight only escaped, besides threescore and ten which were taken, and all their souldiers in them. And as for his cariage, his traine, his friends, his officers and houshold seruants, his wiues, his gold and siluer, his armour, engines of battery, and all such other warlike furniture & munition as was conueyed aboord hs caricts & great ships riding at anker: of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his campe. Among those spoiles also was taken that famous curtizan Lamia, who at the first had her name only for her passing playing vpon the flute: but after she fell to curtizan trade, her countenance and credit increased the more. So that euen then when her beauty through years fell to decay, and that she found Demetrius much younger then her selfe, yet she so wan him with her sweet conuersation and good grace, that he onely liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victory by sea, Menelaus made no more resistance, but yeelded vp SALAMINA and his ships vnto Demetrius. and put into his hands also twelue hundred horsemen, and 12 thousand footmen well armed. This so famous & triumphant victory was yet much more beautified by Demetrius great bounty and goodnes, which he shewed in giuing his enemies slaine in battell honorable funerals, setting the prisoners at libertie without ransome paying, & giuing moreouer twelue hundred complete armors vnto the ATHENIANS. After this Demetrius sent Aristodemus MILESIAN vnto his father Antigonus, to tell him by word of mouth the newes of this victory. Aristodemus was the greatest flatterer in al Antigonus court, who deuised then (as it seemeth to me) to adde vnto this exploit the greatest flattery possible. For when he had taken land after he was come out of ỹ Ile of CYPRVS, he would in no wise haue the ship he came in, to come neare the shore, but commanded them to ride at anker, and no man so hardy to leaue the ship: but he himself got into a litle boat, and went vnto Antigonus, who all this while was in a maruellous feare and perplexity for the successe of this battel, as men may easily iudge they are which hope after so great vncertainties. Now when word was brought him that Aristodemus was coming to him all alone, then was he worse troubled then afore, insomuch that he could scant keepe within doores himselfe, but sent his seruants and friends one after another to meet Aristodemus, to aske him what newes, and to bring him word presently againe how the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on still faire and softly with a sad countenance, and very demurely, speaking neuer a word. Wherefore Antigonus heart being cold in his belly, he could stay no longer, but would himself go and meet with Aristodemus at the gate, who had a maruellous preasse of people following of him, besides those of the court which ranne out to heare his answer. At length when he came neare vnto Antigonus, holding out his right hand vnto him, he cried out aloud: God saue thee, ô King Antigonus: we haue ouercome king Ptolomy in battel by sea, and haue won the realme of CYPRVS, with sixteene thousand and eight hundred prisoners. Then answered Antigonus: And God saue thee too. Truly Aristodemus thou hast kept vs in a trance a good while, but to punish thee for the paine thou hast put vs to, thou shalt the later receiue the reward of thy good newes. Then was the first time that the people with a loud voice called Antigonus and Demetrius kings. Now for Antigonus, his friends and familiars did at that instant put on the royall band or Diademe vpon his head: but for Demetrius, his father sent it vnto him, and by his letters called him King. They also that were in ÆGYPT with Ptolomy, vnderstanding that, did call and salute him by the name of King: because it shold not seeme that for one ouerthrow receiued, their harts were dead. Thus this ambition by iealousie & emulation went from man to man to all Alexanders successors. For Lysimachus then also began to weare the Diademe, and likewise Seleucus, as often as he spake with the GRECIANS: for before that time, he dealt in matters with ỹ barbarous people as a king. But Cassander, though others wrote themselues kings, he only subscribed after his wonted maner. Now this was not only an increase of a new name, or changing of apparell, but it was such an honor, as it lift vp their hearts, and made them stand vpon themselues: and besides, it so framed their maner of life and conuersation with men, that they grew more proud and stately then euer they were before: like vnto common players of Tragedies, who apparelling themselues to play their parts vpon the stage, do change their gate, their countenance, their voice, their manner of sitting at the table, and their talke also. So that afterwards they grew more cruell in commanding their subiects, when they had once taken away the vizer and dissimulation of their absolute power, which before made them farre more lowly and gentle in many matters vnto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought such a wonderfull change in the world. Antigonus therefore puffed vp with the glory of the victory of his sonne Demetrius, for the conquest of CYPRVS, he determined forthwith to set vpon Ptolomy. Himselfe led the army by land, hauing his sonne Demetrius still rowing by the shore side with a great fleete of ships. But one of his

his familiars called Medius, being asleepe, had a vision one night that told him, what should be the end and successe of this iourney. He thought he saw Antigonus runne with all his armie, who should haue the vpper hand; and that at the first he ranne with great force and swiftnesse, but that afterwards his strength and breath failed him so much, that when he should returne, he had scant any pulse or breath, and with much ado retired againe. And euen so it chanced vnto him. For Antigonus by land was eftsoones in great danger: and Demetrius also by sea was often in hazard to leaue the coast, and by storme and weather to be cast into places where was neither hauen, creekes, nor harborough for shippes. And at length hauing lost a great number of his shippes, he was driuen to returne without any attempt giuen. Now Antigonus was at that time litle lesse then foure score yeares old, but yet his fat and corpulent body was more combersome to him then his yeares: therefore being growne vnmeet for wars, he vsed his sonne in his place. Who for that he was fortunate, as also skilfull through the experience he had gotten, did wisely gouerne the weightiest matters. His father besides did not passe for his youthfull parts, lauish expences and common drunkennesse he gaue himselfe vnto. For in time of peace, he was giuen ouer to all these vices: but in time of warre, he was as sober and continent as any man so borne by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifestly knowne to be mistresse ouer him, one day when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kisse his father: and that Antigonus smiling vpon him, said: What, how now sonne, doest thou thinke thou art kissing of Lamia? Another time Demetrius was many dayes together drinking and ryoting, and saw not his father: and then to excuse himselfe vnto him, he told him he had gotten a rheume that made him keepe his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard, said Antigonus: but was it of THASOS or CHIOS that rheume? He spake it, because that in either of those two Ilands, there were excellent good wines. Another time Demetrius sent his father word, that he was not well: thereupon Antigonus went to see him, and comming thither, he met a faire young boy at his doore. So he went vp to his chamber, and sitting downe by his beds side, he tooke him by the hand to feele his pulse. Demetrius told him that his feauer had left him but a litle before. I know it well, (said Antigonus) for I met the young boy euen at the doore as I come in. So Antigonus did gently beare with his sonnes faults, in respect of the many other vertues he had. The voice goeth, that the SCYTHIANS, when they are disposed to drinke drunke together, do diuers times twang the strings of their bowes, as though that would serue to keepe the strength of their courage and hardinesse, which otherwise the pleasantnesse of the wine wold take frō them. But Demetrius gaue himselfe to one thing onely at one selfe time: sometime to take his pleasure, sometime to deale in matters of weight; & in all extremity he euer vsed but one of them, & wold neuer mingle the one with the other: and yet this notwithstanding, he was no lesse politicke and circumspect to prepare all maner of munition for wars. For as he was a wise Captain to leade an armie, so was he also very carefull to prouide all things meet for their furniture, & would rather haue too much then too litle. But aboue all, he exceeded in sumptuous building of ships, and framing of all sorts of engines of battery, and specially for the delight he tooke to inuent and deuise them. For he had an excellent naturall wit to deuise such works as are made by wit & hand, and did not bestow his wit and inuention in handi-crafts, in trifling toyes and bables: as many other kings that haue giuen themselues to play on flutes, others to paint and draw, and others also to Turners craft. As Æropus king of MACEDON, who delighted to make fine tables & prety lamps. And Attalus, sirnamed Philometor (to say, louer of his mother) that would plant and set Physicall herbes, as Helleborum, Lingwort, or Beares foote, Hoscynamum, Henbane, Cicuta, Hemlocke, Aconitum, Libardbaine or Wolfebaine, and Dorycnium: for the which we haue no English word: all these would he set himself with his owne hands in the gardens of his owne pallace, and also gather them in time of the yeare, to know the vertue and power of them. Or as Arsaces the kings of PARTHIA, that boasted they could themselues make their arrowes heads, and sharpen them. But the Artificers workes which Demetrius practised, shewed that they came from a King. For his manner of workmanship had a certaine greatnesse in it, the which euen with the subtiltie and fineneſse of his workes, shewed the trimme handling of the workman: so that they appeared not only worthy the vnderstanding and riches of a King, but also the forging and making by the hands of a great King. For his friends did not onely wonder at their greatnesse, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beautie of them. And this is more true then meete to be spoken: the enemies could not but maruell when they saw his galleys rowing along the coaſt, with fifteene or ſixteene banks of oares: and his engines of batterie which they called Elepolis, (as much to ſay, engines to take cities) were a ſpectacle of great admiration vnto thoſe whom he beſieged, as the euents following did throughly witneſſe. For Lyſimachus, who of all other kings did malice Demetrius moſt, coming to raiſe the ſiege from the citie of Solli in Cilicia, the which Demetrius beſieged, he ſent vnto him to pray him to let him ſee his engines of batterie, and his galleys rowing vpon the ſea. Demetrius granting him, Lyſimachus returning with wonderful admiration. The Rhodians alſo hauing long time defended his ſiege, at the laſt made peace with him, and prayed him to leaue ſome one of his engines with them, for a perpetuall teſtimony & remembrance both of his power, and alſo of their courage and valiantneſſe. The cauſe why Demetrius made warre with the Rhodians, was, becauſe they were confederates with king Ptolomie: he brought againſt their wals the greateſt engine he had, the foore whereof was like a tile, more long then broad, and at the baſe on either ſide it was eight and fortie cubits long, and threeſcore and ſixe high, riſing ſtil narrow euen to the very top: ſo that the vpper parts were narrower then the nether, and within it were many prety rooms and places conueyed for ſouldiers. The forepart of it was open towards the enemy, & euery roome or partition had windowes, out of which they beſtowed all kind of ſhot, becauſe they were full of armed men fighting with all ſorts of weapons. But now, becauſe it was ſo well framed and counterpoiſed, that it gaue no way, nor reeled on either ſide, which way ſoeuer they remoued it, but that it ſtood faſt and vpright vpon her foundation, making a terrible noiſe and ſound, that made the worke as wonderful to behold, as it was a maruellous pleaſure for men to ſee it. In this war were brought vnto Demetrius two notable armors weighing fortie pounds a peece, & made by one Zoilus an armorer, who to ſhew the hardnes and goodnes of the temper, ſuffered thē to be proued and ſhot at, at ſixeſcore paces, with the engines of their batterie: and albeit the armors were ſhot at and hit, yet were they neuer pierced, and but only a litle race or ſcratch ſeene, as it were of a bodkin or penknife, and had no more hurt. Demetrius alwayes wore one of them in theſe warres, and Alcimus Albanian the other, the ſtrongeſt & valianteſt man he had in all his hoaſt, and that only caried a complete armour weighing ſixſcore pounds, where all other ſouldiers wore none aboue threeſcore. This Alcimus was ſlaine at Rhodes, valiantly fighting by the Theater. In this ſiege the Rhodians did valiātly defend themſelues, that Demetrius could do no act worthy memory. This notwithſtanding, although he ſaw he could not preuaile, but loſe his time, yet was he the more obſtinatly bent againſt them, to be euen with them, becauſe they had taken a ſhip of his, in the which his wife Phila had ſent vnto him certain hangings of tapeſtry, linnen, apparel, and letters, and becauſe they had ſent them all vnto Ptolomie as ſoone as they had taken thē. But therein they did not follow the honeſt curteſie of the Athenians, who hauing intercepted certain currers of king Philips that made war againſt them, they opened all the letters they caried, & read them, ſauing only his wife Olympiaes letters ſhe ſent him, the which they ſent vnto king Philip ſealed, as they were when they receiued them. Now though this part did much grieue and offend him, yet he could not find in his hart to ſerue them in that ſort, when he might haue done it not long after. For by chance at that time Protogenes an excellent Painter, borne in Cavnvs, did paint thē the draught of the city of Ialysvs. Demetrius found this table in a houſe in the ſuburbes of the city, being almoſt ended. The Rhodians therupō ſending an herald vnto him, to beſeech him to ſpare the defacing of ſo goodly a work, he returned them anſwer, that he would rather ſuffer his fathers images to be burnt, thē ſo excellent & paſſing a work as that to be loſt, & brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protogenes was 7. yeares drawing of the ſame: and it is ſaid alſo that Apelles himſelfe when he ſaw it, did ſo wonder at it, that his ſpeech failed him, and he ſtood mute a long time, and at laſt ſaid: Surely this is a wonderfull peece of worke, and of great labour, yet doth it want thoſe graces and ornaments whereby thoſe that I paint do reach vnto heauen. This table afterwards being brought to Rome, and hanged vp with others, was in the end burnt by fire. Now as the Rhodians were deſirous to be rid of this warre, and that Demetrius alſo was willing to take an honeſt occaſion to do it, the Ambaſſadours of the Athenians came happily to ſerue both their deſires, who made peace betweene them with theſe conditions: that the Rhodians ſhould be confederates with Antigonus and Demetrius againſt all men, but Ptolomy only. The Athenians ſent for Demetrius, vpon Caſſanders comming to lay ſiege to their city: whereupon Demetrius immediatly hoiſed ſayle towards Athens, with three hundred and thirty galleys, and a great number of men of warre beſides: ſo

ſo that he did not only driue Caſſander out of the prouince of ATTICA, but folowed him euen to the ſtraight of THERMOPYLES, and there ouerthrew him in ſet battell, and receiued the city of HERACLEA, which willingly yeelded vnto him, and 6000 MACEDONIANS that came vnto him to take his part. So in his returne back, he ſet all the GRECIANS at liberty on this ſide ỹ ſtraight: he made league with the BOEOTIANS, & tooke the city of CENCREES, & the caſtles of PHYLE & PANACTOS, in the frontiers & confines of ATTICA, in the which Caſſander had left garriſons to keepe the country in ſubiection: and after he had driuen them out of the country, he rendred the forts again vnto ỹ ATHENIANS. Therfore though it ſeemed ỹ ATHENIANS had before beſtowed to their vttermoſt power al kinds of honors that could be offered him, euery mã ſtriuing for life to preferre the ſame, yet they found out new deuices to flatter & pleaſe him. For they ordained that the place behind the temple of Minerua called Parthenon (as who would ſay, the tẽple of the virgin) ſhould be prepared for his houſe to lye in: and they ſaid, that the goddeſſe Minerua did lodge him with her. But to ſay truly, he was too vnchaſt a gueſt, to think that a maiden goddeſſe would be content he ſhould lye with her. And yet his father Antigonus perceiuing that they had lodged his ſonne Philip on a time in a houſe, where there were three young women, he ſaid nothing to Philip himſelfe, but before him he ſent for the harbinger, and ſaid vnto him: wilt thou not remoue my ſonne out of this ſtraight lodging, and prouide him of a better? And Demetrius, that ſhould haue reuerenced the goddeſſe Minerua, though for no other reſpect but becauſe he called her his eldeſt ſiſter (for ſo he would ſhe ſhould be called) he defiled all the caſtell where was the temple of theſe holy virgins, with horrible and abhominable inſolencies, both towards yong boyes of honeſt houſes, as alſo vnto yong women of the city. So that this place ſeemed to be moſt pure and holy, at ſuch times as he lay with his common curtiſans, Chryſis, Lamia, Demo, and Anticyra. It ſhall not be greatly for the honor of the city of ATHENS, to tell particularly all the abhominable parts he committed there. But Democles vertue and honeſty deſerueth worthy and condigne remembrance. This Democles was a young boy that had no haire on his face, of whoſe beauty Demetrius being informed by the ſirname he had, as cõmonly called through the city, Democles the faire, he ſought diuerſe waies to intice him, both by faire meanes, large promiſes and gifts, and alſo with threats beſides. But when he ſaw no man could bring him to the bent of his bow, and that the yong boy in the end ſeeing him ſo importunate vpon him, came no more to the common places of exerciſe, where other children vſed to recreate themſelues, and that to auoid the common ſtoues, he went to waſh himſelfe in another ſecret ſtoue: Demetrius watching his time and howre of going thither, followed him, and got into him being alone. The boy ſeeing himſelfe alone, and that he could not reſiſt Demetrius, tooke off the couer of the kettle or cauldron where the water was boiling & leaping into it drowned himſelfe. Truly he was vnworthy of ſo lamentable an end, but yet ſhewed a noble heart, worthy of his beauty and country. But he did not as another called Cleænetus, the ſonne of Cleomedon, who brought letters from Demetrius directed to the people, whereby through Demetrius interceſſion and requeſt, his fathers fine of fifty talents in the which he was condemned (and for nonpayment remained priſoner) was clearly remitted and forgiuen. But by this act, he not onely ſhamed and diſhonoured himſelfe, but alſo troubled all the city. For the people thereupon releaſed Cleomedon of his fine, but therwith they made a decree that no citizen ſhould thenceforth bring any more letters from Demetrius. But afterwards vnderſtanding that Demetrius was maruellouſly offended with this decree, they did not only reuoke their firſt decree, but they did alſo put ſome of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others alſo they baniſhed. And further they made a law, that the people of ATHENS ſhould account all religious to the gods, & iuſt vnto men, whatſoeuer it pleaſed Demetrius to order and appoint. At that time there was one of the chiefeſt men of the city, that ſaid Stratocles was a madde man to preferre ſuch matters. Indeed quoth Demochares ſirnamed LACONIAN, he were a mad man if he were otherwiſe: and he ſpake it, becauſe this Stratocles had many great pleaſures at Demetrius hands for this flattery. Howbeit, Demochares being accuſed and condemned vpon theſe words, he was baniſhed ATHENS. See the ATHENIANS how they vſed themſelues, who ſeemed to be deliuered from the garriſon they had before, and to be reſtored vnto their former liberty and freedome. From thence Demetrius went into PELOPONNESVS, and neuer an enemy of his durſt tary his coming, but all fled before him, and left him their caſtles and townes. Thus Demetrius wan vnto himſelfe all the country called ACTE, and all ARCHADIA, ſauing the city of MANTINEA: and for the ſumme

of an hundred talents giuen amongſt them, he deliuered the cities of ARGOS, SICYONE, and of CORINTH, from the garriſons that lay amongſt them. About that time fell out the great feaſt of Iuno in ARGOS, called Heræa. Therefore Demetrius, to honour this feaſt with the GRECIANS, maried Deidamia (the daughter of Eacides, king of the MOLOSSIANS, and ſiſter of Pyrrhus) and perſwaded the SICYONIANS, to leaue their city, and to come and build in another goodly place neare vnto it, where they now do dwell: and ſo with the place and ſituation, he changed alſo the name of the city. For in ſtead of SICYONE, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a generall aſſembly of the ſtates of GRECE, which was kept in the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, called ISTHMOS, Demetrius was choſen Lieutenant generall of all the GRECIANS, as Philip and Alexander (both kings of MACEDON) had bene before him, vnto whom he did not only compare himſelfe, but thought himſelfe greater then they, becauſe fortune ſmiled on him, and for that he had ſo good ſucceſſe in al his affaires. Whereas Alexander did neuer take away the title and name of king from any other kings, neither did euer call himſelfe king of kings, although he had giuen vnto diuerſe of them the name and power of a king: & in contrary maner alſo, Demetrius laughed them to ſcorne which called any other Princes kings but his father and himſelfe. Moreouer he tooke great pleaſure to heare his flatterers, who being at banquets called for wine to drinke to king Demetrius, and then to Seleucus maſter of the Elephants, to Ptolemy Admirall, to Lyſimachus keeper of the treaſure, & to Agathocles SILICIAN, gouernor of the Iles. Al the kings, but Lyſimachus, laughed at theſe toyes when they were reported to them: but Lyſimachus was very angry, & thought great ſcorne that Demetrius ſhould reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old cuſtome commonly to giue an Eunuch the charge of keeping the treaſure. So Lyſimachus of al other Princes did beare him moſt malice; and becauſe he would finely taunt him for that he euer kept Lamia his curtiſan with him: Vntill this preſent time, ſaid he, I neuer ſaw harlot play in a Tragedy before. Demetrius anſwered him againe, that his harlot was chaſter thē Penelope his wife. So Demetrius departing for that time out of PELOPONNESVS, tooke his iourney towards ATHENS, and wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be receiued into the fraternity of the holy myſteries, and that he meant they ſhould ſhew him at one ſelfe time, al that was to be ſeene, euen from the leaſt to the higheſt ſecrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, becauſe they made the brethren of the fraternity ſee them long time after that they had bene firſt receiued into the leſſer ceremonies: the which was not lawfull then, neither was euer heard of before. For theſe ſmaller myſteries, in old time were celebrated in the moneth of Nouember, and the greater in the moneth of Auguſt: and beſides it was not lawfull to celebrate or vſe theſe ceremonies within the ſpace of a yeare one of the other. When theſe letters were opēly read, no man durſt ſpeake againſt them, but Pythodorus the Prieſt, who caried the torch lighted when thēy ſhewed theſe myſteries. Howbeit his words preuailed not, for by the deuice of Stratocles it was enacted at an aſſembly of the city, that the moneth of March in the which they were at that time, ſhould be called and reputed Nouember. And ſo as they could beſt helpe it, by their ordinances of the city they did receiue Demetrius into the fraternity of the myſteries: & afterwards againe, this ſelfe moneth of March which they had tranſlated into Nouember, became ſuddenly Auguſt: and in the ſelfe ſame yeare was celebrated the other ceremony of theſe great myſteries, whereby Demetrius was admitted to ſee the moſt ſtraight and ſecret ceremonies. Therfore Philippides the Poet inueighing againſt the ſacriledge and impiety of religion prophaned by Stratocles, made theſe verſes of him:

Demetrius maried Deidamia king Pyrrhus ſiſter. & changed the name of the city of Sycione and called it Demetriade.

Demetrius choſen Generall of all Greece.

Demetrius pride.

Into one moneth his coming hither,
Hath thruſt vp all the yeare together.

Philippides verſes againſt Stratocles the boaſter.

And afterwards becauſe Stratocles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the temple of Minerua within the caſtell:

Of chaſt Mineruaes holy Church he makes a filthy ſtewes,
And in that virgins very ſight his harlots doth abuſe.

But yet of al the inſolent parts done at that time in ATHENS (although many were committed) none of all the reſt grieued the ATHENIANS more, then this did: that Demetrius commanded them they ſhould preſently furniſh him with two hundred and fifty talents. The taxation of this payment was very hard vnto them, both for the ſhortneſſe of the time appointed them, as alſo for the impoſſibility of abating any part of it. When he had ſeene all this maſſe of money laide on a heape before him, he commanded it ſhould be giuen to Lamia, & among his other curtiſans, Demetrius prodigall gift of 250 talents to his curtiſans to buy themſelues.

to buy them ſope. The ſhame the ATHENIANS receiued by this gift, grieued them more then the loſſe of their mony: and the words he ſpake to the great contempt of them and their city, did more trouble them then the payment they made. Some ſay notwithſtanding, that Demetrius did not alone vſe the ATHENIANS thus ſhamefully, but the THESSALIANS alſo in the ſame maner. But paſſing this ouer, Lamia of her ſelfe and through her owne countenance did get a great ſum of money together of diuerſe perſons for one ſupper ſhe made vnto Demetrius, the preparation whereof was of ſuch exceeding charge, that Lyceus borne in the Ile of SAMOS, did ſet downe the order thereof in writing. And therfore a certaine Poet no leſſe pleaſantly, then truly, called this Lamia, Elepolis: to wit, an engine to take cities. And Demochares alſo borne in the city of SOLI, called Demetrius a fable, becauſe he had Lamia euer with him: as in the fables which old women tell litle children, there is euer lightly a Lamia, as much to ſay, as a witch, or ſorcereſſe. So that the great credit and authority this Lamia had, and the loue which Demetrius bare her, did not onely cauſe his wiues to ſuſpect and enuy him, but made him hated alſo of all his friends and familiars. And therefore certaine gentlemen, whom Demetrius ſent in Ambaſſade vnto king Lyſimachus, he talking familiarly with them, and paſſing the time away, ſhewed them great wounds of the clawes of a Lyon vpon his armes and legges, telling them alſo how he was forced to fight with a Lyon, when through king Alexanders fury he was ſhut vp in his den with him: they ſmiling to heare him, told him that the king their maſter had alſo certaine markes and bitings on his necke, of a wild beaſt called Lamia. And to ſay truly, it was a wonderfull thing, that marying (as he did) his wife Phila ſo much againſt his will, becauſe ſhe was too old for him, how he was ſo rauiſhed with Lamia, and did ſo conſtantly loue her ſo long together, conſidering alſo that ſhe was very old, and paſt the beſt. Therefore Demo, ſirnamed Mania (as much to ſay, the madde woman) pleaſantly anſwered Demetrius, asking her one night when Lamia had played on the flute all ſupper time, what ſhe thought of Lamia? An old woman, O king, quoth ſhe. Another time when fruite was ſerued in, after the boord was taken vp: Do you ſee ſaid Demetrius, how many prety fine knackes Lamia ſendeth me? My mother, anſwered Demo againe, will ſend you more then theſe, if you pleaſe to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that ſhe ouerthrew Bocchoris iudgement in a matter. In ÆGYPT there was a young man that had a maruellous fancie vnto a famous curtiſan called Thonis: who did aske him ſuch a great ſumme of money to lye with her, that it was vnpoſſible for him to giue it her. At length, this amorous youth being ſo deepe in loue with her, dreamed one night he lay with her, and enioyed her: ſo that for the pleaſure he tooke by his conceipt and imagination, when he awaked, his earneſt loue was ſatisfied. This curtiſan whom he had caſt fancy to, hearing of this his dream, did put him in ſuite before the Iudges, to be payed her hire for the pleaſure the yong man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the ſumme of her complaint, commanded the young man to bring before him in ſome veſſell, at a certaine day appointed, as much mony as ſhe did aske him for to lye with her. Then he bad him to toſſe it too & fro in his hand before the curtiſan, that ſhe might onely haue the ſhadow and ſight of it: for quoth he, imagination and opinion is but a ſhadow of truth. Lamia ſaid, this was no equall iudgement: for ſaid ſhe, the ſhadow onely or the ſight of money, did not ſatisfie the couetouſneſſe of the curtiſan, as the young mans luſt was quenched by his dreame. Thus inough ſpoken of Lamia. But now the misfortunes and geſts of him we preſently write of, do tranſport the hiſtorie, as from a comicall into a tragicall theater, that is to ſay, from pleaſant and light matter, into lamentable and bitter teares. For all the Princes and Kings conſpired generally againſt Antigonus, and ioyned all their force and armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed forthwith out of GRECE, and came to ioyne with his father, whoſe courage he found more liuely and better giuen to this warre then his yeares required: beſides that Demetrius coming made him the bolder, and did lift vp his heart the more. And yet it ſeemeth to me, that if Antigonus would but haue yeelded vp a few trifling things, or that either he could or would haue bridled his ouer immoderate couetous deſire to reigne, he had both kept for himſelfe all the time of his life, and alſo left after his death vnto his ſonne, the ſupremeſt dignity and power, aboue all the other kings and ſucceſſours of Alexander. But he was ſo cruell and ſo raſh of nature, and as inſolent and braue in his doings, as in his words: that thereby he ſtirred vp and brought vpon him as his enemies, many great and mighty Princes. For euen at that preſent time he ſaid, that he would as eaſily diſperſe and ſcatter aſunder that conſpiracy againſt him, as choughs or other little birds coming to pecke vp the corne newly ſowne, are eaſily ſcared away with a ſtone or making any little noiſe. So he caried to the field with him, aboue threeſcore and ten thouſand footmen, ten thouſand horſemen, and threeſcore and fifteene Elephants. His enemies had threeſcore and foure thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſemen more then he, with foure hundred Elephants, and ſixſcore carts of war. When the two armies were one neare vnto the other, me thinkes he had ſome imagination in his head that changed his hope, but not his courage. For in all other battels & conflicts, hauing cõmonly vſed to looke big on the matter, to haue a lowd high voice, and to vſe braue words, and ſometime alſo euen in the chiefeſt of all the battel to giue ſome pleaſant mocke or other, ſhewing a certaine truſt he had in himſelfe, and contempt of his enemy: then they ſaw him oftentimes alone and very penſiue, without euer a word to any man. One day he called all his army together, and preſented his ſonne vnto the ſouldiers, recommending him vnto them, as his heire and ſucceſſour, and talked with him alone in his tent. Whereat men maruelled the more, becauſe that he neuer vſed before to impart to any man the ſecrets of his counſell and determination, no not to his owne ſon, but did all things of himſelfe: and then commanded that thing openly to be done which he had ſecretly purpoſed. For proofe hereof it is ſaid, Demetrius being but a yong man, asked him on a time when the campe ſhould remoue: and that Antigonus in anger anſwered him, art thou affraid thou ſhalt not heare the ſound of the trumpet? Furthermore, there fell out many ill ſignes & tokens that killed their harts. For Demetrius dreamed that Alexander the Great appeared armed vnto him at all peeces, and that he asked him what word or ſignall of battel they were determined to giue at the day of battel: he anſwered that they were determined to giue Iupiter and Victorie. Then ſaid Alexander, I will go to thine enemies that ſhall receiue me: and afterwards at the very day of the ouerthrow, when all their army were ſet in battell ray, Antigonus coming out of his tent, had ſuch a great fall, that he fell flat on his face to the ground, and hurt himſelfe very ſorely. So when he was taken vp, then lifting vp his hands to heauen, he made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would pleaſe them to grant him victory, or ſudden death without great paine, before he ſhould ſee himſelfe vanquiſhed and his army ouerthrowne. When both armies came to ioyne, and that they fought hand to hand, Demetrius that had the moſt part of the horſemen with him, went & gaue charge vpon Antiochus the ſonne of Seleucus, and fought it out ſo valiantly on his ſide, that he ouerthrew his enemies, and put them to flight. But too fondly following the chaſe of them that fled, and out of time, he marred al, and was the occaſion of the loſſe of his victory. For when he returned from the chaſe, he could not ioyne againe with their footmen, becauſe the Elephants were betweene both. Then Seleucus perceiuing Antigonus battel was naked of horſemen, he did not preſently ſet vpon them, but turned at one ſide as though he would enuirone them behind, and made them affraid: yet making head as he would charge them, onely to giue them leiſure to come on their ſide, as they did. For the moſt part of Antigonus hoaſt did forſake him and yeelded vnto his enemies: the reſt of them fled euery man. And when a great troupe of mẽ together went with a great fury to giue charge on that ſide where Antigonus was, one of them that were about him ſaid vnto him: Your grace had need to take heed, for theſe men come to charge vs. He anſwered againe: but how ſhould they know me? and if they did, my ſon Demetrius will come and helpe me. This was his laſt hope, and ſtill he looked euery way, if he could ſee his ſonne coming towards him: till at length he was ſlaine with arrowes, darts and pikes. For of all his friends & ſouldiers, there taried not one man by his body, but Thorax of the city of Larissa in Thessaly. Now ỹ battel hauing ſuch ſucceſſe as you haue heard, the Kings and Princes that had won ſo noble a victory, as if they had cut a great body into ſundry peeces, they deuided Antigonus kingdom among them, and euery man had his part of all the prouinces and countries which Antigonus kept, adding that vnto their other dominions which they poſſeſſed before. Now Demetrius flying with al poſſible ſpeed that might be, with fiue thouſand footmen, and foure thouſand horſemen, he got to the city of Ephesvs: where euery man miſtruſted, that being needy of money as he was, he would not ſpare the temple of Diana in Ephesvs, but would rifle all the gold and ſiluer in it. And in contrary manner alſo Demetrius being afraid of his ſouldiers, leſt they would ſpoile it againſt his will, he ſuddenly departed thence, and ſailed towards Greece, putting his greateſt confidence and affiance in the Athenians, becauſe he had left his wife Deidamia at Athens, with ſhips and ſome money; ſuppoſing he could go no whither with better ſafety in his aduerſity, then to Athens, of whoſe good wils he thought himſelfe aſſured. Wherefore when Ambaſſadours of the

the ATHENIANS came vnto him, and found him not far from the Ile of CYCLADES, as he sailed with great speed towards ATTICA, & that they had declared vnto him, he shold forbear to come vnto their city, becausethe people had made an ordinance to suffer no mockings to come into ATHENS, and that they had sent Deidamia his wife honourably accompained vnto the city of MEGARA: then was Demetrius for very anger and passion of mind, cleane out of countenance, although vntill that time he had patiently borne his aduersitie, and his heart had neuer failed him. But this nipped him to the heart, when he saw (that contrary to expectation) the ATHENIANS had deceiued and failed him in his greatest need, and that in his aduersitie he found their former friendship counterfeit, and altogether dissembled. Whereby most plainely appeareth, that the most vncertaine and deceiueable proofe of peoples good-wils and cities towards Kings and Princes, are the immeasurable and extreme honours they do vnto them. For sith it is so, that the truth and certaintie of honour proceedeth from the good-will of those that giue it, the feare which the common people commonly stand in of the power of kings, is sufficient cause for them to mistrust that the people do it not with good will and from their hearts, considering that for feare they do the selfe same things, which they will also do for loue. Therefore graue and wise Princes should not passe so much for the images and statues they set vp for them, or the tables or diuine honours they do decree vnto them, as to regard their owne workes and deeds, and weighing them truly, so to beleeue and receiue their honours for true, or otherwise to reiect and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate kings the more, when they do accept these immeasurable and extreme honours done vnto them: but those sorts chiefly hate them most, that against their wils are forced to do them those honours. Demetrius seeing then how iniuriously the ATHENIANS had vsed him, and at that time not knowing how to be reuenged of them, he modestly sent vnto them onely to make his complaints, and to demand his ships, among the which was that galley of sixteene banckes of oares. The which when he had receiued, he hoised saile immediatly towards the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and there found all things to go against him. For in euery place where he had left any garrison, the Captaines that had the charge of them, either yeelded them vp, or else reuolted, and kept them against him. Therefore leauing Pyrrhus his Lieutenant in GREECE, he tooke sea againe, and sailed towards CHERRONESVS, and there with the mischieues he did, and with the spoiles he got in king Lysimachus land, he payed his men, and enriched his army, the which began againe to increase, and to be dreadfull to his enemies. But now for Lysimachus, the other kings made no great account of him, neither did they stirre to giue him aide, because he was nothing inferiour vnto Demetrius: and for that he was of greater power and possessions then themselues, they therefore were the more affraid of him. Shortly after, Seleucus sent vnto Demetrius, to require his daughter Stratonice in mariage, notwithstanding that he had a sonne already called Antiochus, by his wife Apama a PERSIAN. Howbeit he thought that his affaires and greatnesse of his estate and kingdome, was able inough to maintaine many successours after him. And furthermore, he considered with himselfe that he should haue need of Demetrius alliance, because he saw Lysimachus himselfe match with one of Ptolomies daughters, and his sonne Agathocles with his other daughter. Demetrius seeing this good fortune offered him beyond all hope, presently tooke his daughter with him, and sailed withall his ships directly towards SYRIA. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessity to land sometimes, and specially in CILICIA, the which Pliſtarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, being giuen him by the other kings for his part and portion of the spoile of Antigonus, after he was ouerthrowne. This Pliſtarchus thinking that Demetrius landed not to refresh himselfe, but to forrage and spoile, because he would complaine of Seleucus for the alliance he made with their common enemy, without the consent and priuity of all the other Kings and Princes confederates, he went purposely vnto his brother Cassander. Demetrius hauing intelligence thereof, suddenly inuaded the land, and spoiled as farre as the city of CYNDES, and caried away (which he had leauied) twelue hundred talents, which he found yet left of his fathers treasure: and then with all the speed he could possible he returned to his ships, and hoised saile. Shortly after, his wife Phila also came vnto him. So Seleucus receiued them all neare vnto the city of OROSSVS, and there their meeting was Princely, without sorow or suspition one of the other. First of all Seleucus did feast Demetrius in his tent, in the middest of his campe: and afterwards Demetrius feasted him againe in his galley, with thirteene banckes of oares.

Seleucus maried Stratonice, Demetrius daughter.

Thus they passed many daies together, feasting and reioycing each with other, being vnarmed, and hauing no souldiers to waite vpon them: vntill at length Seleucus with his wife Stratonice departed, and took his way with great pompe towards the city of ANTIOCH. Now for Demetrius, he kept the prouince of CILICIA, and sent his wife Phila vnto her brother Cassander, to answer the complaints and accusations of Plistarchus against him. In the meane time Deidamia his wife departed out of GRECE to come vnto him: who after she had remained with him a few dayes, died of a sickneſſe. Afterwards Demetrius coming againe in fauour with Ptolomy, by Seleucus his son in lawes meanes, he maried his daughter Ptolemaide. Hitherunto Seleucus vsed Demetrius very courteously, but afterwards he prayed him to deliuer him CILICIA againe, for a sum of mony that he offered him: but Demetrius plainly denied him. Then did Seleucus shew a cruell and tyrannicall couetousnesse: for in anger, and with fierce threats & countenance he asked him the cities of TYRE, and SIDON. But therin me thinks he lacked honesty & ciuility: as though he that had vnder his obedience and subiection all that which lay betwixt the INDIES, & the sea of SYRIA, was in such need and pouerty, that for two cities onely, he should driue his father in law from him, who had sustained so hard and bitter change. But therby he rightly confirmed Platoes saying: that he that will be rich indeed, must indeuor himself not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his couetousnesse. For he shall neuer be but a begger and needy, whose couetous desire hath no end. This notwithstanding, Demetrius yeelded not for feare, but prouided to replenish the cities with good garrisons to keepe them against him: saying, that though he had bene ouercome ten thousand times more in battell, yet it should neuer sincke into his head that he should be contented, and thinke himselfe happy to buy Seleucus alliance so deare. On the other side, being aduertised that one Lachares hauing spied oportunity when the ATHENIANS were in ciuill wars one against the other, & that he had ouercome thē, & did tyrannically vsurpe the gouernment, he then perswaded himselfe that he might easily win it againe, if he came thither vpon the sudden. Thereupon he crossed the seas with a great fleete of ships, without any danger: but he had such a great storme and tempest vpon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most part of his ships, and a great number of his men besides. But for himselfe he scaped, & began to make a little warre with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiuing that he did no good there, but lost his time, he sent some of his men to gather a number of his ships againe together, and he himselfe in the meane time went into PELOPONNESVS, to lay siege to the city of MESSINA, where his person was in great danger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blow with a dart, that it hit him full in the mouth, and ran through his cheeke. Notwithstanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subiection againe certaine towns that had rebelled against him. After that, he returned againe into ATTICA, & took the cities of ELEVSIN, and of RHAMNVS: and then spoiled all the country, and took a ship fraught with corne, and hung vp the merchant, that ought it, and the master of the ship that brought it: thereby to terrifie all other merchants, that they should be afraid to bring any more corne thither, and so to famish the city, by keeping them from all things necessary for their sustenance: and so it happened. For a bushell of salt was sold at ATHENS for *forty siluer Drachmaes, and a bushell of wheat for three *hundred Drachmas. In this extreme necessity, the ATHENIANS had but a short ioy for the hundred & fifty galleys they saw neare vnto ÆGINA, the which Ptolomy sent to aide them: for when the souldiers that were in them saw that they brought vnto Demetrius a great number of ships out of PELOPONNESVS, out of CYPRVS, and diuerse other parts, which amounted in the whole to the number of three hundred saile, they weyed their ankers, & fled presently. Then Lachares forsook the city, & secretly saued himself. Now the ATHENIANS, who before had commanded vpon paine of death, that no man should make any motion to the councell, to treate of any peace with Demetrius, they did then vpon Lachares flying, presently open the gates next vnto Demetrius campe, and sent Ambassadors vnto him, not looking for any grace or peace, but because necessity draue them to it. During this so hard and straight siege, there fell out many wonderfull and strange things; but among others, this one is of speciall note. It is reported that the father and son sitting in their house, voide of all hope of life, there fell a dead rat before them from the top of the house, and that the father and sonne fought who should haue it to eate. Moreouer, that at the selfe same siege the Philosopher Epicurus maintained himselfe and his scholers, by giuing them a portion of beanes euery day, by the which they liued. Thus the city of ATHENS being brought vnto this extremitie, Demetrius made his entrie into it, and gaue commandement to all

all the citizens, that they ſhould aſſemble euery man within the Theater: where he made them to be compaſſed in with armed ſouldiers, and then placed all his guard armed about the ſtage. Afterwards he came downe himſelf into the Theater, through high galleries and entries by the which the common players vſed to come to play their parts in tragedies, inſomuch as ỹ ATHENIANS were then worſe afraid then before: howbeit Demetrius preſently pacified their feare, as ſoone as he began to ſpeake vnto them. For he did not faſhion his Oration with a haſtie angrie voice, neither did he vſe any ſharpe or bitter words: but only after he had courteouſly told them their faults & diſcourteſie towards him, he ſaid he forgaue them, & that he would be their friend againe: and furthermore, he cauſed ten millions of buſhels of wheat to be giuen vnto them, and eſtabliſhed ſuch gouernors there, as the people miſliked not of. Then Democles the Orator, ſeeing that the people gaue out great ſhouts of ioy in the praiſe of Demetrius, and that the Orators daily contended in the pulpit for Orations, who ſhould exceed other in preferring new honours for Demetrius, he cauſed an order to be made, that the hauens of PIRÆVS and MVNYCHIA ſhould be put into Demetrius hands, to vſe at his pleaſure. This being eſtabliſhed by voices of ỹ people, Demetrius of his own priuate authority did place a great garriſon within the fort called MVSÆVM, becauſe the people ſhould rebell no more againſt him, nor diuert him from his other enterpriſes. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to ſet vpō the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Archidamus king of LACEDÆMON, came againſt him with a puiſſant armie, whom he diſcomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the city of MANTINEA. After that he inuaded LACONIA with all his army, and made an inrode to the city of SPARTA, where he once againe ouerthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS in ſet battell, took 500 of them priſoners, and ſlue 200: in ſo much as euery man thought he might euen then go to SPARTA without any danger to take it, the which had neuer yet bene taken afore by any. But there was neuer king that had ſo often and ſudden changes of fortune as Demetrius, nor that in other affaires was euer ſo often litle, and then great: ſo ſuddenly downe, and vp againe: ſo weake, and ſtraight ſo ſtrong. And therefore it is reported, that in his great aduerſities when fortune turned ſo contrarie againſt him, he was wont to cry out vpon fortune, that which Æſchylus ſpeaketh in a place:

Demetrius clemency vnto the Athenians.

Demetrius iourney againſt the Lacedamonians.

Demetrius variable fortune.

Thou ſeem'ſt to haue begotten me, of purpoſe for to ſhow
Thy force in lifting of me vp, me downe againe to throw.

Now againe when his affaires proſpered ſo well, and that he was likely to recouer a great force & kingdome, newes were brought him, firſt that Lyſimachus had taken all his townes from him, which he held in ASIA: and on the other ſide, that Ptolomy had won from him all the Realme of CYPRVS, the city of SALAMINA only excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very ſtraightly beſieged. This notwithſtanding, fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archilocus ſpeaketh of, who

For taking him away, and (as it were) the city of SPARTA alſo out of his hands by theſe dreadfull newes, euen when he was certaine to haue won it, ſhe preſently offered him hopes of other great and new things, by this occaſion following. After the death of Caſſander, Philip who was the eldeſt of all his other ſonnes, and left his heire and ſucceſſor in the kingdome of MACEDON, reigned no long time ouer the MACEDONIANS, but deceaſſed ſoone after his father was dead. The two other brethren alſo fell at great variance, and wars together: ſo that the one called Antipater, ſlue his owne mother Theſſalonica: and the other named Alexander, called in to aide him Demetrius and Pyrrhus, the one out of the Realme of EPIRVS, and the other out of PELOPONNESVS. Pyrrhus came firſt before Demetrius, and kept a great part of MACEDON for recompence of his paines, coming to aide him at his deſire: ſo that he became a dreadfull neighbour vnto Alexander himſelfe, that had ſent for him into his countrey. Furthermore, when he was aduertiſed that Demetrius did preſently vpon the receipt of his letters, ſet forward with al his army to come to aide him, the yong Prince Alexander was twice as much more amazed and afraid, for the great eſtate and eſtimation of Demetrius. So he went to him notwithſtanding, and receiued him at a place called DEION, and there imbraced and welcomed him. But immediatly after, he told him that his affaires were now in ſo good eſtate, that praiſed be the gods he ſhould not now need his preſence to aide him. After theſe words the one began to miſtruſt the other. So it chanced one day, that as Demetrius went to Alexanders lodging where the feaſt was prepared, there came one to him to tell him of an ambush that was laid for him, and how they had determined to kill him when he should thinke to be merrie at the banket. But Demetrius was nothing abashed at the newes, and onely went a little softlier, not making such hast as he did before, and in the meane time sent to command his Captaines to arme their men, and to haue them in readinesse: and willed his gentlemen and all the rest of his officers that were about him (which were a greater number by many then those of Alexanders side) euery man of them to go in with him into the hall, and to tarie there till he arose from the table. By this meanes the men whom Alexander had appointed to assault him, durst not, being afraid of the great traine he had brought with him. Furthermore, Demetrius faining that he was not well at ease at that time to make merry, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him beleeue that he had certaine newes brought him of great importance: and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keepe him company, for that he was driuen of necessity to depart from him; and that another time they would meete together, with better leisure and liberty. Alexander was very glad to see that Demetrius went his way out of MACEDON not offended, but of his owne good will: whereupon he brought him into THESSALIE, and when they were come to the city of LARISSA, they began againe to feast one another, to intrap each other: the which offered Demetrius occasion to haue Alexander in his hand as he would wish himselfe. For Alexander of purpose would not haue his guard about him, fearing lest thereby he should teach Demetrius also to stand vpon his guard. Thus Alexander turned his practise for another, vpon himselfe: and he was determined not to suffer Demetrius to scape his hands, if he once againe came within danger. So Alexander being bidden to supper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius rising from the boord in the middest of supper, Alexander rose also, being afraid of that strange manner, and followed him foote by foote to the very doore. Then Demetrius said but to his warders at the gate, Kill him that followeth me. With those words he went out of the dores, and Alexander that followed him was slaine in the place, and certaine of his gentlemen with him which came to rescue him: of the which, one of them as they killed him said, that Demetrius had preuented them but one day. All that night (as it is no other likely) was full of vprore and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the MACEDONIANS being maruellously troubled and afraid of Demetrius great power, when they saw that no man came to assaile them, but that Demetrius in contrarie manner sent vnto them to tell them that he would speake with them, and deliuer them reason for that he had done: then they all began to be bold againe, and willingly gaue him audience. Now Demetrius needed not to vse many words, nor to make any long Orations, to win them vnto him: for, because they hated Antipater, as a horrible manqueller and murtherer of his mother, and because they had no better man to preferre, they easily chose Demetrius king of MACEDON, and thereupon brought him backe into MACEDON, to take possession of the kingdome. This change was not misliked of the other MACEDONIANS that remained at home in their country, for that they yet remembred the traiterous and wicked fact of Cassander against Alexander the Great: for which cause they vtterly hated & detested all his issue & posterity. And furthermore, if there were any sparke of remẽbrance in their hearts, of the bounty and goodnesse of their grandfather Antipater, Demetrius receiued the fruit and benefit, for his wife Philaes sake; by whom he had a son that should succeed him in the kingdome, and was a proper youth, in campe with his father. Demetrius hauing this great good hap and fortune come vnto him, he receiued newes also that Ptolomy had not onely raised his siege from the city of SALAMINA where he kept his mother & children straightly besieged: but further, that he had done them great honor, and bestowed great gifts vpon them. On the other side also he was aduertised, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before bene maried vnto Seleucus, was now maried againe vnto Antiochus, the sonne of the said Seleucus, and how that she was crowned Queene of all the barbarous nations inhabiting in the high prouinces of ASIA: and that came to passe in this maner. It chanced that this yong Prince Antiochus (as loue ouercometh all men) became in loue with his mother in law Stratonice, who already had a sonne by Seleucus his father. She being yong and passing faire, he was so rauished with her, that though he proued all the wayes possible to master his furie and passion that way, yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning himselfe to death because he found his desire abhominable, his passion incurable, and his reason vtterly ouercome, he resolued to kill himselfe by litle and litle, with abstinence from meate and drinke; and made no other reckoning to remedie his

his griefe, fayning to haue some secret inward disease in his bodie. Yet could he not so finely cloake it, but that Erasistratus the Physitian easily found his griefe, that loue, not sickenesse, was his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to imagine with whom he was in loue. Erasistratus being earnestly bent to find out the partie he loued, he sate by this yong Prince al day long in his chamber; & when any faire yong boy or wife came to see him, he earnestly looked Antiochus in the face, and carefully obserued all the parts of the body, and outward mouings, which do commonly betray the secret passions and affections of the mind. So hauing marked him diuerse times, that whē others came to see him, whatsoeuer they were, he still remained in one self state, and that when Stratonice his mother in law came alone or in company of her husband Seleucus to visite him, he commonly perceiued those signes in him, which Sappho writeth to be in louers (to wit, that his words and speech did faile him, his colour became red, his eyes still rolled to and fro, and then a sudden sweat would take him, his pulse would beat fast and rise high; & in the end, that after the force & power of his heart had failed him, & shewed al these signes, he became like a man in an extasie & trance, and white as a kercher:) he then gathering a true coniecture by these so manifest signes and declarations, that it was only Stratonice whom this yong Prince fancied and the which he forced himselfe to keepe secret to the death, thought that to bewray it to the king it would offend him much, but yet trusting to his great affection & fatherly loue he bare to his sonne, he ventured one day to tell him, that his sonnes sickenesse was no other but loue, and withall, that his loue was impossible to be enioyed, and therfore that he must of necessity die, for it was incurable. Seleucus was cold at the heart to heare these newes: so he asked him, What, is he incurable? Yea, Sir, answered the Physitian, becausse he is in loue with my wife. Then replied Seleucus againe: Alas Erasistratus, I haue alwaies loued thee as one of my deerest friends, and wouldest thou not now do me this pleasure, to let my son mary thy wife, sith thou knowest it wel that I haue no moe sonnes but he; and that I see he is but cast away, if thou helpe me not? But your grace would not do it your selfe, said Erasistratus, if he were in loue with Stratonice. O, said Seleucus to him again, that it were the wil of the gods, some god or man could turne his loue that way: for mine owne part, I would not onely leaue him the thing he loued, but I would giue my kingdome also to saue his life. Then Erasistratus seeing that the king spake the word from his heart, & with abundance of teares, he took him by the right hand, & told him plainly, your grace needeth not Erasistratus helpe in this. For being father, husband, and king, your selfe also may only be the Physitian, to cure your sons disease. When Seleucus heard that, he called an assembly of the people, and declared before them all, that he was determined to crowne his son Antiochus king of the high prouinces of Asia, and Stratonice Queene, to marry them together: and that he was perswaded, that his son (who had alwaies shewed himselfe obedient to his fathers will) would not disobey him in this mariage. And as for Stratonice, if she misliked this mariage, & would not consent vnto it becausse it was no cōmon matter, then he praied that his friends would perswade her, she should think all good and comely that should please the king: and withall that concerned the generall benefit of the realme and commonwealth. Hereupon Antiochus and Stratonice were maried together. But now to returne againe to ŷ history of Demetrius. Demetrius came by ŷ kingdome of Macedon & Thessaly by this meanes as you haue heard, & did moreouer possesse the best part of Peloponnesvs, & on this side the streight, the cities of Megara & Athens. Furthermore he led his army against the Boeotians, who were at the first willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus king of Sparta was come into the city of Thebes with his army, the Boeotians encouraged by the faire words & allurement of one Pisis, borne in the city of Thespis (who at that time bare al the sway & chiefe authority amongst thē) they gaue vp their treaty of peace they had begun with Demetrius, & determined to make war. Thereupon Demetrius went to besiege the city of Thebes, & laid his ensignes of battery vnto it: in so much as Cleonymus for feare, stole secretly out of the city. Thereupon the Thebans being also afraid, yeelded themselues vnto Demetrius mercy: who putting great garrisons into the cities, and hauing leauied a great summe of money of the prouince, left them Hieronymus the historiographer, his Lieutenant and gouernor there. So it appeared that he vsed them very courteously, and did them many pleasures, and specially vnto Pisis. For when he had taken him prisoner, he did him no hurt, but receiued him very courteously, and vsed him well: and furthermore, he made him Polemarchus (to wit, campe-master) in the city of Thespis. Shortly after these things were thus brought to passe, king Lysimachus by chance was taken by another barbarous

The city of Thebes yeelded vnto Demetrius Hieronymus the historiographer, Demetrius Lieutenant.

Prince, called Dromichetes. Therupon Demetrius, to take ſuch a noble occaſion offered him, went with a great army to inuade the country of THRACIA, ſuppoſing he ſhould find no man to withſtand him, but that he might conquer it at his pleaſure. Howbeit, ſo ſoone as Demetrius back was turned, the BOEOTIANS reuolted againe from him, & therwithall newes was brought him, that Lyſimachus was deliuered out of priſon. Then he returned backe with all ſpeed, marueilouſly offended with the BOEOTIANS, whom he found already diſcomfited in battell by his ſon Antigonus, and went againe to lay ſiege to the city of THEBES, being the chiefe city of all that prouince of BOEOTIA. But at that preſent time, Pyrrhus came and forraged all THESSALY, and entred euen to the ſtraight of THERMOPILES. Therefore Demetrius was conſtrained to leaue his ſonne to continue the ſiege at THEBES, whileſt he himſelfe went againſt Pyrrhus, who ſuddenly returned againe into his Realme. So Demetrius left 10000 footmen, & 1000 horſemen in THESSALY to defend the country, and returned with the reſt of his army to win THEBES. Therupon he brought his great engine of battery called Elepolis, againſt the wal, as you haue heard before, the which was thruſt forward by litle and litle, with great labor, by reaſon of the weight & heauines of it: ſo that it could ſcant be driuen forward two furlongs in two moneths. But the BOEOTIANS and the THEBANS did valiantly defend themſelues: & Demetrius of a malicious mind & deſire of reuenge (more oftner then needfull, or to any purpoſe) compelled his men to go to the aſſault, and to hazard themſelues: ſo that there were daily a great number of them ſlaine. Antigonus his ſon perceiuing it: Alas, ſaid he, why do we thus ſuffer our men to be ſlaine and caſt away to no purpoſe? Wherfore Demetrius angrily anſwered him againe: What needeſt thou to care? Is there any * corne to be diſtributed to thoſe that are dead? But notwithſtanding, becauſe men ſhould not thinke he ſtill meant to put others in danger, & durſt not venture himſelfe, he fought with them, til at length he was ſhot through the necke with a ſharpe arrow-head, that was ſhot at him from the wall. Wherewithall he fell very ſicke, but yet raiſed not his ſiege, nor remoued his campe, but took the city of THEBES againe by aſſault: the which being not long before againe repleniſhed with people, was in ten yeares ſpace twiſe won & taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a maruellous feare, by his cruell threats he gaue them at his coming in to THEBES: ſo that they looked to haue receiued the extremeſt puniſhment the vanquiſhed could haue, through the iuſt wrath and anger of the conquerour. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirteene of them to death, and baniſhed ſome, he pardoned al the reſt. About that time fell out the celebration of the feaſt called Pythia, in the honor of Apollo: and becauſe the ÆTOLIANS kept all the high waies to bring them vnto the city of DELPHES, in the which of old time they did vſe to celebrate thoſe ſports aforeſaid, he cauſed them to be kept and ſolemnized at ATHENS, as in a place where this god in reaſon ſhould be beſt honored & reuerenced, becauſe he was patron of the city, & for that the ATHENIANS maintained that he was their progenitor. Frō thence he returned into MACEDON, & knowing that it was againſt his nature to liue idly, & in peace, & ſeeing on the other ſide alſo that the MACEDONIANS did him more ſeruice, and were more obedient to him in wars, & that in time of peace they grew ſeditious, full of vanity and quarrels, he went to make war with ỹ ÆTOLIANS: & after he had ſpoiled & deſtroyed their country, he left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there, with a great part of his army. Demetrius himſelfe went in the meane time with the reſt of his army againſt Pyrrhus, & Pyrrhus alſo againſt him; but they miſſed of meeting each with other. Wherupon Demetrius paſſed further vnto the Realme of EPIRVS, the which he ſpoiled & forraged. Pyrrhus on the other ſide went on ſo far that he met with Pantauchus, Demetrius Lieutenāt, with whō he fought a battell, & came to the ſword with him: ſo that he did both hurt him, and was alſo hurt by him. But in the end Pyrrhus had the vpper hand, put Pantauchus to flight, & ſlue a great number of his men, and tooke 5000 priſoners: the which was the chiefe ouerthrow of Demetrius, For Pyrrhus wan not the MACEDONIANS ill will ſo much for the miſchieues and hurts he had done vnto thē, as he got himſelf great fame & renowne with thē, becauſe himſelfe alone had with his own hands done all the noble exploits of war in that iourny: for the which he was afterwards had in great eſtimation among the MACEDONIANS. Now many of them began to ſay, that he was the only king of al others, in whom the liuely image of the hardines & valiātneſſe of Alexander the Great was to be ſeene: & that all the reſt (but ſpecially Demetrius) did but counterfeit his grauity & Princely countenance, like players vpō a ſtage, that would counterfeit his countenance & geſture. And to ſay truly, there was much fineneſſe & curioſity about Demetrius, to make him a playing ſtocke in common playes. For ſome ſay, that he did not only weare

a great hat with his diademe vpon his head, and was apparelled in purple gownes imbrodered with gold: but also that he did vse to weare certaine wollen shooes on his feete died in purple colour, not woue, but fashioned together like a felt, & guilt vpon it. And Furthermore, he had long before caused a cloake to be made of a maruellous rich & sumptuous peece of worke. For vpon it was drawn the figure of the world, with starres & circles of heauen, the which was not throughly finished, by the change of his fortune. But there was neuer king of MACEDON after him that durst weare it: albeit there were many proud and arrogant kings that succeeded him. Now the MACEDONIANS were not only sory, & offended to see such things as they were not wont to be acquainted withall: but they much more misliked his curious maner of life, and specially because he was ill to come to, & worse to be spoken with. For he gaue no audience, or if he did, he was very rough, & would sharply take them vp that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS two yeares, and would giue thē no answer: & yet made as though he loued them better then any other people of GREECE. Another time also he was offended, because ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS had sent but one man only Ambassador vnto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him. And so did the Ambassador of the LACEDÆMONIANS answer him very gallantly, after the LACONIAN maner. For when Demetrius asked him, how chanceth it that ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS do send but one man vnto me? No more but one, said he, ô king, vnto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly & popular like, then he was wont to do: wherby he put the people in good hope that they might the easilier speake with him, and that he would more curteously heare their complaints. Therupon many came, and put vp their humble supplications and bils of petition vnto him. He receiued them, and put them vp in the lap of his cloake. The poore suters were glad of that, and waited vpon him at his heeles, hoping they should quickly be dispatched: but whē he was vpon the bridge of the riuer of Axius, he opened his cloake, and cast them all into the riuer. This went to the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, who then thought they were no more gouerned by a king, but oppressed by a tyrant: and it grieued them so much the more, because they did yet remember (either for that they had seene themselues, or otherwise heard their forefathers say) how courteous king Philip was in all such matters, and how that one day as he passed through the street, a poore old woman pluckt him by the gowne, and eftsoones humbly besought him to heare her, but he answered her he was not then at leisure. Whereupon the poore woman plainly cried out to him, Leaue then to be king. This word so nettled him, and he tooke such a conceit of it, that he returned presently to his pallace, and setting all other matters apart, did nothing else many daies but gaue himselfe to heare all sutes, and began with this poore old woman. For truly nothing becometh a Prince better, then to minister iustice: for Mars (as Timotheus saith) signifieth force, and is a tyrant: but iustice and law, according to Pindarus, is Queene of all the world. Moreouer, the wise Poet Homer saith not that Princes and Kings haue receiued the custody of engines, and of munition, neither also strong & mighty ships of Iupiter, to keepe them to destroy townes withall: but with them to maintaine law & iustice. And therefore he calleth not the cruell and bloudy king, but the iust & mercifull Prince, Iupiters friend and scholer. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title cōtrary to Iupiter, whom they called Polieus, or Poliouchos, signifying protector and preseruer of cities: and that he was called Poliorcetes, a Fort-gainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, and vice preferred for vertue: because he could not discern the truth from falshood, which turned his iniustice to glory, & iniquity to honor. But now to returne where we left: Demetrius fell into a great and dangerous sickenesse in the city of PELLA, during which time he almost lost all MACEDON, by a sudden inuasion Pyrrhus made, who in maner rode it all ouer, and came as farre as the city of EDESSA. Howbeit so soone as he recouered health againe, he easily draue him out, and afterwards made peace with him, because he would not fighting with him (whom he should haue daily at his doores still skirmishing sometime here, sometime there) lose the oportunity, and weaken himselfe to bring that to passe which he had determined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recouer all the Realmes his father had: and besides, the preparation he made was no lesse sufficient then the purpose of such an imagination required. For he had leauied & assembled an army of foure score and eighteene thousand footmen: and vnto them he had also well neare 12000 horsemen, & had besides gotten aboue 500 ships together, which were built part in the hauen of PIRÆVS, part at CORINTH, part in the city of CHALCIS, and part about PELLA. He himselfe in person, went through their worke-houses, and shewed the artificers how they should make them, and did helpe to deuiſe them: ſo that euery man wondered not only at his infinite preparation, but at the greatneſſe and ſumptuouſneſſe of his works. For at that time there was no man liuing that euer ſaw a galley of fifteene or ſixteene bankes of oares. But this is true, that afterwards Ptolomy, ſurnamed Philopater, built a galley of fortie bankes of oares, the which was 280 cubits long, and from the keele in height to the top of the poope, 48 cubits: and to looke to the tackle and guide her, did require 400 mariners, and 4000 watermen to row her; and beſides all that, ſhe could yet cary aboue the hatches, wel-neare 3000 fighting men. Howbeit this galley neuer ſerued to other purpoſe but for ſhew, and was like to a houſe that neuer ſtirred: and it was neuer remoued out of the place where it was built but with maruellous ado, and great danger, more to make men wonder at, then for any ſeruice or commodity it could be imployed vnto. But now the beauty of Demetrius ſhips did nothing hinder their ſwiftneſſe & goodneſſe for fight, neither did the hugeneſſe of their building take away the vſe of them; but their ſwiftneſſe and nimbleneſſe deſerued more commendation, then their ſumptuouſneſſe and ſtatelineſſe. Thus as this great power and preparation was in hand, being ſuch as neuer king before (ſince the time of Alexander the Great) had aſſembled a greater to inuade Asia, theſe three kings, Ptolomy, Seleucus, and Lyſimachus, did all ioyne together againſt him. And afterwards alſo, they ſent Ambaſſadors vnto Pyrrhus in the name of them all, to draw him to their ſide, alluring him to come into Macedon, perſwading him not to repoſe any truſt in the peace Demetrius had made with him, to make account of it as a good and ſure peace: for, they ſaid that Demetrius did not giue him pledge that he would neuer make warre with him, but rather firſt tooke oportunity himſelfe to make warre with whom he thought good. Pyrrhus conſidering ſo much, and finding their words true, there roſe a ſharpe and cruell warre on euery ſide againſt Demetrius, who tracted him, and ſtayed yet to begin. For at one ſelfe time, Ptolemie with a great fleete of ſhips came downe into Greece, and made all Greece reuolt from him: and Lyſimachus alſo on Thraciaes ſide, and Pyrrhus vpon the borders of Epirvs, confining with the realme of Macedon, they entred with a great army, and ſpoiled and ſacked all as they went. Thereupon Demetrius leauing his ſon Antigonus in Greece, he returned with all poſſible ſpeed into Macedon, to go firſt againſt Lyſimachus. But as he was preparing to go againſt him, newes were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the city of Berrhoea. This newes being blowne abroad amongſt the Macedonians, all Demetrius doings were turned topſie turuie. For all his campe was ſtraight full of teares and complaints, and his men began openly to ſhew their anger againſt him, ſpeaking all the ill they could of him, ſo that they would tary no longer, but euery one prayed leaue to depart, pretending to looke to their buſineſſe at home, but in truth to go and yeeld themſelues vnto Lyſimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it beſt for him to get him as far from Lyſimachus as he could, and to bend all his armie againſt Pyrrhus: becauſe the other was their countreyman, and familiarly knowne among the moſt of them, for that they had ſerued together vnder Alexander the Great, and that as he thought, the Macedonians would not preferre Pyrrhus a ſtranger, before him. But there his iudgement failed him: for as ſoone as Pyrrhus had pitched his campe hard by him, the Macedonians that had euer loued valiantnes, and had of ancient time eſteemed him worthier to be king that was the beſt ſoldier and valianteſt in the field; and furthermore had heard the report of his great clemency and courteſie he had ſhewed to the priſoners he had taken: they hauing had goodwill of long time, fought but good occaſion to forſake Demetrius, and to yeeld themſelues vnto Pyrrhus, or to any other Prince whatſoeuer he were. Then they ſecretly began to ſteale away one after another, by ſmall companies at the firſt: but afterwards there roſe ſuch a generall tumult againſt him throughout all the campe, that ſome of them were ſo deſperate to go into his tent to bid him flie, and ſaue himſelfe, becauſe the Macedonians were too wearie with fighting for his curioſity. And yet Demetrius found theſe words more gentle, and modeſt, in reſpect of the vile and cruell words which others gaue him. So he went into his tent, and caſt a blacke cloake about his face, in ſtead of his rich and ſtately cloake he was wont to weare, not like vnto a king, but like a common player when the play is done; and then ſecretly ſtole away. When this was knowne in the campe, many of his ſouldiers ran to his tent to riſle it, and euery man tooke ſuch hold of it to haue his part, that they tare it in peeces, and drew their ſwords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus comming in the middeſt of the tumult, pacified this ſtirre, and preſently without blow giuen, wan all Demetrius campe: and afterwards he deuided the Realme of Macedon with Lyſimachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly reigned the ſpace of ſeuen yeares. Now

Demetrius

Demetrius being thus miserably ouerthrowne, and turned out of his realme, he fled vnto the city of CASSANDRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who tooke it maruellous heauily, and could not abide to see him againe a priuate man, driuen out of his kingdome, and the most miserable king that euer was of all other. Wherefore intending no more to follow vaine hope, and detesting the fortune of her husband, she being more constant in calamitie then in prosperity, killed her selfe with poyson she tooke. Demetrius went from thence into GREECE, purposing to gather together the rest of his shipwracks: and there assembled all his Captains and friends that he had. So it seemeth to me, the comparison Menelaus maketh of his fortune, in one of the Tragedies of Sophocles, in these verses:

Phila, Demetrius wife poysoneth her selfe.

Demetrius strange fortune.

My state doth turne continually about on Fortunes wheele,
Whose double dealing diuerse times enforc't I am to feele:
Resembling right the Moone, whose face abideth at no stay
Two nights together, but doth change in shape from day to day.
At first she riseth small with hornes; and as in age she growes,
With fuller cheekes and bigger light a greater face she shewes.
And when she cometh to the full, and shineth faire and bright,
Among the goodly glistering stars the goodliest in the night:
She fades and fals away againe, and runnes a counter-pace,
Vntill she haue foregone the light, and figure of her face.

This comparison might (I say) much better be applied vnto Demetrius fortune, to his rising and falling, and to his ouerthrow and reliefe againe. For when euery man thought his force & power vtterly ouerthrowne, then began he to rise againe by repaire of soldiers, which by litle and litle came vnto him, and straight reuiued him with good hope. This was the first time that he was euer seene meanely apparelled, like a priuate man vp and downe the country, without some shew or tokens of a king. And there was one that seeing him in this estate at THEBES, pleasantly applied these verses of Eurypides vnto him:

Demetrius misery from princely happinesse.

Of god immortall, now become a mortall wight:
Ismènus bankes and Dirces streames he haunteth in our sight.

Now when he began to haue some hope againe, and was (as it were) entred into the great high way of kings, and had gotten soldiers about him, which made a body and shew of royall power, he restored the THEBANS their liberty and gouernement againe. But the ATHENIANS once more reuolted from him, and did reuoke the dignity and Priesthood of Diphilus, who had bene that yeare created Priest of the sauiours, in stead of the Gouernour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we haue told you before: and made a law, that from thenceforth the ancient and common Gouernours of their city should be restored againe to their ancient maner: and they sent also into MACEDON vnto king Pyrrhus, rather to terrifie Demetrius (whom they saw begin to rise againe) then for any hope they had he would come and helpe them. Howbeit Demetrius came against them with great fury, and did straightly besiege the city of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS sent Crates the Philosopher to him, (a man of great estimation & authority,) who so handled him, partly by intreatie, and partly also through his wife perswasions and counsels he gaue him for his profit, that Demetrius presently raised his siege. Wherefore, after he had gathered together so many ships as were left him, and had imbarked twelue thousand footmen, and a small number of horsemen, he presently tooke sea, and sailed towards ASIA, meaning to take the prouinces of CARIA and LYDIA from Lysimachus, and to make them to rebell against him. There Euridice, sister to his wife Phila, receiued him by the city of MILETVM, hauing with her one of Ptolomies daughters and hers, called Ptolemæide; the which had bene afore affianced to him by Seleucus meanes. So he maried Ptolemæide there, with the good will and consent of her mother Euridice. After his mariage he presently went into the field againe, and did set forwards to winne some cities, whereof many willingly receiued him, and others he tooke by force. Amongst them he tooke the city of SARDIS, whither came diuerse Captaines vnto him of king Lysimachus, who yeelded themselues, and brought him a great number of men and much money besides. But Demetrius receiuing aduertisement that Agathocles, Lysimachus sonne, followed him with a great army, he went thence into PHRYGIA, making account, and also hoping, that if he could win ARMENIA, he might easily make MEDIA rebell; & then that he would see if he could conquer the high prouinces of ASIA, where he might haue many places of refuge, if fortune turned against him. Agathocles followed him very neare, and yet skirmishing diuerse times with him, Demetrius alway had the better: howbeit Agathocles did cut off his victuals from him euery way, and kept him at such a streight, that his men durst no more stray from the campe to forrage: wherefore they sustained great want of victuals, and then began his men to be afraid, and to mistrust that he would make them follow him into ARMENIA and MEDIA. The famine daily increased more and more in his army, and it chanced besides, that missing his way, and failing to gage the foord well as he passed ouer the riuer of Lycus, the fury and force of the riuer caried his men downe the streame, and drowned a great number of them: and yet notwithstanding these great troubles, they mocked him besides. For one wrote at the entrie and coming in to his tent, the first verse of the Tragedy of Oedipus COLONIAN, written by Sophocles, changing onely some word:

Demetrius troubles in Asia.

Thou impe of old and blind Antigonus,
To what a point hast thou now caried vs?

But in the end, the plague began also in the middest of this famine (a common thing, and almost a matter of necessity it should be so) because that men being driuen to need and necessity, doe frame themselues to eate all that comes to hand: whereupon he was driuen to bring backe those few men that remained, hauing lost of all sorts (good and bad) not so few as eight thousand fully told. When he came into the prouince of TARSVS, he commanded his men in no case to meddle with any thing, because the countrey was subiect vnto king Seleucus, whom he would in no wise displease. But when he saw it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to such extremity and need, and that Agathocles had bard vp the streights and passages of mount Taurus against him, he wrote a letter vnto Seleucus, first declaring his miserable state & hard fortune: and then presenting his humble petition and request vnto him, prayed him to take pitie vpon his friend, whom spitefull fortune had throwne into such miserie and calamity, that could not but moue his greatest enemies to haue compassion of him. These letters somewhat softened Seleucus heart, insomuch that he wrote to his Gouernours and Lieutenants of those parts, to furnish Demetrius person with all things needfull for a Princes house, and victuals sufficient to maintaine his men. But one Patrocles, a graue wise man accounted, and Seleucus faithfull friend also, came to tell him, that the charge to entertaine Demetrius soldiers, was not the greatest fault he made therein, and most to be accounted of: but that he did not wisely looke into his affaires, to suffer Demetrius to remaine in his country, considering that he had alway bene a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprise any matters of great importance; and now he was brought to such despaire and extremity, that he had framed his men which were but ranke cowards, (contrarie to their nature) to be most desperate and hardie in greatest dangers. Seleucus being moued with these perswasions, presently took his iourny into CILICIA with a great army. Demetrius being astonied with this sodaine change, and dreading so great an army, got him to the strongest places of mount Taurus. Then he sent vnto Seleucus, first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certaine barbarous people thereabouts, who liued according to their own lawes, and neuer had king: to the end that he might yet there with safety end the rest of his life and exile, staying at length in some place where he might be safe. Secondly, if that liked him not, then that it would yet please him to victuall his men for the winter time onely, in the same place where they were, and not to be so hard hearted vnto him as to driue him thence, lacking all needfull things, and so to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall enemies. But Seleucus mistrusting his demand, sent vnto him that he should winter if he thought good, two moneths, but no more, in the country of CATAONIA, so he gaue him the chiefest of his friends for hostages: howbeit in the meane time he stopped vp all the waies and passages going from thence into SYRIA. Demetrius now seeing himselfe kept in of all sides, like a beast to be taken in the toyle, he was driuen to trust to his owne strength. Thereupon he ouerranne the countrey thereabouts, and so often as it was his chance to haue any skirmish or conflict with Seleucus, he had euer the better of him: and sometime also when they draue the armed carts with sithes against him, he ouercame them, and put the rest to flight. Then he draue them away that kept the toppe of the mountaines, and had barred the passages to keepe him that he should not goe into SYRIA, and so kept them himselfe. In fine, finding his mens hearts lift vp againe, and pretily encouraged, his heart also grew so bigge, that he determined to fight a battell with Seleucus, and to set all at sixe and seuen. So that Seleucus was at a straight with himselfe, and wist not what to do. For he had returned backe the aide which Lyſimachus ſent vnto him, becauſe he was afraid of him, & miſtruſted him. On the other ſide alſo he durſt not fight with Demetrius alone, being afraid to venture himſelfe with a deſperate man: and alſo miſtrulting much his vnconſtant fortune, the which hauing brought him to great extremity, raiſed him vp againe to great proſperity. But in the meane ſpace Demetrius fell into a great ſickneſſe, the which brought his body very weake and low, and had almoſt vtterly ouerthrowne his affaires. For his ſoldiers, ſome of them yeelded themſelues to his enemies, and others ſtole away without leaue, and went where they liſted. Afterwards when he had hardly recouered his health, and within forty daies ſpace was pretily growne to ſtrength againe, with thoſe few ſoldiers that remained with him, he ſeemed to his enemies, that he would go and inuade CILICIA: but then ſuddenly in the night without ſounding any trumpet, he remoued his campe, and went another way; and hauing paſſed ouer mount Amanus, he ſpoiled the countrey vnder it, as farre as the region of CYRRESTICA. But Seleucus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereupon Demetrius ſodainely armed his men, and went out by night to aſſault Seleucus, and to take him ſleeping when he miſtruſted nothing. So that Seleucus knew nothing of his ſtealing on him, but late enough, vntil that certaine traitors of Demetrius campe that fled before, went quickly to aduertiſe him, finding him aſleepe, and brought him newes of the danger he was in. Then Seleucus in a maze and feare withall, got vp, and ſounded the alarme: and as he was putting on his hoſe and making him ready, he cried out, (ſpeaking to his friends and familiars about him) We haue now a cruell & dangerous beaſt to deale with. Demetrius on the other ſide perceiuing by the great ſtir and noiſe he heard in the enemies camp, that his enterpriſe was diſcouered, he retired againe with ſpeed, and the next morning by breake of day, Seleucus went and offered him battel. Demetrius prepared himſelfe to ioyne with him, and hauing giuen one of his faithfull friends the leading of one of the wings of his army, himſelfe led the other, and ouerthrew ſome of his enemies on his ſide. But Seleucus in the midſt of the battell lighted from his horſe, and taking his helmet from his head, he tooke a target on his arme, & went to the firſt rankes of his army, to make himſelf knowne vnto Demetrius men: perſwading them to yeeld themſelues vnto him, and to acknowledge in the end, that he had ſo long time deferred to giue them battell, rather to ſaue them, then to ſpare Demetrius. Demetrius ſoldiers hearing him ſay ſo, they did him humble reuerence, and acknowledging him for their king, they all yeelded vnto him. Demetrius hauing ſundry times before proued ſo many changes and ouerthrowes of fortune, thinking yet to eſcape this laſt alſo, and to paſſe it ouer, he fled vnto the gates Amanides, which are certain ſtraights of ỹ mount Amanus. There he found certaine litle thick groues, where he determined to ſtay all night with certaine gentlemen of his houſe, and a few other of his houſhold ſeruants and officers which had followed him: meaning, if he could poſſible, to take his way towards the city of CAVNVS, to go to that ſea coaſt, hoping to heare of his ſhips there. But when it was told him, he had no victuals nor prouiſion left but only to ſerue him that day, he began then to deuiſe ſome other way. At length one of his familiar friends Soſigenes came vnto him, that had foure hundred peeces of gold about him in his girdle. So hoping that with the ſame money he might flie to the ſea, they tooke their way by night directly to the top of the mountaine. But when they perceiued that the enemies kept watch there, and that there were great ſtore of fires hard by them, they then deſpaired to paſſe any farther, leſt they ſhould be ſeene. So they turned to the ſelfe ſame place from whence they came, not all of them, for ſome of them fled: neither had they that remained alſo any life in them, as before. So one amongſt the reſt tooke vpon him to ſay, that there was no other way to eſcape, but to put Demetrius into Seleucus hands. Demetrius therewithall drew out his ſword, & would haue ſlaine himſelfe: but his friends about him would not ſuffer him, but perſwaded him to yeeld himſelfe vnto Seleucus. Thereupon he ſent vnto Seleucus, to tell him that he yeelded himſelfe vnto him. Seleucus was ſo ioyfull of the newes, that he ſaid, it was not Demetrius good fortune that ſaued him, but his owne: who beſides many other happie good turnes ſhe had done him, gaue him yet ſo honourable occaſion and good hap, as to make the world to know his clemencie and courteſie. Thereupon immediatly he called for his Officers of houſhold, and commanded them to ſet vp his richeſt pauilion, & to prepare all things meet to receiue him honorably. There was one Appolonides a gentleman in Seleucus court, who ſometime had bene very familiar with Demetrius: him Seleucus ſent immediatly vnto Demetrius, to will him to be of good cheare, and not to be affraid to come vnto the king his maſter, for he ſhould find him his very good friend.

Demetrius deſpairing of his good ſucceſſe, attempteth to aſſault Seleucus by night.

Demetrius armie forſooke him, and yeelded themſelues to Seleucus. Demetrius flyeth from Seleucus.

Demetrius yeeldeth himſelfe vnto Seleucus.

So ſoone as the kings pleaſure was knowne, a few of his Courtiers went at the firſt to meet him: but afterwards, euery man ſtriued who ſhould go meete him firſt, becauſe they were all in hope that he ſhould preſently be much made of, and grow in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitie into enuie, and gaue occaſion alſo to Demetrius enemies and ſpitefull men, to turne the kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and dangers, ſaying, that certainly ſo ſoone as the ſouldiers ſaw him, there would grow great ſtirre and change in their campe. And therefore, ſhortly after that Apollonides was come vnto Demetrius, being glad to bring him theſe good newes, and as others alſo followed him one after another, bringing him ſome good newes from Seleucus; & that Demetrius himſelfe after ſo great an ouerthrow (although that before he thought it a ſhamefull part of him to haue yeelded his body into his enemies hands) changed his mind at that time, and began then to grow bold, and to haue good hope to recouer his ſtate againe: behold there came one of Seleucus Captaines called Pauſanias, accompanied with a thouſand footmen and horſemen in all, who compaſſed in Demetrius with them, and made the reſt depart that were come vnto him before; hauing charge giuen him not to bring him to the Court, but to conuey him into CHERRONESVS of SYRIA, whither he was brought, & euer after had a ſtrong garriſon about him to keepe him. But otherwiſe, Seleucus ſent him officers, mony, and all things elſe meete for a Princes houſe: and his ordinary fare was ſo delicate, that he could wiſh for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of liberty and pleaſure appointed him, both to ride his horſe in, and alſo pleaſant walkes, and goodly arbours to walke or ſit in, and fine parkes full of beaſts where he might hunt: moreouer, the king ſuffered his owne houſhold ſeruants that followed him when he fled, to remaine with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came ſome one or other vnto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that ſo ſoone as Antiochus and Stratonice were come, they would make ſome good agreement and peace betweene them. Demetrius remaining in this ſtate, wrote vnto his ſon Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieutenants which he had at CORINTH and ATHENS, that they ſhould giue no credite to any letters written in his name, though his ſeale were to them: but that they ſhould keepe the townes they had in charge for his ſon Antigonus, and all the reſt of his forces, as if he himſelfe were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captiuity of his father, he marueilous grieuouſly tooke his hard fortune, wearing blackes for ſorrow, & wrote vnto all the other kings, but vnto Seleucus ſpecially, beſeeching him to take him as a pledge for his father, & that he was ready to yeeld vp al that he kept, to haue his fathers liberty. The like requeſt did many cities make vnto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lyſimachus: who promiſed Seleucus a great ſumme of mony to put Demetrius to death. But Seleucus, who of long time had no great fancie to Lyſimachus, but rather vtterly deſpiſed him, did then thinke him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wicked requeſt he made vnto him. Wherefore he ſtill delayed time, becauſe he would haue Demetrius deliuered by his ſonne Antiochus and Stratonices meanes, for that Demetrius ſhould be bound to them for his deliuerie, and for euer ſhould acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently tooke his hard fortune, ſo did he daily more and more forget the miſery he was in. For firſt of all, he gaue himſelfe to riding and hunting, as far as the place gaue him liberty. Then by litle and litle he grew to be very groſſe, and to giue ouer ſuch paſtimes, and therewithall he fell vnto drunkenneſſe and dicing: ſo that in that ſort he paſſed away the moſt part of his time (as it ſhould ſeeme) either to auoide the grieuous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was ſober; or elſe vnder colour of drunkennes and eating, to ſhadow the thoughts he had: or elſe finding in himſelfe that it was that manner of life he had long deſired, and that through his vaine ambition and folly till that time he could neuer attaine vnto; greatly turmoyling and troubling himſelfe and others, ſuppoſing to find in warres, by ſea and land, the felicity and delight which he had found in eaſe and idleneſſe, when he neither thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better end can euill and vnaduiſed kings and princes looke for, of all their troubles, dangers, and warres? who indeed deceiue themſelues greatly, not onely for that they follow their pleaſure and delights as their chiefeſt felicity, in ſtead of vertue and honeſt life: but alſo, becauſe that in truth they cannot be mery and take their pleaſure as they would. So Demetrius after he had bene ſhut vp in CHERRONESVS three yeares together, by eaſe, groſſeneſſe, and drunkennes, fell ſick of a diſeaſe whereof he died, when he was foure & fiftie yeares old. Therfore was Seleucus greatly blamed, and he himſelfe alſo did much repent him that he ſo ſuſpected him him as he did, and that he followed not Dromichetes curteſie, a barbarous man borne in THRACIA, who had ſo royally and courteouſly intreated Lyſimachus, whom he had taken priſoner in the warres. But yet there was ſome tragicall pompe in the order of his funerall. For his ſon Antigonus vnderſtanding that they brought him the aſhes of his body, he took ſea with all his ſhips, and went to meete them, to receiue them in the Iſles: and when he had receiued them, he ſet vp the funerall pot of gold (in the which were his embers) vpon the poope of his Admirall galley. So all the cities and townes whereby they paſſed or harboured, ſome of them did put garlands of flowers about the pot, others alſo ſent a number of men thither in mourning apparell, to accompany and honour the conuoy, to the very ſolemnity of his funerals. In this ſort ſailed all the whole fleet towards the city of CORINTH, the pot being plainely ſeene farre off, ſtanding on the top of the Admirall galley: all the place about it being hanged with purple; and ouer it, the Diademe or royall band; and about it, alſo were goodly young men armed, which were as Penſioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famouſeſt Muſitian in that time, being ſet hard by it, played a ſweet and lamentable ſong on the flute, wherewithall the oares keeping ſtroke and meaſure, the ſound did meete with a gallant grace, as in a conuoy where the mourners doe knock their breaſts at the foot of euery verſe. But that which moſt made ý people of CORINTH to weepe and lament, which ran to the peere, and all alongſt the ſhore ſide to ſee it, was Antigonus, whom they ſaw all beblubbered with teares, apparelled as a mourner in blacks. Now after they had brought a wonderfull number of garlands and noſegayes, and caſt them vpon the funerall pot, and had ſolemnized al the honours poſſible for the funerals at CORINTH, Antigonus caried away the pot to burie it in the city of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the name of Demetrius that was dead, and was a new city, that had bene repleniſhed with people, and built of little townes which are about IOLCOS. Demetrius left two children by his firſt wife Phila, to wit, Antigonus and Stratonice: and two other ſonnes, both of them named Demetrius, the one ſurnamed the leane, of a woman of ILLYRIA, & the other, king of the CYRENIANS, of his wife Ptolemæide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who liued in ÆGYPT. And it is reported alſo, that he had another ſonne called Corrhæbus, by his wife Euridice, and that his poſterity reigned by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, vntill the time of Perſeus: who was the laſt king of MACEDON, whom the ROMAINES ouercame by Paulus Æmylius, and wan all the realme of MACEDON vnto the Empire of ROME. THE LIFE OF Marcus Antonius.

ANTONIVS grandfather was that famous Orator whom Marius slue becauſe he tooke Syllaes part. His father was another Antonius ſurnamed *Cretan, who was not ſo famous, nor bare any great ſway in the commonwealth: howbeit otherwiſe he was an honeſt man, and of a very good nature, and ſpecially very liberall in giuing, as appeareth by an act he did. He was not very wealthie, and therefore his wife would not let him vſe his liberality and franke nature. One day a friend of his comming to him to pray him to helpe him to ſome money, hauing great need, Antonius by chance had no money to giue him, but he commanded one of his men to bring him ſome water in a ſiluer baſin; and after hee had brought it him, he waſhed his beard as though he meant to haue ſhaued it, and then found an arrand for his man to ſend him out, and gaue his friend the ſiluer baſin, and bade him get him money with that. Shortly after, there was a great ſtirre in the houſe among the ſeruants, ſeeking out of this ſiluer baſin. Inſomuch as Antonius ſeeing his wife maruellouſly offended for it, and that ſhe would examine all her ſeruants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it, at length he confeſſed he had giuen it away, and prayed her to be contented. His wife was Iulia, of the noble houſe and family of Iulius Cæſar: who for her vertue and chaſtitie, was to be compared with the nobleſt Lady of her time. Marcus Antonius was brought vp vnder her, being maried after her firſt husbands death, vnto Cornelius Lentulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus and others, for that he was of Catilines conſpiracie againſt the Commonwealth. And this ſeemeth to be the originall cauſe and beginning of the cruell and mortall hate Antonius bare vnto Cicero. For Antonius ſelfe ſaith, that he would neuer giue him the body of his father in law to burie him, before his mother went firſt to intreate Ciceroes wife: the which vndoubtedly was a flat lie. For Cicero denied buriall to none of them whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a faire young man, and in the prime of his youth, he fell acquainted with Curio, whoſe friendſhip and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague vnto him. For he was a diſſolute man, giuen ouer to all luſt and inſolencie, who to haue Antonius the better at his commandement, trained him on into great follies, and vaine expences vpon women, in rioting and banquetting: ſo that in ſhort time, he brought Antonius into a maruellous great debt, and too great for one of his yeares, to wit, of two hundred and fiftie talents, for all which ſumme Curio was his ſuretie. His father hearing of it, did put his ſonne from him, and forbad him his houſe.*

Because that by his death he ended the war which hee vnfortunately made againſt thoſe of Creta.

Then

Then he fell in with Clodius, one of the desperateſt and moſt wicked Tribunes at that time in ROME. Him he followed for a time in his deſperate attempts, who bred great ſtirre & miſchiefe in ROME: but at length he forſooke him, being wearie of his raſhneſſe and folly, or elſe for that he was afraid of them that were bent againſt Clodius. Thereupon he left ITALY, and went into GRECE, and there beſtowed the moſt part of his time, ſomtime in wars, and otherwhile in the ſtudie of eloquence. He vſed a maner of phraſe in his ſpeech, called Aſiaticke, which caried the beſt grace and eſtimation at that time, and was much like to his manners & life: for it was full of oſtentation, fooliſh brauery, and vaine ambition. After he had remained there ſome time, Gabinius Proconſull going into SYRIA, perſwaded him to go with him; Antonius told him he would not go as a priuate man: wherefore Gabinius gaue him charge of his horſemen, and ſo tooke him with him. So, firſt of all he ſent him againſt Ariſtobulus, who had made the IEVVES to rebell, and was the firſt man himſelfe that got vp to the wall of a caſtell of his, and ſo draue Ariſtobulus out of all his holds: and with thoſe few men he had with him, he ouercame all the IEVVES in ſet battell, which were many againſt one, and put all of them almoſt to the ſword; and furthermore, tooke Ariſtobulus himſelfe priſoner with his ſonne. Afterwards Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT, that had bene driuen out of his country, went vnto Gabinius to intreat him to go with his army with him into ÆGYPT, to put him againe into his kingdome: and promiſed him if he would go with him, ten thouſand talents. The moſt part of the Captaines thought it not beſt to go thither, and Gabinius himſelfe made it dainty to enter into this warre, although the couetouſneſſe of theſe 10000 talents ſtuck ſorely with him. But Antonius that ſought but for oportunity and good occaſion to attempt great enterpriſes, and that deſired alſo to gratifie Ptolomies requeſt, he went about to perſwade Gabinius to go this voyage. Now they were more afraid of the way they ſhould go, to come to the city of PELVSIVM, then they feared any danger of the war beſides: becauſe they were to paſſe through deepe ſands and deſert places, where was no freſh water to be had all the mariſhes through, which are called the mariſhes Serbonides, which the ÆGYPTIANS cal the exhalations or fume, by the which the giant Typhon breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the ouerflowing of the red ſea, which breaketh out vnder the ground in that place where it is deuided in the narroweſt place from the ſea on this ſide. So Antonius was ſent before into ÆGYPT with his horſemen, who did not onely win that paſſage, but alſo tooke the city of PELVSIVM (which is a great citie) with all the ſouldiers in it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it ſafe for all the reſt of the army, and the hope of the victory alſo certaine for his Captaine. Now did the enemies themſelues feele the fruites of Antonius courteſie, and the deſire he had to winne honour: for when Ptolomy (after he had entred into the city of PELVSIVM) for the malice he bare vnto the city, would haue put all the ÆGYPTIANS in it to the ſword, Antonius withſtood him, and by no meanes would ſuffer him to do it. And in all other great battels and skirmiſhes which they fought, being many in number, Antonius did many noble acts of a valiant and wiſe Capiaine: but ſpecially in one battell, where he compaſſed in the enemies behind, giuing them the victory that fought in front, whereby he afterwards had ſuch honorable reward, as his valiantneſſe deſerued. So was his great courteſie alſo much commended of all, the which he ſhewed vnto Archelaus: for hauing bene his very friend, he made warre with him againſt his will while he liued; but after his death he fought for his body, & gaue it honorable burial. For theſe reſpects he wan himſelfe great fame of them of ALEXANDRIA, and he was alſo thought a worthy man of all the ſouldiers in the ROMAINS camp. But beſides all this, he had a noble preſence, and ſhewed a countenance of one of a noble houſe: he had a goodly thicke beard, a broad forehead, crooked noſed, and there appeared ſuch a manly looke in his countenance, as is commonly ſeene in Hercules pictures, ſtamped or grauen in mettall. Now it had bene a ſpeech of old time, that the family of the Antonij were deſcended from one Anton the ſon of Hercules, whereof the family tooke name. This opinion did Antonius ſeeke to confirme in all his doings: not only reſembling him in the likeneſſe of his body, as we haue ſaid before, but alſo in the wearing of his garments. For when he would openly ſhew himſelfe abroad before many people, he would alwaies weare his caſſocke girt downe low vpon his hippes, with a great ſword hanging by his ſide, and vpon that, ſome ill-fauored cloake. Furthermore, things that ſeeme intollerable in other men, as to boaſt commonly, to ieſt with one or other, to drinke like a good fellow with euery body, to ſit with the ſouldiers when they dine, and to eate and drinke with them ſouldierlike, it is incredible what wonderfull loue it wan him amongſt them. And furthermore, being giuen to loue, that made him the more desired, and by that meanes he brought many to loue him. For he would further euery mans loue, and also would not be angry that men should merrily tell him of those he loued. But besides all this, that which most procured his rising and aduancement, was his liberality, who gaue all to the souldiers, and kept nothing for himselfe: and when he was growne to great credite, then was his authority and power also very great, the which notwithstanding himselfe did ouerthrow by a thousand other faults he had. In this place I will shew you one example only of his wonderfull liberality. He commanded one day his cofferer that kept his mony, to giue a friend of his fiue and twenty Myriades, which the Romaines call in their tongue, Decies. His cofferer maruelling at it, and being angry withall in his mind, brought him all this money in a heape together, to shew him what a maruellous masse of mony it was. Antonius seeing it as he went by, asked what it was: the cofferer answered him, It was the mony he willed him to giue vnto his friend. Then Antonius perceiuing the spite of his man, I thought (said he) that Decies had bene a greater summe of money then it is, for this is but a trifle: and therefore he gaue his friend as much more another time, but that was afterwards. Now the Romains maintaining two factions at Rome at that time, one against the other, of the which, they that tooke part with the Senate did ioyne with Pompey being then in Rome: and the cõtrary side taking part with the people, sent for Cæsar to aide them, who made wars in Gaule: then Curio, Antonius friend, that had changed his garments, and at that time tooke part with Cæsar, whose enemy he had bene before, he wanne Antonius; and so handled the matter, partly through the great credit & sway he bare amongst the people, by reason of his eloquent tongue, and partly also by his exceeding expence of money he made which Cæsar gaue him: that Antonius was chosen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great helpe and furtherance to Cæsars practises. For so soone as Antonius became Tribune, he did oppose himselfe against those things which the Consull Marcellus preferred (who ordained that certaine legions which had bin already leauied and billed, should be giuen vnto Cneus Pompey, with further commission and authority to leauie others vnto them) and set downe an order, that the souldiers which were already leauied and assembled, should be sent into Syria for a new supply vnto Marcus Bibulus, who made warre at that time against the Parthians. And further, gaue a prohibition that Pompey should leauy no more men, and also that the souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompeys friends and followers would not suffer Cæsars letters to be receiued, and openly read in the Senate, Antonius hauing power and warrant by his person, through the holinesse of his Tribuneship, did reade them openly, and made diuerse men change their minds: for it appeared to them that Cæsar by his letters required no vnreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of consideration vnto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey or Cæsar should leaue their army, there were few of the Senators that thought it meete Pompey should leaue his army, but they all in manner commaunded Cæsar to do it. Then Antonius rising vp, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cæsar both, should leaue their armies. Thereupon all the Senators ioyntly together gaue their whole consent, and with a great crie commending Antonius, they prayed him to referre it to the iudgement of the Senate. But the Consuls would not allow of that. Therfore Cæsars friends preferred other reasonable demaunds and requests againe, but Cato spake against them: and Lentulus, one of the Consuls draue Antonius by force out of the Senate, who at his going out made grieuous curses against him. After that, he tooke a slaues gowne, and speedily fled to Cæsar, with Quintus Cassius, in a hired coach. When they came to Cæsar, they cried out with open mouth, that all went hand ouer head at Rome: for the Tribunes of the people might not speake their mindes; and were driuen away in great danger of their liues, as many as stood with law and iustice. Hereupon Cæsar went incontinently into Italy with his army, which made Cicero say in his Philippides: That as Hellen was cause of the warre of Troy, so was Antonius the author of the ciuill wars; which indeed was a starke lie. For Cæsar was not so fickle headed, nor so easily caried away with anger, that he would so suddenly haue gone and made warre with his countrey, vpon the sight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled to him in miserable apparell, and in a hired coach, had he not long before determined it with himselfe. But sith indeed Cæsar looked of long time but for some colour, this came as he wished, and gaue him iust occasion of warre. But to say truly, nothing else moued him to make war with all the world as he did, but one selfe cause, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus also before him, to wit, an insatiable desire to reigne, with a senslesse couetousnesse to be the best man in the world; the which he could not come vnto, before he had first put downe Pompey, and vtterly ouerthrowne him. Now after that Cæsar had gotten ROME at his commandement, & had driuen Pompey out of ITALY, he purposed first to go into SPAINE against the legions Pompey had there: and in the meane time to make prouision for ships and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his absence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor, gouernor of ROME: and Antonius that was Tribune, he gaue him charge of all the souldiers, & of ITALY. Then was Antonius straight maruellously commended & beloued of the souldiers, because he commonly exercised himself among them, and would oftentimes eate and drink with them, and also be liberall vnto them, according to his ability. But then in contrary maner, he purchased diuers other mens euill wils, because that through negligence he would not doe them iustice that were iniured, and dealt very churlishly with them that had any suite vnto him: and besides all this, he had an ill name to intice mens wiues. To conclude, Cæsars friends that gouerned vnder him, were cause why they hated Cæsars gouernment (which indeed in respect of himself was no lesse then a tyranny) by reason of the great insolencies and outragious parts that were committed: amongst whom Antonius that was of greatest power, and that also committed greatest faults, deserued most blame. But Cæsar notwithstanding, when he returned from ỹ wars of SPAINE, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put vp against him: but contrarily, because he found him a hardie man, and a valiant Captaine, he employed him in his chiefest affaires, and was no whit deceiued in his opinion of him. So he passed ouer the IONIAN sea vnto BRVNDVSIVM, being but slenderly accompanied, and sent vnto Antonius and Gabinius, that they should imbarke their men as soone as they could, and passe them ouer into MACEDON. Gabinius was afraid to take the sea, because it was very rough, and in the winter time: and therfore fetched a great compasse about by land. But Antonius fearing some danger might come vnto Cæsar, because he was compassed in with a great number of enemies, first of all he draue away Libo, who rode at anker with a great armie before the hauen of BRVNDVSIVM. For he manned out such a number of pinnaces, barkes, and other small boates about euery one of his galleys, that he draue him thence. After that, he imbarked into ships 20000 footmen, and 800 horsemen, and with this army he hoised saile. When the enemies saw him, they made out to follow him: but the sea rose so high, that the billowes put back their galleys that they could not come neare him, and so he escaped that danger. But withall he fell vpon the rockes with his whole fleete, where the sea wrought very high, so that he was out of all hope to saue himselfe. Yet by good fortune, suddenly the wind turned South-west, and blew from the gulfe, driuing the waues of the riuer into the maine sea. Thus Antonius loosing from the land, and sailing with safety at his pleasure, soone after he saw all the coasts full of shipwracks. For the force and boisterousnesse of the wind did cast away the galleys that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splitted, and diuers also cast away; and Antonius tooke a great number of them prisoners, with a great summe of money also. Besides all these, he tooke the city of LYSSVS, and brought Cæsar a great supply of men, and made him couragious, comming at a pinch with so great a power to him. Now there were diuers hot skirmishes and encounters, in the which Antonius fought so valiantly, that he caried the praise from them all: but specially at two seuerall times, when Cæsars men turned their backes, and fled for life. For he stepped before them, and compelled them to returne againe to fight: so that the victory fell on Cæsars side. For this cause he had the second place in the campe among the souldiers, and they spake of no other man vnto Cæsar, but of him: who shewed plainely what opinion he had of him, when at the last battell of PHARSALIA (which indeed was the last triall of all, to giue the conquerour the whole Empire of the world) he himselfe did leade the right wing of his army, and gaue Antonius the leading of the left wing, as the valiantest man and skilfullest souldier of all those he had about him. After Cæsar had won the victory, and that he was created Dictator, he followed Pompey steppe by steppe: howbeit, before he named Antonius Generall of the horsemen, and sent him to ROME. The Generall of the horsemen is the second office of dignity, when the Dictator is in the city: but when he is abroad, he is the chiefest man, and almost the onely man that remaineth, and all the other officers and magistrates are put downe, after there is a Dictator chosen. Notwithstanding, Dolabella being at that time Tribune, and a young man desirous of change and innouation, he preferred a law which the ROMAINES call Nouas tabulas (as much to say, as a cutting off and cancelling of all obligations and specialties; and were called New tables, because they were driuen

then to make bookes of daily receipt and expence,) and perſwaded Antonius his friend (who alſo gaped for a good occaſion to pleaſe and gratifie the common people) to aide him to paſſe this law. But Trebellius and Aſinius diſſwaded from it all they could poſſible. So by good hap it chanced that Antonius miſtruſted Dolabella for keeping of his wife, and tooke ſuch a conceit of it, that he thruſt his wife out of his houſe, being his coſin germane, and the daughter of C. Antonius, who was Conſull with Cicero; and ioyning with Aſinius, he reſiſted Dolabella, and fought with him. Dolabella had gotten the market place, where the people do aſſemble in councell, and had filled it full of armed men, intending to haue this law of the New tables to paſſe by force. Antonius by commandement of the Senate, who had giuen him authority to leauie men, and to vſe force againſt Dolabella, went againſt him, and fought ſo valiantly, that men were ſlaine on both ſides. But by this meanes he got the ill will of the common people; and on the other ſide, the noble men (as Cicero ſaith) did not onely miſlike him, but alſo hate him for his naughty life: for they did abhor his banquets and drunken feaſts he made at vnſeaſonable times, and his extreme waſtfull expences vpon vaine light huſwiues; and then in the day time he would ſleepe or walke out his drunkenneſſe, thinking to weare away the fume of the abundance of wine which he had taken ouer night. In his houſe they did nothing but feaſt, dance, and maske: and himſelfe paſſed away the time in hearing of fooliſh playes, and in marrying theſe players, tumblers, ieſters, and ſuch ſort of people. As for proofe herof it is reported, that at Hippias mariage, one of his ieſters, he drank wine ſo luſtily all night, that the next morning when he came to pleade before the people aſſembled in councell, who had ſent for him, he being quaſie ſtomacked with his ſurfet he had taken, was compelled to lay vp all before them, and one of his friends held him his gowne in ſtead of a baſin. He had another pleaſant player called Sergius, that was one of ỹ chiefeſt men about him, and a woman alſo called Cytheride, of the ſame profeſſion, whom he loued dearly: he caried her vp and downe in a litter vnto all the townes he went, and had as many men waiting vpō her litter (ſhe being but a player) as were attending vpon his own mother. It grieued honeſt men alſo very much, to ſee that when he went into the country he caried with him a great number of cupboords full of ſiluer and gold plate openly in the face of the world, as it had bene the pompe or ſhew of ſome triumph: & that eftſoones in the middeſt of his iourny he would ſet vp his hals and tents hard by ſome greene groue or pleaſant riuer, & therehis cooks ſhould prepare him a ſumptuous dinner. And furthermore, Lions were harneſſed in traſes to draw his carts: and beſides alſo, in honeſt mens houſes in the cities where he came, he would haue common harlots, curtizans, and theſe tumbling gillots lodged. Now it grieued men much, to ſee that Cæſar ſhould be out of Italy following of his enemies, to end this great war with ſuch great perill & danger, and that others in the meane time abuſing his name and authority, ſhould commit ſuch inſolent and outragious parts vpon their citizens. This me thinks was the cauſe that made the conſpiracy againſt Cæſar increaſe more and more, and layed the reines of the bridle vpon the ſouldiers neckes, whereby they durſt more boldly commit many extortions, cruelties & robberies. And therfore Cæſar after his returne pardoned Dolabella, and being created Conſull the third time, he tooke not Antonius, but choſe Lepidus his colleague and fellow Conſull. Afterwards when Pompeys houſe was put to open ſale, Antonius bought it: but when they asked him mony for it, he made it very ſtrange, and was offended with them; and writeth himſelfe that he would not go with Cæſar into the warres of Africke, becauſe he was not well recompenced for the ſeruice he had done him before. Yet Cæſar did ſomewhat bridle his madneſſe and inſolencie, not ſuffering him to paſſe his faults ſo lightly away, making as though he ſaw them not. And therfore he left his diſſolute maner of life, and maried Fuluia that was Clodius widow, a woman not ſo baſely minded to ſpend her time in ſpinning and houſewiuery; and was not contented to maſter her husband at home, but would alſo rule him in his office abroad, and commanded him that commanded legions and great armies: ſo that Cleopatra was to giue Fuluia thankes for that ſhe had taught Antonius this obedience to women, that learned ſo well to be at their commandement. Now, becauſe Fuluia was ſomewhat ſowre and crooked of condition, Antonius deuiſed to make her pleaſanter, and ſomewhat better diſpoſed: and therefore he would play her many pretie youthfull parts to make her merry. As he did once, when Cæſar returned the laſt time of all conquerour out of Spaine, euery man went out to meete him, and ſo did Antonius with the reſt. But on the ſudden there ranne a rumour through Italie, that Cæſar was dead, and that his enemies came againe with a great armie. Thereupon he returned with ſpeed to Rome,

Rome, and tooke one of his mens gownes, and ſo apparelled came home to his houſe in a darke night, ſaying, that he had brought Fuluia letters from Antonius. So he was let in, and brought to her muffled as he was, for being knowne: but ſhe taking the matter heauily, asked him if Antonius were well. Antonius gaue her the letters, and ſaid neuer a word. So when ſhe had opened the letters, and began to reade them, Antonius ramped on her neck, & kiſſed her. We haue told you this tale for examples ſake only, and ſo could we alſo tell you of many ſuch like as theſe. Now when Cæſar was returned from his laſt warre in Spaine, all the chiefeſt nobility of the city rode many daies iourny from Rome to meete him, where Cæſar made maruellous much of Antonius aboue all the men that came vnto him. For he alwaies tooke him into his coach with him throughout al Italy, and behind him Brutus Albinus and Octauius the ſon of his Neece, who afterwards was called Cæſar, and became Emperor of Rome long time after. So Cæſar being afterwards choſen Conſull the fift time, he immediatly choſe Antonius his colleague and companion: & deſired by depoſing himſelfe of his Conſulſhip, to make Dolabella Conſull in his roome, and had already moued it to the Senate. But Antonius did ſtoutly withſtand it, and openly reuiled Dolabella in the Senate, and Dolabella alſo ſpared him as litle. Thereupon Cæſar being aſhamed of the matter, he let it alone. Another time alſo when Cæſar attempted againe to ſubſtitute Dolabella Conſull in his place, Antonius cried out, that the ſignes of the birds were againſt it: ſo that at length Cæſar was compelled to giue him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was maruellouſly offended with him. Now in truth, Cæſar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cæſar anſwered one that did accuſe Antonius and Dolabella vnto him for ſome matter of conſpiracie: Tuſh ſaid he, they be not thoſe fat fellowes and fine combed men that I feare, but I miſtruſt rather theſe pale and leane men, meaning by Brutus and Caſſius, who afterwards conſpired his death, and ſlue him. Antonius vnwares afterwards gaue Cæſars enemies iuſt occaſion and colour to do as they did: as you ſhall heare. The Romaines by chance celebrated the feaſt called Lupercalia, and Cæſar being apparelled in his triumphing robe, was ſet in the Tribune where they vſe to make their Orations to the people, and from thence did behold the ſport of the runners. The maner of this running was thus: On that day there are many yong men of noble houſe, and thoſe ſpecially that be chiefe officers for that yeare, who running naked vp & down the city, annointed with the oile of oliue, for pleaſure do ſtrike them they meet in their way, with white leather thongs they haue in their hands. Antonius being one among the reſt that was to run, leauing the ancient ceremonies and old cuſtomes of that ſolemnity, he ran to the Tribune where Cæſar was ſet, & caried a laurell crowne in his hand, hauing a royall band or diademe wreathed about it, which in old time was the ancient marke and token of a king. When he was come to Cæſar, he made his fellow runners with him lift him vp, and ſo he did put his laurel crowne vpon his head, ſignifying thereby that he had deſerued to be king. But Cæſar making as though he refuſed it, turned away his head. The people were ſo reioyced at it, that they al clapped their hãds for ioy. Antonius againe did put it on his head: Cæſar again refuſed it; and thus they were ſtriuing off & on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this laurel crown vnto him, a few of his followers reioyced at it: and as oft alſo as Cæſar refuſed it, all the people together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they ſuffered all things ſubiects ſhould do by commandement of their kings: and yet they could not abide the name of a king, deteſting it as the vtter deſtructiõ of their liberty. Cæſar in a rage aroſe out of his ſeate, and plucking downe the coller of his gown from his necke, he ſhewed it naked, bidding any man ſtrike off his head that would. This laurell crowne was afterwards put vpon the head of one of Cæſars ſtatues or images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt off. The people liked his doing therin ſo wel, that they waited on him home to his houſe, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cæſar did turne them out of their offices for it. This was a good incoragement for Brutus and Caſſius to conſpire his death, who fell into a cõſort with their truſtieſt friends, to execute their enterpriſe, but yet ſtood doubtfull whether they ſhould make Antonius priuy to it or not. Al the reſt liked of it, ſauing Trebonius only. He told thẽ, that when they rode to meet Cæſar at his returne out of Spaine, Antonius & he alwaies keeping company, and lying together by the way, he felt his mind a far off: but Antonius finding his meaning, would hearken no more vnto it, & yet notwithſtanding neuer made Cæſar acquainted with this talke, but had faithfully kept it to himſelfe. After that they conſulted whether they ſhould kill Antonius with Cæſar. But Brutus would in no wiſe conſent to it, ſaying, that venturing on ſuch an enterpriſe as that, for the maintenance of law and iuſtice, it ought to be cleare from al villany.

Conſultatiõ about the murther of Antonius with Cæſar.

Yet they fearing Antonius power, & the authority of his office, appointed certaine of the conſpiracy, that when Cæſar were gone into the Senate, & while others ſhold execute their enterpriſe, they ſhould keep Antonius in a talke out of the Senate houſe. Euen as they had deuiſed theſe matters, ſo were they executed: and Cæſar was ſlaine in the middeſt of the Senate. Antonius being put in a feare withall, caſt a ſlaues gowne vpon him, & hid himſelfe. But afterwards when it was told him that the murtherers ſlue no man els, & that they went only into the Capitoll, he ſent his ſon vnto them for a pledge, and bade them boldly come down vpon his word. The ſelf ſame day he did bid Caſſius to ſupper, and Lepidus alſo bad Brutus. The next morning the Senate was aſſembled, and Antonius himſelf preferred a law, that all things paſt ſhould be forgotten, and that they ſhould appoint prouinces vnto Caſſius and Brutus: the which the Senate confirmed, and further ordained, that they ſhould cancell none of Cæſars lawes. Thus went Antonius out of the Senate more praiſed & better eſteemed then euer man was, becauſe it ſeemed to euery man that he had cut off all occaſion of ciuill wars, & that he had ſhewed himſelf a maruellous wiſe gouernour of the commonwealth, for the appeaſing of theſe matters of ſo great weight and importance. But now, the opinion he conceiued of himſelfe after he had a litle felt the good wil of the people towards him, hoping thereby to make himſelfe the chiefeſt man if he might ouercome Brutus, did eaſily make him alter his firſt mind. And therefore when Cæſars body was brought to the place where it ſhould be buried, he made a funerall Oration in cõmendation of Cæſar, according to the ancient cuſtome of praiſing noble men at their funerals. When he ſaw that the people were very glad & deſirous alſo to heare Cæſar ſpoken of, & his praiſes vttered, he mingled his Oration with lamentable words; & by amplifying of matters did greatly moue their hearts & affections vnto pitie & compaſſion. In fine to conclude his Oration, he vnfolded before the whole aſſembly the bloudy garments of the dead, thruſt through in many places with their ſwords, & called the malefactors, cruell and curſed murtherers. With theſe words he put the people into ſuch a fury, that they preſently tooke Cæſars body, and burnt it in the market place, with ſuch tables & formes as they could get together. Then when the fire was kindled, they tooke firebrands, and ran to the murtherers houſes to ſet them on fire, & to make them come out to fight. Brutus therfore & his accomplices, for ſafety of their perſons were driuen to flie the city. Then came all Cæſars friends vnto Antonius, & ſpecially his wife Calpurnia putting her truſt in him, ſhe brought the moſt part of her mony into his houſe, which amounted to ỹ ſum of 4000 talents; & furthermore brought him all Cæſars books and writings, in the which were his memorials of al that he had done & ordained. Antonius did daily mingle with them ſuch as he thought good, & by that means he created new officers, made new Senators, called home ſome that were baniſhed, and deliuered thoſe that were priſoners: and then he ſaid, that all thoſe things were ſo appointed and ordained by Cæſar. Therefore the Romaines mocking them that were ſo moued, they called them Charonites, becauſe that whẽ they were ouercome, they had no other help but to ſay, that thus they were found in Cæſars memorials, who had ſailed in Charons boate, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled abſolutely alſo in all other matters, becauſe he was Conſull, and Caius one of his brethren Prætor, and Lucius the other, Tribune. Now things remaining in this ſtate at Rome, Octauius Cæſar the yonger came to Rome, who was the ſon of Iulius Cæſars Neece, as you haue heard before, & was left his lawfull heire by will, remaining at the time of the death of his great vnkle that was ſlaine, in the city of Apollonia. This yong man at his firſt arriuall went to ſalute Antonius, as one of his late dead father Cæſars friends, who by his laſt will and teſtament had made him his heire: and withall, he was preſently in hand with him for mony and other things which were left of truſt in his hands; becauſe Cæſar had by will bequeathed vnto the people of Rome threeſcore and fifteene ſiluer Drachmaes to be giuen to euery man, the which he as heire ſtood charged withall. Antonius at the firſt made no reckoning of him, becauſe he was very yong, and ſaid, he lacked wit, and good friends to aduiſe him, if he looked to take ſuch a charge in hand, as to vndertake to be Cæſars heire. But when Antonius ſaw that he could not ſhake him off with thoſe words, and that he was ſtill in hand with him for his fathers goods, but ſpecially for the ready money, then he ſpake and did what he could againſt him. And firſt of all, it was he that did keepe him from being Tribune of the people: and alſo when Octauius Cæſar began to meddle with the dedicating of the chaire of gold, which was prepared by the Senate to honour Cæſar with, he threatned to ſend him to priſon, and moreouer deſiſted not to put the people in an vprore. This young Cæſar ſeeing his doings, went vnto Cicero and others, which were

Antonius enemies, and by them crept into fauour with the Senate: and he himselfe sought the peoples good will euery manner of way, gathering together the old souldiers of the late deceased Cæsar, which were dispersed in diuers cities and colonies. Antonius being affraid of it, talked with Octauius in the Capitoll, and became his friend. But the very same night Antonius had a strange dreame, who thought that lightning fell vpon him, and burnt his right hand. Shortly after word was brought him, that Cæsar lay in waite to kill him. Cæsar cleared himselfe vnto him and told him there was no such matter: but he could not make Antonius beleeue the contrarie. Whereupon they became further enemies then euer they were: insomuch that both of them made friends of either side to gather together all the old souldiers through ITALY, that were dispersed in diuers townes: and made them large promises, and sought also to win the legions on their side, which were already in armes. Cicero on the other side being at that time the chiefest man of authority and estimation in the city, he stirred vp all men against Antonius: so that in the end he made the Senate pronounce him an enemy to his country, and appointed young Cæsar Sergeants to cary axes before him, and such other signs as were incident to the dignity of a Cõsull or Prætor: and moreouer, sent Hircius and Pansa, then Consuls, to driue Antonius out of ITALIE. These two Consuls together with Cæsar, who also had an army, went against Antonius that besieged the city of MODENA, and there ouerthrew him in battell: but both the Consuls were slain there. Antonius flying vpon this ouerthrow, fell into great misery al at once: but the chiefest want of al other, & that pinched him most, was famine. Howbeit he was of such a strong nature, that by patience he would ouercome any aduersity, and the heauier fortune lay vpon him, the more constant shewed he himself. Euery man that feeleth want or aduersity, knoweth by vertue and discretion what he should do: but when indeed they are ouerlaid with extremity, and be sore oppressed, few haue the hearts to follow that which they praise and commend, and much lesse to auoid that they reproue & mislike: but rather to ŷ contrary, they yeeld to their accustomed easie life, and through faint heart, & lacke of courage, do change their first mind and purpose. And therefore it was a wonderfull example to the souldiers, to see Antonius that was brought vp in al fineneſſe & superfluity, so easily to drink puddle water, and to eate wild fruits & roots: & moreouer it is reported, that euen as they passed the Alpes, they did eate the barkes of trees, and such beasts as neuer man tasted of their flesh before. Now their intent was to ioyne with the legions that were on the other side of the mountains, vnder Lepidus charge: whom Antonius tooke to be his friend, because he had holpen him to many things at Cæsars hand, through his meanes. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he saw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venter himselfe, and to go vnto Lepidus. Since the ouerthrow he had at MODENA, he suffered his beard to grow at length and neuer clipt it, that it was maruellous long, & the haire of his head also without combing: and besides al this, he went in a mourning gown, and after this sort came hard to the trenches of Lepidus camp. Then he began to speake vnto the souldiers, & many of them their hearts yerned for pity to see him so poorely arrayed, and some also through his words began to pity him: insomuch that Lepidus began to be affraid, and therefore commanded all the trumpets to sound together to stop the souldiers eares, that they should not hearken to Antonius. This notwithstanding, the souldiers tooke the more pity of him, and spake secretly with him by Clodius and Lælius meanes, whom they sent vnto him disguised in womens apparell, and gaue him counsell that he should not be affraid to enter into their camp, for there were a great number of souldiers that would receiue him, and kill Lepidus, if he would say the word. Antonius wold not suffer them to hurt him, but the next morning he went with his army to wade a foord, at a litle riuer that ran betweene them: and himselfe was the formost man that tooke the riuer to get ouer, seeing a number of Lepidus campe that gaue him their hands, plucked vp the stakes, and layed flat the bancke of their trench to let him into their camp. When he was come into their camp, and that he had al the army at his commandement, he vsed Lepidus very courteously, imbraced him, and called him father: and though indeed Antonius did all, and ruled the whole army, yet he alway gaue Lepidus the name and honor of the Captaine. Munacius Plancus, lying also in campe hard by with an army, vnderstanding the report of Antonius curtesie, he also came and ioyned with him. Thus Antonius being a foot againe, and growne of great power, repassed ouer the Alpes, leading into ITALIE with him seuenteene legions, & ten thousand horsemen, besides sixe legions he left in garrison among the GAVLES, vnder the charge of one Varius, a companion of his that would

drinke luſtily with him, and therefore in mockerie was ſirnamed Cotylon, to wit, a bibber. So Octauius Cæſar would not leane to Cicero, when he ſaw that his whole trauell and indeuor was only to reſtore the commonwealth to her former liberty. Therefore he ſent certaine of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends againe: and thereupon all three met together (to wit, Cæſar, Antonius, and Lepidus) in an Iland enuironed round about with a litle riuer, and there remained three daies together. Now as touching all other matters, they were eaſily agreed, and did deuide all the Empire of Rome betweene them, as if it had bene their owne inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for euery one of them would kill their enemies, and ſaue their kinſemen and friends. Yet at length, giuing place to their greedy deſire to be reuenged of their enemies, they ſpurned all reuerence of bloud, and holineſſe of friendſhip at their feet. For Cæſar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius alſo forſooke Lucius Cæſar, who was his vncle by his mother: and both of them together ſuffered Lepidus to kill his own brother Paulus. Yet ſome writers affirme, that Cæſar and Antonius requeſted Paulus might be ſlaine, and that Lepidus was contented with it. In my opinion there was neuer a more horrible, vnnaturall, and crueller change then this was. For thus changing murther for murther, they did aſwell kill thoſe whom they did forſake and leaue vnto others, as thoſe alſo which others left vnto them to kill: but ſo much more was their wickedneſſe and cruelty great vnto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, and hauing no cauſe to hate them. After this plot was agreed vpon betweene them, the ſouldiers that were thereabouts, would haue his friendſhip & league betwixt them confirmed by mariage, and that Cæſar ſhould mary Claudia, the daughter of Fuluia Antonius wife. This mariage alſo being agreed vpon, they condemned 300 of the chiefeſt citizens of Rome, to be put to death by proſcription. And Antonius alſo cõmanded thẽ to whom he had giuen commiſſion to kill Cicero, that they ſhould ſtrike off his head and right hand, with the which he had written the inuectiue Orations (called Philippides) againſt Antonius. So when the murtherers brought him Ciceroes head and hand cut off, he beheld them a long time with great ioy, and laughed hartily, & that oftentimes for the great ioy he felt. Then when he had taken his pleaſure of the ſight of them, he cauſed them to be ſet vp in an open place, ouer the pulpit for Orations (where when he was aliue, he had oftẽ ſpoken to the people,) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not blemiſhed his own fortune, ſhewing himſelfe (to his great ſhame and infamy) a cruell man, and vnworthy the office and authority he bare. His vncle Lucius Cæſar alſo, as they ſought for him to kill him, & followed him hard, fled vnto his ſiſter. The murderers coming thither, forcing to breake into her chamber, ſhe ſtood at her chamber doore with her armes abroad, crying out ſtill: You ſhal not kill Lucius Cæſar, before you firſt kill me, that bare your captaine in my wombe. By this meanes ſhe ſaued her brothers life. Now the gouernment of theſe Triumuiri grew odious & hatefull to the Romaines, for diuers reſpects: but they moſt blamed Antonius, becauſe he being elder then Cæſar, & of more power and force then Lepidus, gaue himſelf againe to his former riot & exceſſe, whẽ he left to deale in the affaires of the cõmonwealth. But ſetting aſide the ill name he had for his inſolency, he was yet much more hated in reſpect of the houſe he dwelt in, the which was the houſe of Pompey the great: a man as famous for his temperance, modeſty, & ciuill life, as for his three triumphs. For it grieued them to ſee the gates cõmonly ſhut againſt the Captains, Magiſtrates of the city, & alſo Ambaſſadors of ſtrange nations which were ſometimes thruſt from the gate with violence: and that the houſe within was full of tumblers, anticke dancers, iuglers, players, ieſters, and drunkards, quaffing and guzling; and that on them he beſtowed the moſt part of his mony he got by al kind of poſſible extortions, bribery & policy. For they did not only ſell by the cryer the goods of thoſe whom they had outlawed and appointed to murder, ſlanderouſly deceiued the poore widowes & yong orphanes, & alſo raiſed al kinds of impoſts, ſubſidies and taxes: but vnderſtanding alſo that the holy Veſtall Nuns had certain goods and mony put in their cuſtody to keep, both of mens in the city, & thoſe alſo that were abroad, they went thither, and tooke them away by force. Octauius Cæſar perceiuing that no mony would ſerue Antonius turne, he prayed that they might deuide the mony betweene them, and ſo did they alſo deuide the army, for them both to go into Macedon to make war againſt Brutus and Caſſius: and in the meane time they left the gouernment of the city of Rome vnto Lepidus. When they had paſſed ouer the ſeas, and that they began to make war, they being both camped by their enemies, to wit, Antonius againſt Caſſius, and Cæſar againſt Brutus, Cæſar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the vpper hand, and did all. Cæſar was ouerthrowne by Brutus, and loſt his campe, and very hardly ſaued himſelfe by flying from them that followed him. Howbeit he writeth himſelfe in his Commentaries, that he fled before the charge was giuen, becauſe of a dreame one of his friends had. Antonius on the other ſide ouerthrew Caſſius in battel, though ſome write that he was not there himſelfe at the battel, but that he came after the ouerthrow, whileſt his men had the enemies in chaſe. So Caſſius at his earneſt requeſt was ſlaine by a faithfull ſeruant of his own called Pindarus, whom he had infranchiſed: becauſe he knew not in time that Brutus had ouercome Cæſar. Shortly after they fought another battel againe, in the which Brutus was ouerthrowne, who afterwards alſo ſlue himſelfe. Thus Antonius had the chiefeſt glory of this victory, ſpecially becauſe Cæſar was ſicke at that time. Antonius hauing found Brutus body after this battell, blaming him much for the murtherer of his brother Caius, whō he had put to death in MACEDON for reuenge of Ciceroes cruel death, and yet laying the fault more in Hortenſius then in him, he made Hortenſius to be ſlaine on his brothers tombe. Furthermore he caſt his coate armor (which was wonderfull rich and ſumptuous) vpon Brutus body, and gaue commandement to one of his ſlaues infranchiſed, to defray ỹ charge of his buriall. But afterwards Antonius hearing that his infranchiſed bondman had not burnt his coat-armour with his body, becauſe it was very rich, and worth a great ſumme of money, and that he had alſo kept backe much of the ready money appointed for his funerall and tombe, he alſo put him to death. After that, Cæſar was conueyed to ROME, and it was thought he would not liue long, nor eſcape the ſickneſſe he had. Antonius on the other ſide went towards the Eaſt prouinces and regions to leauie money: and firſt of all he went into GREECE, and caried an infinite number of ſoldiers with him. Now, becauſe euery ſouldier was promiſed fiue thouſand ſiluer Drachmaes, he was driuen of neceſſity to impoſe extreme tallages & taxations. At his firſt coming into GREECE, he was not hard nor bitter vnto the GRECIANS, but gaue himſelfe only to heare wiſe men diſpute, to ſee playes, & alſo to note the ceremonies & ſacrifices of GREECE, miniſtring iuſtice to euery man: and it pleaſed him maruellouſly to heare them call him Philellen, (as much to ſay, A louer of the GRECIANS) and ſpecially the ATHENIANS, to whō he did many great pleaſures. Wherfore the MEGARIANS, to exceed ỹ ATHENIANS, thinking to ſhew Antonius a goodly ſight, they prayed him to come and ſee their Senate houſe, and councel hall. Antonius went thither to ſee it. So whē he had ſeene it at his pleaſure, they asked him: My Lord, how like you our hall? Me thinkes (quoth he) it is litle, old, and ready to fall downe. Furthermore he tooke meaſure of the temple of Apollo Pythias, and promiſed the Senate to finiſh it. But when he was once come into ASIA, hauing left Lucius Cenſorinus Gouernor in GREECE, and that he had felt the riches and pleaſures of the Eaſt parts, and that Princes, great Lords, and Kings, came to wait at his gate for his coming out: and that Queenes and Princeſſes to excell one another, gaue him very rich preſents, and came to ſee him, curiouſly ſetting forth themſelues, and vſing all art that might be to ſhew their beauty, to win his fauour the more: (Cæſar in the meane ſpace turmoiling his wits and body in ciuill wars at home, Antonius liuing merily and quietly abroad) he eaſily fell again to his old licentious life. For ſtraight, one Anaxenor a player of the citherne, Xoutus a player of the flute, Metrodorus a tumbler, and ſuch a rabble of minſtrels and fit miniſters for the pleaſures of ASIA, (who in fineneſſe & flatterie paſſed al the other plagues he brought with him out of ITALY) all theſe flocked in his court, and bare the whole ſway: and after that, all went awry. For euery one gaue themſelues to riot and exceſſe, when they ſaw he delighted in it: and all ASIA was like to the city Sophocles ſpeaketh of in one of his Tragedies:

Was full of ſweet perfumes, and pleaſant ſongs,
With wofull weeping mingled there amongs.

For in the city of EPHESVS, women attired as they go in the feaſts & ſacrifice of Bacchus, came out to meete him with ſuch ſolemnities and ceremonies, as are then vſed: with men and children diſguiſed like Fawnes and Satyres. Moreouer, the city was full of Iuie, and darts wreathed about with Iuie, pſalterions, flutes and howboyes; and in their ſongs they called him Bacchus father of mirth, courteous and gentle: and ſo was he vnto ſome, but to the moſt part of men, cruell and extreme. For he robbed Noblemen and Gentlemen of their goods, to giue it vnto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged liuing mens goods, as though they had bene dead, and would enter their houſes by force. As he gaue a citizens houſe of MAGNESIA vnto a cooke, becauſe (as it is reported) he dreſſed him a fine ſupper. In the end he doubled the taxation, and impoſed a ſecond vpon ASIA. But then Hybraas the Orator ſent from the eſtates of ASIA, to tel him the ſtate of their country, boldly ſaid vnto him: If thou wilt haue power to lay two tributes in one yeare vpon vs, thou ſhouldeſt alſo haue power to giue vs two Sommers, two Autumnes, and two Harueſts. This was gallantly and pleaſantly ſpoken vnto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleaſed him well to heare it: but afterwards amplifying his ſpeech, he ſpake more boldly, and to better purpoſe: Asia hath payed thee two hundred thouſand talents. If all this mony be not come to thy coffers, then ask account of them that leauied it: but if thou haue receiued it, and nothing be left of it, then are we vtterly vndone. Hybreas words netled Antonius roundly. For he vnderſtood not of the thefts and robberies his officers committed by his authority, in his treaſure and affairs: not ſo much becauſe he was careleſſe, as for that he ouer ſimply truſted his men in al things.

For he was a plaine man, without ſubtilty, and therfore ouer late found out the foule faults they committed againſt him: but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainly confeſſe it vnto them whom his officers had done iniurie vnto by countenance of his authority. He had a noble mind, as well to puniſh offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet he did exceed more in giuing, then in puniſhing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly vſed, mocking and flouting of euery man, that was remedied by it ſelfe: for a man might as boldly exchange a mocke with him, and he was as wel contented to be mocked, as to mocke others: but yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that thoſe which told him ſo plainly and truly in mirth, wold neuer flatter him in good earneſt in any matters of weight. But thus he was eaſily abuſed by the praiſes they gaue him, not finding how theſe flatterers mingled their flatterie vnder this familiar & plain maner of ſpeech vnto him, as a fine deuice to make difference of meats with ſharpe & tart ſauce; and alſo to keepe him by this frantick ieaſting & bourding with him at the table, that their common flatterie ſhould not be troubleſome vnto him, as men do eaſily miſlike to haue too much of one thing: and that they handled him finely therby, when they would giue him place in any matter of weight, and follow his counſell, that it might not appeare to him they did it ſo much to pleaſe him, but becauſe they were ignorant, and vnderſtood not ſo much as he did. Antonius being thus inclined, the laſt and extremeſt miſchiefe of all other (to wit, the loue of Cleopatra) lighted on him, who did waken and ſtir vp many vices yet hidden in him, & were neuer ſeene to any: and if any ſparke of goodneſſe or hope of riſing were left him, Cleopatra quenched it ſtraight, and made it worſe then before. The manner how he fell in loue with her was this. Antonius going to make war with the Parthians, ſent to command Cleopatra to appeare perſonally before him when he came into Cilicia, to anſwer vnto ſuch accuſations as were laid againſt her, being this: that ſhe had aided Caſſius and Brutus in their war againſt him. The meſſenger ſent vnto Cleopatra to make this ſummons vnto her, was called Dellius; who when he had throughly conſidered her beauty, the excellent grace and ſweetneſſe of her tong, he nothing miſtruſted that Antonius would do any hurt to ſo noble a Lady, but rather aſſured himſelf, that within few daies ſhe ſhould be in great fauour with him. Therupon he did her great honor, and perſwaded her to come into Cilicia, as honourably furniſhed as ſhe could poſſible; and bad her not to be affraid at all of Antonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that ſhe had euer ſeene. Cleopatra on the other ſide beleeuing Dellius words, and gueſſing by the former acceſſe and credit ſhe had with Iulius Cæſar, and C. Pompey (the ſon of Pompey the Great) only for her beauty, ſhe began to haue good hope that ſhe might more eaſily win Antonius. For Cæſar and Pompey knew her when ſhe was but a yong thing, and knew not then what the world meant: but now ſhe went to Antonius at the age when a womans beauty is at the prime, and ſhe alſo of beſt iudgement. So ſhe furniſhed her ſelfe with a world of gifts, ſtore of gold & ſiluer, and of riches and other ſumptuous ornaments, as is credible enough ſhe might bring frō ſo great a houſe, and from ſo wealthy & rich a realme as Ægypt was. But yet ſhe caried nothing with her wherin ſhe truſted more then in her ſelfe, and in the charmes and inchantment of her paſſing beauty and grace. Therefore when ſhe was ſent vnto by diuerſe letters, both from Antonius himſelfe, and alſo from his friends, ſhe made ſo light of it, and mocked Antonius ſo much, that ſhe diſdained to ſet forward otherwiſe, but to take her barge in the riuer of Cydnus; the poope whereof was of gold, the ſailes of purple, and the oares of ſiluer, which kept ſtroke in rowing after the ſound of the muſicke of flutes, howboyes, cithernes, vials, and ſuch other inſtruments as they played vpon in the barge. And now for the perſon of her ſelfe, ſhe was layed vnder a pauilion of cloth of gold of tiſſue, apparelled and attired like the goddeſſe Venus, commonly drawne in picture: and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretie faire boyes apparelled as Painters do ſet foorth god Cupid, with little fans in their hands, with the which they fanned wind vpon her. Her Ladies and Gentlewomen alſo, the faireſt of them were apparelled like the Nimphes Nereides (which are the Myrmaides of the waters) & like the Graces; ſome ſtearing the helme, others tending the tackle and ropes of the barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull paſſing ſweet ſauour of perfumes, that perfumed the wharfes ſide, peſtered with innumerable multitudes of people. Some of them followed the barge all along the riuer ſide: others alſo ranne out of the city to ſee her coming in. So that in the end, there ranne ſuch multitudes of people one after another to ſee her, that Antonius was left poſt alone in the market place, in his Imperiall ſeate to giue audience: and there went a rumour in the peoples mouthes, that the goddeſſe Venus was come to play with the god Bacchus for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius ſent to inuite her to ſupper to him. But ſhe ſent him word againe, he ſhould do better rather to come and ſuppe with her, Antonius therefore to ſhew himſelfe courteous vnto her at her arriuall, was contented to obey her, and went to ſupper to her: where he found ſuch paſſing ſumptuous fare, that no tongue can expreſſe it. But amongſt all other things, he moſt wondered at the infinit number of lights and torches hanged of the toppe of the houſe, giuing light in euery place, ſo artificially ſet and ordered by deuices, ſome round ſome ſquare: that it was the rareſt thing to behold that eye could diſcerne, or that euer bookes could mention. The next night, Antonius feaſting her, contended to paſſe her in magnificence and fineneſſe: but ſhe ouercame him in both. So that he himſelfe began to ſcorne the groſſe ſeruice of his houſe, in reſpect of Cleopatraes ſumptuouſneſſe and fineneſſe. And when Cleopatra found Antonius ieaſts and ſlents to be but groſſe, and ſouldier like, in plaine maner, ſhe gaue it him finely, and without feare taunted him throughly. Now her beauty (as it is reported) was not ſo paſſing, as vnmatchable of other women, nor yet ſuch, as vpon preſent view did enamour men with her: but ſo ſweet was her company and conuerſation, that a man could not poſſibly but be taken. And beſides her beauty, the good grace ſhe had to talke and diſcourſe, her curteous nature that tempered her words and deeds, was a ſpur that pricked to the quick. Furthermore, beſides all theſe, her voice and words were maruellous pleaſant: for her tong was an inſtrument of muſick to diuers ſports and paſtimes, the which ſhe eaſily turned into any language that pleaſed her. She ſpake vnto few barbarous people by interpreter, but made them anſwer her ſelf, or at the leaſt the moſt part of them: as the Æthiopians, the Arabians, the Troglodytes, the Hebrevves, the Syrians, the Medes, & the Parthians, & to many others alſo, whoſe languages ſhe had learned. Whereas diuers of her progenitors, the kings of Ægypt, could ſcarce learne the Ægyptian tongue only, and many of them forgot to ſpeake the Macedonian. Now Antonius was ſo rauiſhed with the loue of Cleopatra, that though his wife Fuluia had great wars, and much ado with Cæſar for his affaires, and that the army of the Parthians (the which the kings Lieutenants had giuen to the onely leading of Labienus) was now aſſembled in Mesopotamia, ready to inuade Syria: yet (as though all this had nothing touched him) he yeelded himſelfe to go with Cleopatra vnto Alexandria, where he ſpent and loſt in childiſh ſports (as a man might ſay) and idle paſtimes, the moſt precious thing a man can ſpend, (as Antiphon ſaith) and that is, Time. For they made an order betweene them, which they called Amimetobion, (as much to ſay, No life comparable and matchable with it) one feaſting each other by turnes, and in coſt, exceeding all meaſure and reaſon. And for proofe hereof, I haue heard my grandfather Lampryas report, that one Philotas a Phyſitian, borne in the city of Amphiſſa, told him, that he was at that preſent time in Alexandria, and ſtudied Phiſicke: and that hauing acquaintance with one of Antonius cookes, he tooke him with him to Antonius houſe, (being a yong man deſirous to ſee things) to ſhew him the wonderfull ſumptuous charge and preparation of one only ſupper. When he was in the kitchin, and ſaw a world of diuerſities of meats, and amongſt others, eight wild bores roſted whole, he began to wonder at it, and ſaid: Sure you haue a great number of gueſts to ſupper. The cooke fell a laughing, and anſwered him: No (quoth he) not many gueſts, nor aboue twelue in all: but yet all that is boiled or roaſted muſt be ſerued in whole, or elſe it would be marred ſtraight: for Antonius peraduenture will ſup preſently, or it may be a pretie while hence, or likely enough he will deferre it longer, for that he hath drunke well to day, or elſe hath had ſome other great matters in hand: and therefore we do not dreſſe one ſupper only, but many ſuppers, becauſe we are vncertaine of the houre he wil ſuppe in. Philotas the Phyſitian told my grandfather this tale, and ſaid moreouer, that it was his chance ſhortly after to ſerue the eldeſt ſonne of the ſaid Antonius, whom he had by his wife Fuluia: and that he sate commonly at his table with his other friends, when he did not dine nor suppe with his father. It chanced one day there came a Physitian that was so full of words, that he made euery man wearie of him at the boord: but Philotas to stoppe his mouth, put out this subtill proposition to him: It is good in some sort to let a man drinke cold water that hath an ague: But euery man that hath an ague, hath it in some sort: Ergo, it is good for euery man that hath an ague to drink cold water. The Physitian was so grauelled & amated with all, that he had not a word more to say. Yong Antonius burst out into such a laughing at him, and was so glad of it, that he said vnto him: Philotas, take all that, I giue it thee: shewing him his cupboord full of plate, with great pottes of gold and siluer. Philotas thanked him, and told him he thought himselfe greatly bound to him for this liberality, but he would neuer haue thought that he had had power to haue giuen so many things, and of so great value. But much more he maruelled, when shortly after one of yong Antonius men brought him home all the pots in a basket, bidding him set his marke and stampe vpon them, and to lock them vp. Philotas returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reproued if he tooke them. Then the young Gentleman Antonius said vnto him: Alas poore man, why doest thou make it nice to take them? knowest thou not that it is the sonne of Antonius that giues them thee, and is able to do it? if thou wilt not beleeue me, take rather the ready mony they come to: because my father peraduenture may aske for some of the plate, for the anticke & excellent workmanship of them. This I haue heard my grandfather tell oftentimes. But now againe to Cleopatra. Plato writeth that there are foure kinds of flatterie: but Cleopatra deuided it into many kinds. For she (were it in sport, or in matters of earnest) still deuised sundry new delights to haue Antonius at commandement, neuer leauing him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her sight. For she would play at dice with him, drinke with him, and hunt commonly with him, and also be with him when he went to any exercise or actiuitie of body. And sometime also, when he would go vp and downe the city disguised like a slaue in the night, and would peere into poore mens windowes and their shops, and scold and braule with them within the house, Cleopatra would be also in a chamber maides array, and amble vp and downe the streets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mocks and blowes. Now though most men misliked this maner, yet the Alexandrians were commonly glad of this iolitie, and liked it well, saying very gallantly & wisely: that Antonius shewed them a comicall face, to wit, a merie countenance: and the Romaines a tragicall face, to say, a grimme look. But to reckon vp all the fooliish sports they made, reuelling in this sort, it were too fond a part of me, and therefore I will onely tell you one among the rest. On a time he went to angle for fish, and when he could take none, he was as angrie as could be, because Cleopatra stood by. Wherefore he secretly commanded the fishermen, that when he cast in his line, they should straight diue vnder the water, and put a fish on his hooke which they had taken before: and so snatched vp his angling rod, & brought vp a fish twise or thrise. Cleopatra found it straight, yet she seemed not to see it, but wondered at his excellent fishing: but when she was alone by her selfe among her owne people, she told them how it was, & bad them the next morning to be on the water to see the fishing. A number of people came to the hauen, and got into the fisher boates to see this fishing. Antonius then threw in his line, and Cleopatra straight commanded one of her men to diue vnder water before Antonius men, & to put some old salt-fish vpon his bait, like vnto those that are brought out of the country of Pont. When he had hung the fish on his hooke, Antonius thinking he had taken a fish indeed, snatched vp his line presently. Then they all fell a laughing. Cleopatra laughing also, said vnto him: Leaue vs (my Lord) Ægyptians (which dwell in the country of Pharvs and Canobvs) your angling rod: this is not thy profession, thou must hunt after conquering of Realmes and countries. Now Antonius delighting in these fond and childish pastimes, very ill newes were brought him from two places. The first from Rome, that his brother Lucius and Fuluia his wife, fell out first betweene themselues, and afterwards fell to open warre with Cæsar, and had brought all to nought, that they were both driuen to flie out of Italy. The second newes, as bad as the first: that Labienus conquered all Asia with the army of the Parthians, from the riuer of Euphrates, and from Syria, vnto the country of Lydia and Ionia. Then began Antonius with much ado, a litle to rouze himselfe, as if he had bene wakened out of a deepe sleepe, and as a man may say, coming out of a great drunkennesse. So, first of all he bent himselfe against the Parthians, and went as farre as the country of Phoenicia: but there he receiued lamentable letters frō his wife Fuluia. Wherupō he straight returned ned towards ITALIE, with two hundred saile: and as he went, tooke vp his friends by the way that fled out of ITALIE to come to him. By them he was informed, that his wife Fuluia was the only cause of this war: who being of a peeuish, crooked, & troblesome nature, had purposely raised this vprore in ITALIE, in hope therby to withdraw him from Cleopatra. But by good fortune his wife Fuluia going to meet with Antonius, sickned by the way, and died in the city of SICYONE: and therefore Octauius Cæsar and he were the easilier made friends againe. For when Antonius landed in ITALIE, and that men saw Cæsar asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the other side laid all the fault and burden on his wife Fuluia: the friends of both parties would not suffer them to vntip any old matters, and to proue or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the first procurer of this war, fearing to make matters worse betweene them: but they made them friends together, and deuided the Empire of ROME betweene them, making the sea Ionium the bounds of their diuision. For they gaue all the Pouinces Eastward vnto Antonius, and the countries Westward vnto Cæsar, and left AFRICKE vnto Lepidus: and made a law, that they three, one after another, should make their friends Consuls, when they would not be themselues. This seemed to be a sound counsell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a straighter bond, which fortune offered thus. There was Octauia the eldest sister of Cæsar, not by one mother, for she came of Ancharia, and Cæsar himselfe afterwards of Accia. It is reported, that he dearely loued his sister Octauia, for indeed she was a noble Ladie, and left the widow of her first husband Caius Marcellus, who died not long before: and it seemed also that Antonius had bene widower euer since the death of his wife Fuluia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, neither did he confesse that he had her as his wife: and so with reason he did defend the loue he bare vnto this ÆGYPTIAN Cleopatra. Thereupon euery man did set forward this mariage, hoping thereby that this Lady Octauia, hauing an excellent grace, wisdome and honesty, ioyned vnto so rare a beauty, when she were with Antonius (he louing her as so worthy a Lady deserueth) she should be a good meane to keepe good loue and amity betwixt her brother and him. So when Cæsar and he had made the match between them, they both went to ROME about this mariage, although it was against the law, that a widow should be maried within ten moneths after her husbands death. Howbeit the Senate dispensed with the law, and so the mariage proceeded accordingly. Sextus Pompeius at that time kept in SICILIA, and so made many an inrode into ITALY with a great number of pinnaces and other pirates shippes, of the which were Captaines two notable pirates, Menas and Menecrates, who so scoured all the sea thereabouts, that none durst peepe out with a saile. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had dealt very friendly with Antonius, for he had courteously receiued his mother when she fled out of ITALY with Fuluia: and therefore they thought good to make peace with him. So they met all three together by the mount of MISENA, vpon a hill that runneth farre into the sea: Pompey hauing his shippes riding hard by at anker, and Antonius and Cæsar their armies vpon the shore side, directly ouer against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should haue SICILE and SARDINIA, with this condition, that he should ridde the sea of all theeues and pirates, and make it safe for passengers, and withall, that he should send a certaine of wheat to ROME: one of them did feast another, and drew cuts who should begin. It was Pompeius chance to inuite them first. Whereupon Antonius asked him: And where shall we suppe? There, said Pompey; and shewed him his Admirall gallie which had fiue bankes of oares: That (said he) is my fathers house they haue left me. He spake it to taunt Antonius, because he had his fathers house, that was Pompey the Great. So he cast ankers enow into the sea, to make his gally fast, and then built a bridge of wood to conuey them to his galley, from the head of mount Misena: and there he welcomed them, and made them great cheare. Now in the midst of the feast, when they fell to be mery with Antonius loue vnto Cleopatra, Menas the pirate came to Pompey, and whispering in his eare, said vnto him: Shall I cut the cables of the ankers, & make thee Lord not only of SICILE & SARDINIA, but of the whole Empire of ROME besides? Pompey hauing paused a while vpon it, at length answered him: Thou shouldest haue done it, and neuer haue told it me; but now we must content vs with that we haue: as for my selfe, I was neuer taught to breake my faith, nor to be counted a traitor. The other two also did likewise feast him in their camp, & then he returned into SICILE. Antonius after this agreement made, sent Ventidius before into ASIA to stay the PARTHIANS, & to keep them they shold come no further: and he himselfe in the meane time, to graitfie Cæsar, was contented to be chosen Iulius Cæsars priest & sacrificer, and so they iointly together dispatched al great matters concerning the ſtate of the Empire. But in all other maner of ſports and exerciſes, wherin they paſſed the time away the one with the other, Antonius was euer inferior vnto Cæſar, and alway loſt, which grieued him much. With Antonius there was a Soothſayer or Aſtronomer of Ægypt, that could caſt a figure, and iudge of mens natiuities, to tell them what ſhould happen to them. He either to pleaſe Cleopatra, or elſe for that he found it ſo by his art, told Antonius plainly, that his fortune (which of it ſelfe was excellent good, and very great) was altogether blemiſhed and obſcured by Cæſars fortune: and therefore he counſelled him vtterly to leaue his company, and to get him as far from him as he could. For thy Demon, ſaid he, (that is to ſay, the good angell and ſpirit that keepeth thee) is afraid of his: and being couragious and high when he is alone, becommeth fearfull and timorous when he cometh neare vnto the other. Howſoeuer it was, the euents enſuing proued the Ægyptians words true: for it is ſaid, that as often as they two drew cuts for paſtime, who ſhold haue any thing, or whether they plaid at dice, Antonius alway loſt. Oftētimes when they were diſpoſed to ſee cock-fight, or quails that were taught to fight one with another, Cæſars cocks or quailes did euer ouercome. The which ſpited Antonius in his mind, although he made no outward ſhew of it: and therfore he beleeued the Ægyptian the better. In fine, he recommended the affaires of his houſe vnto Cæſar, and went out of Italy with Octauia his wife, whō he caried into Greece after he had had a daughter by her. So Antonius lying all the winter at Athens, news came vnto him of ỹ victories of Ventidius, who had ouercome the Parthians in battell, in the which alſo were ſlaine Labienus and Pharnabates, the chiefeſt Captains king Orodes had. For theſe good news he feaſted all Athens, & kept open houſe for all the Grecians, and many games of price were plaid at Athens, of the which he himſelf wold be iudge. Wherfore leauing his guard, his axes, and tokens of his Empire at his houſe, he came into the ſhew-place or liſts (where theſe games were plaid) in a long gown and ſlippers after the Grecian faſhion, and they caried tipſtaues before him, as Marſhals men do carie before the Iudges, to make place: and he himſelfe in perſon was a ſtickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After that, preparing to go to the wars, he made him a garland of the holy Oliue, and caried a veſſell with him of the water of the fountaine Clepſydra, becauſe of an Oracle he had receiued, that ſo commanded him. In the meane time, Ventidius once againe ouercame Pacorus (Orodes ſon, king of Parthia) in a battell fought in the country of Cyrreſtica, he being come again with a great army to inuade Syria: at which battell was ſlaine a great number of the Parthians, and among them Pacorus the kings owne ſonne. This noble exploit as famous as euer any was, was a full reuenge to the Romaines of the ſhame and loſſe they had receiued before by the death of Marcus Craſſus: and he made the Parthians flie, and glad to keepe themſelues within the confines & territories of Mesopotamia & Media, after they had thrice together bene ouercome in ſeuerall battels. Howbeit Ventidius durſt not vndertake to follow them any farther, fearing leſt he ſhould haue gotten Antonius diſpleaſure by it. Notwithſtanding, he led his armie againſt them that had rebelled, and conquered them againe: amongſt whom he beſieged Antiochus king of Commagena, who offered him to giue a thouſand talents to be pardoned his rebellion, and promiſed euer after to be at Antonius commandement. But Ventidius made him anſwer, that he ſhould ſend vnto Antonius; who was not farre off, and would not ſuffer Ventidius to make any peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this litle exploit ſhould paſſe in his name, and that they ſhould not think he did any thing but by his Lieutenant Ventidius. The ſiege grew very long, becauſe they that were in the towne, ſeeing they could not be receiued vpon no reaſonable compoſition, determined valiantly to defend themſelues to the laſt man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet receiued great ſhame, repenting him much that he tooke not their firſt offer. And yet at the laſt he was glad to make truce with Antiochus, and to take three hundred talents for compoſition. Thus after he had ſet order for the ſtate & affaires of Syria, he returned againe to Athens: and hauing giuen Ventidius ſuch honours as he deſerued, he ſent him to Rome, to triumph for the Parthians. Ventidius was the only man that euer triumphed of the Parthians vntill this preſent day, a meane man borne, and of no noble houſe or family: who onely came to that he attained vnto, through Antonius friendſhip, the which deliuered him happy occaſion to atchieue great matters, and yet to ſay truly, he did ſo well quit himſelfe in all his enterpriſes, that he confirmed that which was ſpoken of Antonius and Cæſar, to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made warre by their Lieutenants, then by themſelues. For Soſius one of Antonius Lieutenants in Syria, did notable good ſeruice: and Canidius whom

whom he had alſo left his Lieutenant in the borders of ARMENIA, did conquer it all. So did he alſo ouercome the kings of the IBERIANS & ALBANIANS, & went on with his conqueſts vnto mount Caucaſus. By theſe conqueſts, the fame of Antonius power increaſed more and more, and grew dreadfull vnto all the barbarous nations. But Antonius notwithſtanding, grew to be marueilouſly offended with Cæſar, vpon certaine reports that had bene brought vnto him: and ſo tooke ſea to go towards ITALY with three hundred ſaile. And becauſe thoſe of BRVNDVSIVM would not receiue his army into their hauen, he went farther vnto TARENTVM. There his wife Octauia that came out of GREECE with him, beſought him to ſend her vnto her brother, the which he did. Octauia at that time was great with child, and moreouer had a ſecond daughter by him, and yet ſhe put her ſelf in iourny, and met with her brother Octauius Cæſar by the way, who brought his two chiefe friends, Mæcenas and Agrippa with him. She tooke them aſide, and with all the inſtance ſhe could poſſible, intreated them they would not ſuffer her that was the happieſt woman of the world, to become now the moſt wretched & vnfortunateſt creature of all other. For now, ſaid ſhe, euery mans eyes do gaze on me, that am the ſiſter of one of the Emperours, and wife of the other. And if the worſt counſel take place (which the gods forbid) and that they grow to warres: for your ſelues, it is vncertaine to which of them two the gods haue aſſigned the victorie or ouerthrow. But for me, on which ſide ſoeuer the victory fall, my ſtate can be but moſt miſerable ſtill. Theſe words of Octauia ſo ſoftened Cæſars heart, that he went quickly vnto TARENTVM. But it was a noble ſight for them that were preſent, to ſee ſo great an army by land not to ſtirre; and ſo many ſhippes afloate in the roade, quietly and ſafe: and furthermore, the meeting and kindneſſe of friends, louingly embracing one another. Firſt, Antonius feaſted Cæſar, which he granted vnto for his ſiſters ſake. Afterwards they agreed together, that Cæſar ſhould giue Antonius two legions to go againſt the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius ſhould let Cæſar haue an hundred gallies armed with brazen ſpurres at the prooes. Beſides all this, Octauia obtained of her husband, twenty Brigantines for her brother: and of her brother for her husband, a thouſand armed men. After they had taken leaue of each other, Cæſar went immediatly to make warre with Sextus Pompeius, to get SICILIA into his hands. Antonius alſo leauing his wife Octauia and litle children begotten of her, with Cæſar, and his other children which he had by Fuluia, went directly into ASIA. Then beganne this peſtilent plague and miſchiefe of Cleopatraes loue (which had ſlept a long time, and ſeemed to haue bene vtterly forgotten, and that Antonius had giuen place to better counſell) again to kindle, and to be in force, ſo ſoone as Antonius came neare vnto SYRIA. And in the end, the horſe of the mind, as Plato termeth it, that is ſo hard of reine (I meane the vnreined luſt of concupiſcence) did put out of Antonins head al honeſt and commendable thoughts: for he ſent Fonteius Capito to bring Cleopatra into SYRIA: vnto whom, to welcome her, he gaue no trifling things; but vnto that ſhe had already, he added the prouinces of PHENICIA, thoſe of the nethermoſt SYRIA, the Ile of CYPRVS, and a great part of CILICIA, and that country of IVRY where the true balm is, and that part of ARABIA where the NABATHEIANS do dwell, which ſtretcheth out toward the Ocean. Theſe great gifts much miſliked the ROMAINS. But now, though Antonius did eaſily giue away great ſegniories, realmes, and mighty nations vnto ſome priuate men, and that alſo he took from other kings their lawfull realms, (as from Antigonus king of the IEVVES, whom he openly beheaded, where neuer king before had ſuffered like death:) yet all this did not ſo much offend the ROMAINS, as the vnmeaſurable honours which he did vnto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggrauate their malice and ill will towards him, becauſe that Cleopatra hauing brought him two twinnes, a ſonne and a daughter, he named his ſonne Alexander, and his daughter Cleopatra; and gaue them to their ſurnames, the Sunne to the one, and the Moone to the other. This notwithſtanding, he that could finely cloke his ſhamefull deeds with fine words, ſaid, that the greatnes and magnificence of the Empire of ROME appeared moſt, not where the ROMAINS tooke, but where they gaue much: and Nobilitie was multiplied amongſt men by the poſteritie of Kings, when they left off their ſeed in diuers places: and that by this means his firſt anceſtor was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his line and poſteritie in the wombe of one onely woman, fearing Solons lawes, or regarding the ordinances of men touching the procreation of children: but that he gaue it vnto nature, and eſtabliſhed the foundation of many noble races and families in diuers places. Now when Phraortes had ſlaine his father Orodes, and poſſeſſed the kingdome, many Gentlemen of PARTHIA forſooke him, and fled from him. Amongſt them was Moneſes

a Nobleman,and of great authority among his countrimen,who came vnto Antonius that receiued him,& compared his fortune vnto Themiſtocles,and his own riches and magnificence vnto ỹ kings of PERSIA.For he gaue Moneſes 3.cities,LARISSA,ARETHVSA,& HIERAPOLIS,which was called before BOMBICE.Howbeit the king of PARTHIA ſhortly after called him home again, vpon his faith & word. Antonius was glad to let him go,hoping thereby to ſteale vpon Phraortes vnprouided.For he ſent vnto him,and told him that they would remaine good friends, & haue peace together, ſo he would but only redeliuer the ſtandards and enſignes of the ROMAINES, (which the PARTHIANS had won in the battel where M.Craſſus was ſlain)and the men alſo that remained yet priſoners of this ouerthrow.In the meane time he ſent Cleopatra back into ÆGYPT and tooke his way towards ARABIA and ARMENIA,and there took a generall muſter of all his army he had together,and of the kings his confederates that were come by his commandement to aid him,being a maruellous number:of the which,the chiefeſt was Artauaſdes king of ARMENIA,who did furniſh him with 6000.horſmen,and 7000.footmen.There were alſo of the ROMAINES about threeſcore thouſand footmen,and of horſmen (SPANIARDS and GAVLES reckened for ROMANES)to the number of 10000.& of other nations thirty thouſand men,reckening together the horſmen & light armed footmen.This ſo great & puiſſant army(which made the INDIANS quake for feare,dwelling about the country of the BACTRIANS,and all ASIA alſo to tremble)ſerued him to no purpoſe,& all for the loue he bare to Cleopatra.For the earneſt great deſire he had to lie all winter with her,made him begin this war out of due time,and for haſt to put all in hazard:being ſo rauiſhed and enchanted with the ſweet poiſon of her loue,that he had no other thought but of her,and how he might quickly returne again,more then how he might ouercome his enemies.For firſt of all,where he ſhould haue wintered in ARMENIA to refreſh his men, wearied with the long iourney they had made, hauing come eight thouſand furlongs,and then at the beginning of the ſpring to go and inuade MEDIA before the PARTHIANS ſhould ſtir out of their houſes and garriſons:he could tarry no longer,but led them forthwith vnto the prouince of ATROPATENE,leauing ARMENIA on the left hand,and forraged all the country. Furthermore,making all the haſt he could,he left behind him engines of battery which were caried with him in three hundred carts,(among the which alſo there was a ram foureſcore foot long) being things moſt neceſſary for him, and the which he could not get againe for money, if they were once loſt or marred.For the high prouinces of ASIA haue no trees growing of ſuch height and length,neither ſtrong nor ſtraight enough to make ſuch like engines of batterie. This notwithſtanding,he left them all behind him,as an hinderance to bring his matters and intent ſpeedily to paſſe:and left a certain number of men to keepe them,and gaue them in charge vnto one Tatianus.Then he went to beſiege the city of PHRAATA, being the chiefeſt and greateſt city the king of MEDIA had,where his wife & children were.Then he ſtraight found out his own fault, and the want of his artillery he left behind him,by the work he had in hand:for he was faine for lack of a breach(where his men might come to the ſword with their enemies that defended the wall)to force a mount of earth hard to ỹ wals of the city,the which by litle and litle with great labor,roſe to ſome height.In the meane time king Phraortes came down with a great army,who vnderſtanding that Antonius had left his engines of battery behind him, he ſent a great number of horſmen before,which enuironed Tatianus with all his cariage,& ſlue him,and ten thouſand men he had with him.After this the barbarous people tooke theſe engines of battery and burnt them,and got many priſoners,amongſt whom they tooke alſo king Polemon. This diſcomfiture maruellouſly troubled al Antonius army,to receiue ſo great an ouerthrow(beyõd their expectation)at the beginning of their iourney: inſomuch that Artabazus king of the ARMENIANS,deſpairing of the good ſucceſſe of the ROMAINS, departed with his men,notwithſtanding that he was himſelf the firſt procurer of this war and iourny. On the other ſide,the PARTHIANS came couragiouſly vnto Antonius campe,who lay at the ſiege of their chiefeſt city,and cruelly reuiled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay ſtil and did nothing,his mens hearts would faile them,he took ten legions,with three cohorts or enſignes of the Prætors,(which are companies appointed for the guard of the Generall)and all his horſemen, and caried them out to forrage,hoping thereby he ſhould eaſily allure the PARTHIANS to fight a battell. But when he had marched about a daies iourny from his campe, he ſaw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to giue him the onſet, and to skirmiſh with him, when he would thinke to march his way. Therefore he ſet out his ſignall of battell,and yet cauſed his tents and fardels to be truſſed vp, vp, as though he meant not to fight, but onely to leade his men backe againe. Then he marched before the armie of the barbarous people, the which was martialled like a creſſant or halfe Moone: and commanded his horſemen, that as as ſoone as they thought the legions were neare enough vnto their enemies to ſet vpon the voward, they ſhould ſet ſpurres to their horſes, and begin the charge. The PARTHIANS ſtood in battell ray, and beholding the countenance of the ROMANES as they marched, tooke them for ſouldiers indeed, for that they marched in as good array as was poſſible. For in their march they kept their rankes a litle ſpace one from an other, not ſtragling out of order, and ſhaking their pikes, ſpeaking neuer a word. But ſo ſoone as the alarme was giuen, the horſe-men ſuddenly turned head vpon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gaue charge on them: who at the firſt receiued their charge couragiouſly, for they were ioyned nearer then within an arrowes ſhoote. But when the legions alſo came to ioyne with them, ſhouting out aloud, and ratling of their armours, the PARTHIANS horſes and themſelues were ſo afraid and amazed withall, that they all turned taile and fled, before the ROMANES could come to the ſword with them. Then Antonius followed them hard in chaſe, being in great hope by this conflict to haue brought to end all or the moſt part of this warre. But after that his footmen had chaſed them fiftie furlongs off, and the horſemen alſo thriſe as far, they found in all but thirtie perſons taken, and about foureſcore men onely ſlaine: which did much diſcourage them, when they conſidered with themſelues, that obtaining the victorie, they had ſlaine ſo few of their enemies: and when they were ouercome, they loſt ſo many of their men, as they had done at the ouerthrow when their cariage was taken. The next morning Antonius armie truſſed vp their cariage, and marched backe towards their campe: and by the way in their returne they met at the firſt a few of the PARTHIANS; then going on further, they met a few more. So at length when they all came together, they reuiled them, and troubled them on euery ſide, as freſhly and couragiouſly as if they had not bene ouerthrowne: ſo that the ROMANES very hardly got to their campe with ſafetie. The MEDES on the other ſide, that were beſieged in their chiefe Citie of PHRAATA, made a ſally out vpon them that kept the mount which they had forced and caſt againſt the wall of the city, and draue them for feare frō the mount they kept. Antonius was ſo offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he diuided his men by ten legions, and then of them he put the tenth legion to death, on whom the lot fel: and for the other nine, he cauſed them to haue barley giuen them in ſtead of wheate. Thus this warre fell out troubleſome vnto both parties, and the end thereof much more fearfull: for Antonius could looke for no other of his ſide but famine, becauſe he could forrage no more, nor fetch in any victuals, without great loſſe of his men: and on the other ſide, Phraortes knew well enough that the PARTHIANS would do any thing rather then lie in campe abroad in the winter. Therefore he was afraid, that if the ROMANES continued their ſiege all winter long, and made war with him ſtill, that his men wold forſake him, and ſpecially becauſe the time of the yeare went away apace, and the aire waxed cloudie and cold in the equinoctiall Autumne. Thereupon he called to mind this deuice: He gaue the chiefeſt of his Gentlemen of the PARTHIANS charge, that when they met the ROMANES out of their campe, going to forrage, or to water their horſe, or for ſome other prouiſiō, that they ſhould not diſtreſſe them too much, but ſhould ſuffer them to carrie ſomewhat away, and greatly commend their valiantneſſe and hardineſſe, for which their king did eſteeme them the more, and not without cauſe. After theſe firſt allurements, they began by little and little to come nearer vnto them, and to talke with them on horſebacke, greatly blaming Antonius ſelfe-will, that did not giue their king Phraortes occaſion to make a good peace, who deſired nothing more then to ſaue the liues of ſo goodly a companie of valiant men: but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greateſt and moſt dreadful enemies he could haue, to wit, winter and famine, the which they could hardly away withall, though the PARTHIANS did the beſt they could to aid & accompany them. Theſe words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a litle pliant, for the good hope he had of his returne: but yet he would not ſend vnto the king of PARTHIA before they had firſt asked theſe barbarous people that ſpake ſo courteouſly vnto his men, whether they ſpake it of themſelues, or that they were their maſters words. When they told them, the king himſelfe ſaid ſo, and did perſwade them further not to feare or miſtruſt them, then Antonius ſent ſome of his friends vnto the king, to make demand for the deliuery of the enſignes and priſoners he had of the ROMANS ſince the ouerthrow of Craſſus, to the end it ſhould not appeare, that if he asked nothing, they ſhould thinke he were glad that he might only ſcape with safetie out of the danger he was in. The king of PARTHIA answered him, that for the ensignes and prisoners he demanded, he should not breake his head about it, but if he would depart presently and without delay, he might do it peaceably, and without danger. Wherefore Antonius after he had giuen his men some time to trusse vp their cariage, he raised his campe, and tooke his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very proper to entertaine his souldiers and men of warre, and that he could passingly well do it, as well, or better then any Captaine in his time: yet for shame he would not speake vnto them at his remouing, but gaue the charge thereof to Domitius Ænobarbus. Many of them tooke this in very ill part, and thought that he did it in disdaine of them: but the most part of them presently vnderstood the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therfore they thought it their duties to cary the like respect vnto their Captain that their Captaine did vnto them: and so they became the more obedient vnto him. So Antonius was minded to returne the same way he came, being a plaine barren countrey without wood. But there came a souldier to him, borne in the countrey of the MARDIANS, who hauing bene long familiar with the PARTHIANS, knew their fashions very wel, and had also shewed himselfe very true & faithfull to the ROMANES in the battell where Antonius engines of battery and cariage were taken away. This man came vnto Antonius, to counsell him to beware how he went that way, & to make his army a prey (being heauily armed) vnto so great a number of horsmen, all archers in the open field, where they should haue nothing to let them to compasse him round about. & that this was Phraortes fetch, to offer him so friendly conditions & courteous words, to make him raise his siege, that he might afterwards meet him as he would in the plaines: howbeit, if he thought good he would guide him another way on the right hand, through woods & mountains, a far nearer way, & where he should find great plenty of all things needfull for his armie. Antonius hearing what he said, called his counsell together to consult vpon it. For after he had made peace with the PARTHIANS, he was loth to giue them cause to thinke he mistrusted them: and on the other side also he would gladly shorten his way, and passe by places well inhabited, where he might be prouided of all things necessary: therefore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to performe that he promised. The MARDIAN gaue himselfe to be bound hand and foote, till he had brought his army into the countrey of ARMENIA. So he guided his army thus bound, two daies together, without any trouble or fight of enemy. But the third day Antonius thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, and trusting thereto, suffered his soldiers to march in disorder as euery man listed. The MARDIAN perceiuing that the dams of a riuer were newly broken vp, which they should haue passed ouer, & that the riuer had ouerflowne the banks & drowned all the way they should haue gone, he guessed straight that the PARTHIANS had done it, and had thus broken it open, to stay the ROMANES for getting too far before them. Therfore he bad Antonius looke to himself, and told him that his enemies were not farre off. Antonius hauing set his men in order, as he was placing of his archers and slingmen to resist the enemies, and to driue them backe, they descried the PARTHIANS that wheeled round about the army to compasse them in on euery side, & to breake their ranks, and their light armed men gaue charge vpon them. So after they had hurt many of the ROMANES with their arrowes, and that they themselues were also hurt by them with their darts & plummets of lead, they retired a litle, and then came againe and gaue charge, vntill that the horsmen of the GAVLES turned their horses, and fiercely galloped towards them, that they dispersed them so, as all that day they gathered no more together. Hereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not only strengthen the rereward of his armie, but both the flankes also with darts and sling-men, and made his armie march in a square battell: commanding the horsemen, that when the enemies should come to assaile them, they should driue them backe, but not follow them too farre. Thus the PARTHIANS foure dayes after, seeing they did no more hurt to the ROMANES then they also receiued of them, they were not so hote vpon them as they were accustomed, but excusing themselues by the winter that troubled them, they determined to returne backe againe. The fift day Flauius Gallus, a valiant man of his hands, that had charge in the army, came vnto Antonius to pray him to let him haue some moe of his light armed men then were already in the rereward, and some of the horsemen that were in the voward, hoping thereby to do some notable exploit. Antonius granting them vnto him, when the enemies came according to their manner to set vpon the taile of the armie, and to skirmish with them, Flauius couragiously made them retire, but not as they were wont to do before, to retire and ioyne presently with their armie; for he ouer rashly thrust thruſt in among them to fight it out at the ſword. The Captains that had the leading of the rereward, ſeeing Flauius ſtray too farre from the army, ſent vnto him to will him to retire, but he would not hearken to it. And it is reported alſo, that Titius himſelfe the Treaſurer, tooke the enſignes, & did what he could to make the enſigne-bearers returne backe, reuiling Flauius Gallus, becauſe through his folly and deſperatneſſe he cauſed many honeſt and valiant men to be both hurt and ſlaine to no purpoſe. Gallus alſo fell out with him, and commanded his men to ſtay. Wherefore Titius returned againe into the army, and Gallus ſtill ouerthrowing and driuing the enemies back whom he met in the vaward, he was not ware that he was compaſſed in: and ſeeing himſelfe enuironed on all ſides, he ſent vnto the army, that they ſhould come and aide him, where the Captains that led the legions (among the which Canidius, a man of great eſtimation about Antonius made one) committed many faults. For where they ſhould haue made head with the whole army vpon the PARTHIANS, they ſent him aide by ſmall companies: and when they were ſlaine, they ſent him others alſo. So that by their beaſtlineſſe and lacke of conſideration, they had like to haue made all the army flie, if Antonius himſelfe had not come from the front of the battell with the third legion, the which came through the midſt of them that fled, vntill they came to affront the enemies, and ſtayed them from chaſing any farther. Howbeit at this laſt conflict there were ſlaine no leſſe then 3000. men, and 5000. beſides brought ſore hurt into the campe, and amongſt them alſo Flauius Gallus, whoſe body was ſhot through in foure places, whereof he died. Antonius went to the tents to viſit and comfort the ſicke and wounded, and for pities ſake he could not refraine from weeping: and they alſo ſhewing him the beſt countenance they could, tooke him by the hand, and prayed him to go and be dreſſed, and not to trouble himſelfe for them, moſt reuerently calling him their Emperor and Captaine: & that for themſelues, they were whole and ſafe, ſo that he had his health. For indeed to ſay truly, there was not at that time any Emperor or Captaine that had ſo great and puiſſant an army as his together, both for luſty youths and courage of ſouldiers, as alſo for their patience to away with ſo great paines and trouble. Furthermore, the obedience & reuerence they ſhewed vnto their Captaine, with a marueilous earneſt loue and good will, was ſo great, and all were indifferently (as well great as ſmall, the noble men, as meane men, the Captaines as ſouldiers) ſo earneſtly bent to eſteeme Antonius good will and fauor, aboue their owne life and ſafety, that in this point of martiall diſcipline, the ancient ROMANES could not haue done any more. But diuerſe things were cauſe thereof, as we haue told you before: Antonius nobility and ancient houſe, his eloquence, his plaine nature, his liberality and magnificence, and familiarity to ſport and to be merry in companie: but ſpecially the care he tooke at that time to helpe, viſite, and lament thoſe that were ſicke and wounded, ſeeing euery man to haue that which was meet for him, was of ſuch force and effect, as it made them that were ſicke and wounded to loue him better, & were more deſirous to do him ſeruice then thoſe that were whole and ſound. This victory ſo incouraged the enemies (who otherwiſe were weary to follow Antonius any farther) that all night long they kept the fields, & houered about the ROMANES camp, thinking that they would preſently flie, and that then they ſhould take the ſpoile of their campe. So the next morning by breake of day, there were gathered together a far greater number of the PARTHIANS then they were before. For the rumor was, that there were not much fewer then 40000. horſe, becauſe their king ſent thither euen the very guard about his perſon, as vnto a moſt certaine and aſſured victory, that they might be partners of the ſpoile and booty they hoped to haue had for as touching the king himſelfe, he was neuer in any conflict or battel. Then Antonius deſirous to ſpeak to his ſouldiers, called for a blacke gowne, to appeare the more pitifull to thē: but his friends did diſſwade him from it. Therfore he put on his coat armor, & being ſo apparelled, made an Oration to his army: in the which he highly cōmended thē that had ouercome & driuen backe their enemies, & greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backes. So that thoſe which had ouercome, prayed him to be of good cheare: the other alſo to cleare themſelues, willingly offered to take the lot of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwiſe to receiue what kind of puniſhment ſhould pleaſe him to lay vpon them, ſo that he would forget any more to miſlike, or to be offended with them. Antonius ſeeing that, did lift vp his hands to heauen, and made his prayer to the gods, that if in exchange of his former victories, they wold now ſend him ſome bitter aduerſity, then that all might light on himſelfe alone, and that they would giue the victorie to the reſt of his army. The next morning, they gaue better order on euery ſide of the armie, and ſo marched forward: ſo that when the PARTHIANS thought to returne againe to assaile them, they came far short of the reckoning. For where they thought to come, not to fight, but to spoile and make hauocke of all, when they came neare them, they were sore hurt with their slings and darts, and such other iauelins as the ROMANES darted at them, and the PARTHIANS found them as rough and desperate in fight, as if they had bene fresh men they had dealt withall. Wherupon their hearts began againe to faile them. But yet when the ROMANS came to go downe any steepe hils or mountaines, they would set on them with their arrowes, because the ROMANES could go downe but faire and softly. But then againe, the souldiers of the legion that caried great shields, returned backe, and inclosed them that were naked or light armed, in the middest among them, and did kneele of one knee on the ground, and so set downe their shields before them: and they of the second ranke also couered them of the first ranke, and the third also couered the second, and so from ranke to ranke all were couered. Insomuch that this manner of couering and shading themselues with shields, was deuised after the fashion of laying tyles vpon houses, and to sight was like the degrees of a Theater, and is a most strong defence and bulwarke against all arrowes and shot that falleth vpon it. When the PARTHIANS saw this countenance of the ROMANE souldiers of the legion which kneeled on the ground in that sort vpon one knee, supposing that they had bene wearied with trauell, they layed downe their bowes, and tooke their speares and lances, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the ROMANS suddenly rose vpon their feet, and with the darts that they threw from them, they slue the foremost, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next dayes that followed. But by meanes of these dangers and lets, Antonius army could win no way in a day, by reason whereof they suffered great famine: for they could haue but litle corne, and yet were they driuen daily to fight for it; and besides that, they had no instruments to grind it, to make bread of it. For the most part of them had bene left behind, because the beasts that caried them were either dead, or else employed to cary them that were sore and wounded. For the famine was so extreme great, that the eight part of a bushell of wheat was sold for fifty Drachmaes, and they sold barley bread by the weight of siluer. In the end they were compelled to liue of hearbs and roots, but they found few of them that men do commonly eate of, and were enforced to tast of them that were neuer eaten before: among the which, there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits. For he that had once eaten of it, his memory went from him, and he knew no manner of thing, but onely busied himselfe in digging and hurling of stones from one place to another, as though it had bene a matter of great weight, and to be done with all possible speed. All the camp ouer, men were busily stooping to the ground, digging and carying of stones from one place to another: but at the last, they cast vp a great deale of choler, and died suddenly, because they lacked wine, which was the only soueraigne remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Antonius seeing such a number of his men die daily, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, neither would suffer them to be at rest, he oftentimes cried out sighing, and said: O ten thousand! He had the valiantnesse of 10000. GRECIANS in such admiration, whom Xenophon brought away after the ouerthrow of Cyrus: because they had come a farther iourney from BABYLON, and had also fought against much moe enemies many times told, then themselues; and yet came home with safety. The PARTHIANS therefore seeing that they could not breake the good order of the army of the ROMANS, & contrarily, that they themselues were oftentimes put to flight, and welfauoredly beaten, they fell againe to their old crafty subtilties. For when they found any of the ROMANS scattered from the army to go forrage, to seeke some corne, or other victuals, they would come to them as if they had bene their friends, and shew them their bowes vnbent, saying, that themselues also did returne home to their country as they did, and that they would follow them no farther: howbeit that they should yet haue certaine MEDES that would follow them a dayes iourney or two, to keepe them that they should do no hurt to the villages from the high-wayes; and so holding them with this talke, they gently took their leaue of them, and bad them farewell, so that the ROMANES began againe to thinke themselues safe. Antonius also vnderstanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plaine countrey, because also they should find no water in the mountaines, as it was reported vnto him. So as he was determined to take his course, there came into his hoast one Mithridates, a gentleman from the enemies camp, who was cosin vnto Moneses that fled vnto Antonius, and vnto whom he had giuen three cities. When he came to Antonius campe, he prayed them to bring him one that could speake the PARTHIAN or SYRIAN tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a familiar of Antonius, was brought

brought vnto him. Then the gentleman told him what he was, and ſaid that Moneſes had ſent him to Antonius, to requite the honour and courteſie he had ſhewed vnto him. After he had vſed this ceremonious ſpeech, he asked Alexander if he ſaw thoſe high mountaines a far off, which he pointed vnto with his finger. Alexander anſwered he did. The PARTHINAS (ſaid he) do ly in ambuſh at the foot of thoſe mountaines, vnder the which lieth a goodly plaine champion country: and they thinke that you being deceiued with their crafty ſubtill words, will leaue the way of the mountaines, and turne into the plaine. For the other way, it is very hard and painful, and you ſhall abide great thirſt, the which you are well acquainted withall: but if Antonius take the lower way, let him aſſure himſelfe to runne the ſame fortune that Marcus Craſſus did. So Mithridates hauing ſaid, he departed. Antonius was maruellouſly troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, and therfore called for his friends, to heare what they would ſay to it. The MARDIAN alſo that was their guide, being asked his opinion, anſwered, that he thought as much as the gentleman Mithridates had ſaid. For, ſaid he, admit that there were no ambuſh of enemies in the valley, yet it is a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the mountaine way, though it be ſtony and painfull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole daies trauelling without any water. So Antonius changing his firſt mind and determination, remoued that night, and tooke the mountaine way, commanding euery man to prouide himſelfe of water. But the moſt part of thẽ lacking veſſels to cary water in, ſome were driuen to fill their ſallets & murrians with water, and others alſo filled goates skinnes to cary water in. Now they marching forward, word was brought vnto the PARTHIANS that they were remoued: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they preſently followed them the ſelfe ſame night, ſo that by breake of day they ouertooke the rereward of the ROMAINS, who were ſo lame and wearied with going, and lacke of ſleepe, that they were euen done. For beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundred and forty furlongs, and further, to ſee their enemies ſo ſodainly at their backs, that made them vtterly deſpaire: but moſt of all, the fighting with them increaſed their thirſt, becauſe they were forced to fight as they marched, to driue their enemies backe, yet creeping on ſtill. The vaward of the army by chance met with a riuer that was very cleare and cold water; but it was ſalt and venimous to drinke: for ſtraight it did gnaw the guts of thoſe that had drunke it, and made them maruellous dry, and put them into a terrible ache and pricking. And notwithſtanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thruſt them backe that would haue kept them from drinking, and ſo dranke. But Antonius going vp and downe amongſt them, prayed them to take a litle patience for a while, for hard by there was another riuer that the water was excellent good to drinke, and that from thenceforth the way was ſtony and ill for horſemen, that the enemies could follow them no further. So he cauſed the retrait to be ſounded to call them backe that fought, and commanded the tents to be ſet vp, that the ſouldiers might yet haue ſhadow to refreſh them with. So when the tents were ſet vp, and the PARTHIANS alſo retired according to their manner, the gentleman Mithridates before named, returned againe as before, and Alexander in like maner againe was brought vnto him for interpreter. Then Mithridates aduiſed him, that after the army had repoſed a little, the ROMAINES ſhould remoue forthwith, and with all ſpeed poſſible get to the riuer: becauſe the PARTHIANS would go no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander caried the report thereof vnto Antonius, who gaue him a great deale of gold plate to beſtow vpon Mithridates. Mithridates took as much of him as he could well cary away in his gowne, and ſo departed with ſpeed. So Antonius raiſed his camp being yet day light, & cauſed all his army to march, and the PARTHIANS neuer troubled any of them by the way: but amongſt themſelues it was as ill and dreadfull a night as euer they had. For there were villaines of their owne company, who cut their fellowes throats for the mony they had, and beſides that, robbed the ſumpters and cariage of ſuch money as they caried, and at length, they ſet vpon Antonius ſlaues that draue his owne ſumpters and cariage, they brake goodly tables and rich plate in peeces, and diuided it among themſelues. Thereupon all the campe was ſtraight in tumult and vprore: for the reſidue of them were afraid it had bene the PARTHIANS that had giuen them this alarme, and had put all the army out of order. Inſomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his ſlaues enfranchiſed that was of his guard, and made him giue him his faith that he would thruſt his ſword through him when he would bid him, and cut off his head, becauſe he might not be taken aliue of his enemies, nor knowne when he were dead. This grieued his friends to the heart, that they burſt

out a weeping for ſorow. The MARDIAN alſo did comfort him, and aſſured him that the riuer he ſought for was hard by, & that he did gueſſe it by a ſweet moiſt wind that breathed vpon them, and by the aire which they found freſher then they were wont, and alſo, for that they fetched their wind more at liberty; & moreouer, becauſe that ſince they did ſet forward, he thought they were neare their iourneys end, not lacking much of day. On the other ſide alſo Antonius was informed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the enemies, but through the vile couetouſneſſe and villany of certaine of his ſouldiers. Therfore Antonius to ſet his army againe in order, and to pacifie this vprore; ſounded the trumpet that euery man ſhould lodge. Now day began to break, and the army to fal again into good order, and all the hurly burly to ceaſe, when the PARTHIANS drew neare, and that their arrowes lighted among them of the rereward of his army. Thereupon the ſignall of battell was giuen to the light armed men, and the legioners did couer themſelues as they had done before with their ſhields, with the which they receiued and defended the force of the PARTHIANS arrowes, who neuer durſt any more come to handy ſtrokes with them: and thus they that were in the voward, went downe by little and little, till at length they eſpied the riuer. There Antonius placed his armed men vpon the ſands to receiue and driue back the enemies, and firſt of all, got ouer his men that were ſick and hurt, and afterwards all the reſt. And thoſe alſo that were left to reſiſt the enemies, had leiſure inough to drink ſafely, and at their pleaſure. For when the PARTHIANS ſaw the riuer, they vnbent their bowes, and bad the ROMAINS paſſe ouer without any feare, and greatly commended their valiantneſſe. When they had all paſſed ouer the riuer at their eaſe, they tooke a litle breath, and ſo marched forward again, not greatly truſting the PARTHIANS. The ſixt day after this laſt battell, they came to the riuer of Araxes, which diuideth the countrey of ARMENIA from MEDIA; the which appeared vnto them very dangerous to paſſe, for the depth & ſwiftneſſe of the ſtreame. And furthermore there ran a rumor through the campe, that the PARTHIANS lay in ambuſh thereabouts, and that they would come and ſet vpon them whileſt they were troubled in paſſing ouer the riuer. But now, after they were all come ſafely ouer without any danger, and that they had gotten to the other ſide, into the prouince of ARMENIA, then they worſhipped that land, as if it had bene the firſt land they had ſeene after a long and dangerous voyage by ſea, being now arriued in a ſafe and happy hauen: and the teares ran downe their cheekes, and euery man imbraced each other for the great ioy they had. But now, keeping the fields in this fruitfull country ſo plentifull of all things, after ſo great a famine and want of all things, they ſo crammed themſelues with ſuch plenty of victuals, that many of them were caſt into fluxes & dropſies. There Antonius muſtring his whole army, found that he had loſt 20000 footmen, and 4000 horſemen, which had not all bene ſlaine by their enemies: for the moſt part of them died of ſickneſſe, making ſeuen and twenty dayes iourney, coming from the city of PHRAATA into ARMENIA, and hauing ouercome the PARTHIANS in eighteene ſeuerall battels. But theſe victories were not throughly performed nor accompliſhed, becauſe they followed no long chaſe; and thereby it eaſily appeared, that Artabazus king of ARMENIA, had kept Antonius from ending this warre. For if the ſixteene thouſand horſemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had bene at theſe battels (conſidering that they were armed and apparelled much after the PARTHIAN maner, and acquainted alſo with their fight, when the ROMAINES had put them to flight that had fought a battell with them, and that theſe ARMENIANS had followed the chaſe of them that fled) they had not gathered themſelues againe in force, neither durſt they alſo haue returned to fight with them ſo often after they had bene ſo many times ouerthrowne. Therefore, all thoſe that were of any credit and countenance in the army, did perſwade and egge Antonius to be reuenged of this ARMENIAN king: but Antonius wiſely diſſembling his anger, he told him not of his trechery, nor gaue him the worſe countenance, nor did him leſſe honour then he did before: becauſe he knew his army was weak, & lacked things neceſſary. Howbeit afterwards he returned againe into ARMENIA with a great army, and ſo with faire words, and ſweete promiſes of meſſengers, he allured Artabazus to come to him: whom he then kept priſoner, and led in triumph in the city of ALEXANDRIA. This greatly offended the ROMAINES, and made them much to miſlike it, when they ſaw that for Cleopatraes ſake he depriued his country of her due honor and glory, onely to gratifie the ÆGYPTIANS. But this was a prety while after. Howbeit then, the great haſt he made to returne vnto Cleopatra, cauſed him to put his men to ſo great paines, forcing them to lie in the field all winter long when it ſnew vnreaſonably, that by the way he loſt eight thouſand of his men, men,and ſo came down to the ſea ſide with a ſmall company,vnto a certain place called BLANCBOVRG:which ſtandeth betwixt the cities of BERYTVS and SIDON, and there taried for Cleopatra. And becauſe ſhe taried longer then he would haue had her, he pined away for loue and ſorow:ſo that he was at ſuch a ſtraight,that he wiſt not what to do,and therfore to weare it out,he gaue himſelf to quaffing and feaſting. But he was ſo drowned with the loue of her,that he could not abide to ſit at the table till the feaſt was ended:but many times while others banquetted, he ran to the ſea ſide to ſee if ſhe were coming. At length ſhe came, and brought with her a world of apparell and money to giue vnto the ſouldiers. But ſome ſay notwithſtanding, that ſhe brought apparell and no money,and that ſhe tooke of Antonius mony,and cauſed it to be giuen amongſt the ſouldiers in her owne name, as if ſhe had giuen it them. In the meane time it chanced that the king of the MEDES, and Phraortes king of the PARTHIANS,fell at great wars together,the which began(as it is reported)for the ſpoyles of the ROMAINS: and grew to be ſo hote betweene them,that the king of MEDES was no leſſe afraid,then alſo in danger to loſe his whole Realme. Thereupon he ſent vnto Antonius, to pray him to come and make warre with the PARTHIANS,promiſing him that he would aid him to his vttermoſt power. This put Antonius againe in good comfort,conſidering that vnlooked for, the only thing he lacked(which made him he could not ouercome the PARTHIANS,meaning that he had not brought horſmen,and men with darts and ſlings inough) was offered him in that ſort, that it did him more pleaſure to accept it, then it was pleaſure to the other to offer it. Hereupon, after he had ſpoken with the king of MEDES at the riuer of Araxes,he prepared himſelf once more to go through ARMENIA,and to make more cruell warre with the PARTHIANS,then he had done before. Now whileſt Antonius was buſy in this preparation,Octauia his wife,whō he had left at ROME,would needs take ſea to come vnto him. Her brother Octauius Cæſar was willing to it, not for his reſpect at all (as moſt authors do report)as for that he might haue an honeſt colour to make warre with Antonius,if he did miſuſe her,and not eſteeme of her as ſhe ought to be. But when ſhe was come to ATHENS, ſhe receiued letters from Antonius,willing her to ſtay there vntill his coming,and did aduertiſe her of his iourny and determination. The which though it grieued her much, and that ſhe knew it was but an excuſe: yet by her letters to him of anſwer, ſhe asked him whether he would haue thoſe things ſent vnto him which ſhe had brought him, being great ſtore of apparell for ſouldiers,a great number of horſe,ſummes of mony and gifts,to beſtow on his friends and Captaines he had about him:and beſides all thoſe,ſhe had 2000 ſouldiers choſen men, all well armed like vnto the Prætors bands. When Niger,one of Antonius friends whom he had ſent vnto ATHENS, had brought theſe newes from his wife Octauia,& withall did greatly praiſe her,as ſhe was worthy,and well deſerued,Cleopatra knowing that Octauia would haue Antonius from her, and fearing alſo that if with her vertue and honeſt behauiour (beſides the great power of her brother Cæſar) ſhe did adde thereunto her modeſt kind loue to pleaſe her husband, that ſhe would then be too ſtrong for her,and in the end win him away: ſhe ſubtilly ſeemed to languiſh for the loue of Antonius,. pining her body for lacke of meat. Furthermore, ſhe euery way ſo framed her countenance,that when Antonius came to ſee her,ſhe caſt her eyes vpon him, like a woman rauiſhed for ioy. Straight againe when he went from her, ſhe fell a weeping and blubbering looking rufully on the matter,and ſtill found the meanes that Antonius ſhould oftentimes find her weeping: and then when he came ſuddenly vpon her, ſhe made as though ſhe dried her eyes,and turned her face away,as if ſhe were vnwilling that he ſhould ſee her weepe. All theſe tricks ſhe vſed, Antonius being in readines to go into SYRIA,to ſpeake with the king of MEDES. Then the flatterers that furthered Cleopatraes mind,blamed Antonius,and told him that he was a hard natured man,and that he had ſmall loue in him,that would ſee a poore Ladie in ſuch torment for his ſake, whoſe life depended onely vpon him alone. For Octauia, ſayd they, that was maried vnto him as it were of neceſſity, becauſe her brother Cæſars affaires ſo required it, hath the honour to be called Antonius lawfull ſpouſe and wife: and Cleopatra, being borne a Queene of ſo many thouſands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman; and yet that ſhe diſdained not ſo to be called, if it might pleaſe him ſhe might enioy his company,& liue with him: but if he once leaue her,that then it is vnpoſſible ſhe ſhould liue. To be ſhort, by theſe their flatteries and inticements, they ſo wrought Antonius effeminate mind,that fearing leſt ſhe would make her ſelfe away,he returned againe vnto ALEXANDRIA,and referred the king of MEDES to the next yeare following; although he receiued newes that the PARTHIANS at that time were at ciuill warres among themselues. This notwithstanding, he went afterwards and made peace with him. For he maried his daughter which was very yong, vnto one of the sons that Cleopatra had by him: and then returned being fully bent to make warre with Cæsar. When Octauia was returned to Rome from Athens, Cæsar commanded her to go out of Antonius house, and to dwell by her self, because he had abused her. Octauia answered him again, that she would not forsake her husbands house, and that if he had no other occasion to make warre with him, she prayed him then to take no thought for her: for said she, it were too shamefull a thing, that two so famous Captaines should bring in ciuill warres among the Romains, the one for the loue of a woman, and the other for the iealousie betwixt one another. Now as she spake the word, so did she also performe the deed: for she kept still in Antonius house, as if he had bene there, and very honestly, and honourably kept his children, not onely those she had by him, but the other which her husband had by Fuluia. Furthermore, when Antonius sent any of his men to Rome, to sue for any office in the commonwealth, she receiued thē very curteously, and so vsed her self vnto her brother, that she obtained the things she requested. Howbeit therby, thinking no hurt, she did Antonius great hurt. For her honest loue & regard to her husband, made euery man hate him, when they saw he did so vnkindly vse so noble a Lady: but the greatest cause of their malice vnto him, was for the diuision of lands he made among his children in the city of Alexandria. And to confesse a troth, it was too arrogant and insolent a part, and done (as a man would say) in derision and contempt of the Romaines. For he assembled all the people in the shew place, where yong men do exercise themselues, and there vpon a high tribunall siluered, he set two chaires of gold, the one for himself, and the other for Cleopatra, and lower chaires for his children, then he openly published before the assembly, that first of all he did establish Cleopatra Queene of Ægypt, of Cyprvs, of Lydia, and of the lower Syria; and at that time also Cæsarion king of the same Realmes. This Cæsarion was supposed to be the son of Iulius Cæsar, who had left Cleopatra great with child. Secondly, he called the sons he had by her, the kings of kings, and gaue Alexander for his portion, Armenia, Media, and Parthia, when he had conquered the country; and vnto Ptolomy for his portion, Phenicia, Syria, and Cilicia. And therewithall he brought out Alexander in a long gowne after the fashion of the Medes with a high cop-tanke hat on his head, narrow in the top, as the kings of the Medes and Armenians do vse to weare them: & Ptolomy apparelled in a cloake after the Macedonian maner, with slippers on his feet and a broad hat, with a royall band or diademe. Such was the apparell and old attire of the ancient kings and successors of Alexander the Great. So after his sons had done their humble duties, and kissed their father and mother, presently a company of Armenian souldiers set there of purpose, compassed the one about, and a like company of Macedonians the other. Now for Cleopatra she did not onely weare at that time (but at all other times else when she came abroad) the apparell of the goddesse Isis, and so gaue audience vnto all her subiects, as a new Isis. Octauius Cæsar reporting all these things vnto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole people and assembly in Rome, he thereby stirred vp all the Romains against him. Antonius on the other side sent to Rome likewise to accuse him, and the chiefest points of his accusations he charged him with, were these. First, that hauing spoiled Sextus Pompeius in Sicile, he did not giue him his part of the Ile. Secondly, that he did detaine in his hands the ships he lent him to make that warre. Thirdly, that hauing put Lepidus their companion and triumuerate out of his part of the Empire, and hauing depriued him of all honours, he retained for himselfe the lands and reuenues thereof, which had bene assigned vnto him for his part. And last of all, that he had in maner diuided all Italy amongst his owne souldiers, and had left no part of it for his soldiers. Octauius Cæsar answered him againe: that for Lepidus, he had indeed deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, because he did ouer cruelly vse his authoritie. And secondly, for the conquests he had made by force of armes, he was contented Antonius should haue his part of them, so that he would likewise let him haue his part of Armenia. And thirdly, that for his souldiers, they should seeke for nothing in Italy, because they possessed Media and Parthia, the which prouinces they had added to the Empire of Rome, valiantly fighting with their Emperour and Captaine. Antonius hearing these newes, being yet in Armenia, commanded Canidius to go presently to the sea side with his sixteene legions he had: and he himselfe with Cleopatra, went vnto the city of Ephesvs, and there gathered together his galleyes and ships out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great ships of burthen: and of thoſe Cleopatra furniſhed him with two hundred and twenty thouſand talents beſides, and prouiſion of victuals alſo to maintaine all the whole army in this war. So Antonius, through the perſwaſion of Domitius, commanded Cleopatra to returne againe into Ægypt, and there to vnderſtand the ſucceſſe of this warre. But Cleopatra fearing leſt Antonius ſhould againe be made friends with Octauius Cæſar, by the meanes of his wife Octauia, ſhe ſo plied Canidius with money, and filled his purſe, that he became her ſpoke-ſman vnto Antonius, and told him, there was no reaſon to ſend her from this warre, who defrayed ſo great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, becauſe thereby the Ægyptians would then be vterly diſcouraged, which were the chiefeſt ſtrength of the army by ſea: conſidering that he could ſee no king of all the kings their confederates, that Cleopatra was inferiour vnto, either for wiſdome or iudgement, ſeeing that long before ſhe had wiſely gouerned ſo great a realme as Ægypt; and beſides that, ſhe had bene ſo long acquainted with him, by whom ſhe had learned to manage great affaires. Theſe faire perſwaſions wan him: for it was predeſtinated that the gouernment of all the world ſhould fall into Octauius Cæſars hands. Thus, all their forces being ioyned together, they hoiſed ſaile towards the Ile of Samos, and there gaue themſelues to feaſts and ſolace. For as all the Kings, Princes, and communalties, people, and cities from Syria, vnto the marriſhes Mæotides, & from the Armenians to the Illyrians were ſent vnto, to ſend & bring all munition and warlike preparation they could: euen ſo all players, minſtrels, tumblers, fooles, and ieaſters, were commaunded to aſſemble in the Ile of Samos. So that, where in manner all the world in euery place was full of lamentations, ſighes and teares, only in this Ile of Samos there was nothing for many daies ſpace but ſinging and piping, and all the Theater full of theſe common players, minſtrels, and ſinging-men. Beſides all this, euery city ſent an oxe thither to ſacrifice, & kings did ſtriue one with another who ſhould make the nobleſt feaſts, and giue the richeſt gifts. So that euery man ſaid, What can they do more for ioy of victory, if they winne the battell, when they make already ſuch ſumptuous feaſts at the beginning of the warre? When this was done, he gaue the whole rabble of theſe minſtrels, and ſuch kind of people, the city of Priene to keepe them withall, during this warre. Then he went vnto the city of Athens, and there gaue himſelfe againe to ſee playes and paſtimes, and to keepe the Theaters. Cleopatra on the other ſide, being iealous of the honours which Octauia had receiued in this city, where indeed ſhe was maruellouſly honoured and beloued of the Athenians: to winne the peoples good-will alſo at Athens, ſhe gaue them great gifts: and they likewiſe gaue her many great honours, and appointed certaine Ambaſſadors to carry the decree to her houſe, among the which Antonius was one, who (as a citizen of Athens) reported the matter vnto her, and made an Oration in the behalfe of the city. Afterwards he ſent to Rome to put his wife Octauia out of his houſe, who (as it is reported) went out of his houſe with all Antonius children, ſauing the eldeſt of them he had by Fuluia, who was with his father: bewailing & lamenting her curſed hap, that had brought her to this, that ſhe was accounted one of the chiefeſt cauſes of this ciuill war. The Romaines did pitie her, but much more Antonius, and thoſe ſpecially that had ſeene Cleopatra: who neither excelled Octauia in beauty, nor yet in young yeares. Octauius Cæſar vnderſtanding the ſudden and wonderfull great preparation of Antonius, he was not a little aſtonied at it (fearing he ſhould be driuen to fight that ſommer) becauſe he wanted many things, and the great and grieuous exactions of money did ſore oppreſſe the people. For all manner of men elſe were driuen to pay the fourth part of their goods and reuenew, but the Libertines (to wit, thoſe whoſe fathers or other predeceſſors had ſometime bene bond-men) were ſeiſſed to pay the eight part of all their goods at one payment. Hereupon there aroſe a wonderfull exclamation and great vprore all Italy ouer, ſo that amongſt the greateſt faults that euer Antonius committed, they blamed him moſt for that he delayed to giue Cæſar battell. For he gaue Cæſar leiſure to make his preparations, and alſo to appeaſe the complaints of the people. When ſuch a great ſumme of money was demanded of them, they grudged at it, and grew to mutinie vpon it: but when they had once payed it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancus (two of Antonius chiefeſt friends, and that had bene both of them Conſuls) for the great iniuries Cleopatra did them, becauſe they hindered all they could that ſhe ſhould not come to this warre, they went and yeelded themſelues vnto Cæſar, and told him where the teſtament was that Antonius had made, knowing perfectly what was in it. The will was in the cuſtodie of the Veſtall Nunnes: of whom Cæſar demanded it. They anſwered him, that they would not giue

it him: but if he would go and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereupon Cæsar went thither, and hauing read it first to himselfe, he noted certaine places worthy of reproch: so assembling all the Senate, he read it before them all. Whereupon diuers were maruellously offended, and thought it a strange matter, that he being aliue, should be punished for that he had appointed by his will to be done after his death. Cæsar chiefly took hold of this, that he ordained touching his buriall: for he willed that his body, though he died at Rome, should be brought in funerall pompe through the middest of the market place, and that it should be sent into Alexandria vnto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among diuers other faults wherewith Antonius was to be charged for Cleopatraes sake, Caluisius one of Cæsars friends reproued him, because he had frankly giuen Cleopatra al the Libraries of the royall city of Pergamvm, in the which she had aboue two hundred thousand seuerall bookes. Againe also, that being on a time set at the table, he suddenly rose from the boord and trode vpon Cleopatraes foot, which was a signe giuen betweene them, that they were agreed of. That he had also suffered the Ephesians in his presence to call Cleopatra their soueraigne Ladie. That diuers times sitting in his tribunall and chaire of state, giuing audience to all Kings and Princes, he had receiued loue letters from Cleopatra, written in tables of Onyx or Christall; & that he had read them, sitting in his Imperiall seat. That one day when Furnius a man of great account, & the eloquentest man of al the Romains, pleaded a matter before him, Cleopatra by chance coming through ỹ market place in her litter where Furnius was a pleading, Antonius straight rose out of his seat, & left his audience to follow her litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Caluisius deuised the most part of all these accusations of his own head. Neuerthelesse they that loued Antonius were intercessors to the people for him, and amongst them they sent one Geminius vnto Antonius, to pray him he would take heed that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from him, and that he should be counted an enemy to the people of Rome. This Geminius being arriued in Greece, made Cleopatra iealous straight of his coming, because she surmised that he came not but to speake for Octauia. Therfore she spared not to taunt him all supper time; and moreouer to spite him the more, she made him to be set lowest of all at the boord: the which he tooke patiently, expecting occasion to speake with Antonius. Now Antonius commanding him at the table to tell him what wind brought him thither, he answered, That it was no table talke, and that he would tell him to morow morning fasting: but drunke or fasting, howsoeuer it were, he was sure of one thing, that all would not go well on his side, vnlesse Cleopatra were sent backe into Ægypt. Antonius tooke these words in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other side answered him, Thou doest well Geminius, said she, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within few daies after, Geminius stole away, and fled to Rome. The flatterers also to please Cleopatra, did make her driue many other of Antonius faithful seruants & friends frō him, who could not abide the iniuries done vnto them: among the which these two were chiefe, Marcus Syllanus, and Dellius the Historiographer, who wrote that he fled because her Phisitian Glaucus told him, that Cleopatra had set some secretly to kill him. Furthermore, he had Cleopatraes displeasure, because he said one night at supper, that they made them drinke sowre wine, where Sarmentus at Rome dranke good wine of Falerna. This Sarmentus was a pleasant yong boy, such as the Lords of Rome are wont to haue about them to make thē pastime, which they call their ioyes, and he was Octauius Cæsars boy. Now after that Cæsar had made sufficient preparation, he proclaimed open warre against Cleopatra, and made the people to abolish the power and Empire of Antonius, because he had before giuen it vp vnto a woman. And Cæsar said furthermore, that Antonius was not master of himselfe, but that Cleopatra had brought him beside himselfe by her charmes and amorous poysons: and that they that should make warre with them, should be Mardian the Eunuch, Photinus, and Iras (a woman of Cleopatraes bed-chamber, that frizeled her haire, and dressed her head) and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the affaires of Antonius Empire. Before this warre, as it is reported, many signes and wonders fell out. First of all, the city of Pisavrvm which was made a Colonie to Rome, and replenished with people by Antonius, standing vpon the shore side of the sea Adriaticke, was by a terrible earth-quake sunke into the ground. One of the images of stone, which was set vp in the honour of Antonius in the city of Alba, did sweate many daies together: and though some wiped it away, yet it left not sweating still. In the city of Patras whileſt Antonius was there, the temple of Hercules was burnt with lightning. And at the city of Athens also, in a place where the warre of the Giants against the gods is set out in Imagerie, the

the ſtatue of Bacchus with a terrible wind was throwne downe in the Theater. It was ſaid, that Antonius came of the race of Hercules (as you haue heard before,) and in the manner of his life he followed Bacchus, and therfore he was called the new Bacchus. Furthermore, the ſame bluſtering ſtorme of wind ouerthrew the great monſtrous images at ATHENS, that were made in ỹ honor of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named & intituled, The Antonians: and yet did they hurt none of the other images, which were many beſides. The Admirall galley of Cleopatra was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a maruellous ill ſigne: Swallowes had bred vnder the poope of her ſhip, and there came others after them that draue away the firſt, and plucked downe their neaſts. Now when all things were ready, and that they drew neare to fight, it was found, that Antonius had no leſſe then 500 good ſhips of war, among which there were many galleis that had eight and ten banks of oares, the which were ſumptuouſly furniſhed, not ſo meet for fight, as for triumph: an hundred thouſand footmen, and 12000 horſemen; and had with him to aid him theſe kings & ſubiects following: Bocchus king of LYBIA, Tarcondemus king of high CILICIA, Archelaus king of CAPPADOCIA, Philadelphus king of PAPHLAGONIA, Mithridates king of COMAGENA, and Adallas king of THRACIA. Al which were there euery mã in perſõ. The reſidue that were abſent, ſent their armies: as Polemon king of PONT, Manchus king of ARABIA, Herodes king of IVRY; and furthermore Amyntas king of LYCAONIA & of the GALATIANS: & beſides all theſe, he had al ỹ aid the king of MEDES ſent vnto him. Now for Cæſar, he had 250 ſhips of war, 80000 footmen, & well neare as many horſemen as his enemy Antonius. Antonius for his part had all vnder his dominion from ARMENIA & the riuer of Euphrates, vnto the ſea IONIVN & ILLYRICVM. Octauius Cæſar had alſo for his part, all that which was in our HEMISPHERE or halfe part of the world, from ILLYRIA vnto the Ocean ſea vpon the Weſt: then all from the Ocean vnto mare Siculum: and from AFRICKE, all that which is againſt ITALY, as GAVLE and SPAINE. Furthermore, al from the prouince of CYRENIA to ÆTHIOPIA, was ſubiect vnto Antonius. Now Antonius was made ſo ſubiect to a womans wil, that though he was a great deale the ſtronger by land, yet for Cleopatraes ſake he would needs haue this battell tried by ſea: though he ſaw before his eyes, that for lacke of water-men, his captaines did preſt by force al ſorts of men out of GREECE that they could take vp in the field, as trauellers, muletters, reapers, harueſt-men, and yong boyes; and yet could they not ſufficiently furniſh his galleys: ſo that the moſt part of them were empty, and could ſcant row, becauſe they lacked water-men enough. But on the contrary ſide, Cæſars ſhips were not built for pompe, high and great, onely for a ſight and braueric, but they were light of yarage, armed and furniſhed with water-men as many as they needed, and had them all in readineſſe in the hauens of TARENTVM and BRVNDVSIVM. So Octauius Cæſar ſent vnto Antonius, to will him to delay no more time, but to come on with his armie into ITALY: and that for his owne part he would giue him ſafe harbour to land without any trouble; and that he would withdraw his army from the ſea, as farre as one horſe could runne, vntill he had put his army aſhore, and had lodged his men. Antonius on the other ſide brauely ſent him word again, and challenged the combat of him, man for man, though he were the elder: and that if he refuſed him ſo, he would then fight a battell with him in the fields of PHARSALIA, as Iulius Cæſar and Pompey had done before. Now whileſt Antonius rode at anker, lying idly in harbour at the head of ACTIVM, in the place where the city of NICOPOLIS ſtandeth at this preſent, Cæſar had quickly paſſed the ſea Ionium, and taken a place called TORYNE, before Antonius vnderſtood that he had taken ſhip. Then began his men to be afraid, becauſe his army by land was left behind. But Cleopatra making light of it; And what danger I pray you, ſaid ſhe, if Cæſar keepe at * TORYNE? The next morning by breake of day, his enemies comming with full force of oares in battell againſt him, Antonius was afraid, that if they came to ioyne, they would take and carry away his ſhips that had no men of warre in them. So he armed all his water-men, and ſet them in order of battell vpon the fore-caſtell of their ſhips, and then lift vp all his rankes of oares towards the element, as well on the one ſide as on the other, with the prooes againſt the enemies, at the entrie and mouth of the gulfe, which beginneth at the point of ACTIVM: and ſo kept them in order of battell, as if they had bene armed and furniſhed with water-men and ſouldiers. Thus Octauius Cæſar being finely deceiued by this ſtratageme, retired preſently, and therewithall Antonius very wiſely and ſuddenly did cut him off from freſh water. For vnderſtanding that the places where Octauius Cæſar landed had very litle ſtore of water, and yet very bad, he ſhut them in with ſtrong ditches and trenches he caſt, to keepe them from ſailing out at their pleasure, and so to go seeke water farther off. Furthermore, he dealt very friendly and courteously with Domitius, and against Cleopatraes mind. For he being sicke of an ague when he went and tooke a little boate to go vnto Cæsars campe, Antonius was very sorie for it, but yet he sent after him all his cariage, traine, and men: and the same Domitius, as though he gaue him to vnderstand that he repented his open treason, died immediatly after. There were certaine kings also that forsooke him, and turned on Cæsars side, as Amyntas and Deiotarus. Furthermore, his fleete and nauie that was vnfortunate in all things, and vnready for seruice, compelled him to change his mind, and to hazard battell by land. And Canidius also, who had charge of his army by land, when time came to follow Antonius determination, he turned him cleane contrary, and counselled him to send Cleopatra backe againe, and himselfe to retire into MACEDON, to fight there on the maine land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes king of the GETES promised to aide him with a great power: and that it should be no shame nor dishonour to him to let Cæsar haue the sea, because himselfe and his men both had bene well practised and exercised in battels by sea, in the warre of SICILIA against Sextus Pompeius: but rather that he should do against all reason (he hauing so great skill and experience of battels by land as he had) if he should not imploy the force and valiantnesse of so many lustie armed foot-men as he had readie, but would weaken his army by deuiding them into ships. But now, notwithstanding all these good perswasions, Cleopatra forced him to put all to the hazard of battell by sea: considering with her selfe how she might flie and prouide for her safety, not to helpe him to winne the victory, but to flie more easily after the battell lost. Betwixt Antonius campe and his fleete of ships, there was a great high point of firme land that ranne a good way into the sea, the which Antonius vsed often for a walke, without mistrust of feare or danger. One of Cæsars men perceiued it, and told his master that he would laugh if they could take vp Antonius in the middest of his walke. Thereupon Cæsar sent some of his men to lie in ambush for him, and they missed not much of taking him (for they tooke him that came before him) because they discouered too soone, and so Antonius scaped very hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by sea, he set all the other ships on fire, but threescore ships of ÆGYPT, and reserued onely the best and greatest galleys, from three bankes vnto ten bankes of oares. Into them he put two and twenty thousand fighting men, with two thousand darters and slingers. Now as he was setting his men in order of battell, there was a Captaine, a valiant man, that had serued Antonius in many battels and conflicts, and had all his body hacked and cut: who, as Antonius passed by him, cried out vnto him, and said: O noble Emperour, how commeth it to passe that you trust to these vile brittle ships? What, do you mistrust these wounds of mine, and this sword? let the ÆGYPTIANS and PHOENICIANS fight by sea, and set vs on the maine land, where we vse to conquer, or to be slaine on our feete. Antonius passed by him and said neuer a word, but onely beckened to him with his hand and head, as though he willed him to be of good courage, although indeed he had no great courage himselfe. For when the masters of the galleys and pilots would haue let their sailes alone, he made them clap them on; saying to colour ỹ matter withal, that not one of his enemies should scape. All that day and the three daies following, the sea rose so high, and was so boisterous, that the battell was put off. The fift day the storme ceassed, & the sea calmed againe, and then they rowed with force of oares in battell one against the other: Antonius leading the right wing with Publicola, and Cælius the left, and Marcus Octauius, and Marcus Iusteius the midst. Octauius Cæsar on the other side had placed Agrippa in the left wing of his army, and had kept the right wing for himselfe. For the armies by land, Canidius was Generall of Antonius side, and Taurus of Cæsars side: who kept their men in battell ray, the one before the other, vpon the sea side, without stirring one against the other. Further, touching both the Chieftaines: Antonius being in a swift pinnace, was caried vp and downe by force of oares through his army, & spake to his people to encourage them to fight valiantly, as if they were on maine land, because of the steadinesse and heauinesse of their shippes: and commanded the pilots and masters of the galleys, that they should not stirre, none otherwise then if they were at anker, and so to receiue the first charge of their enemies, and that they should not go out of the streight of the gulfe. Cæsar betimes in the morning going out of his tent, to see his shippes throughout, met a man by chance that draue an Asse before him: Cæsar asked the man what his name was. The poore man told him that his name was Eutychus, to say Fortunate: and his Asses name Nicon, to say Conquerour. Therefore Cæsar after he had wonne the battell, setting out the market place with the ſpurres of the galleys he had taken, for a ſigne of his victory, he cauſed alſo the man and his Aſſe to be ſet vp in braſſe. When he had viſited the order of his armie throughout, he tooke a litle pinnace, and went to the right wing, and wondered when he ſaw his enemies lie ſtil in the ſtreight, & ſtirred not. For diſcerning them a far off, men would haue thought they had bene ſhips riding at anker: and a good while he was ſo perſwaded. So, he kept his galleys eight furlongs from his enemies. About noone there aroſe a litle gale of wind from the ſea, and then Antonius men waxing angry with tarying ſo long, and truſting to the greatneſſe and height of their ſhips, as if they had bene inuincible, they began to march forward with their left wing. Cæſar ſeeing that, was a glad man, and began a litle to giue backe from the right wing, to allure them to come farther out of the ſtreight and gulfe, to the end that he might with his light ſhips well manned with water-men, turne and enuirone the galleys of the enemies, the which were heauie of yarage, both for their bigneſſe, as alſo for lacke of water-men to row them. When the skirmiſh began, and that they came to ioyne, there was no great hurt at the firſt meeting, neither did the ſhips vehemently hit one againſt the other, as they do commonly in fight by ſea. For on the other ſide, Antonius ſhips for their heauineſſe could not haue the ſtrength and ſwiftneſſe to make their blowes of any force: and Cæſars ſhips on the other ſide tooke great heed not to ruſh and ſhocke with the forecaſtels of Antonius ſhips, whoſe prowes were armed with great brazen ſpurres. Furthermore they durſt not flanke them, becauſe their points were eaſily broken, which way ſoeuer they came to ſet vpon his ſhips, that were made of great maine ſquare peeces of timber, bound together with great yron pins: ſo that the battell was much like vnto a battell by land, or to ſpeake more properly, to the aſſault of a city. For there were alwaies three or foure of Cæſars ſhips about one of Antonius ſhips, and the ſouldiers fought with their pikes, halbards and darts, and threw halbards and darts with fire. Antonius ſhips on the other ſide beſtowed among them, with their crosbowes and engines of battery, great ſtore of ſhot from their high towers of wood that were ſet vpon their ſhips. Now Publicola ſeeing Agrippa put forth his left wing of Cæſars army, to compaſſe in Antonius ſhips that fought, he was driuen alſo to loofe off to haue more roome, and to go a litle at one ſide, to put thoſe farther off that were afraid, and in the middeſt of the battell: for they were ſore diſtreſſed by Arruntius. Howbeit the battell was yet of euen hand, and the victory doubtfull, being indifferent to both: when ſuddenly they ſaw the threeſcore ſhips of Cleopatra buſily about their yard-maſts, and hoiſing ſaile to flie. So they fled through the middeſt of them that were in fight, for they had bene placed behind the great ſhips, and did maruellouſly diſorder the other ſhips. For the enemies themſelues wondered much to ſee them ſaile in that ſort, with full ſaile towards PELOPONNESVS. There Antonius ſhewed plainly, that he had not onely loſt the courage and heart of an Emperour, but alſo of a valiant man; and that he was not his owne man (prouing that true which an old man ſpake in mirth, That the ſoule of a louer liued in another body, and not in his owne;) he was ſo caried away with the vaine loue of this woman, as if he had bene glued vnto her, and that ſhe could not haue remoued without mouing of him alſo. For when he ſaw Cleopatraes ſhip vnder ſaile, he forgot, forſook, and betrayed them that fought for him, and imbarked vpon a galley with fiue bankes of oares, to follow her that had already begun to ouerthrow him, and would in the end be his vtter deſtruction. When ſhe knew his galley a farre off, ſhe lift vp a ſigne in the poope of her ſhip; and ſo Antonius comming to it, was pluckt vp where Cleopatra was: howbeit he ſaw her not at his firſt comming, nor ſhe him, but went and ſate downe alone in the prow of his ſhip, and ſaid neuer a word, clapping his head betweene both his hands. In the meane time came certaine light brigantines of Cæſars, that followed him hard. So Antonius ſtraight turned the prow of his ſhip, and preſently put the reſt to flight, ſauing one Eurycles a LACEDÆMONIAN, that followed him neare, and preſſed vpon him with great courage, ſhaking a dart in his hand ouer the prow, as though he would haue throwne it vnto Antonius. Antonius ſeeing him, came to the fore-caſtell of his ſhip, and asked him what he was that durſt follow Antonius ſo neare? I am, anſwered he, Eurycles the ſon of Lachares, who through Cæſars good fortune ſeeketh to reuenge the death of my father. This Lachares was condemned of fellonie, and beheaded by Antonius. But yet Eurycles durſt not venture vpon Antonius ſhip, but ſet vpon the other Admirall galley (for there were two:) and fell vpon him with ſuch a blow of his brazen ſpurre that was ſo heauy and bigge, that he turned her round, and tooke her, with another that was loden with very rich ſtuffe and cariage. After Eurycles had left Antonius, he turned againe to his place, and ſate downe, ſpeaking neuer a word, as he did before: and ſo liued three dayes alone, without ſpeaking to any man. But when he arriued at the head of Tænarus, there Cleopatraes women firſt brought Antonius and Cleopatra to ſpeake together, and afterwards to ſup and lie together. Then began there againe a great number of merchants ſhips to gather about them, and ſome of their friends that had eſcaped from this ouerthrow, who brought newes, that his army by ſea was ouerthrowne, but that they thought the army by land was yet whole. Then Antonius ſent vnto Canidius, to returne with his army into Asia by Macedon. Now for himſelfe, he determined to croſſe ouer into Africke, and tooke one of his carects or hulkes loden with gold and ſiluer, & other rich cariage, & gaue it vnto his friends, cõmanding them to depart, and ſeeke to ſaue themſelues. They anſwered him weeping, that they would neither do it, nor yet forſake him. Then Antonius very courteouſly and louingly did comfort them, & prayed them to depart; and wrote vnto Theophilus gouernour of Corinth, that he would ſee them ſafe, and helpe to hide them in ſome ſecret place, vntill they had made their way and peace with Cæſar. This Theophilus was the father of Hipparchus, who was had in great eſtimation about Antonius. He was the firſt of all his enfranchiſed bondmen that reuolted from him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and afterwards went and dwelt at Corinth. And thus it ſtood with Antonius. Now for his army by ſea, that fought before the head or foreland of Activm, they held out a long time, and nothing troubled them more then a great boiſterous wind that roſe full in the prowes of their ſhips; and yet with much ado his nauie was at length ouerthrowne, fiue houres within night. There were not ſlaine aboue fiue thouſand men: but yet there were three hundred ſhippes taken, as Octauius Cæſar writeth himſelfe in his Commentaries. Many plainly ſaw Antonius flie, and yet could very hardly beleeue it, that he that had nineteene legions whole by land, and twelue thouſand horſemen vpon the ſea ſide, would ſo haue forſaken them, and haue fled ſo cowardly, as if he had not oftentimes proued both the one & the other fortune, and that he had not bene throughly acquainted with the diuerſe changes and fortunes of battels. And yet his ſouldiers ſtill wiſhed for him, and euer hoped that he would come by ſome meanes or other vnto them. Furthermore, they ſhewed themſelues ſo valiant and faithfull vnto him, that after they certainely knew he was fled, they kept themſelues whole together ſeuen daies. In the end Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forſaking his campe, when they ſaw themſelues thus deſtitute of their heads and leaders, they yeelded themſelues vnto the ſtronger. This done, Cæſar ſailed towards Athens, and there made peace with the Grecians, and deuided the reſt of the corne that was taken vp for Antonius army, vnto the townes and cities of Greece, the which had bene brought to extreme miſery and pouerty, cleane without money, ſlaues, horſe, and other beaſts of cariage. So that my grandfather Nicarchus told, that all the citizens of our city of Chæronea (not one excepted) were driuen themſelues to cary a certaine meaſure of corne on their ſhoulders to ẏ ſea ſide, that lieth directly ouer againſt the Ile of Anticyra, & yet were they driuẽ thither with whips. They caried it thus but once: for the ſecond time that they were charged againe to make the like cariage, all the corne being ready to be caried, newes came that Antonius had loſt the battell, and ſo ſcaped our poore city. For Antonius ſouldiers & deputies fled immediatly, & the citizens deuided the corne amongſt them. Antonius being arriued in Lybia, he ſent Cleopatra before into Ægypt from the city of Parætonivm; & he himſelfe remained very ſolitary, hauing onely two of his friends with him, with whom he wandered vp and downe both of them Orators, the one Ariſtocrates a Grecian, & the other Lucilius a Romaine: of whom we haue written in another place, that at the battel where Brutus was ouerthrowne, by the city of Philippes, he came and willingly put himſelf into the hands of thoſe that followed Brutus, ſaying that it was he: becauſe Brutus in the meane time might haue liberty to ſaue himſelfe. And afterwards, becauſe Antonius ſaued his life, he ſtill remained with him, & was very faithfull & friendly vnto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had truſted with the gouernment of Lybia, and vnto whom he had giuen the charge of his army there, had yeelded vnto Cæſar, he was ſo mad withall, that he would haue ſlaine himſelfe for anger, had not his friends about him withſtood him, & kept him from it. So he went vnto Alexandria, and there found Cleopatra about a wõderfull enterpriſe, and of great attempt. Betwixt the red ſea, and the ſea betweene the lands that point vpon the coaſt of Ægypt, there is a litle peece of land that deuideth both the ſeas, and ſeparateth Apricke from Asia: the which ſtreight is ſo narrow at the end where the two ſeas are narroweſt, that it is not aboue three hundred furlongs ouer. Cleopatra went about to lift her ſhips ſhips out of the one ſea, and to hale them ouer the banke into the other ſea: that when her ſhips were come into the gulfe of Arabia, ſhe might then carie all her gold and ſiluer away, and ſo with a great company of men go and dwell in ſome place about the Ocean ſea, farre from the ſea Mediterraneum, to ſcape the danger and bondage of this warre. But now, becauſe the Arabians dwelling about the city of Petra, did burne the firſt ſhippes that were brought to land, and that Antonius thought, that his army by land which he left at Actium was yet whole, ſhe left off her enterpriſe, and determined to keepe all the ports & paſſages of her realme. Antonius, he forſooke the city and company of his friends, and built him a houſe in the ſea, by the Ile of Pharos, vpon certaine forced mounts which he cauſed to be caſt into the ſea, & dwelt there, as a man that baniſhed himſelfe from all mens company: ſaying that he would leade Timons life, becauſe he had the like wrong offered him, that was before offered vnto Timon: and that for the vnthankfulneſſe of thoſe he had done good vnto, and whom he tooke to be his friends, he was angry with all men, and would truſt no man. This Timon was a citizen of Athens, that liued about ỹ warre of Peloponnesvs, as appeareth by Plato and Ariſtophanes comedies: in the which they mocked him, calling him a viper and malicious man vnto mankind, to ſhun all other mens companies, but the company of young Alcibiades, a bold and inſolent youth, whom he would greatly feaſt and make much of, and kiſſed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cauſe what he meant to make ſo much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon anſwered him, I do it, ſaid he, becauſe I know that one day he ſhall do great miſchiefe vnto the Athenians. This Timon ſomtimes would haue Apemantus in his company, becauſe he was much like of his nature and conditions, and alſo followed him in manner of life. On a time when they ſolemnly celebrated the feaſt called Choæ at Athens, (to wit, the feaſts of the dead where they make ſprinklings and ſacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feaſted together by themſelues, Apemantus ſaid vnto the other: O here is a trim banquet Timon. Timon anſwered againe: Yea, ſaid he, ſo thou wert not here. It is reported of him alſo, that this Timon on a time (the people being aſſembled in the market place about diſpatch of ſome affaires) got vp into the pulpit for Orations, where the Oratours commonly vſe to ſpeake vnto ỹ people: and ſilence being made, euery man liſtening to heare what he would ſay, becauſe it was a wonder to ſee him in that place, at length he began to ſpeake in this manner: My Lords of Athens, I haue a little yard at my houſe where there groweth a figge tree, on the which many citizens haue hanged themſelues: and becauſe I meane to make ſome building on the place, I thought good to let you all vnderſtand it, that before the figge tree be cut downe, if any of you be deſperate, you may there in time go hang your ſelues. He died in the city of Hales, and was buried vpon the ſea ſide. Now it chanced ſo, that the ſea getting in, it compaſſed his tombe round about, that no man could come to it: and vpon the ſame was written this Epitaph:

Antonius followeth the life and example of Timon Miſanthropos the Athenian.

Plato and Ariſtophanes teſtimony of Timon Miſanthropos, what he was.

Here lies a wretched corſe, of wretched ſoule bereft:
Seeke not my name: a plague conſume you wicked wretches left.

The Epitaph of Timon Miſanthropos.

It is reported that Timon himſelfe, when he liued, made this Epitaph: for that which is commonly rehearſed, was not this, but made by the Poet Callimachus:

Here lye I Timon, who aliue all liuing men did hate:
Paſſe by and curſe thy fill: but paſſe, and ſtay not here thy gate.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this litle ſhall ſuffice at this preſent. But now to returne to Antonius againe. Canidius himſelfe came to bring him newes, that he had loſt all his army by land at Actium: on the other ſide he was aduertiſed alſo, that Herodes king of Iurie, who had alſo certaine legions and bands with him, was reuolted vnto Cæſar, and al the other kings in like maner: ſo that ſauing thoſe that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwithſtanding did nothing trouble him: and it ſeemed that he was contented to forgo all his hope, and ſo to be rid of all his cares and troubles. Thereupon he left his ſolitary houſe he had built by the ſea which he called Timoneon, and Cleopatra receiued him into her royall pallace. He was no ſooner come thither, but he ſtraight ſet all the city on rioting & banquetting againe, and himſelfe to liberalitie and gifts. He cauſed the ſon of Iulius Cæſar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according to the manner of the Romaines) amongſt the number of young men: and gaue Antyllus, his eldeſt ſon he had by Fuluia, the mans gowne, the which was a plaine gowne without gard or embroderie, of purple. For theſe things, there was kept great feaſting, banquetting and dancing in Alexandria many daies together. Indeed they did break their firſt order they had set downe, which they called Amimetobion, (as much to say, No life comparable) and did set vp another, which they called Synapothanumenon, (signifying the order and agreement of those that will die together,) the which in exceeding sumptuousnesse and cost was not inferiour to ỹ first. For their friends made themselues to be enrolled in this order of those that would die together, and so made great feasts one to another: for euery man when it came to his turne, feasted their whole company and fraternity. Cleopatra in the meane time was very carefull in gathering all sorts of poisons together, to destroy men. Now to make proofe of those poisons which made men die with least paine, she tried it vpon condemned men in prison. For when she saw the poisons that were sodaine and vehement, & brought speedie death with grieuous torments: and in contrary manner, that such as were more mild and gentle, had not that quicke speede and force to make one die sodainely: she afterwards went about to proue the stinging of snakes and adders, and made some to be applyed vnto men in her sight, some in one sort, some in another. So when she had daily made diuerse and sundry proofes, she found none of them all she had proued so fit as the biting of an Aspicke: the which causeth only a heauinesse of the head, without swouning or complaining, and bringeth a great desire also to sleepe, with a little sweate in the face; and so by litle and litle taketh away the senses and vitall powers, no liuing creature perceiuing that the patients feele any paine. For they are so sorie when any body awaketh them, and taketh them vp, as those that be taken out of a sound sleepe, are very heauy and desirous to sleepe. This notwithstanding, they sent Ambassadors vnto Octauius Cæsar in Asia, Cleopatra requesting the realme of Ægypt for their children, and Antonius praying that he might be suffered to liue at Athens like a priuate man, if Cæsar would not let him remaine in Ægypt. And because they had no other men of estimation about them, for that some were fled, and those that remained, they did not greatly trust, they were enforced to send Euphronius the schoolemaster of their children. For Alexas Laodician, who was brought into Antonius house and fauour by meanes of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credit with him, then any other Grecian (for that he had euer bene one of Cleopatraes ministers to win Antonius, and to ouerthrow all his good determinations to vse his wife Octauia well:) him Antonius had sent vnto Herodes king of Ivrie, hoping still to keepe him his friend, that he should not reuolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he should haue kept Herodes from reuolting from him, he perswaded him to turne to Cæsar: and trusting king Herodes, he presumed to come in Cæsars presence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleasure, for he was presently taken prisoner, and sent in chains to his owne countrey, and there by Cæsars commandement put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cæsar would not grant vnto Antonius requests: but for Cleopatra, he made her answer, that he would deny her nothing reasonable, so that she would either put Antonius to death, or driue him out of her country. Therewithal he sent Thyreus one of his men vnto her, a very wise and discreet man: who bringing letters of credite from a young Lord vnto a noble Ladie, and that besides greatly liked her beauty, might easily by his eloquence haue perswaded her. He was longer in talke with her then any man else was, and the Queene her selfe also did him great honour: insomuch as he made Antonius iealous of him. Whereupon Antonius caused him to be taken and well fauouredly whipped, and so sent him vnto Cæsar: and bad him tell him, that he made him angrie with him, because he shewed himselfe proud and disdainefull towards him; and now specially, when he was easie to be angred, by reason of his present misery. To be short, if this mislike thee (said he) thou hast Hipparchus one of my enfranchised bondmen with thee: hang him if thou wilt, or whippe him at thy pleasure, that we may cry quittance. From henceforth Cleopatra, to cleare her selfe of the suspition he had of her, made more of him then euer she did. For first of all, where she did solemnize the day of her birth very meanely and sparingly, fit for her present misfortune, she now in contrary manner did keepe it with such solemnity, that she exceeded all measure of sumptuousnes and magnificence: so that the guests that were bidden to the feasts, and came poore, went away rich. Now things passing thus, Agrippa by diuers letters sent one after another vnto Cæsar, prayed him to returne to Rome, because the affaires there did of necessity require his person & presence. Therupon he did defer the war till the next yeare following: but whē winter was done he returned again through Syria by the coast of Africk, to make wars against Antonius, and his other captains. When the city of Pelvsivm was taken, there ran a rumour in the city, that Seleucus (by Cleopatraes consent) had surrendred the same. But to cleare her her ſelf that ſhe did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus wife and children vnto Antonius, to be reuenged of them at his pleaſure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many ſumptuous tombes and monuments, as well for excellencie of workmanſhip, as for height and greatneſſe of building, ioyning hard to the temple of Iſis. Thither ſhe cauſed to be brought all the treaſure and precious things ſhe had of the ancient kings her predeceſſours: as gold, ſiluer, emeralds, pearles, ebony, yuory, and cynnamon, and beſides all that, a maruellous number of torches, faggots, and flaxe. So Octauius Cæſar being affraid to loſe ſuch a treaſure and maſſe of riches, and that this woman for ſpite would ſet it on fire & burne it euery whit, he alwaies ſent ſome one or other vnto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whileſt he in the meane time drew neare the city with his army, So Cæſar came and pitched his campe hard by the city, in the place where they runne and mannage their horſes. Antonius made a ſallie vpon him, and fought very valiantly, ſo that he draue Cæſars horſemen backe, fighting with his men euen into their campe. Then he came againe to the pallace, greatly boaſting of this victory, and ſweetly kiſſed Cleopatra, armed as he was when he came from the fight, recommending one of his men of armes vnto her, that had valiantly fought in this skirmiſh. Cleopatra to reward his manlineſſe, gaue him an armor and head peece of cleane gold: howbeit the man at armes when he had receiued this rich gift, ſtole away by night, and went to Cæſar. Antonius ſent againe to challenge Cæſar, to fight with him hand to hand. Cæſar anſwered him, That he had many other waies to die then ſo. Then Antonius ſeeing there was no way more honorable for him to die, then fighting valiantly, he determined to ſet vp his reſt, both by ſea and land. So being at ſupper (as it is reported) he commanded his Officers and houſhold ſeruants that waited on him at his boord, that they ſhould fill his cuppes full, and make as much of him as they could: for ſaid he, you know not whether you ſhall do ſo much for me to morrow or not, or whether you ſhall ſerue another maſter: and it may be you ſhall ſee me no more, but a dead body. This notwithſtanding, perceiuing that his friends and men fell a weeping to heare him ſay ſo: to ſalue that he had ſpoken, he added this more vnto it, that he would not leade them to battell, where he thought not rather ſafely to returne with victory, then valiantly to die with honour. Furthermore, the ſelfe ſame night within a litle of midnight, when all the city was quiet, full of feare and ſorow, thinking what would be the iſſue and end of this warre, it is ſaid, that ſodainly they heard a maruellous ſweet harmony of ſundry ſorts of inſtruments of muſicke, with the crie of a multitude of people, as they had bene dancing, and had ſung as they vſe in Bacchus feaſts, with mouings and turnings after the manner of the Satyres: and it ſeemed, that this dance went through the city vnto the gate that opened to the enemies, and that all the troupe that made this noiſe they heard, went out of the city at that gate. Now, ſuch as in reaſon ſought the depth of the interpretation of this wonder, thought that it was the god vnto whom Antonius bare ſingular deuotion to counterfeit and reſemble him, that did forſake them. The next morning by break of day, he went to ſet thoſe few footemen he had in order vpon the hils adioyning vnto the city: and there he ſtood to behold his gallies which departed from the hauen, and rowed againſt the gallies of the enemies, and ſo ſtood ſtill, looking what exploits his ſoldiers in thē would do. But when by force of rowing they were come neare vnto them, they firſt ſaluted Cæſars men; and then Cæſars men reſaluted them alſo, and of two armies made but one: and then did altogether row toward the city. When Antonius ſaw that his men did forſake him, and yeelded vnto Cæſar, and that his footemen were broken and ouerthrowne, he then fled into the city, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him vnto them with whom he had made warre for her ſake. Then ſhe being affraid of his furie, fled into the tombe which he had cauſed to be made, and there ſhe locked the doores vnto her, & ſhut all the ſprings of the lockes with great bolts, and in the meane time ſent vnto Antonius to tell him, that ſhe was dead. Antonius beleeuing it, ſaid vnto himſelfe: What doeſt thou looke for further, Antonius, ſith ſpitefull fortune hath takē from thee the only ioy thou hadſt, for whom thou yet reſeruedſt thy life? Whē he had ſaid theſe words, he went into a chamber & vnarmed himſelf, & being naked, ſaid thus: O Cleopatra, it grieueth me not that I haue loſt thy company, for I wil not be long from thee: but I am ſory, that hauing bene ſo great a Captaine & Emperor, I am indeed condemned to be iudged of leſſe courage and noble mind then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loued and truſted much, and whom he had long before cauſed to ſweare vnto him, that he ſhould kill him when he did command him: and then he willed him to keepe his promiſe. His man drawing his ſword, lift it vp as though he had ment to haue ſtricken his maſter: but turning his head at one side, he thrust his sword into himselfe, and fell downe dead at his masters foote. Then said Antonius: ô noble Eros, I thanke thee for this, and it is valiantly done of thee, to shew me what I should do to my selfe, which thou couldest not doe for me. Therewithall he tooke his sword, and thrust it into his belly, and so fell downe vpon a little bed. The wound he had, killed him not presently, for the bloud stinted a litle when he was laide: and when he came somewhat to himselfe againe, he prayed them that were about him, to dispatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out tormenting himselfe: vntill at the last there came a Secretarie vnto him (called Diomedes) who was commanded to bring him into the tomb or monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that she was aliue, he very earnestly prayed his men to carie his body thither, and so he was caried in his mens armes into the entry of the monument. Notwithstanding, Cleopatra would not open the gates, but came to the high windowes, and cast out certaine chaines and ropes, in the which Antonius was trussed: and Cleopatra her owne selfe, with two women onely, which she had suffered to come with her into these monuments, trised Antonius vp. They that were present to behold it, said they neuer saw so pitifull a sight. For they plucked vp poore Antonius all bloudy as he was, and drawing on with pangs of death: who holding vp his hands to Cleopatra, raised vp himselfe as well as he could. It was a hard thing for these women to do, to lift him vp: but Cleopatra stooping down with her head, putting too all her strength to her vttermost power, did lift him vp with much ado, and neuer let go her hold, with the helpe of the women beneath that bad her be of good courage, & were as sory to see her labour so, as she her selfe. So when she had gotten him in after that sort, and laid him on a bed, she rent her garments vpon him, clapping her breast, and scratching her face and stomacke. Then she dried vp his bloud that had bewrayed his face, & called him her Lord, her husband, & Emperor, forgetting her own misery and calamity, for the pity and compassion she took of him. Antonius made her ceasse her lamenting, & called for wine, either because he was a thirst, or else for that he thought thereby to hasten his death. When he had drunke, he earnestly prayed her, and perswaded her, that she would seeke to saue her life, if she could possible, without reproch & dishonour: and that chiefly she should trust Proculeius aboue any man else about Cæsar. And as for himselfe, that she should not lament nor sorow for the miserable change of his fortune at the end of his daies: but rather that she should thinke him the more fortunate, for the former triumphes and honors he had receiued; considering that while he liued, he was the noblest & greatest Prince of the world; & that now he was ouercome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a Romaine by another Romaine. As Antonius gaue the last gaspe, Proculeius came that was sent from Cæsar. For after Antonius had thrust his sword in himself, as they caried him into the tombs and monuments of Cleopatra, one of his guard (called Dercetæus) took his sword with the which he had striken himselfe, and hid it: then he secretly stole away, and brought Octauius Cæsar the first newes of his death, and shewed him his sword that was bloudied. Cæsar hearing this newes, straight withdrew himselfe into a secret place of his tent, and there burst out with teares, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had bene his friend and brother in law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in sundry great exploits and battels. Then he called for all his friends and shewed them the letters Antonius had written to him, and his answers also sent him againe, during their quarrell and strife: and how fiercely and proudly the other answered him, to all iust and reasonable matters he wrote vnto him. After this, he sent Proculeius, and commanded him to do what he could possible to get Cleopatra aliue, fearing lest otherwise all the treasure would be lost: and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, and bring her aliue to Rome, she would maruellously beautifie and set out his triumph. But Cleopatra would neuer put her selfe into Proculeius hands, although they spake together. For Proculeius came to the gates that were thicke and strong, and surely barred, but yet there were some cranewes, through the which her voice might be heard, and so they without vnderstood, that Cleopatra demanded the kingdome of Ægypt for her sonnes: and that Proculeius answered her: That she should be of good cheare, and not be affraid to referre all vnto Cæsar. After he had viewed the place very well, he came and reported her answer vnto Cæsar: who immediatly sent Gallus to speake once againe with her, and bad him purposely hold her in talke, whilest Proculeius did set vp a ladder against that high window by the which Antonius was trised vp, and came downe into the monument with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleopatra stood to heare what Gallus said vnto her. One of her women which was shut vp in her monuments with her, saw Proculeius by chance

as he came downe, and skreeked out: O poore Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when she saw Proculeius behind her as she came from the gate, she thought to haue stabbed her selfe in with a short dagger she wore of purpose by her side. But Proculeius came sodainly vpon her, and taking her by both the hands, said vnto her: Cleopatra, first, thou shalt do thy selfe great wrong, and secondly, vnto Cæsar, to depriue him of the occasion and oportunity, openly to shew his bountie and mercy, and to giue his enemies cause to accuse the most courteous and noble Prince that euer was, and to appeach him, as though he were a cruell and mercilesse man, that were not to be trusted. So euen as he spake the word, he tooke her dagger from her, and shooke her clothes for feare of any poyson hidden about her. Afterwards, Cæsar sent one of his infranchised men called Epaphroditus, whom he straightly charged to looke well vnto her, and to beware in any case that she made not her selfe away: and for the rest, to vse her with all the courtesie possible. And for himselfe, he in the meane time entred the city of ALEXANDRIA, and (as he went) talked with the Philosopher Arrius, and held him by the hand, to the end that his countrymen should reuerence him the more, because they saw Cæsar so highly esteeme and honour him. Then he went into the shew-place of exercises, and so vp to his chaire of state which was prepared for him of a great height: and there according to his commandement, all the people of ALEXANDRIA were assembled, who quaking for feare, fell downe on their knees before him, and craued mercy. Cæsar bad them all stand vp, and told them openly that he forgaue the people, and pardoned the fellonies and offences they had committed against him in this warre. First, for the founders sake of the same city, which was Alexander the Great: secondly, for the beautie of the city, which he much esteemed and wondered at: thirdly, for the loue he bare vnto his very friend Arrius. Thus did Cæsar honour Arrius, who craued pardon for himselfe and many others, and specially for Philostratus, the eloquentest man of all the Sophisters and Orators of his time, for present and sodaine speech: howbeit, he falsely named himselfe an Academicke Philosopher. Therefore Cæsar that hated his nature and conditions, would not heare his suite. Therupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed Arrius step by step in a long mourning gowne, still buzzing in his eares this Greeke verse:

Cleopatra taken.

Cæsar tooke the city of Alexãdria. Cæsar greatly honoured Arrius the Philosopher.

Philostratus the eloquentest Orator in his time, for present speech vpon a sodaine.

A wise man, if that he be wise indeed,
May by a wise man haue the better speed.

Cæsar vnderstanding this, not for the desire he had to deliuer Philostratus of his feare, but to ridde Arrius of malice and enuie that might haue fallen out against him, he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius sonnes, Antyllus, his eldest sonne by Fuluia was slaine, because his schoolemaster Theodorus did betray him vnto the souldiers, who strake off his head. And the villaine tooke a precious stone of great value from his necke, the which he did sow in his girdle, and afterwards denied that he had it: but it was found about him, and so Cæsar trussed him vp for it. For Cleopatraes children, they were very honourably kept, with their gouernours & traine that waited on them. But for Cæsarion, who was said to be Iulius Cæsars sonne, his mother Cleopatra had sent him vnto ỹ INDIANS through ÆTHIOPIA, with a great summe of mony. But one of his gouernors also called Rhodon, euen such another as Theodorus, perswaded him to returne into his countrey, and told him that Cæsar sent for him to giue him his mothers kingdome. So, as Cæsar was determining with himselfe what he should do, Arrius said vnto him:

Antyllus, Antonius eldest sonne by Fuluia, slaine.

Too many Cæsars is not good.

The saying of Arrius the Philosopher.

Alluding vnto a certaine verse of Homer, that saith:

Too many Lords doth not well.

Therefore Cæsar did put Cæsarion to death, after the death of his mother Cleopatra. Many Princes, great Kings and Captaines did craue Antonius body of Octauius Cæsar, to giue him honourable buriall: but Cæsar would neuer take it from Cleopatra, who did sumptuously and royally burie him with her own hands, whom Cæsar suffered to take as much as she would to bestow vpon his funerals. Now was she altogether ouercome with sorow and passion of mind, for she had knocked her brest so pitifully, that she had martyred it, and in diuers places had raised vlcers & inflammations, so that she fell into a feuer withall: whereof she was very glad, hoping thereby to haue good colour to abstaine from meate, and that so she might haue died easily without any trouble. She had a Phisitian called Olympus, whom she made priuy to her intent, to the end he should helpe to rid her out of her life: as Olympus writeth himself, who wrote a book of all these things. But Cæsar mistrusted the matter, by many coniectures he had, and therefore did put her in feare, and threatned her to put her children to ſhamefull death. With theſe threates, Cleopatra for feare yeelded ſtraight, as ſhe would haue yeelded vnto ſtrokes: and afterwards ſuffered her ſelfe to be cured and dieted as they liſted. Shortly after, Cæſar came himſelfe in perſon to ſee her, and to comfort her. Cleopatra being layed vpon a litle low bed in poore eſtate (when ſhe ſaw Cæſar come into her chamber,) ſodenly roſe vp, naked in her ſmocke, and fell downe at his feete maruellouſly disfigured: both for that ſhe had plucked her haire from her head, as alſo for that ſhe had martyred all her face with her nailes; and beſides, her voice was ſmall and trembling, her eyes ſunk into her head with continuall blubbering; and moreouer, they might ſee the moſt part of her ſtomacke torne in ſunder. To be ſhort, her body was not much better then her mind: yet her good grace & comlineſſe, and the force of her beauty was not altogether defaced. But notwithſtanding this vgly and pitifull ſtate of hers, yet ſhe ſhewed her ſelfe within, by her outward lookes and countenance. When Cæſar had made her lie downe againe, and ſate by her beds ſide: Cleopatra began to cleare and excuſe her ſelfe for that ſhe had done, laying all to the feare ſhe had of Antonius: Cæſar in contrary manner, reproued her in euery point. Then ſhe ſuddenly altered her ſpeech, and prayed him to pardon her, as though ſhe were affraid to dye, and deſirous to liue. At length, ſhe gaue him a briefe and memoriall of all the ready mony and treaſure ſhe had. But by chance there ſtood one Seleucus by, one of her Treaſurers, who to ſeeme, a good ſeruant, came ſtraight to Cæſar to diſproue Cleopatra, that ſhe had not ſet in all, but kept many things back of purpoſe. Cleopatra was in ſuch a rage with him, that ſhe flew vpon him, and tooke him by the haire of the head, and boxed him well fauouredly. Cæſar fell a laughing & parted the fray. Alas, ſaid ſhe, ô Cæſar: is not this a great ſhame and reproch, that thou hauing vouchſafed to take the paines to come vnto me, and done me this honor, poore wretch, & caitife creature, brought into this pitifull and miſerable ſtate: and that mine owne ſeruants ſhould come now to accuſe me? though it may be I haue reſerued ſome iewels and trifles meet for wom̃, but not for me (poore ſoule) to ſet out my ſelfe withall, but meaning to giue ſome pretie preſents and gifts vnto Octauius and Liuia, that they making means and interceſſion for me to thee, thou mighteſt yet extend thy fauour and mercy vpon me. Cæſar was glad to heare her ſay ſo, perſwading himſelfe thereby that ſhe had yet a deſire to ſaue her life. So he made her anſwer, that he did not only giue her that to diſpoſe of at her pleaſure, which ſhe had kept back, but further promiſed to vſe her more honourably and bountifully, then ſhe would thinke for: and ſo he tooke his leaue of her, ſuppoſing he had deceiued her, but indeed he was deceiued himſelfe. There was a yong Gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, that was one of Cæſars very great familiars, and beſides did beare no ill will vnto Cleopatra. He ſent her word ſecretly (as ſhe had requeſted him) that Cæſar determined to take his iourny through SYRIA, & that within three daies he would ſend her away before with her children. When this was told Cleopatra, ſhe requeſted Cæſar that it would pleaſe him to ſuffer her to offer the laſt oblations of the dead, vnto the ſoule of Antonius. This being granted her, ſhe was caried to the place where his tombe was, and there falling downe on her knees, embracing the tombe with her women, the teares running downe her cheeks, ſhe began to ſpeake in this ſort: O my deare Lord Antonius, it is not long ſithence I buried thee here, being a free woman: & now I offer vnto thee the funerall ſprinklings and oblations, being a captiue and priſoner; and yet I am forbidden and kept from tearing and murthering this captiue body of mine with blowes, which they carefully guard and keepe, onely to triumph of thee: looke therefore henceforth for no other honors, offerings, nor ſacrifices from me: for theſe are the laſt which Cleopatra can giue thee, ſith now they carie her away. Whileſt we liued together, nothing could ſeuer our companies: but now at our death, I feare me they will make vs change our countries. For as thou being a ROMAIN, haſt bene buried in ÆGYPT: euen ſo wretched creature I an ÆGYPTIAN, ſhall be buried in ITALY, which ſhall be all the good that I haue receiued by thy country. If therefore the gods where thou art now haue any power & authority, ſith our gods here haue forſaken vs, ſuffer not thy true friend and louer to be caried away aliue, that in me they triumph of thee: but receiue me with thee, and let me be buried in one ſelfe tombe with thee. For though my griefes and miſeries be infinit, yet none hath grieued me more, nor that I could leſſe beare withall, then this ſmall time which I haue bene driuen to liue alone without thee. Then hauing ended theſe dolefull plaints, and crowned the tombe with garlands & ſundry noſegayes, and maruellous louingly embraced the ſame, ſhe commanded they ſhould prepare her bath; and when ſhe had bathed and waſhed herſelfe, ſhe fell to her meate, and was ſumptuouſly ſerued. was at dinner, there came a countriman and brought her a basket. The ſouldiers that warded at the gates, asked him ſtraight what he had in his basket. He opened his basket, and tooke out the leaues that couered the figs, and ſhewed them that they were figs he brought. They all of them maruelled to ſee ſo goodly figges. The countrieman laughed to heare them, and bad them take ſome if they would. They beleeued he told them truly, and ſo bad him carie them in. After Cleopatra had dined, ſhe ſent a certaine table written and ſealed vnto Cæſar, and commanded them all to go out of the tombes where ſhe was, but the two women; then ſhe ſhut the doores to her. Cæſar when he receiued this table, and began to reade her lamentation and petition, requeſting him that he would let her be buried with Antonius, found ſtraight what ſhe meant, and thought to haue gone thither himſelfe: howbeit, he ſent one before in all haſt that might be, to ſee what it was. Her death was very ſodaine: for thoſe whom Cæſar ſent vnto her, ran thither in all haſt poſſible, and found the ſouldiers ſtanding at the gate, miſtruſting nothing, nor vnderſtanding of her death. But when they had opened the doores, they found Cleopatra ſtarke dead, laid vpon a bed of gold, attired and arrayed in her royall robes, and one of her two women, which was called Iras, dead at her feet: and her other woman (called Charmion) half dead, & trembling, trimming the Diademe which Cleopatra wore vpon her head. One of the ſoldiers ſeeing her, angrily ſaid vnto her: Is that well done Charmion? Very well, ſaid ſhe againe, and meete for a Princeſſe deſcended from the race of ſo many noble Kings: ſhe ſaid no more, but fel down dead hard by the bed. Some report, that this Aſpicke was brought vnto her in the basket with figs, and that ſhe had commanded them to hide it vnder the fig leaues, that when ſhe ſhould think to take out the figs, the Aſpicke ſhould bite her before ſhe ſhould ſee her: howbeit, that when ſhe wold haue taken away the leaues for the figs, ſhe perceiued it, and ſaid, Art thou here then? And ſo her arme being naked, ſhe put it to the Aſpicke to be bitten. Other ſay againe, ſhe kept it in a boxe, & that ſhe did pricke and thruſt it with a ſpindle of gold, ſo that the Aſpicke being angred withall, leapt out with great furie, and bit her in the arme. Howbeit few can tell the troth. For they report alſo, that ſhe had hidden poyſon in a hollow razor which ſhe caried in the haire of her head; and yet was there no mark ſeene on her body, or any ſigne diſcerned that ſhe was poyſoned, neither alſo did they finde this ſerpent in her tombe: but it was reported only, that there was ſeene certaine freſh ſteppes or tracks where it had gone, on the tombe ſide toward the ſea, and ſpecially by the doore ſide. Some ſay alſo, that they found two litle pretty bitings in her arme, ſcant to be diſcerned: the which it ſeemeth Cæſar himſelfe gaue credit vnto, becauſe in his triumph he caried Cleopatraes image, with an Aſpicke biting of her arme. And thus goeth the report of her death. Now Cæſar, though he was maruellous ſorie for the death of Cleopatra, yet he wondered at her noble mind and courage, and therefore commanded ſhe ſhould be nobly buried, and layed by Antonius: and willed alſo that her two women ſhould haue honourable buriall. Cleopatra died being eight and thirty years old, after ſhe had reigned two and twenty yeares, and gouerned about fourteene of them with Antonius. And for Antonius, ſome ſay that he liued three and fifty yeares: and others ſay, ſixe and fiftie. All his ſtatues, images, and mettals, were plucked downe and ouerthrowne, ſauing thoſe of Cleopatra, which ſtood ſtill in their places, by meanes of Archibius one of her friends, who gaue Cæſar a thouſand talents that they ſhould not be handled as thoſe of Antonius were. Antonius left ſeuen children by three wiues, of the which, Cæſar did put Antyllus (the eldeſt ſon he had by Fuluia) to death. Octauia his wife tooke all the reſt, and brought them vp with hers, and maried Cleopatra, Antonius daughter, vnto king Iuba, a maruellous courteous & goodly Prince. And Antonius (the ſon of Fuluia) came to be ſo great, that next vnto Agrippa, who was in greateſt eſtimation about Cæſar; and next vnto the children of Liuia, which were the ſecond in eſtimation: he had the third place. Furthermore, Octauia hauing had two daughters by her firſt husband Marcellus, & a ſon alſo called Marcellus, Cæſar maried his daughter vnto that Marcellus, and ſo did adopt him for his ſon. And Octauia alſo maried one of her daughters vnto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was dead, after he had bene maried awhile. Octauia perceiuing that her brother Cæſar was very buſie to chuſe ſome one among his friends, who he truſted beſt to make his ſonne in law, ſhe perſwaded him, that Agrippa ſhould marie his daughter (Marcellus widow) and leaue her owne daughter. Cæſar firſt was contented withall, and then Agrippa: and ſo ſhe afterwards tooke away her daughter and maried her vnto Antonius; & Agrippa maried Iulia, Cæſars daughter. Now there remained two daughters more of Octauia and Antonius: Domitius Ænobarbus maried the one; and the other, which was Antonia, ſo faire and vertuous a young

Of Antonius iſſue came Emperours.

Ladie, was maried vnto Druſus the ſonne of Liuia, and ſonne in law of Cæſar. Of this mariage came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperor. And of the ſonnes of Germanicus, the one whoſe name was Caius, came alſo to be Emperour: who after he had licentiouſly reigned a time, was ſlaine, with his wife and daughter. Agrippina alſo (hauing a ſonne by her firſt husband Ænobarbus, called Lucius Domitius) was afterwards maried vnto Clodius, who adopted her ſonne, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperour in our time, who ſlue his owne mother, and had almoſt deſtroyed the Empire of Rome, through his madneſſe and wicked life, being the fifth Emperour of Rome after Antonius.

THE COMPARISON OF Demetrius with Antonius.

The power of Demetrius and Antonius.

NOw, ſithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, hauing fortune alike diuers & variable vnto thē, let vs therfore come to conſider their power & authority, and how they came to be ſo great. Firſt of all, it is certaine that Demetrius power and greatnes fell vnto him by inheritance frō his father Antigonus: who became the greateſt & mightieſt Prince of all the ſucceſſors of Alexander, and had won the moſt part of Asia, before Demetrius came of full age. Antonius in contrary manner, borne of an honeſt man, who otherwiſe was no man of war, & had not left him any meane to ariſe to ſuch greatneſſe, durſt take vpon him to contend for the Empire with Cæſar that had no right vnto it by inheritance, but yet made himſelfe ſucceſſor of the power, the which the other by great paine and trauell had obtained, and by his own induſtry became ſo great, without the helpe of any other, that the Empire of the whole world being deuided into two parts, he had the one halfe, and tooke that of the greateſt countenance and power. Antonius being abſent, oftentimes ouercame the Parthians in battell by his Lieutenants, and chaſed away the barbarous people dwelling about mount Caucaſus, vnto the ſea Hyrcanium, inſomuch as the thing they moſt reproue him for, did moſt witneſſe his greatneſſe. For, Demetrius father made him gladly marie Phila, Antipaters daughter, although ſhe was too old for him: becauſe ſhe was of a nobler houſe then himſelfe. Antonius on the other ſide was blamed for marying of Cleopatra, a Queene that for her power and nobility of bloud, excelled all other kings in her time, but Arſaces: & moreouer, made himſelf ſo great, that others thought him worthy of greater things, then he himſelfe required. Now for the deſire that moued the one and the other to conquer Realmes, the deſire of Demetrius was vnblameable and iuſt, deſiring to reigne ouer people which had bene gouerned at all times, and deſired to be gouerned by Kings. But Antonius deſire was altogether wicked and tyrannicall, who ſought to keepe the people of Rome in bondage and ſubiection, but lately before rid of Cæſars reigne and gouernment. For the greateſt and moſt famous exploite Antonius euer did in warres (to wit, the warre, in the which he ouerthrew Cassius and Brutus) was begun to no other end, but to depriue his countrimen of their liberty and freedome. Demetrius in contrary manner, before fortune had ouerthrowne him, neuer left to set GREECE at liberty, and to driue the garrisons away, which kept the cities in bondage: and not like Antonius, that boasted he had slaine them that had set ROME at liberty. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius was his liberality and bountie, in the which Demetrius excelled him so farre, that he gaue more to his enemies, then Antonius did to his friends: although he was maruellously well thought of, for the honourable and sumptuous funerall he gaue vnto Brutus body. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his enemies to be buried that were slaine in battell, and returned vnto Ptolomie all the prisoners he had taken, with great gifs and presents he gaue them. They were both in their prosperity, very riotously and licentiously giuen: but yet no man can euer say, that Demetrius did at any time let slip any oportunity or occasion to follow great matters, but onely gaue himselfe indeed to pleasure, when he had nothing else to do. And further, to say truly, he took pleasure of Lamia, as a man would haue a delight to heare one tell tales, when he hath nothing else to do, or is desirous to sleepe: but indeed when he was to make any preparation for war, he had not then Iuie at his darts end, nor had his helmet perfumed, nor came out of the Ladies closets picked and princt to go to battell: but he let all dancing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides saith:

The souldier of Mars, cruell, and blondie.

The liberality and bounty of Demetrius & Antonius.

Demetrius and Antonius riots.

But to conclude, he neuer had ouerthrow or misfortune through negligence, nor by delaying time to follow his owne pleasure; as we see in painted tables, where Omphale secretly stealeth away Hercules clubbe, and tooke his Lyons skinne from him: euen so Cleopatra oftentimes vnarmed Antonius, and enticed him to her, making him lose matters of great importance, and very needfull iournies, to come and be dandled with her, about the riuers of Canobus, and Taphosiris. In the end, as Paris fled from the battell, and went to hide himselfe in Helens armes: euen so did he in Cleopatraes armes; or to speake more properly, Paris hid himselfe in Helens closet, but Antonius (to follow Cleopatra) fled and lost the victory. Furthermore, Demetrius had many wiues that he had maried, and all at one time: the which was not disallowable or not forbidden by the kings of MACEDON, but had bene vsed from Philip and Alexanders time; as also king Lysimachus and Ptolomy had; and did honour all them that he maried. But Antonius first of all maried two wiues together, the which neuer ROMAINE durst do before, but himselfe. Secondly, he put away his first ROMAINE wife, which he had lawfully maried, for the loue of a strange woman, he fondly fell in fancie withall, and contrary to the lawes and ordinances of ROME. And therefore Demetrius mariages neuer hurt him, for any wrong he had done to his wiues: but Antonius contrarily, was vndone by his wiues. Of all the lasciuious parts Antonius played, none were so abhominable, as this only fact of Demetrius. For the Historiographers write, that they would not suffer dogges to come into the castle of ATHENS, because of all beasts he is too busie with bitcherie: and Demetrius, in Mineruaes temple it selfe lay with Curtisans, and there defiled many citizens wiues. And besides all this, the horrible vice of cruelty, which a man would thinke were least mingled with these wanton delights, is ioyned with Demetrius concupiscence: who suffered (or more properly, compelled) the goodliest young boy of ATHENS, to die a most pitifull death, to saue himselfe from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontinencie, did no hurt but to himselfe, and Demetrius did hurt vnto all others. Demetrius neuer hurt any of his friends: but Antonius suffered his Vncle by his mothers side to be slaine, that he might haue his will of Cicero to kill him: a thing so damnable, wicked, and cruell of it selfe, that he hardly deserued to haue bene pardoned, though he had killed Cicero, to haue saued his Vncles life. Now where they falsified and brake their oaths, the one making Artabazus prisoner, and the other killing of Alexander, Antonius out of doubt had best cause, and iustest colour: for Artabazus had betrayed him, and forsaken him in MEDIA. But Demetrius (as diuers do report) deuised a false matter to accuse Alexander, to cloke the murther he had committed: and some thinke, he did accuse him, to whom he himselfe had done iniurie vnto: and was not reuenged of him, that would do him iniurie. Furthermore, Demetrius himselfe did noble feates of warre, as we haue recited of him before: and contrarily, Antonius, when he was not there in person, wanne many famous and great victories by his Lieutenants: and were both ouerthrowne being personally in battel, but yet not both after one sort. For the one was forsaken of his men being MACEDONIANS, & the other contrarily forsooke his that were ROMAINES: for he fled, and left them that ventured their liues for his honour. So that the fault the one did, was, that he made them his enemies that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he ſo beaſtly left them that loued him beſt, & were moſt faithfull to him. And for their deaths, a man cannot praiſe the one or the other, but yet Demetrius death was the more reprochfull: for he ſuffered himſelf to be taken priſoner, and when he was ſent away to be kept in a ſtrange place, he had the heart to liue yet three yeares longer, to ſerue his mouth and belly, as brute beaſts do. Antonius on the other ſide, ſlue himſelfe (to confeſſe a troth) cowardly, and miſerably, to his great paine and griefe: and yet was it before his body came into his enemies hands.

The end of Antonius life.

THE LIFE OF Artaxerxes.

The parentage of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Artaxerxes, the firſt of this name of all the kings of PERSIA, a noble and courteous Prince as any of all his houſe, was ſurnamed Long-hand, becauſe his right hand was longer then his left; and he was the ſon of king Xerxes. But the ſecond, whoſe life we preſently intend to write, was ſurnamed Mnemõ, as much to ſay, Great memory: & he was the ſon of the daughter of the firſt Artaxerxes. For king Darius, and his wife Paryſatis, had foure ſons, of the which, the eldeſt was this Artaxerxes, the ſecond Cyrus, and two other yonger, Oſtanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the name of the former ancient Cyrus, which in the PERSIAN tong ſignifieth the Sun. But Artaxerxes was called before Arſicas, although Dinon writeth, that he was called Oarſes. Howbeit it is vnlikely, that Cteſias (although his bookes otherwiſe be full of fables, and as vntrue as they are fond) ſhould forget the name of the Prince with whom he dwelt, whom he ſerued, and continually followed, both him, his wife and children. Cyrus from his cradle was of a hot ſtirring mind, and Artaxerxes in contrary manner, more mild and gentle in all his actions & doings. He was maried to a very faire Ladie, by his father & mothers commandement: and afterwards kept her againſt their wils, being forbidden by them. For king Darius his father, hauing put his ſonnes wiues brother to death, he would alſo haue put her to death: but her husband with teares made ſuch humble ſuite to his mother for her, that with much ado, he did not onely get pardon for her life, but grant alſo that ſhe ſhould not be put from from him. This notwithſtanding, his mother alwaies loued Cyrus better then him, and prayed that he might be king after his fathers death. Wherefore Cyrus being in his prouinces of ASIA by the ſea ſide, when he was ſent for to come to the Court, at what time his father lay ſick of the diſeaſe he died: he went thither in good hope his mother had preuailed with his father, that in his will he would make him his heire of the realme of PERSIA. For his mother Paryſatis alledged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did helpe king Xerxes in the like caſe, through Demaratus counſell. She ſaid that Arſicas was borne before her husband Darius was king, and Cyrus after he was crowned king. All this could not preuaile: for her eldeſt ſon Arſicas, ſurnamed Artaxerxes, was aſſigned king of PERSIA, and Cyrus gouernor of LYDIA, and the kings Lieutenant generall of all the low-countries of ASIA toward ŷ ſea ſide. Shortly after king Darius death, the new king Artaxerxes went vnto Paſargades, there to be conſecrated and annointed king by the Prieſts of ŷ country of PERSIA. The place of this Paſargades, is a temple dedicated vnto Minerua the goddeſſe of battels, as I take it, where the new king muſt be conſecrated; and when he cometh into the temple, he putteth off his gowne, and putteth on that which the old ancient Cyrus wore before he was king. Furthermore, he muſt eate of a certain tart or fricacie made of figs with turpentine: and then he muſt drinke a drinke made with vineger and milke. There are alſo certaine other ſecret ceremonies which they muſt keepe, & none do know, but the very Prieſts themſelues. Now Artaxerxes being ready to enter into all theſe ceremonies, Tiſaphernes came vnto him, and brought him one of the Prieſts that had bene Cyrus ſchoolemaſter in his youth, and had taught him Magicke; who by reaſon ſhould haue bene more offended then any man elſe, for that he was not appointed king. And this was the cauſe why they beleeued him the better, when he accuſed Cyrus; for he ſaid: That Cyrus had conſpired treaſon againſt the king his brothers owne perſon, and that he meant traiterouſly to kill him in the temple, when he ſhould put off his gowne. Some do report, that Cyrus was apprehẽded vpon this ſimple accuſation by word of mouth. Others write alſo, that Cyrus came into the temple, and hiding himſelfe, he was taken with the maner, and bewrayed by the Prieſt. So, as he was going to ſuffer death, his mother took Cyrus in her armes, and wound the haire of her head about his necke, and tied him ſtraightly to her: and withall ſhe wept ſo bitterly, and made ſuch pitifull mone vnto the king her ſonne, that through her interceſſion, the king granted him his life, and ſent him againe into his country and gouernment. But this ſatisfied not Cyrus, neither did he ſo much remember the king his brothers fauour vnto him, in granting this his life, as he did the deſpite he had offered him, to be made priſoner. Inſomuch that for this grudge and euill will, he euer after had a greater deſire then before to be king. Some writers alledge, that he entred into actuall rebellion againſt his brother by force of armes, becauſe he had not ſufficient reuenue to defray the ordinarie expence of his houſe: howbeit it is a meere folly to ſay ſo. For, though he had had no other helpe but his mother, he might haue had of her what he would haue taken and deſired. Againe, to ſhew that of himſelfe he had ability enough, we need but alledge the ſouldiers and ſtrangers he gaue pay vnto in diuers places, (as Xenophon writeth.) For he brought them not all together into one army, becauſe he deſired to keepe his enterpriſe as ſecret as he could: but he had friends and ſeruants that leauied them in diuerſe places, and vnder diuerſe colours. And furthermore, he had his mother alway about the king, that cleared all ſuſpitions conceiued againſt him. He himſelfe alſo on the other ſide, whileſt he made theſe preparations, wrote very humbly vnto his brother, ſometime asking ſomewhat of him, and another time accuſing Tiſaphernes: all to blind the king, to make him thinke that he bent all his malice and ſpite againſt him: beſides that, the king of his owne nature was ſomewhat dull and ſlow, which the comon people thought to proceed of his courteſie & good nature. At his firſt coming to the crown, he followed the firſt Artaxerxes goodneſſe and courteſie, by whom he had his name. For he gaue more eaſie audience vnto ſuiters: he did alſo more honorably reward and recompence thoſe that had deſerued well: and he vſed ſuch moderation in puniſhing of offenders, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious mind & deſire of reuenge, nor yet of will to hurt any man. When he had any thing giuen him, he took it as thankfully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankly alſo giue againe. For, how litle a thing ſoeuer was offered him, he took it wel. And it is reported, that one Romiſes on a time preſenting him a maruellous faire pomegranate: By the Sun (ſaid he) this man in a ſhort time, of a litle towne would make a great city, if he were made gouernor of it. Another time there was a poore labourer ſeeing euery man giue the king a preſent, ſome one thing, ſome another, as he passed by them: he hauing nothing at hand to giue him, ran to the riuers side, and tooke both his hands full of water, and came and offered it him. King Artaxerxes was so glad of it, that he sent him in a cup of massie gold, a thousand Dareckes, which were peeces of gold so named, because the image of Darius was stamped vpon them. And vnto one Euclidas a LACEDÆMONIAN, that presumed to giue him bold words, it pleased him to answer by one of his Captaines: Thou maist say what thou list; and I as king, may say and do what I list. Another time as he was an hunting, Tiribazus shewed the king his gowne that was all to tattered: Well, said the king, and what wouldest thou haue me to do? Tiribazus answered him, I pray your Grace take another, and giue me that you haue on. The king did so, and told him: Tiribazus, I giue thee my gowne, but I command thee not to weare it. Tiribazus tooke it, and cared not for the kings commandement that he should not weare it; not that he was any euill disposed man, but because he was a fond light-headed fellow that cared for nothing: thereupon he straight put the kings gowne on his backe, and not contented therewith, he did besides set on many iewels of gold which kings onely are wont to weare, and womens trinkets and ornaments. Therewithall euery man in the Court murmured at him, because it was a presumption, directly against the lawes and ordinances of PERSIA. Howbeit the king but laughed at it, and told him: I giue thee leaue Tiribazus to weare those womens gawds as a woman, & the kings robe as a foole. Furthermore, where the maner was in PERSIA, that no person sate at the kings boord, but his mother & wife, of the which, his mother sate vppermost, and his wife lowermost: Artaxerxes made his two brethren Ostanes and Oxathres sit at his own boord: but yet he pleased the PERSIANS best of al, because he was content his wife Statyra should sit openly in her chariot, and that she might be seene and reuerenced by the other Ladies of the countrey. And this made him singularly beloued of the people. Now, such as desired innouation & change, & that could not away with quiet life, gaue out, that the Realme of PERSIA required such a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, giuen to armes, and greatly rewarded his seruants; and that the greatnesse of the Empire of PERSIA stood in need of a king, whose mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterprises. So Cyrus thereupon began to make warre vpon his brother, not only trusting vnto them that were of the low countries about him, but hoping of those also in the high prouinces neare vnto the king. Furthermore, he wrote also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, to pray them to send him men of warre, promising to giue the footmen they sent, horses; and the horsemen, coaches; landed men, whole villages; and to those that had villages, to giue them cities: besides all this, that for the ordinarie wages of them that should serue him in this war, he would not pay them by account, but by full measure. And boasting largely of himselfe, he said he had a greater mind then his brother; that he could better away with hardnesse then he, that he vnderstood Magicke better then he; and that he could drinke more wine then he, and carie it better: and that the king his brother in contrary manner was so womanish and fearefull, that when he went an hunting, he durst scarce get vp vpon his horse backe: and when he went to the wars, he would hardly take his chariot. When the LACEDÆMONIANS had read his letters, they sent a litle scrole vnto Clearchus, commanding him to obey Cyrus in any thing he would command him. So Cyrus did set forward to make war against his brother, hauing leauied a great number of fighting men of barbarous nations, and of GRECIANS, litle lesse then thirteene thousand men: sometime aduertising one cause, sometime another, why he leauied such a multitude of men. But his purpose could not be long dissembled: for Tisaphernes went himselfe vnto the Court, to bring newes of his attempt. Then al the Court was straight in an vprore withall. Many men also did accuse the Queene mother, for the practise of this war, and all her friends and seruants were vehemently suspected to be conspirators with Cyrus: but the greatest thing that troubled Parysatis most, was Queene Statyra her daughter in law, who stormed maruellously to see this war begun against king Artaxerxes her husband, and incessantly cried out on her: O, where is the faith thou vowedst by oath? whereto are thy intercessions come thou madest for the pardon of his life, who now conspireth his brothers death? By sauing of his life, art not thou now the cause of this war and troubles we see at hand? After this reproch and shame receiued by Statyra, Parysatis being a cruell and malicious woman of nature, so hated her, that from thenceforth she sought all the waies she could to put her to death. And Dinon the Historiographer saith, that during this war, she did execute her wicked purpose vpon her: but Ctesiphas writeth, that it was after the warre. And therefore it is liker that he being daily in the king of PERSIAS court, should certainly know the time when she did execute her her treason against her; and also there is no cause why he should rather write in any other time, then in that in which the fact was done: although in many other places he commonly vseth to feine, and to write deuices of his owne head. Therefore let vs leaue the report of this fact to the selfe same time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew neare vnto his brothers countrey, he had newes, and a rumor ran through his campe, that the king was not determined to come and fight with him so soone: and that he meant first to go further into PERSIA, and to tary there till he had gathered his army together out of all parts. And for proofe herof, the king hauing cast a great trench of ten yards broad, and as many high, the space of foure hundred furlongs in length: he left it without guard, and let Cyrus win it, who came on further without any resistance, euen to the very city it self of BABYLON. Howbeit in the end, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the first man that durst tel the king, that he shold not flie fight in that sort, nor hide himself in the farthest part of PERSIA, leauing his enemy ỹ realmes of MEDIA, BABYLON, & SVSA: considering also that he had many moe soldiers in readinesse then his enemy, & an infinite number of Captaines more skilfull, and able to giue counsell, and to fight, then he was. These words of Tiribazus made the king alter his mind, and to determine to giue battell as soone as he could. Thereupon he marched forward against his enemie, with nine hundred thousand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That maruellously astonied Cyrus men, and made them afraid at the first when they saw them in so excellent good order before them: for that they were dispersed straggling here and there without any order, and men vnarmed, trusting too much in themselues in despising of their enemie: so that Cyrus had much ado to set his men in battel ray, and yet was it with great noise and tumult. But the GRECIANS wondred most of all other, when they saw the kings army march in so good order of battel without any noise: for they thought to haue seene a wonderfull great disorder and confusion, in such an infinite multitude of people; and supposed they would haue made such a noise, that one of them should not haue heard another. Where indeed to the contrary, all was so well martialled, specially becausse he had placed before his battel the best carts he had, armed with sithes, & drawne with the strongest and biggest horse he had in all his army: hoping by the fiercenesse and furie of their careire, to breake into the rankes of the enemies, before they could come to ioyne with theirs. But sith this battell is discribed by diuers Historiographers, and specially by Xenophon, who hath as (a man would say) liuely set it out to the eye; and setteth it forth to the Reader, not as a battell already fought, but presently a fighting, stirring vp their mindes, as if themselues were in the action and instant danger (he hath so passingly set it downe,) it were but a folly therefore of me to take vpon me to make any further description of it, sauing to touch some speciall points worthy of note, which he peraduenture hath left out. As, the place where the battel was fought, is called COVNAXA, fiue hundred furlongs from BABYLON: and how that before the battell, Clearchus gaue Cyrus counsell to keepe behind the squadron of the GRECIANS, and not to hazard his person among the first: and that Cyrus answered him, What sayest thou Clearchus? wouldest thou haue me that striues to be king, to shew my selfe vnworthy to be a king? But Cyrus hauing made this fault, not standing vpon his safety and guard, but ouer-rashly thrusting himselfe into great danger, Clearchus selfe also committed as great a fault (if it were not worse) when he would not set his men in order directly against the battell of the enemies, where the kings person stood, but went and pent them vp by the riuers side, being afraid lest they should haue bene compassed in behind. For if he would haue looked so straightly to himselfe, and haue prouided euery way for his safety, that no man might come to hurt him, he should haue kept himselfe at home, and not haue stirred one foot out of the doores. But sith he had come so farre, as from the low countries of ASIA, vnto the place where the field was fought, & vncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his fathers seat and Imperiall crowne; to go chuse a place in the battell, not where he might do his Lord best seruice that had hired him, but rather where he might fight more at his ease, and at lesse danger, it was euen as much, as if through cowardlinesse his wits had bene taken from him when he should haue fought, or that through treason he had forsaken his enterprise. For, to proue that the troupes which were about the kings person, had neuer bene able to haue receiued the charge of the GRECIANS, and that those being ouerthrowne, the King had bene slaine in the field, or else forced to flie, and that Cyrus had wonne the field, and by this victory had bene king, the successe of this battell doth plainely shew it. And therefore Clearchus ouer-curious respect, deserued more blame for the losse of this battell, then Cyrus ouer-hardineſſe. For if king Artaxerxes would haue choſen or wiſhed a place where the GRECIANS might haue done him leſſe hurt, he could not haue deuiſed a fitter place that was ſo farre from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither ſee nor heare what was done where he was, as it fell out in ſequele. For Cyrus was ſlaine before he could preuaile by Clearchus victory, he was ſo far from him: and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meeteſt to be done. For he commanded Clearchus to place himſelfe with his company in the middeſt of the battell; who anſwered him, he ſhould take no thought for any thing, for he would ſee all things well ordered. And when he had ſaid ſo, he marred all afterwards: for where the GRECIANS were, they ouerthrew the barbarous people that made head againſt them, and had them in chaſe while they were wearie of following them. Cyrus being mounted vpon a hot ſtirring horſe, that had a hard head, and was very fierce and dogged, called Paſacas, as Cteſias writeth, Artagerſes, the gouernor of the prouince of the CADVSANS, ſpied him a farre off, and when he had found him, clapped ſpurres to his horſe, and came with full cariere vnto him, and cryed out: O traytor, and moſt vnfaithfull and deſperate man, thou now diſhoureſt the name of Cyrus (which is the goodlieſt and moſt honorable name of all the PERSIANS,) for that thou haſt brought ſo valiant GRECIANS hither to ſo wicked an enterpriſe, to ſpoile ŷ PERSIANS goods, in hope to deſtroy thy ſoueraigne Lord and onely brother, who hath an infinite number of ſlaues and ſeruants farre honeſter men then thou wilt be while thou liueſt; and that thou ſhalt preſẽtly know by proofe, for thou ſhalt die before thou ſee the king thy brothers face: & therewithall he threw his dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus armour was ſo good, that it pierced him not: yet the blow came with ſuch good will, that it made him ſtagger on his horſe backe. When Artagerſes had giuen him that blow, he preſently turned his horſe. But Cyrus therewithall threw a dart at him ſo happily, that he ſlue him right in the place aboue the bone that ioyneth the two ſhoulders together: ſo that the head of his dart, ran quite through his neck. Now, that Cyrus ſlue Artagerſes with his owne hands in the field, all the Hiſtoriographers do agree vpon it: but for the death of Cyrus, becauſe Xenophon toucheth it but a little by the way, for that he was not preſent in the very place where he was ſlaine, it ſhall not be hurtfull particularly to ſet downe the maner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and alſo of Cteſias. Firſt, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had ſlaine Artagerſes, he went with great furie, & flew in amongſt the troupe of them which were neareſt vnto the kings perſon, and that he came ſo neare the king, that he ſlue his horſe ſtarke dead vnder him, and the king fell to the ground withall. But Tiribazus that was hard by him, ſtraight mounted the king againe vpon another horſe, and ſaid vnto him: Your Grace will remember this battel another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping ſpurres againe to his horſe, threw another dart at Artaxerxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the king told them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather die then ſuffer it: ſo therewithall he ſpurring his horſe to charge Cyrus (who came fiercely and deſperatly, hauing an infinite number of blowes with darts throwne at him on euery ſide) threw his dart at him alſo. So did all thoſe that were about his perſon: and ſo was Cyrus ſlaine in this conflict. Some ſay, that he was ſlaine with the wound the king his brother gaue him. Others ſay, that it was a man at armes of the countrey of CARIA, vnto whom the king for reward of his good ſeruice, gaue the honor in all battels to carie before the firſt ranke, a Cocke of gold on the top of a ſpeare: for the PERSIANS do call the CARIANS Cockes, becauſe in the wars they vſe to weare creaſts in the top of their head-peeces. And this is Dinons report. But Cteſias, to couch in few words that which Dinon reporteth at large, ſaith: that Cyrus after he had ſlaine Artagerſes, gallopped on the ſpurre againſt the king himſelfe, and the king againſt him, and not a word betweene them both. Arieus one of Cyrus flatterers, threw the firſt dart at the king, but killed him not: and the king with all his force againe threw his dart, thinking to haue hit Cyrus, but he miſſed him, and ſlue Tiſaphernes, one of the valianteſt and ſtouteſt men Cyrus had about him, who fell downe dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes ſo ſore a blow on his breaſt, that he pierced his armour, and entred into his fleſh two fingers deepe. The king with this blow fell downe to the ground: therewithall the moſt part of his men about him were ſo afraid, that they forſooke him and fled. Howbeit he got vp againe, with the helpe of others that were about him, amongſt whom Cteſias ſaid he was one, and ſo recouered a little hill a farre off, to take a little breath. In the meane time, Cyrus horſe that was hot in the mouth, and hard headed, as we haue told you, caried his maſter ſpite of his heart farre from his men, among his enemies, and no man man knew him, becauſe it was night, and his men were very buſie in ſeeking for him. But Cyrus hoping he had won the victory, being of a hot ſtirring nature, and valiant, he went vp and downe in the thickeſt of his enemies, crying out in the PERSIAN tongue: Saue your ſelues poore men, ſaue your ſelues. When they heard him ſay ſo, ſome made a lane for him to paſſe by them, and did him reuerence: but by euill fortune his Tiara (which is the high royall hat after the PERSIAN maner) fell off from his head. Then a yong PERSIAN called Mithridates, paſſing by him, hit him a blow with his dart vpon one of his temples, hard by his eye, not knowing what he was. His wound ſtraight fell on a maruellous bleeding. Whereupon, Cyrus ſtaggering at it, fell on the ground in a ſwound, and his horſe ran away from him: but the capariſon he had vpon him fell to the ground all bloudied, and his page that had hurt him, tooke it vp. Shortly after Cyrus being come to himſelfe againe, ſome of his Eunuches (which were men gelt, and groomes of his chamber) that were about him, did lift him vp, thinking to ſet him vpon another horſe, and to get him out of the preaſſe: but he was not able to ſit on his horſe. Thereupon he proued if he could better go on foote, and the Eunuches held him vp by the armes, and led him amazed as he was, not able to ſtand on his feete; although he thought he had won the battell, becauſe he heard his enemies flying about him crie, The gods ſaue king Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receiue them to mercie. But in the meane time, there came certaine poore men of the city of CAVNVS, who followed the kings campe, getting their liuing as drudges and ſlaues, to do moſt vile ſeruice. They ioyned with the troupe where Cyrus was, ſuppoſing they had bin the kings men: but when they perceiued in the end by the red coates they wore vpon their armors, that they were enemies, for that the kings men wore white coats, there was one among the reſt that valiantly ſtrake at Cyrus behind with his partizan, not knowing indeed that it was Cyrus. The blow lighted full on the hamme of his legge, and cut his ſinewes ſo, that Cyrus fell withall; & falling, by misfortune fell vpon a great ſtone with his brow, where he had bene hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Cteſias report it, where me thinketh he cutteth his throat with a dull edged knife, he hath ſuch ado to bring Cyrus to his end. Now after Cyrus was dead, Artaſyras, one of king Artaxerxes Eunuches (whom they called the kings Eye in the Court) paſſing by on horſe-backe, knew Cyrus Eunuches that mourned very pitifully, lamenting the death of their maſter. So he asked the Eunuch whom Cyrus loued beſt: Who is that that is dead, ô Pariſcas, that thou weepeſt ſo bitterly? Pariſcas anſwered him againe, Seeſt thou not Artaſyras, that it is Cyrus but newly dead? Artaſyras wondered much when he ſaw him. So he comforted the Eunuch, and willed him in no caſe to go from the body, and in the meane time he gallopped apace to the king, who thought he had loſt all, and was very ill beſides, both for the great thirſt he ſuffered, as alſo for the wound he had on his breaſt. Now when the Eunuch came vnto the king, and told him with a ſmiling countenance the newes, how he had ſeene Cyrus dead: the king was ſo ioyfull at the newes, that he was deſirous himſelf forthwith to go vnto the place where he lay to ſee him, and commanded Artaſyras to bring him thither. But after he had conſidered better of it, he was counſelled not to go thither himſelf for feare of the GRECIANS, who they ſaid wonne all, and were yet chaſing and killing them in the field, that fled: but rather that he ſhould ſend a good company of men thither, to bring him iuſt report, whether the newes were true of his death or not. Vpon this aduice he ſtaied, and ſent thither thirtie men, euery man with torches in their hands. In the meane time, one of the Eunuches called Satibarzanes, ranne vp and downe to ſee if he could get any water for the king, that was almoſt dead for thirſt: for there was no water neare vnto him where he was, and beſides, his campe was far from him. His Eunuch hauing runne vp and downe a great way to ſeeke it, met by chance with theſe poore ſlaues and porters the CAVNIANS, among the which one of them caried in an old ragged goates skinne, about eight glaſſe-fuls of naughtie ſtinking water. So he preſently caried the ſame to the king, who dranke it vp euery whit. When the king had drunke it, the Eunuch aſked him, if that naughtie water did him no hurt. The king ſware by the gods vnto him, that he neuer dranke better wine, nor ſweeter water then that was, nor that pleaſed him better then that did: and therefore, ſaid he, I beſeech the gods, if it be not my hap to find him that gaue thee this water to reward him, yet that it will pleaſe them to ſend him good fortune. As the king was talking thus with the Eunuch, the thirtie men with their torches returned vnto him, who altogether with ioyfull countenance, confirmed the good newes he looked not for: and then there were come together againe a greater number of ſouldiers about him, and ſtill came moe

Artaxerxes army of nine hundred thousand fighting mẽ, against his brother Cyrus.

Xenophon the Historiographer excellently describeth this battell betwixt Artaxerxes & his brother Cyrus.

one after another, that he began againe to be couragious. Then he came downe into the plaine, with a world of lights and torches about him, and went ſtraight to the place where his brother Cyrus body lay. There, following the ancient manner of the PERSIANS againſt traytors to the king, he cauſed his head and right hand to be ſtriken off, and then made his head be brought vnto him, the which he tooke by the haires of his head (for Cyrus wore them long and thicke) and did himſelfe ſhew it vnto them that fled ſtil & were afraid, to encourage them againe. They wondering to ſee it, did him humble reuerence, and ſo gathered by companies about the king, that in a ſmall time there were gathered together about him, threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men, with the which he tooke his way againe towards the campe. Indeed Cteſias ſaith, that he had but foure hundred thouſand fighting men in all: but Dinon and Xenophon ſay more. And for the number of them that were ſlaine, Cteſias ſaith, that word was brought to the king, that there were not aboue nine thouſand ſlaine, howbeit that to ſight they ſeemed to be no leſſe then twenty thouſand: but for that point, he might be talked withall, in either of both. And furthermore, where he ſaith that the king did ſend him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN vnto the GRECIANS, and others with him, that is a flat lie. For Xenophon knew right well, that this Cteſias waited vpon the king, becauſe he ſpeaketh of him in diuerſe places of his hiſtory: if he had bene appointed by the king to cary report vnto the GRECIANS of ſo weighty a matter, it is like enough Xenophon would not haue concealed it, when he nameth Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN. But Cteſias (as it appeareth by his writings) was a very ambitious man, & partial vnto ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS, but ſpecially vnto Clearchus: and is glad when he can get any occaſion to ſpeake of himſelfe for his glory, of LACEDÆMON, & of Clearchus. Now after this battel, king Artaxerxes ſent goodly rich gifts vnto Artagerſis ſon, whoſe father Cyrus had ſlaine with his own hands; & (as it is reported) did alſo greatly honor Cteſias, and many others: and did not forget alſo to cauſe the poore CARIAN ſlaue to be ſought out, that had giuen him the water to be caried to him, which ſaued his life: and when he had found him out, of a poore wretch vnknowne before, he made him a rich nobleman. He ſeuerely puniſhed thoſe alſo that had offended the martiall law, as amongſt others Arbazes, one of the MEDES: who (when the battell was ioyned) fled firſt to Cyrus ſide, and, then, when he vnderſtood he was ſlaine, he returned againe to the kings ſide. For, ſuppoſing that it was rather timorouſneſſe & cowardly nature, then for treaſon or ill will he bare him, he compelled him to carie a whore on his backe ſtarke naked, all day long about the market place. And to another (who beſides he had yeelded himſelf to his enemies, falſly boaſting that he had ſlaine two) he made his tongue to be bored through in three ſeuerall places with a cordiners aule. Now the king being of opinion that it was himſelfe that had ſlaine his brother Cyrus with his owne hand, and being deſirous that euery man ſhould ſo thinke and ſay, he ſent preſents vnto Mithridates, that had hurt him firſt in the forehead, and commanded him that caried the gifts vnto him, to tell him from the king: The king doth ſend thee theſe preſents, becauſe thou finding firſt the capariſon of Cyrus horſe, diddeſt bring it vnto the king. The CARIAN alſo, that had cut the ham of his legge wherewith Cyrus fell downe, asked his gift likewiſe: which the king gaue him, and bad the meſſenger tell him, The king doth giue thee this, becauſe thou waſt the ſecond perſon that brought him the good newes: for Artaſyras was the firſt, and thou the ſecond, that brought him newes of the death of Cyrus. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleaſed in his mind with theſe words, he went his way, and ſaid nothing then, nor made any thing ado: but the vnfortunate CARIAN fondly fell into a fooliſh veine, common vnto mẽ. For, the ſudden ioy he felt (as it ſeemeth) to ſee ſuch a goodly rich preſent before him, as ỹ king ſent him, made him ſo forget himſelfe, that he began to aſpire, and to pretend greater things then became his eſtate and calling. And therefore he would not take the kings gift, as in reſpect that he had brought him word of Cyrus death: but began to ſtorme, and to rage, calling the gods to witneſſe, that it was he onely, and none other, that ſlue Cyrus, and that they did him great wrong, to take this honor from him. The king being told of it, tooke it ſo angrily, that he preſently commanded them to ſtrike off his head. But Paryſatis (the Queene mother) being preſent when the king gaue this commandement, ſhe prayed him not to put him to death in this ſort: for the villaine (ſaid ſhe) let me alone, I will chaſtiſe him well inough for his preſumption and raſh ſpeech. The king was contented ſhe ſhould haue him. Thereupon ſhe ſent the Sergeant to take this curſed CARIAN, and made him be hanged vpon a gibbet ten daies together, and at the ten daies end cauſed his eyes to be pulled out of his head: and laſt of all, poured molten mettall into his eares, and ſo killed killed the villaine with this kind of torment. Mithridates alſo ſhortly after, died miſerably by a like folly. He was bidden to ſupper at a feaſt, whither came alſo the king & Queene mothers Eunuches: and when they came, Mithridates ſate downe at the boord in the kings golden gowne he gaue him. When they had ſupped, and that they began to drinke one to another, one of Paryſatis Eunuches ſaid vnto Mithridates: The king hath indeed giuen thee a goodly gowne Mithridates, and goodly chaines and carcanets of gold, and ſo is the ſword very rich and good he gaue thee, ſo that when thou haſt that by thy ſide, there is no man (I warrant thee) but will thinke thee a happy man. Mithridates thē, the wine fuming into his braine, anſwered ſtraight: What meaneſt thou by that, Sparamixes? I deſerued better then this when the battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, anſwered, I do not ſpeake it for any hurt or euill will I beare thee, Mithridates: but to ſpeake frankly among our ſelues, becauſe the Grecians haue a common prouerb, that Wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valiāt act was it to take vp a capariſon of a horſe that fell on the ground, and to carie it to the king? which the Eunuch ſpitefully put forth vnto him, not that he was ignorant who did it, but to prouoke him to ſpeake, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a haſty man of nature, and could not keepe his tongue, and leaſt of all when he had drunke ſo well as he had done; and ſo it fell out indeed. For Mithridates could not bite it in, but replied ſtraight: You may talke as long as you liſt of the capariſon of a horſe, & ſuch traſh, but I tell you plainly, that Cyrus was ſlaine with mine own hands, & with no mans elſe. For I hit him not in vaine as Artagerſes did, but full in the forehead hard by the eye, & ſtrake him through and through his head againe, and ſo ouerthrew him, of which blow he died. He had no ſooner ſpoken theſe words, but the reſt that were at the boord, caſt down their eies, foreſeeing the death of this poore and vnfortunate Mithridates. But then the maſter of the feaſt began to ſpeake, and ſaid vnto him: Friend Mithridates, I pray thee let vs drinke and be merrie, and reuerence and thanke the good fortune of our king; and for the reſt, let this talke go, it is too high for vs. When the Eunuch went from thence, he told Paryſatis (the Queene mother) what Mithridates had ſaid before them all: and ſhe went and told the king of it. Who was maruellouſly offended with all to be ſo belied, and to loſe the thing that was moſt honourable, and beſt pleaſed him in his victory. For it was his mind, that all the world (both Grecians and barbarous people) ſhould certainly beleeue, that in the battell betwixt him and his brother he was hurt, but yet that he ſlue Cyrus with his owne hand. So the king commanded that Mithridates ſhould ſuffer the paines of death in boates, the which is after this manner. They take two boates made of purpoſe ſo euen, that the one is neither broader nor longer then the other, and then lay the offender in one of them vpon his backe, and ſo couer him with the other, and do ſow both boates together: ſo that the feete, hands, and head do come out at holes made of purpoſe for him, the reſt of his body is all hidden within. Now they giue him meate as much as he will eate, and if he will not eate, they force him to it, by thruſting aules in his eyes: then when he hath eaten, they giue him honey to drinke mingled with milke, and they do not only poure it into his mouth, but alſo all his face ouer, turning him full into the Sun, ſo that his face is all couered ouer with flies: and furthermore, being driuen to do his needs in that trough, of his excrements there ingender worms that eate his body to the very priuities. Then, when they ſee the man is dead, they take off the vppermoſt boate, and find all his fleſh deuoured with vermine ingendred of him, euen to his very intrails. So, when Mithridates had miſerably languiſhed in this maner, ſeuenteene daies together, at length he died in extreme torments. Now Paryſatis (the Queene mother) lacked no more to accompliſh her wicked deſire, but Meſabates, one of the kings Eunuches that had cut off Cyrus head and hand: and ſeeing that he was very wary and circumſpect in his behauior, that ſhe could not take him at any aduantage, in the end ſhe deuiſed a fine way to intrap him. She had a maruellous wit, and among other things could play paſſingly well at all games at dice, and did many times play with the king her ſon before the warres: and after the warres alſo, when he had made peace, ſhe did play at dice with him as ſhe had done before, in ſo much as ſhe knew all his ſecret loue, and ſuffered him to enioy it. To be ſhort, ſhe would neuer be out of his ſight but as litle as ſhe could, and would let his wife Statira haue as little time with him as might be, that ſhe might gouerne and rule him as ſhe would: both becauſe ſhe hated her of all creatures liuing, & alſo for that ſhe would beare the greateſt ſway and credit about him. When ſhe ſaw the king one day at leiſure, not knowing how to paſſe the time away, ſhe inticed him to play a thouſand Dareckes at dice, and was contented to loſe them willingly, and played the thouſand Dareckes downe, ſeeming notwithſtanding to be angry with her loſſe. So ſhe prayed him alſo to play one of his Eunuches with her: and the king was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed betweene them that they ſhould both name and except fiue of the truſtieſt and chiefeſt Eunuches they had: and then, which of them loſt, ſhould preſently deliuer vnto the winner his choiſe of all the other Eunuches he would demand. Thus they fell to play, and ſhe imploying all the cunning ſhe had, and playing as warily as ſhe could poſſible, beſides that the dice ran on her ſide, her lucke ſerued her ſo, that ſhe wan: and then ſhe required Meſabates for her winnings, being none of thoſe the king had excepted. When ſhe had him deliuered her, ſhe gaue him to the hangman, & willed him to flea him aliue, and then that they ſhould crucifie him, & naile him to a croſſe, and hang his skin vpon another peece of timber by him: the which was done accordingly. The king was maruellous angry withall when he knew it, and grieuouſly offended with his mother. Howbeit ſhe ſported it out, and laughing told him: Indeed it becomes thee well to be angry for loſing an old gelded villaine, where I loſt a thouſand Darecks quietly, and ſaid neuer a word. So there came no other thing of it, ſauing that the king was a litle angry, & repented him that he had played ſo fondly, & was ſo finely mocked. But Queene Statira on the other ſide (beſides that ſhe was againſt her in all other things) ſpared not to tell Queene mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the kings good & faithfull ſeruant ſo cruelly to death, for Cyrus ſake. But now, after that Tiſaphernes (king Artaxerxes Lieutenāt) had deceiued Clearchus, & other Captaines of GREECE, deteſtably falſifying his word he had giuen them, & that he had ſent thē bound vnto the king, Cteſias ſaith, that Clearchus praied him to help him to a combe; and that hauing had one by his means, & ſo combed his head, it pleaſed him ſo wel, that to requite his good will, he gaue him his ſeale of armes from his finger wherewith he ſealed his letters, for a witnes of the great friendſhip that was betweene them two. He ſaith alſo, that in the ſtone of this ring there was grauen the dance of the CARYATIDES. And furthermore, that the other ſouldiers which were priſoners with Clearchus, did take away ỹ moſt part of the victuals that were ſent to him, & left him litle or nothing; & that he did remedy all this, procuring a greater quantity to be ſent vnto thē, and that they ſhould put Clearchus portion apart, and all the other ſoldiers parts by thēſelues. This he did, as he ſaith, by Paryſatis conſent and commandement, who knowing that amongſt other victuals they daily ſent Clearchus a gāmon of bacō, ſhe told him one day he ſhould do well to hide a litle knife in this gāmmon of bacon, & to ſend it him, to the end that the life of ſo noble & valiant a man as he was, ſhould not fal to the cruelty of the king. Howbeit, that he was afraid to meddle withal, & durſt not do it: and that the king ſware, and promiſed his mother (who was an earneſt ſuter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him to death. This notwithſtanding, the king being afterwards procured, and perſwaded to the contrary, by Queene Statira his wife, he put thē all to death, but Menon. Therfore Paryſatis (Queene mother) after that time (ſaith Cteſias) deuiſed all the waies ſhe could to poyſon Queene Statira, & to make her out of the way. But me thinketh this ſmelleth like a lie, that Paryſatis ſhould intend ſo wicked and dangerous an act, as to put the kings lawfull wife to death, by whom he had ſonnes that were to inherit the Crowne, onely for the loue & reſpect of Clearchus: and it is too plaine that he coined that, to honour and magnifie Clearchus memory the more. But to proue it, a man may eaſily find it by the lies he addeth afterward vnto it: ſaying, that after the Captaines were ſlaine, all the bodies of the reſt were torne in peeces by dogs and fowles: and alſo that there came a boiſterous wind, and couered all Clearchus body with a great hill of duſt; and that out of this hill of duſt ſhortly after there ſprung vp many palme trees, which made a pretie thicke groue, that it ſhadowed all that place. Inſomuch that the king himſelf did afterwards maruellouſly repent him for putting him to death, for that he was an honeſt man, & beloued of the gods. This was not for Clearchus ſake, but for an old cankred malice Paryſatis had long time borne in her heart againſt Queene Statira: becauſe ſhe ſaw well enough, that the credit and authority her ſelfe had with the king, was in reſpect of a ſonnes duty and obedience to his mother; and in contrary maner, Statiraes credit and authority had a better ground and foundation, becauſe it came of the loue and goodwill the king did beare her. And this is the only cauſe that made her to practiſe the death of Queene Statira, hauing determined that her ſelfe, or daughter in law, muſt needs die. Now Queene mother had one of the women of her chamber called Gigis, that was of great credit about her, & whom ſhe only truſted. Dinon writeth, that this Gigis did helpe Paryſatis to make the poyſon: but Cteſias writeth contrarily, and ſaith, that ſhe only knew it, but otherwiſe that it was againſt her will: and

and that he that made the poyſon, was one Belitaras, but Dinon called him Melantas. Now, though in outward ſemblance and ſhew Queene mother and Statira ſeemed to haue forgotten all malice between them, & that they began again one of them to keepe company with the other, and did eate and drinke together: yet one of them miſtruſted the other, and tooke great heed to themſelues, both of them eating one ſelfe meate, and in one diſh together, and were both ſerued with one ſelfe officers and men. In PERSIA there is a little bird, of the which all the parts are excellent good to eate, and are full of fat within; ſo that it is thought it liueth by aire and dew, and in the PERSIAN tongue they call it Ryntaces. Paryſatis, as Cteſias ſaith, tooke one of theſe birds, and cut it in the middeſt with a little knife, the which was poyſoned onely on one of the ſides, and gaue that halfe which was poiſoned vnto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Paryſatis her ſelfe that gaue it her, but her caruer Melantas that carued her meate, and ſtill gaue Queene Statira of that meate which the ſide of his poyſoned knife had touched. So Queene Statira preſently fell ſicke of the diſeaſe whereof ſhe died, with grieuous pangs and gripings in her bowels, and found plainely that ſhe was poyſoned by Paryſatis meanes: whereupon ſhe told the King as much, who was of the ſame opinion, and thought it was his mother, becauſe he knew her cruell reuenging mind, that neuer pardoned any, againſt whom ſhe conceiued any grudge. The king therefore to know the troth, when his wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his mothers houſhold ſeruants and officers, and did put them to torments, to make them confeſſe the troth, ſauing Gigis whom Queene mother kept cloſe in her chamber a long time, and would neuer ſuffer the king to haue her: who earneſtly requeſted her to deliuer her vnto him. Notwithſtanding, Gigis her ſelfe at length prayed Queene mother to giue her leaue one night to go home to her houſe. The king vnderſtanding it, laid waite for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when ſhe was taken, he condemned her to ſuffer the paines of death ordained for poyſoners, the which in PERSIA is executed in this maner. They make them put their head vpon a great plaine ſtone, and with another ſtone they preſſe and ſtrike it ſo long, till they haue daſhed the braines of the malefactor out of their head. After this ſort was Gigis put to death. Now for Paryſatis his mother, the king did her no other hurt, nor ſaid any more vnto her, but cõfined her to BABYLON according to her deſire; and ſware, that whileſt ſhe liued, he would neuer ſee BABYLON. In this ſtate ſtood the affaires of the king. But now, Artaxerxes hauing done the vtmoſt he could to haue ouercome the GRECIANS which came to make war with him in the heart of his Realme, and wold haue beene as glad of that, as he was to haue ouercome Cyrus, and to keepe his crowne and Realme: he could neuer preuaile againſt them. For, though they had loſt Cyrus that gaue them entertainment, and all their priuate Captaines that led them: they ſaued themſelues notwithſtanding, being in the heart of his Realme, and ſhewed the PERSIANS by experience, that their doings was nothing but gold and ſiluer, curioſitie, and faire women, or otherwiſe, nothing but pompe and vanity. Hereupon all the GRECIANS became couragious, and deſpiſed the barbarous people: inſomuch that the LACEDÆMONIANS thought it a great ſhame and diſhonor vnto them, if they did not deliuer the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the ſlauery & bondage of the PERSIANS, & keep them from the open violence & cruelty of the barbarous people. For they hauing at other times attempted to do it by their Captaine Timbron, & afterwards alſo by Dercillidas, whom they ſent thither with an army, and hauing done nothing worthy memory, at length they determined to ſend their king Ageſilaus thither in perſon, who paſſing through ASIA with his ſhips, began preſently to make hote war againſt the PERSIANS as ſoone as euer he had landed his armie. For, at the firſt conflict he ouerthrew Tiſaphernes (the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant) in battell, and made the moſt part of the cities of GRECE that are in ASIA, to rebell againſt him. Artaxerxes looking into this warre, and wiſely conſidering what way and meanes he was to take, to make warre with the GRECIANS, he ſent into GRECE one Hermocrates a RHODIAN (of great credit about him) with a maruellous ſumme of gold and ſiluer, bountifully to beſtow in gifts among the nobility and chiefe rulers of the cities of GRECE, to make all the other GRECIANS to riſe againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS. Hermocrates wiſely executed his commiſſion, for he made the chiefeſt cities of GRECE to rebell againſt LACEDÆMON: ſo that all PELOPONNESVS being vp in armes, and in great garboile, the Ephori at LACEDÆMON were enforced to ſend for Ageſilaus home againe. Ageſilaus being ſory to depart out of ASIA, ſayd vnto his friends, that the king of PERSIA had driuen him out of his Realme with thirty thouſand archers: becauſe that the PERSIAN coyne is ſtamped with an archer, hauing a bow in his hand.

Artaxerxes drawe the Lacedæmonians frō all their dominion by sea.

Axtaxerxes also draue ỹ LACEDÆMONIANS out of all their iurisdiction by sea, by the meanes of Conon Generall of the ATHENIANS, whom Pharnabazus (one of his Lieutenants) had wont to take his part. For Conon, after he was ouerthrown in battel at a place called the Goates riuer, kept euer after in the Ile of CYPRVS, not so much for the safetie of his person, as also for that it was a meete place to stay in, vntil the warres of GRECE were appeased. He, knowing that the deuice he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution; and on the contrary side, that the power of the king lacked a man of deepe iudgement to be employed: wrote letters vnto him of his aduice what he thought to do, straightly charging him whō he deliuered his letters vnto that if he could possibly, he should cause the same to be deliuered vnto the king by Zenon the CRETAN, one of the kings dancers, or by one Polycritus his Phisitian, borne in the citie of MENDE: and in both their absences, then to giue it vnto Ctesias, to deliuer it vnto the king. It chanced so, that this letter came to the hands of Ctesias who (as it is reported) added moreouer vnto the contents of the letter, that the king should send him to Conon, because he was a necessary man to be imploied in his seruice, but specially by sea. Ctesias saith not so: but writeth that the king of his own voluntary motion gaue him this charge. Now, after Artaxerxes had through the leading of Conon and Pharnabazus, won the battell by sea neare to the Ile of GNIDVS, and that thereby he had driuen all the LACEDÆMONIANS from their iurisdictiō by sea, al GRECE had him in maruellous great estimation: so that he gaue vnto the GRECIANS with such cōditions as he would, that so famous peace, called Antalcidas peace. This Antalcidas was a citizen of SPARTA, the son of one Leon, who fauoring king Artaxerxes affaires, procured by the treaty of this peace, that the LACEDÆMONIANS left vnto Artaxerxes al the cities of GRECE in ASIA & al the Iles cōtained in the same, to enioy quietly, making them pay tribute at his pleasure. This peace being concluded with the GRECIANS (if so shamefull a treason, reproach & common infamy to al GRECE may be called peace, as neuer war fell out more dishonorable and infamous for the vanquished) king Artaxerxes, that otherwise hated the LACEDÆMONIANS to the death, and that esteemed them (as Dinon writeth) the impudentest men liuing, did notwithstanding loue Antalcidas passing well, and entertained him very honourably when he came into PERSIA vnto him. It is reported, that the king one day tooke a garland of flowers, and did wet it with the most precious and sweetest oile of perfume that was prepared for the feast, & sent the same vnto Antalcidas: insomuch as euery man maruelled to see the king set so much by him. Indeed he was a meet man to follow the vanity and curiositie of the PERSIANS, and had well deserued such a garland to be sent him: who was so bold to dance a dance before the PERSIANS, mocking and counterfetting Leonidas & Callicratidas, two of the valiantest men that euer were in GRECE. Therfore one said at that time in the presence of king Agesilaus: O how vnhappy is poore GRECE at this day, whē the LACEDÆMONIANS come to follow the PERSIANS? But Agesilaus presently answered him againe, Not so, said he: but rather the PERSIANS follow the LACEDÆMONIANS. Notwithstāding, this wise answer Agesilaus made, did not take away the shame of the fact: and shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS lost the battell of LEVCTRES, and therewith also the signoritie and principalitie they had kept of long time ouer all GRECE, although they had lost their estimaton before, for consenting to so shamefull and dishonorable peace. When SPARTA florished most, and was chiefe of all the other cities of GRECE, so long did Artaxerxes continue still to make much of Antalcidas, and called him, his friend. But after that the LACEDÆMONIANS had lost the battell of LEVCTRES, hauing receiued so great an ouerthrow, and wanting mony, they sent Agesilaus into ÆGYPT, and Antalcidas into PERSIA vnto king Artaxerxes, to pray him to aide and helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS. Howbeit, the king made so small account of him, and disdained him so much, denying him and his requests, that he returned backe to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the king. And there also seeing that his enemies mocked him; and fearing that the Ephori would cōmit him to prison, he killed himselfe with famine. About that time also, the THEBANS after they had won the battel of LEVCTRES, sent Ismenias & Pelopidas into PERSIA, vnto king Artaxerxes, where Pelopidas did nothing vnworthy of himselfe. Howbeit, Ismenias being commanded to kneele to the king, he let fall his ring at his feet, and stouped to take it vp: whereby it was thought of some, that he did it to kneele to the king. Another time Artaxerxes liking a secret aduertisment very well, sent him from Timagoras the ATHENIAN, he gaue him tenne thousand Daricks by his Secretarie called Belluris. And because he had a sickly body, and was driuen to drinke cowes milke to restore him, the king therefore sent foure score milch kine with him

him, to giue milke to the paile, to haue freſh milke euery day. Furthermore, he ſent him a bed throughly furniſhed with al things neceſſary, & groomes of the chāber to make his bed, ſaying, that the GRECIANS could not tel how to make it: and did alſo let him haue men to cary him vpon their armes to the ſea ſide, becauſe he was ſicke; and whileſt he was at the Court, he entertained him very honorably and bountifully. So Oſtanes the kings brother, ſayd one day vnto him: Timagoras, remember how honourably thou art ſerued at thy boord, for it is for no ſmall matter thou art thus made of. This word was rather to cut him for his treaſon, then for any remembrance of the benefit receiued. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condemned the ſame Timagoras to die, becauſe he had taken bribes and money of the king of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recompence of ſo many other things that he had done to deſpite the GRECIANS with, did one thing that pleaſed them maruellouſly, when he did put Tiſaphernes to death, who was the dreadfulleſt enemie the GRECIANS had. Paryſatis the Queene mother did helpe to bring this to paſſe, aggrauating the accuſations brought in againſt him: for the king kept not his anger long againſt his mother, but fel in againe with her, & ſent for her, knowing that ſhe had an excellent wit & noble courage to gouerne a great kingdome: and beſides, that there was nothing now to let them to come together as much as they would, to giue any occaſion of iealouſie or malice to any perſon. So euer after, his mother Paryſatis endeuored her ſelfe to feed the king her ſonnes humour euerie manner of way, ſeeming to miſlike nothing that he did: whereby ſhe grew in ſo great credite with him, that he denied her nothing whatſoeuer ſhe asked him. So ſhe perceiued that the king was extremely in loue with one of his own daughters, that was called Atoſſa: howbeit that he diſſembled his loue the beſt he could, & kept it ſecret, chiefly for feare of her, although ſome write, that indeed he had already had her maiden-head. Now Paryſatis hauing found his loue, ſhe began to make more of his daughter then ſhe did before, and talking with her father, ſometime ſhe praiſed her beautie, another time her grace and good countenance, ſaying that ſhe was like a Queene and noble Princeſſe: ſo that at length by litle and litle ſhe perſwaded him to marry her openly, not paſſing for the lawes and opinions of the GRECIANS, conſidering that God had giuen him vnto the PERSIANS, to ſtabliſh lawes vnto them, to decide right from wrong, and the good from the bad. Some Hiſtoriographers do write; and amongſt them Heraclides of CYMES, that Artaxerxes did not onely marry the eldeſt of his daughters, but the ſecond alſo called Ameſtris, of whō we will ſpeake hereafter. Now when he had maried the eldeſt, Atoſſa, he loued her ſo entirely well, that though ſhe fell ſicke of the diſeaſe commonly called Vitiligo, that ran ouer all her bodie, he loued her not the worſe for it, but praied continually for her vnto the goddeſſe Iuno, honouring no other goddeſſe but her onely, and fell downe on his knees before her image; and ſent by his friends and Lieutenants ſo many offerings, that al the way from his Court gates vnto the temple of Iuno (which was ſixteene furlongs off) was full of gold, ſiluer, rich purple, ſilkes, and horſe that were ſent thither. He began to make warre alſo with the ÆGYPTIANS, and made Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ATHENIAN, his Lieutenants, who did no good, becauſe they fell at variance the one with the other. But afterwards, Artaxerxes himſelfe went in perſon to conquer the CADVSIANS with three hundred thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand horſemen. So he inuaded their country, which was a very rude country, alway darke and cloudie: the earth bringeth forth nothing that man ſoweth, but doth only feed the inhabitants with peares, apples, and ſuch like fruite, and yet the men be very ſtrong and valiant notwithſtanding. So when he was entred farre into the country before he was ware, he fel into great want of victuals, and was alſo in great danger. For his ſouldiers found nothing in all the countrey that was good to eate; and worſt of all, no victuals could come vnto them from any place, becauſe of the hardneſſe and naughty waies of the countrey: ſo that his campe liued onely with the fleſh of their beaſts of cariage, and yet they ſold it dearely; for, an Aſſes head was ſold for threeſcore ſiluer Drachmaes. To conclude, the famine was ſo great, that prouiſion failed for the kings owne mouth, and there were but few horſe left, for all the reſt were eaten. Then Tiribazus, that had oftentimes been chiefe about the king, becauſe he was a valiant man, and that through his folly was many times alſo out of fauor, as at that preſent time, when he had no authority nor eſtimation, he deuiſed a ſtratageme, whereby he ſaued the king and all his campe. In this countrey of the CADVSIANS, there were two kings in the field with their armies, both of them camped aſunder, one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had ſpoken with king Artaxerxes, and had told him what he meant to do, he went vnto one of the kings, and at the ſelfe ſame time alſo ſecretly ſent his ſonne vnto the other king, and told either of them, that the other king had sent Ambassadors vnto Artaxerxes to make peace with him, vnwitting to his companion; and therefore he counselled them, if they were wise, one of them to seeke to preuent another with all the possible speed he could; and promised them both, one after another, to helpe them the best he could. Both the one and the other of the kings gaue credite to his words, either of them both mistrusting one another: so that the one speedily sent his Ambassadours vnto king Artaxerxes, with Tiribazus; and the other also his Ambassadours with his sonne. But Tiribazus tarying long in his iourney, king Artaxerxes began somewhat to suspect him: his enemies also did accuse him in his absence, and the king grew very cholericke, and repented him that he had trusted him so farre, and was willing to heare euery man that spake against him. Howbeit, Tiribazus at length returned, and his son also, and either of them brought with them the Ambassadours of the CADVSIANS, and so peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft againe, and in greater credit then euer he was, and so departed with the king. The king then shewed plainly, that cowardlinesse proceedeth not of pompe and curiositie, as some take it, beleeuing that it doth effeminate mens hearts; but rather of a vile base mind, that commonly followeth euill, and the worst counsell: for neither the iewels of gold, the kingly robe, nor other sūptuous ornaments which the king euer wore about him, worth twelue thousand talents (as it is reported) did not hinder him at that time to trauell, and to take as much paine as any man in all his army. For he himself marched on foote the foremost man, carying his owne trusse in a scarfe vpon his shoulders, and his target on his arme, and trauailed through high stonie mountaines. So that, his souldiers seeing the courage and paine the king himselfe tooke, they marched so nimbly, that it seemed they had wings: for he dayly marched about two hundred furlongs. Now the king at length by sore trauell came to one of his owne houses where there were goodly arbors & parks, with goodly trees passingly set forth: but all the country besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a tree a great way from thence, and it was maruellous cold. The king suffered his souldiers to hew downe the goodly pines and cypres trees in his parkes: and because they durst not presume to touch them, he himselfe as he was, tooke an axe in his hand, and began to hew downe the goodliest tree there. The souldiers seeing that, fell euery man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short time they had prouided themselues well with wood, and made them great fires in euery place, and so past ouer the night quietly by the fire side. This notwithstanding, he lost a great number of valiant men in this voyage, and almost all his horses. Therefore, thinking his men would mocke him because he did faile of his purpose, he began to grow mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefest noble men he had about him, so that in a rage he put many of them to death; but much more of them remained whom he mistrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloudsucker, then a cowardly tyrant: as in contrary maner, nothing is more courteous, and lesse suspitious, then a valiant and hardie man. And therefore brute beasts, that be neuer made tame nor mastered, are commonly cowardly and timorous: and the other on the contrary, that are noble and couragious, are bold, and do come straight to know a man, because they haue no feare, neither do they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they doe. Afterwards, king Artaxerxes being growne very old, heard that there was great stirre and contention betweene his sonnes, which of them should be heire after his death, and that this contention fell out also among his friends and men of great calling. The wisest of them wished, that as he himselfe came vnto the crowne, as his fathers eldest sonne: so, that he likewise should after his death leaue it vnto his eldest sonne called Darius. But the yonger, which was called Ochus, being a valiant man, and of a hote stirring nature, had some in the Court also that tooke his part, and hoped to attaine to his purpose, by the meanes of his sister Atossa, whem he loued and honoured, promising to marry her, and to make her Queene, if he might come to be king after his fathers decease. And besides, there went a report abroad, that in their fathers life time he secretly kept her: howbeit Axtaxerxes neuer vnderstood it. Now, because he would betimes put his sonne Ochus out of all hope to succeed him in his kingdome, lest this expectation might make him goe about to practise that which Cyrus did, and that by this meanes his Realme should grow into faction and ciuill warres: he proclaimed his eldest sonne Darius (being fiftie yeares old) king after his death; and furthermore, gaue him leaue from thenceforth to weare the point of his hat right vp. In PERSIA the custome is, that when any commeth to bee proclaimed successour and heire apparent to the crowne, he should require a gift of him that proclaimeth him

him ſucceſſor. The which the other doth grant him, whatſoeuer it be that he asketh, ſo it be not impoſſible. Darius then asked his father a concubine called Aſpaſia, who was firſt with Cyrus, and in greateſt fauour with him aboue all the reſt, but then was for the kings owne bodie. She was borne in the countrey of IONIA, of free parents: and being vertuouſly brought vp, ſhe was brought one night vnto Cyrus as he was at ſupper, with other women, who ſate them downe without too curious bidding hard by him, and were very glad when Cyrus offered to play and be merry with them, giuing euery one of them ſome pleaſant word: and they made it not coy. But Aſpaſia ſtood on her feete by the table, and ſaid neuer a word: and notwithſtanding that Cyrus called her, ſhe would not come at him. Moreouer, when one of the groomes of his chamber would haue taken her to haue brought her to him: The firſt, ſaith ſhe, that layeth hands on me ſhall repent it. Thereupon all thoſe that were preſent, ſaid, ſhe was a fooliſh thing, and ſimply brought vp, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it paſſed it ouer with laughing, and told him that had brought them vnto him: Doeſt thou not ſee, that of all theſe thou haſt brought me, there is not an honeſt woman but ſhe? After that, Cyrus began to make much of her, and loued her better continually then all the reſt, and called her Aſpaſia the wiſe. This Aſpaſia was taken among the ſpoiles of Cyrus campe after he was ouerthrowne; and Darius as we haue told ye, did beg her of his father, who was very angry with it in his mind. For the barbarous people of all other things are maruellous iealous of their women, ſo that not onely he ſhould be put to death, that durſt but ſpeake to, or touch any concubine of the kings but in ſport: but alſo whoſoeuer came neare them, or neare their coaches as they trauelled. The kings daughter Atoſſa, whom he had maried againſt the law, was yet liuing, & beſides her he had alſo three hundred and threeſcore paſſing faire concubines: and yet when his ſonne Darius asked Aſpaſia of him, the king anſwered, ſhe was a free woman borne, and therfore if ſhe wold, he was content he ſhould haue her: but if ſhe were vnwilling to go to him, then he would not haue him force her by any meanes. So Aſpaſia was ſent for, and ſhe was asked with whom ſhe had rather be. She anſwered, With Darius: contrary to king Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the cuſtome, & alſo the law, was compelled to let him haue her. But ſhortly after he took her from him againe, ſaying that he would place her in a Nunry of Diana, in the country of ECBATANE, where they call her Anitis, there to ſerue the goddeſſe, and to liue chaſt all the daies of her life: ſuppoſing by this means to puniſh his ſon, not rigorouſly, but moderatly, with griefe mixt with ſport and earneſt. Howbeit his ſon tooke it not ſo patiently, either becauſe he was deeply in loue with Aſpaſia, or elſe for that he ſaw his father mocked him in that point. Tiribazus finding this, and perceiuing that Darius tooke it very grieuouſly, he aggrauated his anger againſt his father, knowing the paſſion of loue in Darius, by his owne vpon the like occaſion. King Artaxerxes had many daughters, & had promiſed Pharnabazus one of thē, called Apama: vnto Orontes, Rodogoune, and to Tiribazus, Ameſtris. The king performed the other two mariages, and did put Tiribazus by his wife. For the king himſelfe maried his owne daughter Ameſtris; and for her, he promiſed Tiribazus the yonger, Atoſſa: with whom alſo he himſelfe fell in loue, and maried her. Tiribazus hereupon was in ſuch a rage with the king, that he hated him to the death: not becauſe he was any traitor or ſeditious man in nature, but a mad hare-brain'd felow. For ſomtime he was aloft, and in as good credite and authority as the beſt: ſuddenly againe he would play ſome mad parts to anger the king, and then he was in as much diſgrace, and out of countenance: and could away with neither fortune. For when he was in authority, he made euery man hate him for his pride; and being in diſgrace, he could not humble himſelfe, but looke bigger then before. Now there was fire and brimſtone met, when Tiribazus tooke part with Darius. For he daily blew into his eares, that it was to no purpoſe for him to weare his hat right vp, if his affaires alſo went not rightly forward: and that he deceiued himſelfe much, if he did not know that his brother (by meanes of the women he kept) ſecretly aſpired to the crowne: and that his father being ſo vnconſtant as he was, he muſt not truſt in any ſort to ſucceed him in the kingdome, what proclamation ſoeuer he hath made in his behalfe to the contrary. For, ſaid he, he that for a GRECIAN woman hath broken & violated the holieſt law that was in PERSIA, thou muſt not looke that he will performe that he hath promiſed thee. And furthermore, he perſwaded him, that it was not a like repulſe vnto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for, as it was for him to be turned out of all that euer he had gotten. For ſaid he, if it pleaſe Ochus to liue like a priuate man, he may ſafely do it, and no man will trouble him: but for himſelfe that was already proclaimed king he muſt of neceſſitie make himſelfe king, or elſe he muſt not liue. So, the Poet Sophocles his ſaying moſt commonly proueth true:

Ill counſell eaſily takes place.

For the way is large and plaine for a man to beleeue as he liſt, and men commonly are giuen rather to beleeue the euill then the good, becauſe moſt men know not what goodneſſe meaneth. But now beſide theſe perſwaſions, the greatneſſe of the kingdome, and the feare Darius ſtood in of his brother Ochus, tooke great force & effect with him: and it may be alſo, that Venus her ſelfe did ſomewhat in the matter, for the malice & ſpite that Aſpaſia was taken from him. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, thus was it handled, that Darius flatly cõſpired againſt his father Artaxerxes, together with Tiribazus. Now, they hauing gotten many conſpirators to ioyne with them, one of the kings Eunuchs perceiuing it, ran and told the king of it, & how they had ſuddenly determined to aſſaile him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among themſelues, that they ſhould kill him in his bed in the night. Artaxerxes receiuing this aduertiſement, thought it was not good to be careleſſe of a matter of ſo great importance, as his life: and alſo that it were too great lightneſſe in him ſo ſodainly to beleeue his Eunuch, without better proofe or knowledge. So he took this way with himſelfe. He commanded the Eunuch that had giuen him this information, to keepe company ſtill with the conſpirators, and to follow them whereſoeuer they went, to ſee their doings: and in the meane time he beate downe his wall behind his bed, and made a doore through and ſet vp a hanging of tapeſtry before it. When the time was come, as the Eunuch had aduertiſed the king, that the traitors meant to do their feate, Artaxerxes being laid on his bed, roſe not vp till he had ſeene euery traitor of them in the face that came to kill him. Then, when he ſaw them comming towards him with their ſwords drawne, he ſuddenly lift vp the hanging, and got into his inner chamber, & ſhut the doore after him, making an out-cry, murder, murder. So, the traitors being plainely ſeene and knowne by the king, fled the ſame way they came, and failed of their purpoſe, and bad Tiribazus ſaue himſelfe, becauſe he was known. So they diſperſed themſelues, & ſcaped by flying. But Tiribazus was taken tardie, although he had ſlaine diuers of the kings guard, valiantly defending himſelfe: yet they tooke him not, till he was ſtriken with a dart a good way off, which ſlue him. Darius was alſo taken and apprehended, and brought priſoner with his ſons: and the king referred him to be iudged by his Peeres. For the king himſelf would not be preſent to giue iudgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuſe him: howbeit, he commanded his Secretaries to ſet downe in writing, the opinion and ſentence of euerie one of the Iudges, and to bring it to him. In fine, they all caſt him, and condemned him to die. Then the officers laid hold on him, and brought him into a chamber of the priſon, where the hangman came with a razor in his hand, with the which he vſed to cut mens throats ſo condemned to die. So the hangman coming into the chamber, when he ſaw it was Darius, he was affraid, and came out of the chamber againe, his heart failing him, and durſt not lay hands vpon the perſon of the king. But the Iudges that ſtood without the chamber, bad him goe and do it, vnleſſe he would haue his owne throate cut. So the hangman then came in, and tooke Darius by the haire of the head, and made him hold downe his head, and ſo cut his necke with his razor he had in his other hand. Others do write, that this ſentẽce was giuen in the preſence of king Artaxerxes ſelfe, and that Darius ſeeing himſelfe conuicted by manifeſt proofes brought in againſt him, he fell downe at his fathers feete, and beſought him to pardon him: and then, that his father being angrie, roſe vp, and drew out his curtelax and wounded him in ſo many places withall, that at length he ſlue him. Then returning into his Court, he worſhipped the Sunne, & turning him to his Lords that were about him, he ſaid vnto them: My Lords, God be with you, and be merry at home in your houſes, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken reuenge of them that practiſed treaſon againſt me. This was the end of Darius treaſon. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother ſtood in good hope to be next heire to the crowne, and the rather through the meanes and friendſhip of his ſiſter Atoſſa: but yet of his legitimate brethren, he feared Ariaſpes, who was only left of all the reſt that were legitimate: and of his baſtard brethren, Arſames: not becauſe Ariaſpes was elder then he, but for that (he being of a ſoft and plaine name) the PERSIANS therefore deſired he might be their king. On the other ſide Arſames was wiſe, and valiant: and Ochus ſaw that his father loued him dearely. So he determined to intrap them both. Now Ochus being a ſubtile and malicious natured man, he firſt ſhewed his cruelties vpon Arſames, and his malice vpon Ariaſpes his legitimate brother. For, becauſe he knew he was but ſimple and plaine, he ſent daily ſome of the kings Eunuchs vnto him, who brought him threatning words and meſſages, as from the king: telling him, that he had determined to put him to a ſhamefull and cruell death. So, forging theſe newes continually as things very ſecret, they did ſo terrifie poore Ariaſpes, telling him, that the king was fully bent to put ſome of his threats in execution out of hand; that he was put in ſuch feare and diſpaire of his life, that he prepared himſelfe a poiſon, and dranke it, to rid himſelfe of his life. King Artaxerxes vnderſtanding of his death, took it very heauily, & began to miſtruſt the cauſe that made him to make himſelfe away: howbeit, he could not ſeeke the proofe of it, for his extreame age. But this chance made him loue Arſames better then before, ſhewing plainely that he truſted him better then Ochus, and did make him priuie to all things. Ochus could no longer abide to deferre his intent, and therefore inticed Harpaces Tiribazus ſonne, to kill his baſtard brother Arſames; the which he did. Now Artaxerxes was ſo extreme old, that he was as good as done with age: but after he heard his ſonne Arſames was murthered, he could beare it no longer, but tooke it ſo to his heart for ſorow, that when he had liued foureſcore and foureteene yeares, and raigned threeſcore and two, he died. When he was dead, they then found that he had beene a gracious and courteous Prince, and one that loued his people and ſubiects; when they ſaw the proofe of his ſucceſſor Ochus, that paſſed all men liuing, in cruelty and ſeueritie.

THE LIFE OF Dion.

LIke as Simonides (O Soſius Senecio) ſaith, that the citie of ILIVM was not offended with the CORINTHIANS, for that they came to make war with thē with other GRECIANS, becauſe Glaucus (whoſe firſt anceſtors came from CORINTH) had taken armes, and louingly fought for the ſame: euen ſo me thinks, that neither the GRECIANS, nor ROMAINS haue cauſe to complaine of the Academie, ſith they be both alike praiſed of the ſame in this preſent booke, in the which are contained the liues of Dion and Brutus. Of the which, the one of them hauing beene very familiar with Plato himſelfe, and the other from his childhood brought vp in Platoes doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one ſelfe ſchoole-houſe to attempt the greateſt enterpriſes amongſt men. And it is no maruell if they two were much like in many of their doings, prouing that true, which their ſchoolemaiſter Plato wrote of vertue: that to do any noble act in the gouernment of a common wealth, which ſhould be famous and of credit; authoritie, and good fortune, muſt both meet in one ſelfe perſon, ioyned with iuſtice and wisedome. For as a certaine fencer called (Hippomachus) saith, that he knew his scholers farre off, if he did but see them coming from the market with meate in their hands: so it must needs follow, that men hauing beene vertuously brought vp, must needs be wise in all their doings; and beside that it bringeth them to ciuilitie and honestie, it also frameth their conditions much like one to another. Furthermore, their fortunes hauing also fallē out both alike, more by chance then by any reason, do make their liues very like to each other; for they were both of thē slain, before they could bring their enterprises to passe which they had determined. But the greatest wonder of all is this, that their deaths were foreshewed vnto them both, by a wicked spirit that visibly appeared vnto either of them: albeit there be some that cannot abide those opinions, and do maintaine, that these sights and euill spirits do neuer appeare to any man that hath his right wits, but that they are fancies of little children, or old women, or of some men whose wits are weakened by sickenesse; and so haue a certaine imagination of such strange sights, being of this superstitious mind, that they haue a wicked spirit, and an euill angell in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them graue and learned Philosophers, and very constant men, not ouercome by any sodaine passion or imagination of mind, haue been moued by such sights & spirits, and haue also told it vnto their friends: I cannot tell whether we shall be enforced, to grant the most strange and old opinion of them which say: That there be euill spirits, which enuying the vertue of good men, to withdraw them from their godly minds, do make them afraid with these feareful sights, inciting them to forsake their godlinesse, lest that persisting therein, they should be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let vs referre this disputation to some other booke: and now in this twelfth couple of these famous mens liues compared, let vs first begin to write of the life of him that is the elder of these two men we speake of.

A wicked spirit appeared vnto Dion and Brutus.

Dionysius the elder, after he had the gouernment of SICILIA in his hands, he maried the daughter of Hermocrates, a citizen of SYRACVSA. But yet not being throughly setled in his tyrannie, the SYRACVSANS did rebell against him, and did so cruelly & abominably handle the body of his wife, that she willingly poisoned her selfe. So, after he had established himselfe in his gouernment with more suretie then before, he maried againe two other wiues together, the one a stranger of the citie of LOCRES, called Doride: and the other of the country it selfe, called Aristomachè, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefest man of all SYRACVSA, and that had been companion with Dionysius, the first time he was chosen Generall. It was said that Dionysius maried them both in one day, and that they could neuer tell which of them he knew first: but otherwise, that he made as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly sate together with him at his table, and did either of them lie with him by turnes, though the SYRACVSANS would haue their owne countriwoman preferred before the stranger. Howbeit, the strange woman had this good happe, to bring forth Dionysius his eldest sonne, which was a good countenance to defend her, being a forriner. Aristomachè in contrary manner, continued a long time with Dionysius without fruit of her wombe, although he was very desirous to haue children by her: so that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accusing her that she had with sorceries and witchcraft, kept Aristomachè from being with child. Dion being the brother of Aristomachè, was had in great estimation at the first, for his sisters sake: but afterwards the tyrant finding him to be a wise man, he loued him then for his owne sake. Insomuch, that among many sundrie things and pleasures he did for him, he commanded his Treasurers to let him haue what money he asked of them, so they made him acquainted withall the selfe same day they gaue him any. Now, though Dion had euer before a noble mind in him by nature, yet much more did that magnanimitie increase, when Plato (by good fortune) arriued in SICILE. For his coming thither surely was no mans deuice, (as I take it) but the very prouidence of some god: who (bringing farre off the first beginning and foundation of the liberty of the SYRACVSANS and to ouerthrow the tyrannicall state) sent Plato out of ITALIE vnto the citie of SYRACVSA, and brought him acquainted with Dion, who was but a yong man at that time, but yet had an apter wit to learne, and readier goodwill to follow vertue, then any yong man else that followed Plato; as Plato himselfe writeth, and his owne doings also do witnesse. For Dion hauing from a child beene brought vp with humble conditions vnder a tyrant, and acquainted with a seruile timorous life, with a proud and insolent reigne, with all vanity and curiositie, as placing chiefe felicitie in couetousnesse: neuertheless, after he had felt the sweet reasōs of Philosophy, teaching the right way to vertue, his hart was inflamed straight with an earnest desire to follow the same. And becausse he foūd that he was so easily perswaded to loue vertue and honesty, he simply thinking (being of an honest plain nature) that the selfe same perswasions would moue a like affection in Dionysius; obtained of Dionysius, that being at leisure, he was contented to see Plato, and to speake with him. When Plato came to Dionysius, all their talke in maner was of vertue, & they chiefly reasoned, what was fortitude: where Plato proued that tyrants were no valiant men. From thence passing farther into iustice, he told him, that the life of iust men was happie; and contrarily, the life of vniust men, vnfortunate. Thus the tyrant Dionysius perceiuing he was ouercome, durst no more abide him, and was angry to see the standers by make such estimation of Plato, and that they had such delight to heare him speake. At length he angrily asked him, What busines he had to do there? Plato answered him, he came to seeke a good man, Dionysius then replied againe; What, in Gods name, by thy speech thē it seemeth thou hast found none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionysius anger wold proceed no further, & therfore at Platoes earnest request, he sent him away in a galley with three bankes of oares, the which Pollis a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine caried backe againe into GREECE. Howbeit, Dionysius secretly requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as euer he wold do him pleasure: if not, yet that he would sell him for a slaue, howsoeuer he did: for, said he, he shall be nothing the worse for that; because, if he be a iust man, he shall be as happie to be a slaue, as a freeman. Thus (as it is reported) this Pollis caried Plato into the Ile of ÆGINA, & there sold him. For the EGINETES hauing war at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a decree, that all the ATHENIANS that were taken in their Ile, shold be sold. This notwithstāding, Dionysius refused not to honor & trust Dion, as much as euer he did before, & did also send him Ambassador in matters of great weight: as when he sent him vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaued himselfe so well, that he wan great reputation by his iourney: and the tyrant could well away with his plain speech. For no man but he, durst say their minds so boldly vnto him, to speake what he thought good: as on a time he reproued him for Gelon. One day when they mocked Gelons gouernment before the tyrants face, and that Dionysius himself said (finely descanting on his name, which signifieth laughter) that he was euen the very laughing stocke it selfe of SICILE, the Courtiers made as though they liked this encounter and interpretation of laughter passing well: but Dion not being well pleased withall, said vnto him: For his sake men trusted thee, wherby thou camest to be tyrant: but for thine owne sake they will neuer trust any man: for (to say truly) Gelon shewed by his gouernment, that it was as goodly a thing as could be, to see a city gouerned by an absolute Prince: but Dionysius by his gouernment on the other side, made it appeare as detestable a thing. This Dionysius had by his LOCRIAN wife, three children; and by Aristomachè, foure: of the which, two were daughters, the one called Sophrosynè, and the other Aretè. Of them, Dionysius eldest son maried Sophrosyné, and Areté was maried vnto his brother Thearides: after whose death Dion maried her, being his Neece. Now when Dionysius her father fell sicke, not likely to escape, Dion would haue spoken with him for his children he had by his sister Aristomaché. Howbeit the Phisitians about him, to curry fauor with the next heire and successor of the tyranny, would neuer let him haue any time or oportunitie to speake with him. For (as Timæus writeth) they gaue Dionysius the elder (as he had cōmanded them) a strong opiat drinke to cast him in a sleepe, and so therby they took from him all his senses, and ioyned death with his sleepe. Notwithstanding in the first counsell and assembly holden by his friends, to consult about the state and affaires of the yonger Dionysius, Dion moued matter so necessarie and profitable for that present time, that by his wisedome he shewed they were all but children, and by his bold and franke speech made them know, that they were but slaues of the tyranny: because they beastly and cowardly gaue such counsell and aduice, as might best please and feed the young tyrants humour. But, he made them most to wonder at him, when they fearing aboue all other things, the danger Dionysius state was in, by reason of CARTHAGE, he did promise them, that if Dionysius would haue peace, he would then go forthwith into AFRICKE, and finde the meanes honourably to quench the warres: or, if otherwise he better liked of warre, that he would furnish him at his owne proper costs and charges, fifty gallies ready to rowe. Dionysius wondred greatly at the noble mind of Dion, and thanked him much for the goodwill he bare vnto him, touching his estate. But all men else taking Diens noble offer to be a reproach of their auarice; and his credit and authority, an impaire vnto theirs: they presently vpon this liberall offer tooke occasion to accuse him, not sparing any reprochfull words against him, to moue Dionysius to be offended with him. For they complained of him, and said, that he cunningly practised to possesse the tyranny, making him-

ſelfe ſtrong by ſea, going about by his gallies to make the tyranny fall into the hands of the children of Ariſtomache his ſiſter. But the chiefeſt cauſe of al why they did malice and hate him, was his ſtrange manner of life, that he neither would keepe company with them, nor liue after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in fauour and friendſhip with this young ill-brought-up tyrant, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vaine pleaſures, ſtudied for no other thing, but to entertaine him in loue matters, and other vaine exerciſes, as to riot and banquet, to keepe light women companie, and all ſuch other vile vicious paſtimes and recreations: by the which the tyranny became like iron ſoftned by fire, and ſeemed to be very pleaſant vnto the ſubiects, becauſe the ouer-great maieſtie and ſeuerity therof was ſomwhat milder, not ſo much by the bounty and goodneſſe, as by the folly and retchleſneſſe of the Lord. Thus, this little care and regard increaſing more and more, ſtill winning way with the yong tyrant, did at length melt and breake aſunder thoſe ſtrong Diamond chaines, with the which Dionyſius the elder made his boaſt that he left his Monarchie and tyranny chained to his ſon. For ſometime he would be three daies together without intermiſſion, ſtill bar queting and being drunke: and all that time his Court gates were kept ſhut vnto graue and wiſe men, and for all honeſt matters; & was then ful of drunkards, of common playes, dancings, masks, and mummeries, & ful of al ſuch trumperie and diſſolute paſtimes. And therefore Dion vndoubtedly was much enuied of them, becauſe he gaue himſelfe to no ſport and pleaſure: whereupon they accuſed him, and miſnamed his vertues, vices, being ſomewhat to be reſembled vnto them; as in calling his grauitie, pride; his plainneſſe and boldneſſe in his oration, obſtinacie; if he did perſwade them, that he accuſed them; and becauſe he would not make one in their fond paſtimes, that therfore he deſpiſed them. For, to ſay truly, his maners by nature had a certaine haughtineſſe of mind and ſeueritie, and he was a ſowre man to be acquainted with: wherby his company was not only troubleſome, but alſo vnpleaſant to this yonger Dionyſius, whoſe eares were ſo fine, that they could not away to heare any other thing but flatterie. And furthermore, diuers of his very friends & familiars (that did like and commend his plaine manner of ſpeech and noble mind) did yet reproue his ſterneneſſe, and auſtere conuerſation with men: for it ſeemed vnto them, that he ſpake too roughly, & dealt ouer hardly with them that had to do with him, and more then became a ciuil or courteous man. And for proofe hereof, Plato himſelfe ſometime wrote vnto him (as if he had propheſied what ſhould happen) that he ſhould beware of obſtinacie, the companion of ſolitarineſſe, that bringeth a man in the end to be forſaken of euery one. This notwithſtanding, they did more reuerence him at that time, then any man elſe, becauſe of the ſtate and gouernment, and for that they thought him the onely man that could beſt prouide for the ſafety and quietneſſe of the tyranny, the which ſtood then in tickle ſtate. Now Dion knew wel enough, that he was not ſo well taken and eſteemed through the goodwill of the tyrant, as againſt his will, and for the neceſſitie of the ſtate and time. So Dion ſuppoſing the ignorance, and want of knowledge in Dionyſius was the cauſe, he deuiſed to put him into ſome honeſt trade or exerciſe, & to teach him the liberal ſciences, to frame him to a ciuill life, that thenceforth he ſhould no more be afraid of vertue, and ſhould alſo take pleaſure & delight in honeſt things. For Dionyſius of his owne nature, was none of the worſt ſort of tyrants, but his father fearing that if he came once to haue a feeling and conceit of himſelfe, or that he companied with wiſe & learned men, he would go neare to enter into practiſe, & put him out of his ſeate; he euer kept him locked vp in a chamber, and would ſuffer no man to ſpeake with him. Then the yonger Dionyſius, hauing nothing elſe to do, gaue himſelf to make litle chariots, candleſticks, chaires, ſtooles, and tables of wood: for his father Dionyſius was ſo feareful and miſtruſtfull of euery body, that he wold ſuffer no man with a paire of Barbers ſizers to poule the haire of his head, but cauſed an image-maker of earth to come vnto him, and with a hote burning cole to burne his goodly buſh of haire round about. No man came into his chamber where he was with a gowne on his backe, no not his owne brother nor ſon, but he was driuen (before he could come in) to put off his gowne, and the guard of his chamber to ſtrip him naked, whatſoeuer he was: and then they gaue him another gowne to caſt vpon him, but not his owne. One day his brother Leptines going about to deſcribe vnto him the ſituation of ſome place, he tooke a halbard from one of the guard, and with the point thereof beganne to drawe out a plot of the ſame vpon the ground. Dionyſius was terribly offended with him, and did put the ſouldier to death that gaue him his halbard. He ſaid, he was affraid of his friends, yea and of the wiſeſt of them; becauſe he knew that they deſired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to command

mand, then to obey. He ſlue one of his Captaines called Marſias (whom he had preferred and had giuen him charge of men) becauſe he dreamed, that he killed him: ſaying, that he dreamed of this in the night, becauſe that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Dionyſius that was ſo timorous, and whoſe mind through fearefulneſſe was ſtill miſerably occupied, was notwithſtanding maruellouſly offended with Plato, becauſe he did not iudge him to be the nobleſt and valianteſt man aliue. Dion therefore ſeeing (as we haue ſaid) the yonger Dionyſius cleane marred, and in manner caſt away for lacke of good education, perſwaded him the beſt he could to giue himſelfe vnto ſtudie, and by the greateſt intreaty he could poſſibly make, to pray the Prince of all Philoſophers to come into SICILE. And then, when through his intreaty he were come, that he would refer himſelfe wholly vnto him, to the end that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby, (the beſt example that can be poſſible; and by whom the whole world is ruled and gouerned, which otherwiſe were out of all order and confuſed,) he ſhould firſt obtaine great happineſſe to himſelfe, & conſequently vnto all his citizens; who euer after through the temperance & iuſtice of a father, wold with good will do theſe things, which they then vnwillingly did for the feare of a Lord. And in doing this; from a tyrant he ſhould come to be a king: for, the chaines of a Diamond to keepe a Realme in ſafety, were not force and feare, as his father Dionyſius held opinion: neither the great multitude of yong ſoldiers, nor the guard of 10000 barbarous people: but in cõtrary maner, that they were the loue & good will of their ſubiects) which the Prince obtaineth through vertue and iuſtice. the which chaines though they be ſlacker then the other that are ſo hard and ſtiffe, yet are they ſtronger, & will laſt longer time, to keepe a realme and kingdome in ſafety. And furthermore, the Prince (ſaid he) is not deſirous of honor, neither is a man that deſerueth greatly to be praiſed & commended, that only ſtudieth to weare ſumptuous apparel, & that glorieth to ſee his Court richly furniſhed, and himſelfe curiouſly ſerued: and in the meane time doth not frame himſelfe to ſpeake better, to be wiſer; and to carry a greater maieſty then any other meane or common perſon; not eſteeming to adorne and beautifie the princely pallace of his mind, as becometh the royall Maieſtie of a king. Dion oftentimes rehearſing theſe exhortations vnto Dionyſius, and otherwhile enterlacing betweene, ſome reaſons he had learned of Plato, he graffed in him a wonderfull and (as it were) a vehement deſire to haue Plato in his company, and to learne of him. So, ſundry letters came frõ Dionyſius vnto ATHENS, diuers requeſts from Dion, & great intreatie made by certain Pythagorian Philoſophers, that praied & perſwaded Plato to come into SICILE, to bridle ỹ light diſpoſition of this yong man, by his graue & wiſe inſtructions: who without regard of reaſon, led a diſſolute and licentious life. Therfore Plato (as himſelfe reporteth) bluſhing to himſelfe, and fearing leſt he ſhold giue men cauſe to think, that it was but the opinion men had of him, & that of himſelfe he was vnwilling to do any worthy act: and further, hoping that doing good but vnto one man alone, who was the only guide of all the reſt, he ſhold (as it were) recouer all SICILE from her corruption and ſickneſſe, he performed their requeſts that ſent vnto him. But Dions enemies fearing the change and alteration of Dionyſius, they perſwaded him to call Philiſtus the Hiſtoriographer home againe frõ baniſhment, who was a learned man, & had bin brought vp & acquainted with the tyrants faction: to the end he ſhold ſerue as a counter-poiſe, to withſtand Plato and his Philoſophy: for this Philiſtus, frõ the firſt time that the tyranny began to be eſtabliſhed, did ſhew himſelfe very willing & cofnormable to the ſtabliſhment therof, and had of long time kept the caſtle: & the voice went, that he kept the mother of Dionyſius the elder, & as it was ſuppoſed, not altogether without ỹ tyrants knowledge. But afterwards, Leptines hauing had two daughters by one woman, whom he enticed to folly, being another mans wife, he maried one of theſe his daughters vnto Philiſtus, and made not Dionyſius priuie to it before. The tyrant therewith was ſo offended, that he put Leptines woman in priſon faſt locked vp, and draue Philiſtus out of SICILE. He being baniſhed thus, repaired vnto ſome of his friends that dwelt about the Adriaticke ſea, where it ſeemeth, he wrote the moſt part of all his hiſtorie, being then at good leaſure. For he was not called home againe during the life of Dionyſius the elder: but after his death, the malice the Courtiers bare vnto Dion, cauſed them to procure Philiſtus calling home againe (as we haue told you) as the man they thought would ſticke ſtoutly in defence of the tyranny. So, Philiſtus no ſooner returned, but he ſtoutly began to defend the tyranny: and others in contrary manner, deuiſed accuſations to the tyrant againſt Dion, accuſing him that he had practiſed with Theodotes & Heraclides, to ouerthrow the tyranny of Dionyſius. For Dion (in my opinion) hoped by Platoes coming to bridle and leſſen a little the ouer-licentious and imperious tyranny of Dionyſius, and thereby to frame Dionyſius a wiſe and righteous gouernour. But on the other ſide, if he ſaw he would not follow his counſell, and that he yeelded not to his wiſe inſtructions, he then determined to put him downe, and to bring the gouernment of the cõmonwealth into the hands of the SYRACVSANS: not that he allowed of Democratia, (to wit, where the people gouerne) but yet certainly thinking that Democratia was much better then the tyranny, when they could not come vnto Ariſtocratia, (to wit, the gouernmẽt of a few of the Nobility.) Now things being in this ſtate, Plato arriued in SICILE, where he was maruellouſly receiued & honored by Dionyſius. For when he landed on the ſhore, leauing his gally that brought him, there was ready for him one of the kings rich and ſumptuous chariots, to conuey him to the caſtel: & the tyrant made ſacrifice to giue the gods thanks for his coming, as for ſome wonderfull great good hap chanced vnto his ſeigniorie. Furthermore, the wonderfull modeſty and temperance that was begun to be obſerued in feaſts and banquets, the Court cleane changed, & the great goodnes & clemency of the tyrant in al things, in miniſtring iuſtice to euery man; did put the SYRACVSANS in great good hope of change, and euery man in the Court was very deſirous to giue himſelfe to learning and Philoſophy: ſo that, (as men reported) the tyrants pallace was full of ſand & duſt, with the nũber of ſtudents that drew plattes and figures of Geometry. Shortly after Plato was arriued, by chance the time was come about to do a ſolemn ſacrifice within the caſtel, at which ſacrifice the herald (as the maner was) proclaimed aloud the ſolemne prayer accuſtomed to be done: That it would pleaſe the gods, long to preſerue the ſtate of the tyranny. Wherat, Dionyſius being hard by him, ſaid vnto him. What, wilt thou not leaue to curſe me? This word grieued Philiſtus and his companions to the hart, thinking that with time, by litle and litle, Plato wold win ſuch eſtimation and great authority with Dionyſius, that afterwards they ſhould not be able to reſiſt him: conſidering that in ſo ſhort a time as he had been with Dionyſius, he had ſo altered his mind and courage. And therefore they now began, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuſe Dion: and ſaid, that it was eaſie to be ſeene, how he charmed and inchanted Dionyſius through Platoes eloquence, to make him willing to reſigne his gouernment, becauſe he would tranſfer it to the hands of the children of his ſiſter Ariſtomachè. Others ſeemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS hauing come before into SICILIA with a great armie, both by ſea and land, they were all loſt and caſt away, and could not win the citie of SYRACVSA: and that now by one onely Sophiſter, they vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrew the Empire of Dionyſius, perſwading him to diſcharge the ten thouſand ſouldiers he had about him for his guard, to forſake the foure hundred gallies, the ten thouſand horſemen, and as many mo footmen, to go to the Academy to ſeeke an vnknown happineſſe neuer heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, reſigning his preſent happineſſe and felicity (to be a great Lord, to haue money at will, and to liue pleaſantly,) vnto Dion and his Nephew. By ſuch like accuſations and wicked tongues, Dionyſius began firſt to miſtruſt Dion, and afterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frowne vpon him. In the meane time they brought letters that Dion wrote ſecretly vnto the Gouernors of the city of CARTHAGE, wiſhing them, that when they would make peace with Dionyſius, they ſhould not talke with him vnleſſe he ſtood by; aſſuring them that he would helpe them to ſet things in quietneſſe, and that all ſhould be well again. When Dionyſius had read theſe letters with Philiſtus, and had taken his aduice and counſell what he ſhould do, as Timæus ſaid, he deceiued Dion vnder pretence of reconciliation, making as though he meant him no hurt, and ſaying that he would become friends againe with him. So he brought Dion one day to the ſea ſide vnder his caſtell, and ſhewed him theſe letters, burdening him to haue practiſed with the CARTHAGINIANS againſt him. And, as Dion went about to make him anſwer to cleare himſelf, Dionyſius would not heare him, but cauſed him to be taken vp as he was, and put into a pinnaſe, and commanded the mariners to ſet him a land vpon the coaſt of ITALY. After this was done, and that it was knowne abroade in the citie, euery man thought it a cruell part of Dionyſius: inſomuch that the tyrants pallace was in a maruellous pecke of troubles, for the great ſorow the women made for the departure of Dion. Moreouer, the citie ſelf of SYRACVSA began to look about them, looking for ſome ſodaine great change & innouation, for the tumult and vprore that wold happen by meanes of Dions baniſhment; and for the miſtruſt alſo that all men wold haue of Dionyſius. Dionyſius conſidering this, and being afraid of ſome misfortune, he gaue his friends and the women of his pallace comfortable words, telling them that he had not baniſhed him, but was contented that he ſhould abſent himſelfe for a time: being afraid, that in his ſudden angry mood he might paraduenture be compelled to do him ſome worſe turne if he remained, becauſe of his obſtinacie and ſelfe-will. Furthermore, he gaue vnto Dions friends two ſhips, to carrie as much goods, mony, and as many of Dions ſeruants as they would, and to conuey them vnto him into PELOPONNESVS. Dion was a maruellous rich man, and for the pompe of his ſeruice, and ſumptuous moueables of his houſe, they were like vnto the perſon of a tyrant. All theſe riches Dions friends brought aboord vpon thoſe ſhips, & caried them vnto him; beſides many other rich gifts which the women and his friends ſent vnto him: ſo that by meanes of his great riches, Dion was maruellouſly eſteemed among the GRECIANS; who by the riches of a baniſhed citizen, coniectured what the power of a tyranny might be. But now concerning Plato. When Dion was exiled, Dionyſius cauſed him to be lodged in his caſtle, and by this means craftily placed (vnder cloke of friendſhip) an honorable guard about him, becauſe he ſhold not returne into GREECE to ſeek Dion, to tell him of the iniurie he had done vnto him. Howbeit, Dionyſius often frequenting his company, (as a wild beaſt is made tame by companie of man) he liked his talke ſo well, that he became in loue with him, but it was a tyrannicall loue: for he would haue Plato to loue none but him, and that he ſhould eſteeme him aboue all men liuing, being ready to put the whole realme into his hands, and all his forces, ſo that he would thinke better of him then of Dion. Thus was this paſſionate affection of Dionyſius grieuous vnto Plato: for he was ſo drowned with the loue of him, as men extremely iealous of the women they loue, that in a moment he would ſodainly fall out with him, and ſtraight againe become friends, and pray him to pardon him. And to ſay truly, he had a maruellous deſire to heare Platoes Philoſophie: but on the other ſide, he reuerenced them that did diſſwade him from it, and told him, that he wold ſpoile himſelf, if he entred ouer-deeply into it. In the meane time fell out warre, and thereupon he ſent Plato againe away, promiſing him, that the next Spring he would ſend for Dion home. But he brake promiſe therein, and yet ſent him his reuenues: and praied Plato to pardon him, though he had not kept promiſe at his time appointed. For he alleadged the warre was the cauſe, and that ſo ſoone as he had ended his war, he would ſend for Dion; whom in the meane time he prayed to haue patience, and not to attempt any ſtir or alteratiõ againſt him, nor to ſpeak euil of him among the GRECIANS. This Plato ſought to bring to paſſe, and brought Dion to ſtudy Philoſophy, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS. Dion lay in the city of ATHENS with one Calippus, whom he had known of long time; howbeit, he bought him a houſe in the country, to lie there ſometime for his pleaſure; the which he gaue afterwards (at his returne into SICILE) vnto Speuſippus that kept him company, and was continually with him more then with any other friend he had in ATHENS, through Platoes counſell: who to ſoften & recreate Dions manners, gaue him the company of ſome pleaſant conceited man, knowing that this Speuſippus could modeſtly obſerue time & place to be pleaſant & mery; for which reſpect, Timon in his ſatyricall ieaſts, calleth Speuſippus, A good ieaſter. Now Plato himſelfe hauing vndertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dancing of yong children, Dion tooke the paines to teach: and exerciſe them; and moreouer, himſelfe was at the whole charge of theſe playes, Plato ſuffering him to beſtow that liberality and courteſie vpon the ATHENIANS: the which wan Dion a great deale more good wil, then Plato honor. Dion kept not ſtil at ATHENS, but went alſo to ſee the other good cities of GREECE, paſſing his time away. He being at common feaſts and aſſemblies with the chiefeſt men, and beſt learned in matters of ſtate and gouernment, and neuer ſhewing any light parts, nor ſigne of tyrannicall pride in his manner of life, nor of a man that had been brought vp with all pompe and pleaſure, but like a graue vertuous man, and well ſtudied in Philoſophy, whereby he grew to be generally beloued and eſteemed of all men: the city granted him publike honours, and ſent him degrees of his glory, made in their councels and aſſemblies. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS made him a SPARTAN & Burgeſſe of the city, not paſſing for Dionyſius diſpleaſure, though at that time he had giuen them great aide, in the warre they made againſt the THEBANS. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Pæodorus MEGARIAN, to come and ſee him at his houſe, and Dion went thither. This Pæodorus was a maruellous great rich man, and therefore Dion ſeeing a great number of people ſtanding at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and ſpeake with him, he had ſuch great buſines: he turned vnto his friends that did accompany him, who were angry they made him tarie ſo long at the gate, and ſaid vnto them: What cauſe haue we to thinke euill of him, ſith we did the like when we were at SYRACVSA? But Dionyſius being incenſed with enuie againſt him, and

fearing the goodwill the GRECIANS bare him, he kept backe his reuenue, and would no more send it him; and seized all the goods, the which he gaue to his receiuers to keepe. Furthermore, because he would cleare himself of the infamie he had gotten amongst the Philosophers for Platoes sake, he sent for diuers wise and learned men, and vainly coueting to excell them all in wisedome, he was driuen improperly, and out of time, to alledge many wise sayings he had learned of Plato. Thereupon he began againe to wish for him, and to condemne himselfe, for that he had no wit to vse him well when he had him at his commandement, and that he had not heard him so much as he should haue done: and like a tyrant as he was, madly caried away with light desires, and easily changing mind from time to time, a sodaine vehement desire tooke him in the head, to haue Plato againe. So he sought all the meanes and waies he could deuise, to pray Archytas the Pythagorean Philosopher, to tell him that he might boldly come; and to be his surety vnto him for that he would promise him: for first of all, they were acquainted together by his meanes. Therfore Archytas sent thither Archidamus the Philosopher. Dionysius also sent certaine gallies, and some of his friends thither, to pray Plato to come to him, and he himselfe wrote specially and plainly, that it should not go well with Dion if Plato came not into SICILE: but if he would be perswaded to come, that then he would do what he would haue him. Many letters and requests came vnto Dion from his wife and sister, insomuch as Dion so vsed the matter, that Plato obeyed Dionysius without making any excuse at all. So Plato writeth himselfe, that he was driuen to come againe the third time into the streight of SICILE;

To trie, if once he could Charybdis dangers passe.

Now Plato being arriued in SICILE, he made Dionysius a great ioyfull man, and filled all SICILE, againe with great good hope: for they were all very desirous, and did what they could, to make Plato ouercome Philistus and the tyrannie with his Philosophie. The women of Dionysius Court did entertaine Plato the best they could: but aboue all, Dionysius seemed to haue a maruellous trust and affiance in him, & more then in any other of all his friends. For he suffered Plato to come to him without searching of him, and oftentimes offered to giue him a great summe of money: but Plato would take none of it. Therefore Aristippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrants Court in SICILE, said, that Dionysius bestowed his liberality surely: for, to vs that aske much, he giueth little, and much vnto Plato, that requireth nothing. After Dionysius had giuen Plato his welcome, he beganne to moue him againe of Dion. Dionysius on the other side, at the first did vse him with fine delayes, but afterwards he shewed himselfe angry indeed, and at length fell out with Plato, but yet so couertly that others saw it not: for Dionysius dissembled that; but otherwise in all other things he did him as much honour as he could deuise, practising thereby to make him to forsake Dions friendship. Now Plato found him at the first, that there was no trust to be giuen to his words, and that all were but lies and deuices he either said or did: howbeit, he kept it to himselfe, and euer patiently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he beleeued him. They two thus finely dissembling with each other, thinking to deceiue all men, and that none should vnderstand their secrets: Helycon CYZICENIAN, one of Platoes friends, did prognosticate the eclipse of the Sunne. The same falling out as he had prognosticated, the tyrant esteemed maruellously of him, and gaue him a siluer talent for his labour. Then Aristippus sporting with other Philosophers, said, he could tell them of a stranger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognosticate (said he) that Plato and Dionysius will be enemies ere it be long. In the end it came to passe, that Dionysius made port-sale of all Dions goods, and kept the money to himselfe, and lodged Plato (that before lay in the next court to his pallace) among the souldiers of his guard, whom he knew maliced him of long time, and sought to kill him, because he did perswade Dionysius to leaue his tyrannie, and to liue without his guard. Plato being in this instant danger, Archytas sent Ambassadours forthwith vnto Dionysius, in a galley of thirty ores, to demaund Plato againe: declaring that Plato came againe to SYRACVSA vpon his word and caution. Dionysius to excuse himselfe, and to shew that he was not angry with him, at his departure from him, he made him all the great cheare and feasts he could, and so sent him home with great shewes of good will. One day among the rest, he said vnto Plato: I am afraid Plato (said he) that thou wilt speake euill of me when thou art among thy friends and companions in the Academie. Then Plato smiling, answered him againe: The gods forbid, that they should haue such scarcity of matter in the Academie, as that they must needs talke of thee. Thus was Platoes returne, (as it is reported) although that that which he himſelfe writeth, agreeth not much with this report. Theſe things went to Dions heart, ſo that ſhortly after he ſhewed himſelfe an open enemie vnto Dionyſius, but ſpecially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plato vnder couert words ſent Dionyſius word of it by his letters: and thus it was. After Dion was exiled, Dionyſius returning Plato backe againe, he willed him ſecretly to feele Dions mind, whether he would not be angry that his wife ſhould be married to another man; becauſe there ranne a rumour abroad, (whether it were true, or inuented by Dions enemies) that he liked not his mariage, and could not liue quietly with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at ATHENS, and had told Dion of all things, he wrote a letter vnto Dionyſius the tyrant, and did ſet all other things downe ſo plainly, that euery man might vnderſtand him; but this one thing onely ſo darkly, that he alone and none other could vnderſtand him, but he to whom he had written: declaring vnto him, that he had ſpoken with Dion about the matter he woted of, and that he did let him vnderſtand he would be maruellous angrie if Dionyſius did it. So at that time, becauſe there was great hope of reconciliation betweene them, the tyrant did nothing lately touching his ſiſter, but ſuffered her ſtill to remaine with Dions ſonne. But when they were ſo farre out, that there was no more hope to returne into fauour againe, and that he had alſo ſent home Plato in diſgrace and diſpleaſure, then he maried his ſiſter Aretè (Dions wife) againſt her will, vnto one of his friends called Timocrates, not following therein his fathers iuſtice and lenity. For Polyxenus that had maried his fathers ſiſter Theſta, being alſo become his enemie, fled out of SICILE. Dionyſius the elder ſent for his ſiſter Theſta, and tooke her vp very ſharply, for that ſhe knowing her husband would flie, did not come and tell him of it. Theſta nobly anſwered him againe, and neuer was afraid nor abaſhed: Why, Dionyſius, doeſt thou thinke me a woman ſo faint-hearted and beaſtly, that if I had knowne my husband would haue gone his way and left me, I would not haue taken ſea with him, and both haue runne one fortune together? Truly, I knew not of his departure till he was gone: for it had been more for mine honour, to haue been called the wife of the baniſhed Polyxenus, then the ſiſter of thee a tyrant. Dionyſius maruelled to heare his ſiſter ſpeake thus boldly, and the SYRACVSANS wondred at her noble courage: inſomuch, that when the tyranny was vtterly deſtroyed, they did not refuſe to do her all the honor they could deuiſe, as vnto a Queene. And when ſhe was dead alſo, all the citizens of SYRACVSA by a common decree, did accompany her body at her buriall. This litle digreſſion from our hiſtory, is not altogether vnprofitable. But now again to our matter. Dion from thenceforth diſpoſed himſelf altogether vnto war, againſt Platoes counſell and aduice: who did his beſt endeuour to perſwade him from it, both for the reſpect of Dionyſius good entertainment he had giuen him, as alſo for that Dion was of great years. Howbeit, on the other ſide, Speuſippus and his other friends did prouoke him vnto it, and perſwaded him to deliuer SICILE from the ſlauery and bondage of the tyrant, the which held vp her hands vnto him, and would receiue him with great loue and goodwill. For whileſt Plato lay at SYRACVSA, Speuſippus keeping the citizens cõpany more then Plato did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the firſt, they were afraid to open themſelues vnto him, and frankly to ſpeake what they thought, miſtruſting he was a ſpie vnto the tyrant, ſent amongſt them to feele their minds: but within ſhort time they began to truſt him, and were all of one mind; for they praied & perſwaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwiſe for bringing of ſhips, ſouldiers, nor horſes with him, but only to hire a ſhip, & to lend the SICILIANS his body and name againſt Dionyſius. Speuſippus reporting theſe newes vnto Dion, did put him in good heart againe: wherupon he began ſecretly to leauy men by other mens meanes, to hide his purpoſe and intent. The Philoſophers do ſet forward Dions wars; many citizens dealing in the affaires of the cõmonwealth, did aid him, & diuers of them alſo that only gaue their minds to the ſtudie of Philoſophy: and among them, Eudemus CYPRIAN (on whoſe death Ariſtotle wrote his Dialogue of the ſoule) and Timonides LEVCADIAN went with him. Furthermore, there ioyned alſo with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothſayer, and that had bin his companion in ſtudy in the Academie. Now, of all them whom the tyrant had baniſhed, (which were no leſſe then a thouſand perſons) there were but only fiue and twenty that durſt accompany him in this war: for all the other were ſuch daſtards, that they forſooke him, and durſt not go with him. The place where they appointed to meet, was the Ile of ZACINTH, where they leauied all their ſouldiers, that were not aboue eight hundred in all; but all of them braue ſouldiers and valiant men, and excellently well trained in warres: and to conclude, ſuch luſtie men, as wold encourage al the army Dion hoped of at his arriuall in SICILE, to fight like valiant men with them. These hired ſouldiers, the firſt time that they vnderſtood it was to go into Sicile, to make warre with Dionyſius, they were amazed at the firſt, and miſliked the iourney, becauſe it was vndertaken rather of malice and ſpight that Dion had to be reuenged, then otherwiſe of any good cauſe or quarrell; who hauing no better hope, tooke vpon him deſperate and impoſſible enterpriſes. Therfore the ſouldiers were offended with their Captains that had preſſed them, becauſe they had not told them of this warre before. But, after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies haue euill foundations, and are ſubiect vnto ruine; and that he led them not into Sicile ſo much for ſouldiers, as he did to make them Captaines of the Syracvsans and the other Sicilians, who of long time deſired nothing more then occaſion to riſe: and, when after him alſo Alcimenes (a companion with him in this warre, and the chiefeſt man of all the Achaians, both for nobility and eſtimation) did ſpeake vnto them in like maner; then they were all contented to go whither they would leade them. It was then in the heate of Sommer, and the wind blew, called the Grecian wind, the Moone being at the full; and Dion hauing prepared to make a ſumptuous ſacrifice vnto the god Apollo, he led al his men armed with white corſlets in proceſſion into the temple: and after the ſacrifice done, he made them a feaſt in the parke or ſhew-place of the Zacinthians. There the tables were laid, and the ſouldiers wondered to ſee the great ſtate and magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and ſiluer, & ſuch other furniture & preparation as paſſed a priuate mans wealth: then they thought with themſelues, that a man being ſo old, and Lord of ſo great a good, would not attempt things of ſuch danger, without good ground, and great aſſurance of his friends aid and help. But, after his oblations of wine, & common praiers made to the gods at feaſts, ſodainly the Moone eclipſed. Dion thought it not ſtrange to ſee an eclipſe, conſidering the reuolutions of the eclipſes, and knowing wery well it is a ſhadow that falleth vpon the body of the Moone, becauſe of the direct interpoſition of the earth betwixt her & the Sun. But becauſe the ſoldiers that were afraid & aſtonied withal, ſtood in need of ſome comfort & encouragement, Miltas the Soothſayer ſtanding vp in the midſt among thē, ſaid vnto them: My fellow ſoldiers, be of good cheare, & aſſure your ſelues that we ſhal proſper: for God doth foreſhew vs by this ſight we ſee, that ſome one of the chiefeſt things now in higheſt place & dignity ſhalbe eclipſed. And at this preſent time, what thing carieth greater glory and fame, then the tyrāny of Dionyſius? Therfore you muſt think, that ſo ſoone as you arriue in Sicile, your ſelues ſhal put out his light & glory. This interpretatiō of the eclipſe of the Moone, did Miltas the ſoothſayer make, before all the whole company. But touching the ſwarme of Bees that lighted on the poope of Dions ſhip, he told him and his friends priuatly: That he was afraid his acts (which ſhould fall out famous and glorious) ſhould laſt but a while, and flouriſhing a few dayes, would ſtraight conſume away. It is reported alſo, that Dionyſius in like manner had many ſtrange ſignes and wonderfull tokens from aboue. Among others, there came an Eagle, that ſnatched a partiſan out of a ſoldiers hand, and caried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the ſea. The ſea alſo beating againſt the walles of the caſtle, was as ſweete to drinke a whole day together, as any conduit or running water: as thoſe that taſted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a Sow farrowed Pigges that lacked no part of their body but onely their eares. This the Soothſayers ſaid, did ſignifie rebellion and diſobedience of his ſubiects: and that the Citizens would no more heare him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told alſo, that the ſweetneſſe of the ſalt water prognoſticated to the Syracvsans change of cruell and euill time, vnto good and ciuill gouernment: and that the Eagle, Iupiters miniſter; and the partiſan, the marke and token of the kingdome and empire; did betoken, that Iupiter (the chiefe of all the gods) had determined to deſtroy and put downe the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So, Dions ſouldiers were embarked into two great ſhips of burden, and another third ſhip that was not very great, and two pinnaces with thirty oares, followed them, For their armour and weapon, beſide thoſe the ſoldiers had, he caried two thouſand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of darts, of pikes, and plenty of victuals: that they ſhould lack nothing all the time they were vpon the ſea, conſidering that their iourney ſtood altogether at the courteſie of the winds & ſea; and for that they were affraid to land, vnderſtanding that Philiſtus rode at anker in the coaſt of Apvolia, with a fleete of ſhippes that lay in waite for their coming. So hauing a pleaſant gale of wind, they ſailed the ſpace of twelue dayes together, and the thirteenth day they came to the foreland of Sicile called Pachynus. There the Pylot thought it beſt they ſhould land preſently: for if they willingly looffed into the ſea, and loſt that point, they were ſure they ſhould loſe alſo many nights nights and daies in vaine in the midſt of the ſea, being then Sommer time, and the wind at the South. But Dion being affraid to land ſo neare his enemies, he was deſirous to go farther, and ſo paſt by the foreland of PACHYNVS. Then the North wind roſe ſo bigg and great, that with great violence it draue back their ſhips from the coaſts of SICILE. Furthermore, lightning and thunder mingled withall, (becauſe it was at that time when the ſtarre Arcturus beginneth to ſhew) it made ſo terrible a tempeſt, and powred down ſuch a ſore ſhower of raine vpon them, that all the mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whither the wind would driue them, til that ſuddenly they ſaw the ſtorm had caſt them vpon the Ile of CERCINA, (which is on the coaſt of LYBIA) & ſpecially where it is moſt dangerous to arriue for the rocks; for their ſhips were like to haue run vpon them, and to haue made ſhipwracke. But with much ado they bare off the ſhips with their great long poles, and wandred vp and downe the ſea, not knowing whither they went vntill the ſtorme ceaſſed. Then they met a ſhippe, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the mariners cal, The heads of the great Syrte. Thus they wandring vp and downe, being maruellous angry that the ſea was calme, there roſe a little South wind from the land, although they leaſt looked for any ſuch wind at that time, and litle thinking it would ſo haue changed: but ſeeing the wind riſe bigger and bigger, they packed on all the ſailes they had, and making their prayers vnto the gods, they croſſed the ſea, and ſailed from the coaſt of LYBIA, directly vnto SICILE, and had the wind ſo luckie, that at the fifth day they were neare vnto a litle village of SICILE, called MINOA, the which was ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS. Synalus CARTHAGINIAN, being at that time Captaine and gouernour of the towne of MINOA, and Dions friend, was there by chance at this preſent, who being ignorant of his enterpriſe and coming, did what he could to keepe Dions ſouldiers from landing. But they not withſtanding ſodainly leapt on land armed, but ſlue no man: for Dion had commanded them the contrary, for the freindſhip he bare the Captaine: and they following the townſmen hard that fled before them, entred the towne hand ouer head amongſt them, and ſo wan the market place. When both the Captaines met, and that they had ſpoken together, Dion deliuered the towne into Synalus hands againe, without any hurt or violence offered him. Synalus on the other ſide, did endeuour himſelfe all he could to make much of the ſouldiers, and holpe Dion to prouide him of all things neceſſary. But this did moſt of all encourage the ſoldiers, becauſe Dionyſius at their arriuall, was not then in SICILE: for it chanced ſo, that not many daies before he went into ITALY with foureſcore ſaile. Therefore when Dion willed them to remaine there a few daies to refreſh themſelues, becauſe they had bin ſo ſore ſea-beaten a long time together, they themſelues wold not, they were ſo glad to imbrace the occaſion offered them, and prayed Dion to leade them forthwith to SYRACVSA. Dion leauing all his ſuperfluous armor and prouiſion in the hands of Synalus, and praying him to ſend them to him when time ſerued, he tooke his way towards SYRACVSA. So by the way, two hundred horſemen of the ARGENTINES, which dwell in that part called ECNOMVS, came firſt to ioyne with him, and after them, the GELOIANS. The rumour of their coming ran ſtraight to SYRACVSA: thereupon Timocrates that had maried Areté, Dions wife, and Dionyſius the fathers ſiſter, and to whom Dionyſius the yonger had left the charge and gouernment of all his men and friends in the citie: he preſently diſpatched a poſt with letters, to aduertiſe Dionyſius of Dions cõming. He himſelf alſo in the meane time had taken ſuch order, that there roſe no tumult nor mutinie in the city, though they all of them lacked no goodwil to rebel: but becauſe they were vncertaine whether this rumor were true or falſe, (being afraid) euery man was quiet. Now there chanced a ſtrange misfortune vnto the meſſenger which caried the letters vnto Dionyſius. For after he had paſſed the ſtraight, and that he was arriued in the citie of RHEGIO of ITALIE ſide, making haſte to come to the city of CAVLONIA, where Dionyſius was, he met by the way one of his acquaintance that caried a mutton but newly ſacrificed. This good fellow gaue him a peece of it, and the meſſenger ſpurred away withal the ſpeed he could poſſible: but when he had ridden the moſt part of the night, he was ſo wearie and drowſie for lacke of ſleepe, that he was driuen to lye downe: ſo he lay downe vpon the ground in a wood hard by the high way. The ſauour of this fleſh brought a Wolfe to him that caried away the fleſh and the portmantle it was wrapt in, and in the which alſo were his letters of aduertiſement, which he carried vnto Dionyſius. When he awoke out of his ſleepe, and ſaw that his portmantle was gone, he enquired for it, and went wandring vp and downe a long time to ſeeke it: howbeit, all in vaine, for he could neuer find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to go to the tyrant without his letters, but rather to flie into ſome vnknowne place, where no body knew him. Thus ouerlate receiued Dionyſius aduertiſement by others of this war, which Dion made in SICILE. In the meane time, the CAMARINIANS came & ioyned with Dions army, in the high-way towards SYRACVSA: and ſtill there came vnto him alſo a great number of the SYRACVSANS that were vp in armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other ſide, certaine CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the caſtle of EPIPOLES with Timocrates, of purpoſe to keepe it; vpon a falſe rumour Dion gaue out (and which came vnto them) that he would firſt goe againſt their townes: they forſooke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their owne goods. Dion vnderſtanding that, being lodged with his army in a place called MACRÆ, he preſently remoued his camp, being darke night, and marched forward till he came vnto the riuer of Anapus, which is not from the city aboue ten furlongs off: & there ſtaying a while, he ſacrificed vnto the riuer, and made his prayer, and worſhipped the riſing of the Sunne. At the ſelfe ſame inſtant alſo, the Soothſayers came and told him, that the gods did promiſe him aſſured victorie. And the ſouldiers alſo ſeeing Dion weare a garland of flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremonie of the ſacrifice, all of them with one ſelfe goodwill tooke euery man one of them, (being no leſſe then fiue thouſand men that were gathered together by the way, and but ſlenderly armed with ſuch things as came firſt to hand; howbeit, ſupplying with goodwill their want of better furniture and armor:) and when Dion commanded them to march, for ioy they ranne, and encouraged one another with great cries, to ſhew themſelues valiant for recouery of their libertie. Now for them that were within the citie ſelfe of SYRACVSA, the Noblemen and chiefe Citizens went to receiue them at the gates, in their beſt gownes. The common people on the other ſide, ran and ſet vpon them that tooke part with the tyrant, and ſpoiled them that were called the PROSAGOGIDES (as much to ſay, The common Promooters of men) the deteſtableſt villaines, hatefull to the gods and men: for they like Sycophants and buſie tale-bearers, would iet vp and downe the city, and mingle among the Citizens, hauing an oare in euery mans matter, being full of prittle prattle, and buſie headed, to know what euery man ſaid and did, and then to go carie it to the tyrant. Theſe men were they that had their payment firſt of all, for they killed them with drie blowes, beating them to death with ſtaues. When Timocrates could not enter into the caſtell with them that kept it, he tooke his horſe backe, and fled out of the city; and flying, made all men afraid and amazed where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, becauſe it ſhould not ſeeme, that for feare of a trifle, he had forſaken the city. In the meane time, Dion came on towards the citie with his men, and was come ſo neare, that they might ſee him plainly from the citie, marching foremoſt of all, armed with a faire bright white corſelet, hauing his brother Megacles on the right hand of him, & Calippus ATHENIAN on the left hand, crowned with garlands of flowers: and after him alſo there followed an hundred ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, choſen for his guard about him, and the reſt came marching after in good order of battell, being led by their Captaines. The SYRACVSANS ſaw him coming, and went out and receiued him as a holy & bleſſed proceſſion, that brought them their liberty and popular ſtate againe, the which they had loſt the ſpace of eight and fortie yeares. When Dion was come into the city, by the gate called Menitide, he cauſed his trumpeter to ſound, to appeaſe the rumor & tumult of the people. Then he commanded an Herald to proclaime aloud: That Dion and Megacles, who were come to put down the tyranny, did ſet all the SYRACVSANS at liberty, and all the other SICILIANS alſo from the bondage and ſubiection of the tyrant. And becauſe Dion himſelf was deſirous to ſpeake vnto the people, he went to the vpper part of the towne, called ACRADINA. The SYRACVSANS, all the ſtreetes through as he paſſed by, had on either hand of him prepared ſacrifices, and ſet vp tables and cuppes vpon them: and as he paſſed by their houſes, they caſt flowers and fruites on him, and made prayers vnto him, as if he had beene a god. Now, vnder the caſtell there was a place called Pentapyla (a clocke, to know by the Sunne how the day went) the which Dionyſius had cauſed to be made, and it was of a good pretie height. Dion got vp vpon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perſwading his countrimen to doe their endeuour to recouer their liberty againe; and to maintaine it. They being in a maruellous ioy withall, and deſirous to pleaſe Dion, did chooſe him and his brother Megacles their Lieutenants generall, with abſolute power and authoritie. Afterwards alſo, by the conſent of Dion himſelfe and his brother, and at their requeſts in like manner, they choſe twenty other Captaines, of the which the moſt part of them had beene baniſhed by the tyrant, and

and were returned againe with Dion. The Soothſayers and Prognoſticators liked it well, and ſaith it was a good ſigne for Dion, that he trode that ſumptuous building & workmanſhip of the tyrant vnder his feete, when he made his Oration: but becauſe the hand of the Diall did ſhew the courſe of the Sunne, which neuer leaueth going, vpon the which he got vp when he was choſen Lieutenant generall with abſolute power and authoritie, they were afraid againe, that it was a ſigne Dions affaires ſhould haue a ſudden change of fortune. After this, Dion hauing taken the caſtle of EPIPOLES, he ſet al the citizens at liberty, which were kept there as priſoners in captiuity by the tyrant, and enuironed the caſtell round about with a wall. Within ſeuen daies after, Dionyſius returned by ſea to the caſtell of SYRACVSA,, and therewithall alſo came the carts loaden with armour and weapon to SYRACVSA, which Dion had left with Sinalus: the which Dion cauſed to be diſtributed among the citizens of SYRACVSA that had none. Others did furniſh themſelues as well as they could, and ſhewed that they had courage and good-will to fight for the maintenance and defence of their liberty. In the meane time, Dionyſius ſent Ambaſſadors, firſt vnto Dion priuately, to ſee if he would yeeld to any compoſition. But Dion would not heare them, but bade them tell the SYRACVSANS openly what they had to ſay, being men that were free, and enioyed liberty. Then the Ambaſſadors ſpake in the behalfe of the tyrant, vnto the people of SYRACVSA, promiſing them with mild and gentle words, that they ſhould pay no more ſubſidies and taxes, but very little, and ſhould be no more troubled with warres, other then ſuch as they themſelues ſhould like of. The SYRACVSANS made a mockerie at thoſe offers, and Dion alſo anſwered the Ambaſſadours, and willed Dionyſius to ſend no more to the SYRACVSANS, before he had diſpoſſeſt himſelf of his tyrannie: &, ſo that he would leaue it, he would be his meane to obtaine all things iuſt and reaſonable of the people. Dionyſius liked very well of this good offer: and therfore ſent his Ambaſſadors again to pray the SYRACVSANS, that they would appoint ſome amongſt them to come to the caſtell, to talke with him for the benefit and commodity of the commonwealth, that he might heare what they would alledge, and they alſo what anſwer he would make. Dion choſe certaine whom he ſent vnto him. Now there ranne a rumor in the city among the SYRACVSANS, which came from the caſtell, that Dionyſius would willingly of himſelfe, rather then by reaſon of Dions coming, depoſe himſelfe of the tyranny. But this was but a falſe allarme, and crafty fetch of Dionyſius, to entrap the SYRACVSANS by. For thoſe that were ſent him from the city, he kept them priſoners euery man of them, and one morning hauing made his ſouldiers drinke wine luſtily, which he kept in pay to guard his perſon, he ſent them with great fury to aſſault the wal the SYRACVSANS had built againſt the caſtel. Now, becauſe the SYRACVSANS looked for nothing leſſe then for the ſudde aſſault, & for that theſe barbarous people with a wonderfull courage and great tumult ouerthrew the wal, and others of them alſo did ſet vpon the SYRACVSANS, there was not a man of them that durſt make head to fight with them, ſauing the ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, whom Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard the noiſe, ranne ſtraight to repulſe them, and yet they themſelues could not well tell what they ſhould do vpon that ſudden. For they could heare nothing for the great noiſe and hurly burly of the SYRACVSANS, which fled with great diſorder, and came and mingled themſelues amongſt them. Till at length, Dion perceiuing he could not be heard, to ſhew them by deed what they ſhould do, he went firſt himſelfe againſt theſe barbarous people, and about him there was a cruell and bloudy fight: for his enemies knew him as well as his owne men, and they all ranne vpon him with great cries. Now for Dion himſelfe, indeed becauſe of his age, he was heauier then was requiſite for one that ſhould away with the paines of ſuch battels: but he had ſuch a valiant courage in him, that he went through with all luſtily, and ſlue them that did aſſaile him. Yet he had his hand alſo thruſt through with a pike, and very hardly did his curaces hold out the blowes of the darts and thruſts by hand which he receiued on them, they were ſo mangled & hacked with ſuch a number of darts and pikes paſſed through his ſhield and broken on him, that in the end he was beaten downe: howbeit his ſouldiers reſcued him ſtraight. Then he made Timonides their Captaine, and he himſelfe tooke his horſe-backe, and went vp and downe the citie, ſtaying and quieting the flying of the SYRACVSANS. Then he ſent for his ſouldiers the ſtrangers, which he had put in garriſon in that part of the city called the ACRADINE to keepe it, and brought them being freſh, againſt the barbarous people of the caſtle that were wearied, and almoſt all of them diſcouraged to attempt any further enterpriſe. For they had made this ſallie out, in hope to haue taken all the city at the firſt onset, onely running vp and downe: but when contrary to their expectation, they met these valiant souldiers, and fresh supply, they then began to retire againe into the castell. And the GRECIAN souldiers on the other side, perceiuing they gaue backe, they came the faster vpon them, so that they were compelled to turne their backes, and were driuen within the wals, after they had slaine threescore and foureteene of Dions men, and lost a great number of their owne. This was a noble victorie, and therefore the SYRACVSANS gaue the souldiers that were strangers, an hundred siluer Minaes, in reward for their good seruice: and they gaue Dion their Generall, a crown of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a trumpet from the castle, written from the women of his house: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed, To my father, the which Hipparinus wrote vnto him. For that was Dions sonnes name, though Timæus writeth he was called Areteus, after his mothers name Aretè. But in such matters, me thinks Timonides is better to be credited, because he was his friend and companion in armes. All the other letters that were sent, were openly read before the assembly of the SYRACVSANS, and did onely concerne requests of these women vnto Dion. The SYRACVSANS would not haue the supposed letter of his sonne to be openly read: but Dion against their minds opened it, and found that it was Dionysius letter; who by words, made the direction of it vnto Dion, but in effect, he spake vnto the SYRACVSANS. For in sight, it seemed a manner of request and iustification of him: but in truth, it was written of purpose to accuse Dion. First of all, he remembred him of the things he had done before, for the establishing and preseruation of the tyranny: and afterwards, of cruell threats against those whom he should loue best, as his wife, his sonne, and sister: and last of all, full of most humble requests and intreaties, with sorow and lamentation. But that which most moued Dion of all other, was, that he required him not to destroy the tyranny, but rather to take it for himselfe, and not to set them at liberty that hated him, and would alwaies remember the mischiefe he had done vnto them: and that he would himselfe take vpon him to be Lord, sauing by that means the liues of their parents & friends. When these letters had bin read before the whole assembly of the people, the SYRACVSANS thought not how to reuerence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible constancy & magnanimity of Dion, that stood firme and fast for iustice and vertue, against such vehement intreaty & perswasion of his kinsfolke and friends: but they contrarily began to be afraid, and to mistrust him, as he that of necessity should be forced to pardon the tyrant, for the great pledges and hostages he had of him. Wherfore, they beganne to chuse them new gouernors, and the rather, because they heard that Heraclides was coming vnto them, whom they loued singularly well. This Heraclides was one of them that had been banished, a good souldier and Captaine, and well esteemed of for the charge and office he bare vnder the tyrants: howbeit, a very vnconstant man in euery thing, and would not continue long in a mind, and lest constant in warres where he had great charge of honor in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOPONNESVS; wherefore he determined to come with a power by himselfe, and with his owne fleet against the tyrant. So he arriued at length in SYRACVSA, with seuen gallies, and three other ships: where he found Dionysius againe shut vp into his castell with a wall, and the SYRACVSANS also to haue the better hand of him. Then he began to curry fauor with the common people all the waies he could possibly deuise, hauing by nature a certaine pleasing maner to win the cõmon people, which seek nothing else but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the easier for him to win them, because the people did already mislike Dions seuerity, as a man too seuere and cruell to gouerne a common wealth. For they had now their will so much, and were growne so strong headed, because they saw themselues the stronger, that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free cities, where they only be Lords, and do rule) before they were fully set at liberty. Therefore first of all, not being called together by the authority of the gouernours, they ranne in a fury, of their owne light heads, vnto the place of common assemblies, and there chose Heraclides Admirall. Then Dion vnderstanding this, came to complaine of the iniurie they had done him, declaring vnto them, that to giue this power now vnto Heraclides, was to take that away which they had first giuen vnto him: because he should no more be Generall, if they chose any other Admirall by sea then himselfe. The SYRACVSANS then, as it were against their wils did reuoke the power they had giuen vnto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion sent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a little, and told him, it was not honestly, nor profitably done of him, to sue to the people, and to contend for honour against him in so dangerous a time, when the least occasion in

in the world was inough to haue marred al. Afterwards, Dion himſelf called an aſſembly againe of the city, and eſtabliſhed Heraclides Admirall: and perſwaded the citizens to giue him ſouldiers, as he had indeed. Heraclides outwardly ſeemed to honour Dion, and confeſſed openly that he was greatly bound vnto him, and was alwaies at his heeles very lowly, being ready at his commandement: but in the meane time; ſecretly he inticed the common people to rebell, and to ſtirre vp thoſe whom he knew meete men to like of change. Whereby he procured Dion ſuch trouble, & brought him into ſuch perplexity, that he knew not wel which way to take. For, if he gaue them aduice to let Dionyſius quietly come out of the caſtle, then they accuſed him, & ſaid, he did it to ſaue his life: if on the contrary ſide, becauſe he would not trouble them, he continued ſiege ſtill, and eſtabliſhed nothing; then they thought he did it of purpoſe to draw out the warsin length, becauſe he might the longer time remaine their Chieftain generall, & ſo to keepe the citizens longer in feare. At that time there was one Soſis in SYRACVSA, a man of no name, but noted among the SYRACVSANS for his villanie and wickedneſſe, eſteeming that full and ample liberty, when he might vnchecked licenciouſly ſpeake what he would, as indeed he did. For, he ſeeking to do Dion a diſpleaſure, firſt of all one day at a common councel he ſtood vp on his feete, and called the SYRACVSANS beaſts (amongſt many other vile words he gaue them) if they did not perceiue, that being come from a fond and drunken tyrannie, they had now receiued a ſober maiſter, and a wile waric tyrant. So, when he had thus openly ſhewed himſelfe an enemy vnto Dion, he came no more that day into the market place: but the next morning he was ſeene running vp and downe the city naked, his head and face all of a goare-bloud, as if he had been followed of men to haue ſlaine him. Thus Soſis, coming in this manner into the middeſt of the market place, cried out that Dions ſtrangers had lyen in wait for him, and had handled him in this ſort, ſhewing his wound on his head. Many of the people tooke this matter very grieuouſly, and cried out vpon Dion, and ſayd it was vilely and tyrannically done of him, by feare of murther and danger, to take away the libertie from the citizens to ſpeake. Now, though the whole aſſembly hereupon fell into an vprore withall; Dion notwithſtanding came thither to cleare himſelfe of theſe accuſations, and made them preſently ſee, that this Soſis was brother to one of Dionyſius guard: who had put into his head, in this ſort to put the citie of SYRACVSA in an vproare, becauſe Dionyſius had no other hope nor meane to eſcape, but by ſtirring vp faction and ſedition among them, to make one of them fall out with another. The Surgeons were ſent for foorthwith to ſearch the wound of this Soſis: who found, that it was rather a litle ſcratch, then any violent wound giuen him. For the wounds or cuts of a ſword, are euer deepeſt in the middeſt: and Soſis cut was but wery litle, and not deepe, hauing had many beginnings, & giuen him (as it ſeemed) at ſundry times, but for very paine, the party that cut him, was driuen to leaue off, & came to cut him at diuerſe times. Furthermore, there came certaine of his friends in the meane time, that brought a razor before the aſſembly, and reported that as they came, they met Soſis by the way all bloudied: who ſaid, that he fled from Dions ſouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they preſently followed them, but found no man; and onely they ſaw a razor, which ſome body had caſt vpon a hollow ſtone thereabouts, where they firſt ſaw him coming vnto them. Thus, Soſis deuice had but euill ſucceſſe. For beſides all theſe proofes and tokens, Dions houſhold ſeruants came to be witneſſe againſt him, that very early in the morning he went abroad alone with a razor in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuſe Dion, knew not what to ſay to the matter, but ſhrunke away: whereupon the people condemning Soſis to death, they were quiet againe with Dion. Yet were they alwaies afraid of theſe ſouldiers that were ſtrangers, ſpecially when they ſaw the greateſt cõflicts they had with ỹ tyrant, was by ſea, after that Philiſtus was come from the coaſt of APVGLIA with a great number of gallies to aide the tyrant. For then they thought, that theſe ſouldiers (the ſtrangers) being armed at all parts to fight by land, they would do him no more ſeruice by ſea: becauſe the citizens themſelues were they that kept them in ſafety, for that they were men practiſed to fight by ſea, and were alſo the ſtronger by meanes of their ſhips. But beſide all this the onely thing that made them to be couragious againe, was the good fortune they had at the battell by ſea, in the which when they had ouercrome Philiſtus, they cruelly and barbarouſly vſed him. Truly Ephorus ſaith, that Philiſtus ſlue himſelfe, when he ſaw his galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the firſt beginning of this warre) writing vnto Speuſippus the Philoſopher, ſaith that that Philiſtus was takẽ aliue, becauſe his galley ran aland: & that that the SYRACVSANS firſt

tooke of his curaces, and ſtripped him naked, and after they had done him all the villany and ſpite they could, they cut off his head, and gaue his body vnto boyes, commanding them to dragge it into that part of the city called ACRADINE, and then to caſt it into the common priuy. Timæus alſo to ſpite him the more, ſaith that the boyes tied the dead body by his lame legge, and ſo dragged him vp and downe the city, where all the SYRACVSANS did what villany to it they could, being glad to ſee him dragged by the legge, that had ſaid: Dionyſius ſhould not flie from the tyranny vpon a light horſe, but that they ſhould pull him out by the legge againſt his will. Now Philiſtus reporteth this matter thus: not as ſpoken to Dionyſius by himſelfe, but by ſome other. But Timæus taking a iuſt occaſion and colour to ſpeake euill of the good will, fidelity, & care that Philiſtus had alwaies ſeemed to ſhew in the confirmation and defence of the tyranny, doth liberally beſtow iniurious words on him in this place. Now for them, whom he had indeed offended, if they of malice and ſpite to be reuenged, did offer him cruelty, peraduenture they were not much to be blamed: but for them that ſince his death haue written the geſts, who were neuer offended by him in his life time, and who ought to ſhew themſelues diſcreet in their writing, me thinks that if they had regarded their owne credite and eſtimation, they ſhould not ſo fondly and outragiouſly haue reproued the aduerſities and misfortunes, which by fortune may as well chance to the honeſteſt man, as vnto him. Thus fondly did Ephorus praiſe Philiſtus, who although he haue an excellent fine wit to counterfeit goodly excuſes, and cunningly to hide wicked and diſhoneſt parts, and eloquently to deuiſe by honeſt words to defend an euill cauſe: yet cannot he with all the fine wit he hath, excuſe himſelfe, that he hath not been the onely man of the world that hath moſt fauoured tyrants, and that hath euer loued, & ſpecially deſired power, wealth, and allyance with tyrants. But he (in my opinion) taketh the right courſe of an Hiſtoriographer, that neither doth commend Philiſtus doings, nor yet caſteth his aduerſities in his teeth to his reproch. After Philiſtus death, Dionyſius ſent vnto Dion, to make him an offer to deliuer him the caſtell, armour, munition, and ſouldiers that were in it, with money alſo to pay them for fiue moneths ſpace. For himſelfe, he prayed that he might be ſuffered to go ſafely into ITALY, and to lie there, to take the pleaſure of the fruits of the country called GYARTA, which was within the territory of SYRACVSA, & lieth out from the ſea towards the main land. Dion refuſed this offer, & anſwered ỳ Ambaſſadors, that they muſt moue the SYRACVSANS in it. They ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily take Dionyſius aliue, would not heare the Ambaſſadors ſpeake, but turned them away. Dionyſius ſeeing no other remedy, left the caſtell in the hands of his eldeſt ſonne Apollocrates, and hauing a luſtie gale of wind, he ſecretly imbarked certaine of his men he loued beſt, with the richeſt things he had, and ſo hoiſed ſaile, vnwares to Heraclides, the Admirall of SYRACVSA. The people were maruellouſly offended with Heraclides for it, and began to mutine againſt him. But Heraclides, to pacifie this tumult of the people, ſuborned one Hippon an Orator, who preferred the law Agraria vnto the people, for the diuiſion of all the Iland amongſt them: & that the beginning of liberty was equality, and of bondage pouertie, vnto them that had no lands. Heraclides giuing his conſent to this decree, and ſtirring the common people to ſedition againſt Dion, that withſtood it: perſwaded the SYRACVSANS, not onely to confirme the law Hippon had propounded, but alſo to diſcharge the hired ſtrangers, to chuſe other Captaines and gouernours, and to rid themſelues of Dions ſeuere gouernment. But they ſuppoſing ſtraight to haue been rid from the tyrannie, as from a long and grieuous ſickneſſe, ouer-raſhly taking vpon them, like people that of long time had been at liberty, they vtterly vndid themſelues, and ouerthrew Dions purpoſe: who like a good Phiſitian was carefull to ſee the citie well ordered and gouerned. So when they were aſſembled to chuſe new officers in the middeſt of ſummer, there fell ſuch horible thunders, and other terrible ſtormes, and vnfortunate ſignes in the element, that for the ſpace of fiftecne dayes together, the people were ſtill ſcattered and diſperſed when they were aſſembled: inſomuch, that being afraid of theſe ſignes aboue, they durſt not at that time create any new Captains. Certain daies after, as the Orators had choſen a faire time to proceed to the election of officers, an Oxe drawing in a cart (being daily acquainted with euerie ſight and noiſe) ſuddenly without any occaſion offered, fell into a madneſſe againſt the carter that draue him, and breaking his yoke aſunder, ranne ſtraight to the Theater, and there made the people runne into euery corner, to flie and ſaue themſelues: and then flinging, and bearing all downe before him that ſtood in his way, he ranne through as much of the city, as the enemies afterwards wan of them. This notwithſtanding, the SYRACVSANS making light account of all theſe theſe ſignes, they choſe fiue and twenty Captaines, of the which Heraclides was one: and ſecretly they ſent to feele the hired ſouldiers, to ſee if they could entice them from Dion, to cauſe them to take their part, and made them large promiſes to make them free men (as themſelues) of SYRACVSA. The ſouldiers would not be enticed from him; but faithfully and louingly tooke Dion amongſt them with their armor and weapon: and putting him in the middeſt of them, led him in this manner out of the city, and did no man hurt, but reproued their vnthankfulneſſe and villanie vnto all thoſe they met by the way. Then the SYRACVSANS deſpiſing thē for their ſmal number; & becauſe they did not firſt ſet vpon them, but truſting on the other ſide to themſelues, for that they were the greater number, they came to aſſaile them, ſuppoſing they ſhould eaſily ouercome them in the city, and kill euery man of them. Dion being thus in a ſtraight, that of neceſſity he muſt fight againſt his owne countrimen, or elſe be ſlaine himſelfe with his ſoldiers, he held vp his hands to the SYRACVSANS, and very earneſtly prayed them to be content, pointing them with his finger to the caſtell that was full of their enemies, which ſhewed themſelues vpon the wals, & ſaw what they did. In the end, when he ſaw that he could not pacifie their fury & tumult, and that all the city was in an vprore with the prittle prattle of theſe ſeditious people, who were caried like the ſea with the winde, he did yet forbid his ſouldiers to giue any charge vpon them; who notwithſtanding made a countenance with great cries, and ratling of their harneſſe, as if they had meant to runne on thē. Then the SYRACVSANS durſt not abide by it, but ran away like ſheepe through the ſtreets no man chaſing them. So Dion called backe againe his men, and led them directly into the country of the LEONTINES. Then the new officers and gouernors of SYRACVSA, perceiuing that the women laughed them to ſcorne: becauſe they would recouer the fame they had loſt, they armed their men anew, and marched after Dion to fight with him; whom they ouertooke at a riuer, as he was ready to paſſe ouer. Then began their horſemen a litle to skirmiſh with Dions company: but when they ſaw he did no more beare with their faults for countries ſake but frowned indeed vpon them, and ſet his men in battell ray againſt them: then they turned their backs again, with more ſhame and reproach then before, & ſo fled vnto the city of SYRACVSA, & had not many of their men ſlain. The LEONTINES receiued Dion very honorably, tooke the ſtrangers his ſouldiers, gaue them pay, and made them free citizens with them: and ſent Ambaſſadors alſo vnto the SYRACVSANS, to will thē to let the ſtrangers haue their pay. The SYRACVSANS on their ſide alſo, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the LEONTINES to accuſe Dion. So, all their confederates were aſſembled in the city of the LEONTINES; & in that aſſembly, after both parties had bin heard, to heare what they would ſay; it was iudged: That the SYRACVSANS were to blame. Howbeit, they would not ſtand to the iudgement of their confederates, for they were now grown proud & careles, becauſe they were gouerned by no mā, but had Captains that ſtudied to pleaſe thē, and were afraid alſo to diſpleaſe thē. After that, there ariued certain gallies of Dionyſius at SYRACVSA, of the which Nypſius Neapolitan was Captaine which brought victuals & mony, to helpe them that were beſieged within the caſtle. Theſe galleys were fought with, and the SYRACVSANS obtained victory, and tooke foure of the tyrants gallies with three banks of oares a peece: howbeit they fondly abuſed their victorie. For they hauing no body to command or rule them, imployed all their ioy in rioting and banquetting, and in fond and diſſolute meetings, taking ſo little care and regard to their buſineſſe, that now when they thought the caſtell was ſure their owne, they almoſt loſt their city. For Nypſius perceiuing that euery part of the city was out of order, and that the common people did nothing all day long vnto darke night, but bib and drinke drunke, dancing after their pipes and howboyes; and that the Gouernours themſelues were very glad alſo to ſee ſuch feaſting, or elſe for that they diſſembled it, and durſt not command and compell them that were drunke: he wiſely tooke the occaſion offered him, and ſcaled the wall which had ſhut vp the caſtell, and wanne it, and ouerthrew it. Then he ſent the barbarous ſouldiers into the city, and commanded them to do with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACVSANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gaue preſent remedy, they were ſo amazed and ſuddenly ſet on: for indeed they made a right ſacke of the citie. Here men were killed, there they ouerthrew the wall; in another place they caried away women and litle children priſoners into the caſtell, weeping and crying out: and laſtly, they made the Captaines at their wits end, who could giue no preſent order, nor haue their men to ſerue them againſt their enemies, that came hand ouer head on euery ſide amongſt them. The city being thus miſerably in garboile, and the ACRADINE alſo in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to rise againe: euery man thought then with himselfe, that Dion must be sent for, but yet no man moued it notwithstanding, being ashamed of their vnthankfulnesse and ouer great folly they had committed, in driuing him away. Yet necessity enforcing them vnto it, there were certaine of the horsemen and of their confederates that cried, that they must send for Dion & the PELOPONNESIANS his souldiers, which were with him in the territory of the LEONTINES. Assoone as the first word was heard, and that one had the heart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACVSANS cried out, There was the point: & they were so glad of it, that the water stood in their eyes for ioy, and besought the gods it would please them to bring him vnto them, they were so desirous to haue him againe. For they called to mind how valiant and resolute he was in danger, and how that he was neuer afraid, but did encourage them with his manhood, in such sort, that being led by him, they were not afraid to set vpon their enemies. So the confederates of them, sent presently Archonides and Telesides vnto him: and the noblemen that serued on horseback, they sent him also fiue amongst them, beside Hellanicus. Who tooke their horses, and poasted for life, so that they came vnto the city of the LEONTINES about Sunne-set: & lighting off from their horses, they went first of al & kneeled downe at Dions feet, and weeping, told him the miserable state of the SYRACVSANS. Straight there came diuerse of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPONNESIAN souldiers vnto Dion (mistrusting then that there was some newes in hand,) to see the earnest and humble suite the Ambassadors of SYRACVSA made vnto him. Wherefore Dion tooke them presently with him, and brought them himselfe vnto the Theater, where the common councels and assemblies of the citie were holden: thither ranne euery man to heare what the matter was. Then Archonides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, told openly before the whole assembly, the greatnesse of their miserie, and requested the hired souldiers to come and aide the SYRACVSANS, forgetting the iniurie they had receiued: considering, that they had more dearely payed for their folly, then they themselues (whom they had so iniured) would haue made them to haue suffered. When they had said their minds, there was a great silence through all the Theater: and then Dion rose vp, and began to speake. But the great teares that fel from his eyes would not suffer him to speak: wherefore the hired souldiers being sory to see him weepe, prayed him not to trouble himselfe, but to be of good courage. Then Dion letting go the sorow and griefe he had conceiued, began to speake vnto them in this maner. "My Lords of PELOPONNESVS, and you also the confederates: I haue called you together to consult with you, what you should do. For my selfe, it were no honesty for me to consult what I should do now, when the citie of SYRACVSA standeth in peril of destruction: and therfore if I cannot saue it from destruction, yet at the least I wil burie my selfe in the fire and ruine of my country. But for you, if it please you once more to helpe vs vnaduised and most vnfortunate people, you shall by your meanes set the poore distressed city of SYRACVSA againe on foot, which is your deed. Or if it be so, that remembring the iniuries the SYRACVSANS haue offered you, you will suffer it to be destroyed: yet I beseech the gods, that at the least they wil requite your valiantnesse, fidelity & good loue you haue born me vntill this present; beseeching you to remember Dion, who neither forsooke you at any time when you haue bene iniured, nor his countriemen, when they were in trouble. So going on still with his tale, the mercenary strangers stepped forth with great noise, and prayed him to leade thē to aid SYRACVSA. Thē the Ambassadors also that were sent from the SYRACVSANS saluted & imbraced them, and prayed the gods to blesse Dion & them, with all the good hap that might be. So when al was whisht & quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to go & prepare themselues, and that they should be there ready armed after supper, determining the very same night to go to aid SYRACVSA. But now at SYRACVSA, while day light lasted, Dionysius souldiers & Captaines did all the mischief & villany they could in the city, & when night came, they retired again into the castell, hauing lost very few of their men. Then the seditious gouernours of the SYRACVSANS took hart againe vnto thē, hoping that the enemies wold be contented with that they had done: & therfore began a new to perswade the citizens to let Dion alone, and not to receiue him with his mercenary souldiers if they came to aide him; saying that they themselues were honester men then the strangers, to saue their citie, and to defend their liberty without help of any other. So, other Ambassadors were sent againe vnto Dion; some from the captains & gouernors of the city, to stay them that they should not come; and other also from the horsemen, & noble citizens his friends to hasten his iourny: whereupon by reason of this variance, Dion marched very softly at his ease. Now by night, Dions enemies within the city got to the gates, and kept them that Dion should not come in. Nypsius on the other side made a sally out of the castell, with his mercenarie souldiers, being better appointed, and a greater number of them then before: and with them he straight plucked downe all the wall which they had built before the castell, and ranne and sacked the citie. At this sally out of the castell, they did not onely kill the men they met, but women and litle children also, and stayed no more to spoile, but to destroy and put all to hauock. For, because Dionysius saw that he was brought to a straight and desperate case, he bare such mortall malice against the SYRACVSANS, that sith there was no remedy but that he must needs forgo his tyranny, he determined to bury it with the vtter destruction & desolation of their citie. And therefore to preuent Dions aid, and to make a quicke dispatch to destroy all, they came with burning torches in their hands, and did set fire on all things they could come too: and farther off, they fired their darts and arrowes, and bestowed them in euery part of the city. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall, and slaine in the streets by the souldiers; and others also that ranne into their houses, were driuen out againe by force of fire: for there were a number of houses that were on fire, and fell downe vpon them that went and came. This miserie was the chiefest cause why all the SYRACVSANS agreed together to set open the gates vnto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionysius souldiers were gone againe into the castell, he made no great hast to march forward: but when day was broken, there came certaine horsemen from SYRACVSA vnto Dion, who brought him newes that the enemies had once againe taken the city. Then also came other of his enemies vnto him, and praied him to make hast. Now their misery increasing still, and they being brought into hard state, Heraclides first sent his brother vnto Dion, and then Theodotes his vncle, to pray him to come quickly and helpe them: for now there was no man left to resist the enemies, because he himselfe was hurt, and the citie also was in maner cleane burnt and destroyed. When these men came to Dion, he was yet about threescore furlongs from the towne. So he told his mercenary souldiers the danger that the towne was in, and hauing encouraged them, he led them no more faire and softly, but running towards the city, and meeting messengers one in anothers neck as he went, that prayed him to make all the possible speed he could. By this meanes, the soldiers marching with wonderfull speed and good will together, he entred the gates of the city at a place called Hecatompedon. First of all, he sent the lightest armed he had against the enemies, to the end that the SYRACVSANS seeing them, they might take a good heart again to them, whilest he himself in the meane time did set all the other heauy armed soldiers and citizens that came to ioyne with them in battel ray, & did cast thē into diuers squadrons, of greater length & breadth; and appointed him that shold haue the leading of them, to the end that setting vpon the enemies in diuers places together, they shold put them in greater feare and terror. When he had set al things in this order, and made his prayer vnto the gods, & that they saw him marching through the city against their enemies: then there rose such a cōmon noise and reioycing, and great shout of the souldiers, mingled with vowes, prayers, & perswasions of all the SYRACVSANS, that they called Dion their god & sauior, and the mercenary souldiers their brethren and fellow citizens. Furthermore, there was not a SYRACVSAN that so much regarded his owne life and person, but he seemed to be more afraid of the losse of Dion only, then of all the rest. For they saw him the formost man running through the danger of the fire, treading in bloud, & vpō dead bodies that lay slaine in the midst of the streets. Now indeed to charge the enemies, it was a maruellous dangerous enterprise: for they were like mad beasts, and stood beside in battel ray along the wall which they had ouerthrowne, in a very dangerous place, and hard to win. Howbeit, the danger of the fire, did most of all trouble and amaze the strangers, & did stop their way for on which side soeuer they turned them, the houses round about them were all on a fire, and they were driuen to march ouer the burnt timber of the houses, and to run in great danger of the wals of the house sides that fell on them, & to passe through the thicke smoke mingled with dust and beside to keepe their ranks with great difficulty. And whē they came to assaile the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, because of the straightnes of the place: howbeit, the SYRACVSANS with force of cries and shouts, did so animate & incorage their men, that at length they draue Nypsius & his men to forsake the place. The most part of them got into the castle, being very neare vnto them: the other that could not get in in time, fled straglingly vp and downe, whom the GRECIAN souldiers slue, chasing of them. The extremity of the time did not presently suffer the conquerers to reap the fruit of their victory, neither the ioyes and embracings meete for ſo great an exploit. For the SYRACVSANS went euery man home to his owne houſe, to quench the fire, the which could ſcarcely be put out all the night. When day brake, there was none of theſe ſeditious flatterers of the people that durſt tary in the citie, but condemning themſelues, they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotus came together of their owne good wils to yeeld themſelues vnto Dion; confeſſing that they had done him wrong, and humbly praying him to ſhew himſelfe better vnto them, then they had ſhewed themſelues vnto him, and that it was more honorable for him, being euery way vnmatchable for his vertues, to ſhew himſelfe more noble to conquer his anger, then his vnthankfull enemies had done: who contending with him before in vertue, did now confeſſe themſelues to be far inferior vnto him. This was the ſumme and effect of Heraclides and Theodotus ſubmiſſion vnto Dion. But his friends did perſwade him not to pardon two ſuch wicked men, who did malice and enuie his honor: and as he would do the ſtrangers his ſouldiers any pleaſure, that he ſhould put Heraclides into their hands, to roote out of the common-wealth of SYRACVSA, his vile maner to flatter and curry fauor with the people, the which was as dangerous and great a plague to a citie, as ý tyrannie. Dion pacifying them, anſwered: Other Generals of armies, ſaid he, do imploy al their wits in martiall exerciſes and wars: but for himſelfe, that he had of long time ſtudied and learned in the ſchoole of the Academie, to ouercome anger, enuie, and all malice and contention: the noble proofe whereof is moſt ſeene, not in vſing honeſt men and his friends moderatly, but in ſhewing mercy alſo vnto his enemies, and forgetting his anger againſt them that haue offended him: and that for his part, he had rather ouercome Heraclides, not in riches and wiſedome, but in clemency and iuſtice; for therein chiefly conſiſted excellency, ſith no man elſe in wars can chalenge power and gouernment, but fortune, that ruleth moſt. And though Heraclides, ſaid he, through enuie hath done like a wicked man, muſt Dion therefore through anger blemiſh his vertue? Indeed by mans law it is thought meeter to reuenge an iniurie offered, then to do an iniurie: but nature ſheweth, that they both proceed of one ſelfe imperfection. Now though it be a hard thing to change & alter the euill diſpoſition of a man, after he is once nuſled in villanie: yet is not man of ſo wild & brutiſh a nature, that his wickednes may not be ouercome with often pleaſures, when he ſeeth that they are continually ſhewed him. Dion anſwering his friends thus, he forgaue Heraclides; & beginning againe to ſhut vp the caſtell with a wall round about, he commanded the SYRACVSANS euery man of them to cut downe a ſtake, and to bring it thither. So when night was come, ſetting his ſouldiers the ſtrangers in hand withall, whileſt the SYRACVSANS ſlept & tooke their eaſe, by morning he had compaſſed the caſtell round about with a pale. The next day, they that ſaw the greatneſſe and ſudden expedition of this work, wondered much at it, as wel the enemies, as alſo the citizens: and when they had buried the dead bodies, & redeemed them that were taken priſoners (which were not much leſſe then 2000 perſons) he called a common councell of the city, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion ſhould be choſen Generall of SYRACVSA, with abſolute power and authoritie both by ſea & land. The chiefeſt men of the city liked very wel of it, & wold haue had the people to haue paſſed it. But the rabble of the marriners, and other mechanicall people liuing by their labour, would not ſuffer Heraclides to be put from his Admiralſhip, but fell to mutinie, thinking that though Heraclides did them no pleaſure elſe, yet he would euer be a more popular man then Dion, and pleaſe the common people better. Dion granted their deſire, and made Heraclides Admirall againe of the ſea: howbeit he did anger them as much another way, when he did not only reiect the earneſt ſuite they made to haue the law Agraria paſſe for diuiſion of lands in equality amongſt them, but did alſo cancell and reuoke al that had been done before. Wherfore Heraclides remaining at MESSINA, began thenceforth to enter into new practiſes againe, and to flatter the ſouldiers and ſea-faring men he had brought thither with him, and to ſtirre them vp againſt Dion, ſaying that he would make himſelfe tyrant: and himſelfe in the meane time ſecretly practiſed with Dionyſius, by meanes of a SPARTAN called Pharax. The nobleſt men of the SYRACVSANS miſtruſted it, and therupon there fel out great mutinie in their campe, whereby alſo followed great famine in SYRACVSA: ſo that Dion was at ſuch a ſtraight, that he could not tell what to ſay to it, and was reproued of all his friends for that he had againe preferred to great authority againſt himſelfe, ſo vntractable a man, and ſo malicious and wicked a perſon as Heraclides was. Now when Pharax lay in campe with an armie neare vnto the city of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES, Dion did bring the army of the SYRACVSANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him till an other

other time. But through Heraclides, and the sea-mens crying out, that said, he would not trie this warre by battell, but would draw it out in length, because he would be still Generall, he was forced to giue battell, and lost it. Howbeit, the ouerthrow was not great, and happened rather because his men were at a iarre among themselues by reason of their faction and diuision, then otherwise. Dion therfore prepared to fight another battel, and gathered his men together againe, encouraging them, when euen at twi-light word was brought him, that Heraclides with all his fleete was vnder saile towards SYRACVSA, meaning to take the city, and to shut Dion and his armie out of it. Wherefore he presently tooke with him the chiefest men of authoritie in the citie, and the most willingest men, and rode all night with them in such haste, that they were at the gates of SYRACVSA the next morning by nine of the clocke, hauing ridden seuen hundred furlongs. Heraclides that had sailed with all the possible speed he could, to preuent him with his ships, perceiuing that he came short, he turned saile, and taking seas at all aduenture, by chance he met with Gæsylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who told him he was sent from LACEDÆMON, to be Generall to the SICILIANS in this warre, as Gylippus was sent at other times before. He was glad he had met with him to haue such a remedie and defence against Dion, and boasted of it vnto the friends and confederates of SYRACVSA, and sent an Herauld before vnto the SYRACVSANS, summoning them to receiue Gæsylus LACEDÆMONIAN, who was sent to be their Generall. Dion made answer: That the SYRACVSANS had gouernours enough; and though that their affaires did of necessitie require a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine, yet that himselfe was he; for that he was made free in SPARTA. Then Gæsylus perceiuing he could not obtaine to be Generall, he went vnto SYRACVSA, and came to Dion, and there made Heraclides and him friends againe by the greate and solemne othes he made: and because Gæsylus also sware, that he himselfe would be reuenged of him for Dions sake, and punish Heraclides if euer after he did once more conspire against him. After that, the SYRACVSANS brake vp their armie by sea, because it did them no seruice, and was beside chargeable keeping of it, and further did also breed sedition and trouble amongst their gouernors: and so went to lay straighter siege to the castell then euer they did; and built vp the wall againe, which the enemies had ouerthrowne. Then Dionysius sonne seeing no aide to come to him from any part, and that victuals failed them; and further, that the souldiers began to mutine being vnable to keepe them, he fell to a composition with Dion, and deliuered vp the castell into his hands, with all the armor and munition in it: and so tooke his mother and his sisters of Dion, and put them aboord vpon fiue gallies, with the which he went vnto his father, through the safe conduct of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all SYRACVSA, but was there to see this sight; or if by chance there were any absent, the other that were there, called them thither as loud as they could crie, saying: That they did not see the goodlyest day and Sunshine, which the city of SYRACVSA might see then at her rising, the same being now restored againe to her former liberty. If vntill this present day they do reckon the flying of Dionysius for one of the rarest examples of fortunes change, as one of the greatest and notablest things that euer was: what ioy (thinke we) had they that draue him out, and what pleasure had they with themselues, that with the least meane that could be possible, did destroy the greatest tyranny in the world? So when Apollocrates (Dionysius sonne) was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into the castell, the women within the castell would not tarrie till he came into the house, but went to meete him at the gates; Aristomachè leading Dions sonne in her hand, and Aretè following her weeping, but very fearefull how she should call and salute her husband, hauing lyen with another man, Dion first spake to his sister, and afterwards to his sonne: and then Aristomachè offering him Aretè, said vnto him: since thy banishment ô Dion, we haue led a miserable and captiue life, but now that thou art returned home with victorie, thou hast rid vs out of care and thraldome, and hast also made vs againe bold to lift vp our heads, sauing her here, whom I (wretched creature) haue by force (thy selfe aliue) seene maried vnto another man. Now then, sith fortune hath made thee Lord of vs all, what iudgement giuest thou of this compulsion? How wilt thou haue her to salute thee? as her vncle or husband? As Aristomachè spake these words, the water stood in Dions eyes: so he gently and louingly taking his wife Aretè by the hand, he gaue her his sonne, and willed her to go home to his house where he then remained, and so deliuered the castell vnto the SYRACVSANS. He hauing this prosperous successe and victory, would not reape any present benefite or pleasure thereby, before he had shewed himselfe thankfull to his friends, giuen great gifts also vnto the confederates of SYRACVSA, and specially before he had giuen euery one of his friends in the citie, & his mercenary ſoldiers the ſtrangers, ſome honorable reward according to their deſerts, exceeding his hability with magnanimitie of mind: when he himſelfe liued ſoberly, and kept a moderate diet, contenting him with any thing that came firſt to hand. Euery man that heard of it, wondered at him, conſidering that not onely all SICILE and CARTHAGE, but generally all GREECE looked vpon his great proſperity and good fortune, thinking no man liuing greater then he, nor that any Captaine euer attained vnto ſuch fame and wonderfull fortune as he was come vnto. This notwithſtanding, Dion liued as temperately and modeſtly in his apparell, and alſo in his number of ſeruants, and ſeruice at his boord, as if he had liued with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not been conuerſant among ſouldiers and Captains, which haue no other comfort nor pleaſure for all the paines and danger they ſuffer continually, but to eate and drinke their fill, and to take their pleaſure all day long. Plato wrote vnto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no reſpect but to one place, and to one city, to wit, the Academie, and would haue no other Iudges nor lookers into his doings, but the ſcholers of the ſame: who neither wondred at his great exploits, valiantneſſe, nor victorie, but only conſidering if he did wiſely and modeſtly vſe the fortune he had, and could ſo keep himſelfe within modeſt bounds, hauing done ſo great things, Furthermore, touching the grauitie he had when he ſpake to any body, & his inflexible ſeueritie which he vſed towards the people, he determined neuer to alter or change it: notwithſtanding that his affaires required him to ſhew courteſie and lenitie, and that Plato alſo reproued him for it, and wrote, that ſeueritie and obſtinace (as we ſaid before) was the companion of ſolitarineſſe. But it ſeemeth to me that Dion did vſe it for two reſpects. The firſt, becauſe nature had not framed him courteous and affable to winne men: ſecondly, he did what he could to draw the SYRACVSANS to the contrary; who were ouer licentious, and ſpoiled with too much flattery. For Heraclides began againe to be buſie with him. Firſt of all, Dion ſending for him to come to councell, he ſent him word, he would not come: and that being a priuate citizen, he would be at the common councell amongſt others when any was kept. Afterwards he accuſed him, for that he had not ouerthrowne and razed the caſtle: and alſo becauſe he would not ſuffer the people to breake open the tombe of Dionyſius the elder, to caſt out his bodie: and becauſe he ſent for counſellors to CORINTH, and diſdained to make the citizens his companions in the gouernment of the commonwealth. Indeed to confeſſe a troth, Dion had ſent for certain CORINTHIANS, hoping the better to ſtabliſh the forme of a cõmon wealth, which he had in his mind when they were come. For his mind was vtterly to break the gouernment of Democratia (to wit, the abſolute gouernment and authoritie of the people in a citie, not being as it were a cõmonwealth, but rather a faier and market where things are ſold, as Plato ſaith) & to eſtabliſh the LACONIAN or CRETAN cõmonwealth, mingled with a princely & popular gouernment: and that ſhould be Ariſtocratia, to wit, the number of a few noblemen that ſhould gouerne and direct the chiefeſt and weightieſt matters of ſtate. And for that purpoſe, he thought the CORINTHIANS ỹ meeteſt men to help him to frame this cõmonwealth, cõſidering that they gouerned their affaires more by chuſing a few number of the nobility, then otherwiſe; & that they did nõt refer many things to the voice of the people. And becauſe he was aſſured that Heraclides wold be againſt him in it al that he could, & that otherwiſe he knew he was a ſeditious, a troubleſome, & lightheaded fellow: he then ſuffered thẽ to kil him, who had long before done it, if he had not kept them from it; & ſo they went home to his houſe, & ſlue him there. The murther of Heraclides was much miſliked of the SYRACVSANS, howbeit Dion cauſed him to be honorably buried, & brought his body to ỹ ground, followed with al his army. Thẽ he made an Oration himſelf to the people, & told thẽ that it was impoſſible to auoid ſeditiõ & trouble in the city, ſo long as Dion & Heraclides did both gouern together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar of Dions, who (as Plato ſaith) came not acquainted with Dion through the occaſion of his ſtudy in Philoſophy, but becauſe he had bin his guide to bring him to ſee the ſecret myſteries and ceremonies of the ſacrifices, and for ſuch other like common talke and cõpany. This notwithſtanding, Callippus did accõpany him in all this war, & was very much honored of him, and was one of the firſt of all his friends that entred into SYRACVSA with him, & did valiantly behaue himſelf in al the battels & conflicts that were fought. This Callippus ſeeing that Dions beſt and chiefeſt friends were all ſlaine in this war, & that Heraclides alſo was dead, that the people of SYRACVSA had no more any head, and beſides, that the ſoldiers which were with Dion did loue him better then any other man: he became the vnfaithfulleſt man, and the verieſt villain of

of all other, hoping that for reward to kill his friend Dion, he ſhould vndoubtedly come to haue the whole gouernment of all SICILE; and as ſome do report, for that he had taken a bribe of his enemies, of twenty talents, for his labor to commit this murther. So he began to practiſe, to bribe and to ſuborne certaine of the mercenarie ſoldiers againſt Dion, and that by a maruellous crafty and ſubtile fetch. For, vſing commonly to report vnto Dion certaine ſeditious words ſpoken peraduenture by the ſouldiers indeed, or elſe deuiſed of his owne head, he wanne ſuch a liberty and boldneſſe by the truſt Dion had in him, that he might ſafely ſay what he would to any of the ſoldiers, and boldly ſpeake euill of Dion by his owne commandement: to the end he might therby vnderſtand the better, whether any of his ſoldiers were angry with him, or wiſhed his death. By this policy, Callippus ſtraight found out thoſe that bare Dion grudge, and that were already corrupted, whō he drew to his conſpiracy. And if any man vnwilling to giue eare vnto him, went & told Dion, that Callippus wold haue inticed him to conſpire againſt him, Dion was not angry with him for it, thinking that he did but as he had cōmanded him to do. Now as this treaſon was practiſing againſt Dion, there appeared a great and monſtrous ghoſt or ſpirit vnto him. By chance ſitting late one euening all alone in a gallery he had, and being in a deepe thought with himſelfe, ſuddenly he heard a noiſe: and therewith caſting his eye to the end of his gallery (being yet day-light) he ſaw a monſtrous great woman, like vnto one of the furies ſhewed in playes, and ſaw her ſweeping of the houſe with a broome. This viſion ſo amazed and affrighted him, that he ſent for his friends, and told them what a ſight he had ſeene: and praied them to tarrie with him all night, being as it were a man beſide himſelfe, fearing leſt the ſpirit would come to him againe if they left him alone, of the which notwithſtanding he neuer heard more afterwards. Howbeit ſhortly after, his ſonne being growne to mans ſtate, for a certaine light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he caſt himſelfe headlong downe from the top of the houſe, and ſo was ſlaine. Dion being in this ſtate, Callippus went on ſtil with his treaſon, and ſpread a rumor abroad among the SYRACVSANS, that Dion ſeeing himſelfe now deſtitute of children, was determined to ſend for Apollocrates, Dionyſius ſon, to make him his heire and ſucceſſor, being coſin germaine to his wife, and his ſiſters daughters ſonne. Then began Dion, his wife, and ſiſters to miſtruſt Callippus practiſes, and they were told it by diuerſe and manifeſt proofes. But Dion being ſory (as I ſuppoſe) for Heraclides death, and inwardly taking that murther in very euill part, as a foule blot to his life and doings, he ſaid, he had rather die a thouſand deaths, and to offer his throat to be cut to any that would, rather then he would liue in that miſerie, to be compelled to take heed as well of his friends, as of his enemies. Callippus then ſeeing the woman ſo buſie and inquiſitiue of his doings, and fearing leſt he ſhould be bewrayed, he came weeping vnto them, and told them, it was nothing, and that he was ready to aſſure them of it by any maner of way they would deuiſe. The women then willed him to ſweare by the great oath, which was in this maner. He that muſt take this oath, cometh into the temple of the goddeſſes Theſmophores, which are, Ceres and Proſerpina: and after certaine ſacrifices done, he putteth on the purple chaplet of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, holding a burning torch in his hand, and ſweareth in this maner. Callippus hauing done all theſe ceremonies, and made the oath in forme as I haue told you, he made ſo light account of the goddeſſes, that he taried no longer to do the murther he had determined, but til the very feaſt day of the goddeſſe ſhould come, by whom he had ſworne: and ſlue him on the day of the feaſt of Proſerpina. Now, I do not thinke that he choſe that day of ſet purpoſe, knowing right well that he did alwaies ſinne againſt her, what time ſoeuer he had killed his brother, being by his meanes ſpecially admitted to the ſocietie and brotherhood with him, of the fraternitie and myſteries of Ceres and Proſerpina. Of this conſpiracie there were diuers. For, as Dion was ſet in his chamber talking with his friends, where there were many beds to ſit on, ſome compaſſed the houſe round about, others came to the doores and windowes of his chamber; and they that ſhould do the deed to diſpatch him, which were the ZACYNTHIAN ſoldiers, came into his chāber in their coats without any ſword. But when they were come in, they that were without did ſhut the dores after them, and locked them in, leſt any man ſhould come out, and they that were within, fell vpon Dion, and thought to haue ſtrangled him. But when they ſaw they could not, they called for a ſword. Neuer a man that was within, durſt open the dores, though there were many with Dion. For they thought euery man to ſaue their owne liues, by ſuffering him to be killed, and therefore durſt not come to helpe him. So the murtherers taried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a SYRACVSAN, that gaue one of the ZACYNTHIAN ſoldiers

a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throat, as a weather they had holden a long time in their hands, euen dead for feare. The murther being executed, they caſt his ſiſter, and wife great with child, into priſon, and there the poore ladie was pitifully brought to bed of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring vp, then otherwiſe to do any thing with the child. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, becauſe Callippus began then a litle to grow to ſome trouble: for at the firſt, after he had ſlain Dion, he bare all the whole ſway for a time, and kept the city of SYRACVSA in his hands: and wrote vnto ATHENS, the which next vnto the immortall gods he was moſt afraid of, hauing defiled his hands in ſo damnable a treaſon. And therefore (in my opinion) it was not euill ſpoken, That ATHENS is a citie, of all other, that bringeth forth the beſt, when they giue themſelues to goodneſſe; and the wickedeſt people alſo, when they diſpoſe themſelues to euill: as their country alſo bringeth forth the beſt hony that is, and hemlocke in like manner that quickly diſpatcheth a man of his life. Howbeit, the gods and fortune did not ſuffer this treaſon and wicked man to reigne long, hauing come to the gouernment of a realme by ſo damnable a murther: but ſhortly after they gaue him his payment he had deſerued. For Callippus going to take a litle towne called * CATANA, he loſt the city of SYRACVSA: whereupon he ſaid, That he had loſt a city, & got a cheeſe-knife. Afterwards he went to aſſaile the MESSINIANS, and there he loſt a great number of his men, and amongſt them were ſlaine thoſe that killed Dion. Now Callippus finding no city in all SICILE that would receiue him, but that they all did hate and abhorre him, he went to take the city of RHEGIO in ITALY. There being in great diſtreſſe and need of all things, and not able to maintaine his ſouldiers; he was ſlaine by Leptines and Polyperchon, with the ſelfe ſame dagger wherwith Dion before was ſlaine: the which was knowne by the faſhion, being ſhort like the LACONIAN daggers, and alſo by the workmanſhip vpō it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was the end and death of Callippus. Now for Ariſtomachè and Aretè, they were taken out of priſon: and Icetes SYRACVSAN, that ſometimes had been one of Dions friends, tooke them home to his owne houſe, and vſed them very well and faithfully for a certain time, but afterwards was wonne and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he cauſed a ſhip to be prouided for them, and bare them in hand that he would ſend them into PELOPONNESVS: but he gaue them charge that caried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them ouer boord into the ſea. Some ſay that the two women, and the litle yong boy, were caſt aliue into the ſea. But this reward of the ſinfull act that he committed, returned againe vpon himſelfe, as it had done before vnto others. For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and beſides, the SYRACVSANS did alſo kill two of his daughters in reuenge of the vnfaithfulneſſe he had ſhewed vnto Dion.

MArcus Brutus came of that Iunius Brutus, for whom the ancient ROMAINES made his ſtatue of braſſe to be ſet vp in the Capitoll, with the images of the kings, holding a naked ſword in his hand: becauſe he had valiantly put downe the TARQVINES from the kingdome of ROME. But that Iunius Brutus being of a ſoure ſterne nature, not ſoftened by reaſon, being like vnto ſword blades of too hard a temper, was ſo ſubiect to his choler and malice he bare vnto the tyrants, that for their ſakes he cauſed his owne ſonnes to be executed. But this Marcus Brutus in contrarie manner, whoſe life we preſently write, hauing framed his manners of life by the rules of vertue, and ſtudie of Philoſophy, and hauing employed his wit, which was gentle and conſtant, in attempting of great things, me thinkes he was rightly made and framed vnto vertue. So that his very enemies which wiſh him moſt hurt, becauſe of his conſpiracie againſt Iulius Cæſar, if there were any noble attempt done in all this conſpiracie, they referre it wholy vnto Brutus; and all the cruell and violent acts vnto Caſſius, who was Brutus familiar friend, but not ſo well giuen, and conditioned as he. His mother Seruilia, it is thought, came of the bloud of Seruilius Hala; who, when Spurius Melius went about to make himſelfe king, and to bring it to paſſe had enticed the common people to rebell, tooke a dagger, and hid it cloſe vnder his arme, and went into the market place. When he was come thither, he made as though he had ſomwhat to ſay vnto him, and preſſed as neare him as he could: wherfore Melius ſtouping downe with his head, to heare what he would ſay, Seruilius ſtabbed him in with his dagger and ſlue him. Thus much all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father ſome for the euill will and malice they bare vnto Brutus, becauſe of the death of Iulius Cæſar, do maintaine, that he came not of Iunius Brutus that draue out the TARQVINS: for there were none left of his race, conſidering that his two ſons were executed for conſpiracy with the TARQVINS and that Marcus Brutus came of a meane houſe, the which was raiſed to honour and office in the common wealth but of late time. Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth the contrary, that Iunius Brutus indeed ſlue two of his ſonnes which were men growne, as the hiſtories doe declare; howbeit that there was a third ſonne, being but a litle child at that time, from whom the houſe and family afterwards was deriued: and furthermore, that there were in his time certaine famous men of that family, whose stature and countenance resembled much the image of Iunius Brutus. And thus much for this matter. Marcus Cato the Philosopher was brother vnto Seruilia, Marcus Brutus mother: whom Brutus studied most to follow of all the other ROMAINES, because he was his vncle, and afterwards he maried his daughter. Now touching the GRECIAN Philosophers, there was no sect nor Philosopher of them, but he heard and liked it: but aboue all the rest, he loued Platoes sect best, and did not much giue himselfe to the new or meane Academie (as they call it) but altogether to the old Academie. Therefore he did euer greatly esteeme the Philosopher Antiochus, of the city of ASCALON: but he was more familiar with his brother Ariston, who for learning and knowledge was inferior to many other Philosophers, but for wisedome & courtesie, equall with the best and chiefest. Touching Empylus, whom M. Brutus himselfe doth mention in his Epistles, and his friends also in many places, he was an Orator, and left an excellent booke he wrote of the death of Iulius Cæsar, and intituled it, Brutus. He was properly learned in the Latine tong, & was able to make long discourse in it: beside that he could also pleade very well in Latine. But for the Greek tong, they do note in some of his Epistles, that he counterfeited that briefe compendious maner of speech of the LACEDÆMONIANS. As when the war was begun, he wrot vnto the PERGAMENIANS in this sort: I vnderstand you haue giuen Dolabella money: if you haue done it willingly, you confesse you haue offended me; if against your wils, shew it then by giuing me willingly. Another time againe vnto the SAMIANS: Your councels be long, your doings be slow, consider the end. And in another Epistle he wrote vnto the PATAREIANS: The XANTHIANS despising my goodwil, haue made their country a graue of despaire, and the PATAREIANS that put themselues into my protection, haue lost no iot of their liberty: and therfore whilest you haue liberty, either chuse the iudgement of the PATAREIANS, or the fortune of the XANTHIANS. These were Brutus maner of letters, which were honored for their briefnesse. So Brutus being but a yong stripling, went into CYPRVS with his Vncle Cato, who was sent against Ptolomy king of ÆGYPT; who hauing slaine himselfe, Cato staying for certain necessarie busines he had in the Ile of RHODES, had already sent* Caninius, one of his friends before to keepe his treasure and goods. But Cato fearing he would be light-fingered, wrote vnto Brutus forthwith to come out of PAMPHILIA (where he was but newly recouered of a sickenesse) into CYPRVS; the which he did. The which iourney he was sory to take vpon him, both for respect of Caninius shame, whom Cato (as he thought) wrongfully slandered: as also because he thought this office too meane and vnmeet for him, being a young man, and giuen to his booke. This notwithstanding, he behaued himselfe so honestly and carefully, that Cato did greatly commend him: and after all the goods were sold and conuerted into readie money, he tooke the most part of it, and returned withall to ROME. Afterwards, when the Empire of ROME was deuided into factions, and that Cæsar and Pompey both were in armes one against the other, and that all the Empire of ROME was in garboile and vprore: it was thought then that Brutus would take part with Cæsar, because Pompey not long before had put his father to death. But Brutus preferring the respect of his countrey and commonwealth before priuate affection, and perswading himselfe that Pompey had iuster cause to enter into armes, then Cæsar, he then tooke part with Pompey; though oftentimes meeting him before, he thought scorne to speake to him, thinking it a great sin and offence in him, to speake to the murtherer of his father. But then submitting himselfe vnto Pompey, as vnto the head of the commonwealth, he sailed into SICILE, Lieutenant vnder Sestius that was Gouernor of that prouince. But when he saw that there was no way to rise, nor to do any noble exploits, and that Cæsar and Pompey were both camped together, and fought for victory: he went of himself vnsent for, into MACEDON: to be partaker of the danger. It is reported, that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his coming, when he saw him come to him, he rose out of his chaire, and went & imbraced him before them all, and vsed him as honorably, as he could haue done the noblest man that tooke his part. Brutus being in Pompeys campe, did nothing but study all day long, except he were with Pompey; and not only the daies before but the selfe same day also before the great battell was fought in the fields of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was ouercome. It was in the middest of Sommer, and the Sunne was very hote, besides that the campe was lodged neare vnto marrishes, and they that caried his tent, taried long before they came: whereupon, being very wearie with trauell, scant any meate came into his mouth at dinner time. Furthermore, when others slept, or thought what would happen the morow after, he fell to his booke, and wrote all day long til night, writing a breuiary of Polybius.

It

It is reported that Cæsar did not forget him, and that he gaue his Captaines charge before the battell, that they should beware they killed not Brutus in fight; and if he yeelded willingly vnto them, that then they should bring him vnto him: but if he resisted, and would not be taken, then that they should let him go, and do him no hurt. Some say he did this for Seruiliaes sake, Brutus mother. For when he was a yong man, he had been acquainted with Seruilia, who was extremely in loue with him. And because Brutus was borne in that time when their loue was hotest, he perswaded himselfe that he begate him. For proofe hereof the report goeth, that when the weightiest matters were in hand in the Senate, about the conspiracie of Catiline, which was likely to haue vndone the city of Rome, Cæsar and Cato sate neare together, and were both of contrarie minds to each other: and then, that in the meane time one deliuered Cæsar a letter. Cæsar tooke it, and read it softly to himselfe: but Cato cried out vpon Cæsar, and sayd he did not well to receiue aduertisements from enemies: whereupon the whole Senate beganne to murmure at it. Then Cæsar gaue Cato the letter as it was sent him, who read it, and found that it was a loue-letter sent from his sister Seruilia: thereupon he cast it againe to Cæsar, and sayd vnto him; Hold, drunken soppe. When he had done so, he went on with his tale, and maintained his opinion as he did before: so commonly was the loue of Seruilia knowne, which she bare vnto Cæsar. So, after Pompeys ouerthrow at the battell of Pharsalia, and that he fled to the sea, when Cæsar came to besiege his campe Brutus went out of the campe gates vnseene of any man, and leapt into a marish full of water and reeds. Then when night was come, he crept out, and went vnto the city of Larissa: from whence he wrote vnto Cæsar, who was very glad that he had scaped, and sent for him to come vnto him. When Brutus was come, he did not onely pardon him, but also kept him alwaies about him, and did as much honour and esteeme him, as any man he had in his company. Now, no man could tell whither Pompey was fled, and all were maruellous desirous to know it: wherefore Cæsar walking a good way alone with Brutus, he did aske him which way he thought Pompey tooke. Cæsar perceiuing by his talke that Brutus guessed certainly whither Pompey should be fled, he left all other wayes, and tooke his iourney directly towards Ægypt. Pompey (as Brutus had coniectured) was indeed fled into Ægypt, but there he was villanously slaine. Furthermore, Brutus obtained pardon of Cæsar for Cassius and defending also the King * of Lydians cause, he was ouerlayd with a world of accusations against him; howbeit, intreating for him, he saued him the best part of his Realme and Kingdome. They say also, that Cæsar sayd, when he heard Brutus pleade: I know not (sayd he) what this young man would; but what he would, he willeth it vehemently. For as Brutus grauitie and constant minde would not grant all men their requests that sued vnto him, but being mooued with reason and discretion, did alwaies encline to that which was good and honest: euen so when it was mooued to follow any matter, he vsed a kind of forcible and vehement perswasion, that calmed not till he had obtained his desire. For by flattering of him, a man could neuer obtaine any thing at his hands, nor make him to do that which was vniust. Further, he thought it not meete for a man of calling and estimation, to yeeld vnto the requests and intreaties of a shamelesse and importunate suter, requesting things vnmeete: the which notwithstanding some men do for shame, because they dare deny nothing, and therefore he was wont to say, That he thought them cuill brought vp in their youth, that could deny nothing. Now when Cæsar tooke sea to go into Africke against Cato and Scipio, he left Brutus Gouernour of Gaule in Italie on this side of the Alpes, which was a great good happe for that Prouince. For where others were spoiled and polled by the insolencie and couetousnesse of the Gouernors, as if it had been a country conquered, Brutus was a comfort and rest vnto their former troubles and miseries they sustained. But he referred it wholy vnto Cæsars grace and goodnesse. For when Cæsar returned out of Africke, and progressed vp and downe Italie, the things that pleased him best to see, were the cities vnder Brutus charge and gouernment, and Brutus himselfe; who honoured Cæsar in person, and whose companie also Cæsar greatly esteemed. Now there were diuers sorts of Prætorships in Rome, and it was looked for, that Brutus or Cassius would make suite for the chiefest Prætorship, which they called, The Prætorship of the city: because he that had that office, was as a Iudge to minister iustice, vnto the citizens. Therefore they stroue one against another, though some say, that there was some litle grudge betwixt them for other matters before, and that this contention did set them further out, though they were allied together: for Cassius had maried Iunia, Brutus sister. Others say, that this contention betwixt them came by Cæsar himselfe, who secretly gaue either of them both hope of his fauor. So their suit for the Prætorship was so followed and laboured of either party, that one of them put another into suite of law. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble exploits in armes, which Cassius had done against the PARTHIANS. So Cæsar after he had heard both their obiections, told his friends, with whom he consulted about this matter: Cassius cause is the iuster (said he) but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorship, and Cassius the second: who thanked not Cæsar so much for the Prætorship he had, as he was angry with him for that he had lost. But Brutus in many other things tasted of the benefite of Cæsars fauour in any thing he requested. For if he had listed, he might haue been one of Cæsars chiefest friends, and of greatest authoritie and credite about him. Howbeit, Cassius friends did dissuade him from it (for Cassius and he were not yet reconciled together sithence their first contention and strife for the Prætorship) & prayed him to beware of Cæsars sweete enticements, and to flie his tyrannicall fauors: the which they said Cæsar gaue him, not to honor his vertue, but to weaken his constant minde, framing it to the bent of his bow. Now Cæsar on the other side did not trust him ouermuch, nor was without tales brought vnto him against him: howbeit he feared his great mind, authoritie, and friends. Yet on the other side also, he trusted his good nature, and faire conditions. For, intelligence being brought him one day, that Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him: be answered, That these fat long-haired men made him not afraide, but the leane and whitely faced fellowes, meaning that by Brutus and Cassius. At another time also when one accused Brutus vnto him, and bad him beware of him: What, (said he againe, clapping his hands on his breast,) thinke ye that Brutus will not tary till this bodie die? meaning that none but Brutus after him was meete to haue such power as he had. And surely, (in my opinion) I am perswaded that Brutus, might indeed haue come to haue beene the chiefest man of ROME, if he could haue contented himselfe for a time to haue been next vnto Cæsar, and to haue suffered his glory and authority, which he had gotten by his great victories, to consume with time. But Cassius being a cholericke man, and hating Cæsar priuately, more then he did the tyrannie openly, he incensed Brutus against him. It is also reported, that Brutus could euill away with the tyrannie, and that Cassius hated the tyrant: making many complaints for the iniuries he had done him; and amongst others, for that he had taken away his Lions from him. Cassius had prouided them for his sports, when he shold be Ædilis, and they were found in the city of MEGARA, when it was wonne by Calenus; and Cæsar kept them. The rumor went, that these lions did maruellous great hurt to the MEGARIANS: for whē the city was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied vp, & turned thē loose, thinking they would haue done great mischiefe to the enemies, and haue kept them from setting vpon them: but the Lions (contrarie to expectation) turned vpon themselues that fled vnarmed, and did so cruelly teare some in peeces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause (as some do report) that made Cassius conspire against Cæsar. But this holdeth no water: for Cassius euen from his cradle could not abide any manner of tyrants, as it appeared when he was but a boy, and went vnto the same schoole that Faustus the son of Sylla did. And Faustus bragging among other boyes, highly boasted of his fathers kingdom: Cassius rose vp on his feet, and gaue him two good wirts on the eare. Faustus gouernors would haue put this matter in suite against Cassius: but Pompey would not suffer them, but caused the two boyes to be brought before him, and asked them, how the matter came to passe. Then Cassius (as it is written of him,) said vnto the other: Go too Faustus, speake againe and thou dares, before this Nobleman here, the same words that made me angry with thee, that my fists may walke once againe about thine eares. Such was Cassius hote stirring nature. But for Brutus, his friends and countrimen, both by diuers procurements, and sundrie rumours of the citie, and by many bils also, did openly call and procure him to do that he did. For vnder the image of his ancestor Iunius Brutus, (that draue the kings out of ROME) they wrote: O, that it pleased the gods thou wert now aliue, Brutus! and againe, That thou wert here among vs now! His tribunall or chaire, where he gaue audience during the time he was Prætor, was full of such bils: Brutus thou art asleepe, and art not Brutus indeed. And of all this, Cæsars flatterers were the cause: who beside many other exceeding and vnspeakeable honours they daily deuised for him, in the night time they put Diademes vpon the heads of his images, supposing thereby to allure the common people to call him King, in stead of Dictator. Howbeit it turned to the contrarie, (as we haue written more at large in Iulius Cæsars life.) Now when

Cassius felt his friends, and did stirre them vp against Cæsar: they all agreed, and promised to take part with him, so Brutus were the chiefe of their conspiracie. For they told him, that so high an enterprise and attempt as that, did not so much require men of manhood and courage to draw their swords, as it stood them vpon to haue a man of such estimatiō as Brutus, to make euery man boldly thinke, that by his onely presence the fact were holy and iust, If he tooke not this course, then that they should go to it with fainter hearts; and when they had done it, they should be more fearefull, because euery man would thinke that Brutus would not haue refused to haue made one with them, if the cause had been good and honest. Therefore Cassius considering this matter with himselfe, did first of all speake to Brutus, since they grew strange together for the suite they had for the Prætorship. So when he was reconciled to him againe, and that they had embraced one another, Cassius asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate house the first day of the moneth of March, because he heard say that Cæsars friendes should moue the councell that day, that Cæsar should be called king by the Senate. Brutus answered him, he wold not be there. But if we be sent for (said Cassius) how then? For my selfe then (said Brutus,) I meane not to hold my peace, but to withstand it, and rather die then lose my liberty: Cassius being bold, and taking hold of this word: Why, (quoth he) what ROMAINE is he aliue that will suffer thee to die for thy liberty? What? knowest thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkest thou that they be coblers, tapsters, or such like base mechanicall people, that write these billes and scroles which are found daily in thy Prætors chaire, and not the noblest men and best citizens that do it? No be thou well assured, that of other Prætors they looke for gifts, common distributions amongst the people, and for common playes, & to see fencers fight at the sharp, to shew the people pastime: but at thy hands, they specially require (as a due debt vnto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bent to suffer any extremity for thy sake, so that thou wilt shew thy selfe to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. Thereupon he kissed Brutus, and embraced him: and so each taking leaue of other, they went both to speake with their friends about it. Now amongst Pompeys friends, there was one called * Caius Ligarius, who had been accused vnto Cæsar for taking part with Pompey, and Cæsar discharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Cæsar so much for his discharge, as he was offended with him, for that he was brought in danger by his tyrannicall power, And therefore in his heart he was alwaie his mortall enemie, and was besides very familiar with Brutus, who went to see him being sicke in his bed, and said vnto him: Ligarius, in what a time art thou sicke? Ligarius rising vp in his bed, and taking him by the right hand, said vnto him: Brutus (said he) if thou hast any great enterprise in hand worthy of thy selfe, I am whole. After that time they began to feele all their acquaintance whom they trusted, and layd their heads together consulting vpon it, and did not onely picke out their friends, but all those also whom they thought stout enough to attempt any desperate matter, and that were not afraid to lose their liues. For this cause they durst not acquaint Cicero with their conspiracie, although he was a man whom they loued dearely, and trusted best: for they were affraid that he being a coward by nature, and age also hauing increased his feare, he would quite turne and alter al their purpose, and quench the heat of their enterprise, the which specially required hote and earnest execution; seeking by perswasion to bring all things to such safetie, as there should be no perill. Brutus also did let other of his friends alone, as Statilius Epicurian, and Faonius, that made profession to follow Marcus Cato: because that hauing cast out words a farre off, disputing together in Philosophie to feele their minds, Faonius answered, That ciuill warre was worse then tyrannical gouernment vsurped against the law. And Statilius told him also, That it were an vnwise part for him to put his life in danger, for a sort of ignorant fooles and asses. Labeo was present at this talke, and maintained the contrary against them both. But Brutus held his peace, as though it had beene a doubtfull matter, and a hard thing to haue bene decided. But afterwards, being out of their companie, he made Labeo priuie to his intent; who very readily offered himselfe to make one. And they thought good also to bring in another Brutus to ioyne with him, surnamed Albinus: who was no man of his hands himselfe, but because he was able to bring good force of a great number of slaues, and fencers at the sharpe, whom he kept to shew the people pastime with their fighting, besides also that Cæsar had some trust in him. Cassius and Labeo, told Brutus Albinus of it at the first, but he made them no answer. But when he had spoken with Brutus himselfe alone, and that Brutus had told him he was the chiefe ring-leader of all this conspiracie, then he willingly promised him the best aide he could, Furthermore, the onely name and great calling of Brutus did bring on the most of them to giue consent to this conspiracy: who hauing neuer take oathes together, nor taken or giuen any caution or assurance, nor binding themselues one to another by any religious othes, they all kept the matter so secret to themselues, and could so cunningly handle it, that notwithstanding, the gods did reueale it by manifest signes and tokens from aboue, and by predictions of sacrifices, yet all this would not be beleeued. Now Brutus, who knew very well, that for his sake all the noblest, valiantest, and most couragious men of ROME did venture their liues, weighing with himselfe the greatnesse of the danger: when he was out of his house, he did so frame and fashion his countenance and lookes that no man could discerne he had any thing to trouble his mind. But when night came that he was in his owne house, then he was cleane changed: for either care did wake him against his will when he would haue slept, or else oftentimes of himselfe he fell into such deepe thoughts of this enterprise, casting in his mind all the dangers that might happen: that his wife lying by him, found that there was some maruellous great matter that troubled his mind, not being wont to be in that taking, and that he could not well determine with himselfe. His wife Porcia (as we haue told you before) was the daughter of Cato, whom Brutus maried being his cousin, not a maiden, but a young widow after the death of her first husband Bibulus, by whom she had also a young sonne called Bibulus, who afterwards wrote a booke of the acts and gestes of Brutus, extant at this present day. This young ladie being excellently well seene in Philosophy, louing her husband well, and being of a noble courage, as she was also wise: because she would not aske her husband what he ayled before she had made some proofe by her selfe: she tooke a litle razour, such as Barbers occupie to pare mens nailes, and causing her maydes and women to go out of her chamber gaue her selfe a great gash with all in her thigh, that she was straight all of a goare bloud: and incontinently after, a vehement feauer tooke her, by reason of the paine of her wound. Then perceiuing her husband was maruellously out of quiet, and that he could take no rest, euen in her greatest paine of all, she spake in this sort vnto him: I being, ô Brutus, (said she) the daughter of Cato, was maried vnto thee; not to be thy bed-fellow and companion in bedde and at boord onely, like a harlot, but to be partaker also with thee of thy good and euill fortune. Now for thy selfe, I can find no cause of fault in thee touching our match: but for my part, how may I shew my duty towards thee, and how much I would do for thy sake, if I cannot constantly beare a secret mischance or griefe with thee, which requireth secrecie and fidelitie? I confesse, that a womans wit commonly is too weake to keepe a secret safely: but yet (Brutus) good education, and the company of vertuous men, haue some power to reforme the defect of nature. And for my selfe, I haue this benefite moreouer, that I am the daughter of Cato, and wife of Brutus, This notwithstanding, I did not trust to any of these things before, vntil that now I haue found by experience, that no paine or griefe whatsoeuer can ouercome me. With those words shee shewed him her wound on her thigh, and told him what she had done to proue her selfe. Brutus was amazed to heare what she sayd vnto him, and lifting vp his hands to heauen, he besought the goddes to giue him the grace he might bring his enterprise to so good passe, that he might be found a husband, worthy of so noble a wife as Porcia: so he then did comfort her the best he could. Now, a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cæsar would not faile to come, the conspiratours determined then to put their enterprise in execution, because they might meete safely at that time without suspition, and the rather, for that all the noblest and chiefest men of the city would be there: who when they should see such a great matter executed, would euery man set too their hands, for the defence of their libertie. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the Councell should be kept, was chosen of purpose by diuine prouidence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certaine place full of seates for men to sit in; where also was set vp the image of Pompey, which the city had made and consecrated in honour of him, when he did beautifie that part of the citie with the Theater he built, with diuers porches about it. In this place was the assembly of the Senate appointed to be, iust on the fifteenth day of the moneth March, which the ROMAINES call, Idus Martias: so that it seemed some god of purpose had brought Cæsar thither to be slaine, for reuenge of Pompeys death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his house with a dagger by his side vnder his long gowne, that no body saw nor knew, but his wife

wife onely. The other conſpiratours were all aſſembled at Caſſius houſe, to bring his ſonne into the market place, who on that day did put on the mans gowne, called Toga Virilis: and from thence they came all in a troupe together vnto Pompeys porch, looking that Cæſar would ſtraight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull aſſured conſtancie of theſe conſpirators, in ſo dangerous and weightie an enterpriſe as they had vndertaken. For many of them being Prætors, by reaſon of their office, whoſe dutie is to miniſter iuſtice to euery bodie; did not onely with great quietneſſe and courteſie heare them that ſpake vnto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gaue them attentiue eare, as if they had no other matter in their heads: but moreouer, they gaue iuſt ſentence, and carefully diſpatched the cauſes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certaine ſumme of money, refuſed to pay it, and cried out, that he did appeale vnto Cæſar. Then Brutus caſting his eyes vpon the conſpirators ſaid: Cæſar ſhall not let me to ſee the law executed. Notwithſtanding this, by chance there fell out many misfortunes vnto them, which was enough to haue marred the enterpriſe. The firſt and chiefeſt, was Cæſars long tarying, who came very late to the Senate: for, becauſe the ſignes of the ſacrifices appeared vnluckie, his wife Calphurnia kept him at home, and the Soothſayers bade him beware he went not abroad. The ſecond cauſe was, when one came vnto Caſca being a conſpirator, and taking him by the hand, ſaid vnto him: O Caſca, thou kepteſt it cloſe from me, but Brutus hath told me all. Caſca being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, & ſayd: Why, how now, how commeth it to paſſe thou art thus rich, that thou doeſt ſue to bee Ædilis? Thus Caſca being deceiued by the others doubtful words, he told them it was a thouſand to one, he blabbed not out all the conſpiracie. Another Senatour called Popilius Læna, after he had ſaluted Brutus and Caſſius more friendly then he was wont to doe, he rounded ſoftly in their eares, and told them: I pray the goddeſſe you may go through with that you haue taken in hand; but withall, diſpatch I reade you, for your enterpriſe is bewrayed. When he had ſaid, he preſently departed from them, and left them both affraid that their conſpiracie would out. Now in the meane time, there came one of Brutus men poſt haſt vnto him, and told him his wife was a dying. For Porcia being very carefull and penſiue for that which was to come, and being too weake to away with ſo great and inward griefe of mind, ſhe could hardly keepe within, but was frighted with euery little noyſe and crie ſhe heard, as thoſe that are taken and poſſeſt with the furie of the Bacchantes; asking euery man that came from the market place, what Brutus did, and ſtill ſent meſſenger after meſſenger, to know what newes. At length Cæſars comming being prolonged (as you haue heard,) Porciaes weakneſſe was not able to hold out any longer, and thereupon ſhee ſodainly ſwounded, that ſhe had no leyſure to go to her chamber, but was taken in the middeſt of her houſe, where her ſpeech and ſenſes failed her. Howbeit ſhe ſoone came to her ſelfe againe, and ſo was layd in her bed, and attended by her women. When Brutus heard theſe newes, it grieued him, as it is to be preſuppoſed: yet he left not off the care of his countrie and common wealth, neither went home to his houſe for any newes he heard. Now, it was reported that Cæſar was coming in his Litter: for he determined not to ſtay in the Senate all that day (becauſe he was affraid of the vnluckie ſignes of the ſacrifices) but to adiourne matters of importance vnto the next Seſſion & Councell holden, fayning himſelfe not to be well at eaſe. When Cæſar came out of his Litter, Popilius Læna (that had talked before with Brutus and Caſſius, and had praied the goddes they might bring this enterpriſe to paſſe) went vnto Cæſar, and kept him a long time with a talke. Cæſar gaue good eare vnto him wherefore the conſpiratorus (if ſo they ſhould be called) not hearing what hee ſaid to Cæſar, but coniecturing by that he had told them a litle before, that his talke was none other but the verie diſcouerie of their conſpiracy, they were affraid euerie man of them; and one looking in anothers face, it was eaſie to ſee that they all were of a mind, that it was no tarying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they ſhould kill themſelues with their owne hands. And when Caſſius and certaine other clapped their hands on their ſwords vnder their gownes to draw them; Brutus marking the countenance and geſture of Læna, and conſidering that he did vſe himſelfe rather like an humble and earneſt ſuter, then like an accuſer: he ſaid nothing to his companion (becauſe there were many amongſt them that were not of the conſpiracie,) but with a pleaſant countenance encouraged Caſſius. And immediatly after, Læna went from Cæſar, and kiſſed his hand: which ſhewed plainely that it was for ſome matter concerning himſelfe, that he had held him ſo long in talke. Now all the Senators being entred firſt into this place or chapter house where the councell should be kept, all the other conspiratours straight stood about Cæsars chaire, as if they had had something to say vnto him. And some say, that Cassius casting his eies vpon Pompeys image, made his prayer vnto it, as if it had bene aline. * Trebonius on the other side, drew Antonius aside, as he came into the house where the Senate sate, and held him with a long talke without. When Cæsar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honour him at his coming in. So when he was set, the conspiratours flocked about him, and amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble suite for the calling home againe of his brother that was banished. They all made as though they were intercessors for him, and tooke Cæsar by the hands, and kissed his head and breast. Cæsar at the first, simply refused their kindnesse and intreaties: but afterwards, perceiuing they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Cæsars gowne ouer his shoulders, and Casca that stood behind him, drew his dagger first and strake Cæsar vpon the shoulder, but gaue him no great wound. Cæsar feeling himselfe hurt, tooke him straight by the hand he held his dagger in, & cried out in Latine: O traitor Casca, what dost thou? Casca on the other side cried in Greeke, and called his brother to helpe him. So diuerse running on a heap together to flie vpō Cæsar, he looking about him to haue fled, saw Brutus with a sword drawne in his hand ready to strike at him: then he let Cascaes hand goe, and casting his gowne ouer his face, suffered euery man to strike at him that would. Then the conspirators thronging one vpon another, because euery man was desirous to haue a cut at him, so many swords and daggers lighting vpon one bodie, one of them hurt another, and among them Brutus caught a blow on his hand, because he would make one in murthering of him, and all the rest also were euery man of them bloudied. Cæsar being slaine in this maner, Brutus standing in the middest of the house, would haue spoken, and staied the other Senators that were not of the conspiracie, to haue told them the reason why they had done this fact. But they as men both affraid and amazed, fled one vpon anothers necke in hast to get out at the dore, and no man followed them. For it was set downe, and agreed betweene them, that they should kill no man but Cæsar onely, and should intreat all the rest to looke to defend their libertie. All the conspiratours, but Brutus, determining vpon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, because he was a wicked man, and that in nature fauoured tyrannie: besides also, for that he was in great estimation with soldiers, hauing been conuersant of long time amongst them: and especially hauing a mind bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authoritie at that time, being Consull with Cæsar. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he said it was not honest: secondly, because he told them there was hope of change in him. For he did not mistrust, but that Antonius being a noble minded & couragious man (when he should know that Cæsar was dead) would willingly help his country to recouer her liberty, hauing thē an example vnto him, to follow their courage and vertue. So Brutus by this means saued Antonius life, who at that present time disguised himselfe, and stole away: but Brutus & his consorts, hauing their swords bloody in their hands, went straight to the Capitoll, perswading the Romaines as they went, to take their libertie againe. Now, at the first time when the murther was newly done there were sudden outcries of people that ranne vp and downe the citie, the which indeed did the more increase the feare and tumult. But when they saw they slue no man, neither did spoile or make hauock of any thing, then certaine of the Senators, and many of the people enboldening themselues, went to the Capitoll vnto them. There a great number of men being assembled together one after another, Brutus made an oration vnto them to win the fauor of the people, and to iustifie that they had done. All those that were by, said they had done well, and cried vnto them, that they should boldly come downe from the Capitol: whereupon Brutus and his companions came boldly downe into the market place. The rest followed in troupe, but Brutus went formost, very honorably cōpassed in round about with the noblest mē of the city, which brought him from the Capitol, through the market place, to the pulpit for oratiōs. Whē the people saw him in the pulpit, although they were a multitude of rakehels of all sorts, and had a good wil to make some stirre: yet being ashamed to do it, for the reuerēce they bare vnto Brutus, they kept silence to heare what he would say: Whē Brutus began to speake, they gaue him quiet audience: howbeit immediatly after, they shewed that they were not all contented with the murther. For when another called Cinna would haue spoken, and began to accuse Cæsar, they fell into a great vprore among them, and maruellously reuiled him. Insomuch that the conspiratours returned againe into the Capitoll. There Brutus

tus being affraid to be beſieged, ſent backe againe the Noblemen that came thither with him: thinking it no reaſon, that they which were no partakers of the murther, ſhould be partakers of the danger. Then the next morning the Senate being aſſembled, and holden within the temple of the goddeſſe Tellus, to wit, the Earth: and Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero, hauing made a motion to the Senate in that aſſembly, that they ſhould take an order to pardon and forget all that was paſt, and to eſtabliſh friendſhip and peace againe: it was decreed, that they ſhould not only be pardoned, but alſo that the Conſuls ſhould referre it to the Senate what honours ſhould be appointed vnto them. This being agreed vpon, the Senate brake vp, and Antonius the Conſull, to put them in heart that were in the Capitoll, ſent them his ſonne for a pledge. Vpon this aſſurance, Brutus and his companions came downe from the Capitoll, where euery man ſaluted and embraced each other, among the which, Antonius himſelfe did bid Caſſius to ſupper to him: and Lepidus alſo bade Brutus, and ſo one bad another, as they had friendſhip and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called againe to councell, did firſt of all commend Antonius, for that he had wiſely ſtayed and quenched the beginning of a ciuill warre: then they alſo gaue Brutus and his conſorts great praiſes; and laſtly they appointed them ſeuerall gouernments of Prouinces. For vnto Brutus they appointed CRETA; AFRICKE vnto Caſſius; ASIA vnto Trebonius; BITHYNIA vnto Cimber; and vnto the other Decius Brutus Albinus, GAVLE on this ſide of the Alpes. When this was done, they came to talke of Cæſars will and teſtament and of his funerals and tombe. Then Antonius thinking good his teſtament ſhould be read openly, and alſo that his bodie ſhould be honourably buried, and not in hugger mugger, leſt the people might thereby take occaſion to be worſe offended if they did otherwiſe: Caſſius ſtoutly ſpake againſt it. But Brutus went with the motion, and agreed vnto it: wherein it ſeemeth he committed a ſecond fault. For the firſt fault he did, was when he would not conſent to his fellow conſpirators, that Antonius ſhould be ſlaine: and therefore he was iuſtly accuſed, that therby he had ſaued and ſtrengthened a ſtrong and grieuous enemie of their conſpiracy. The ſecond fault was, when he agreed that Cæſars funerals ſhould be as Antonius would haue them, the which indeed marred all. For firſt of all, when Cæſars teſtament was openly read among them, wherby it appeared that he bequeathed vnto euery citizen of ROME, 75 Drachmaes a man; & that he left his gardens and arbors vnto the people, which he had on this ſide of the riuer Tybet, in the place where now the temple of Fortune is built: the people then loued him, and were maruellous ſorie for him. Afterwards, when Cæſars bodie was brought into the market place, Antonius making his funerall oration in praiſe of the dead, according to the ancient cuſtome of ROME, and perceiuing that his words moued the common people to compaſſion, he framed his eloquence to make their hearts yearne the more; & taking Cæſars gowne all bloodie in his hand, he layd it open to the ſight of them all, ſhewing what a number of cuts and holes it had vpon it. Therewithall the people fell preſently into ſuch a rage and mutinie, that there was no more order kept amongſt the common people. For ſome of them cried out, Kill the murtherers: others plucked vp formes, tables, and ſtalles about the market place, as they had done before at the funerals of Clodius, aad hauing laid them all on a heape together, they ſet them on fire, and thereupon did put the bodie of Cæſar, and burnt it in the mids of the moſt holy places. And furthermore, when the fire was throughly kindled, ſome here, ſome there, tooke burning firebrands, and ranne with them to the murtherers houſes that killed him, to ſet thē on fire. Howbeit, the conſpirators foreſeeing the danger before had wiſely prouided for themſelues, and fledde. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had been no partaker of the conſpiracy, but was alway one of Cæſars chiefeſt friends: he dreamed the night before, that Cæſar bad him to ſupper with him, and that he refuſing to goe, Cæſar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, ſo that at length he led him by the hand into a great darke place, where being maruellouſly affraid, he was driuen to follow him in ſpite of his heart. This dreame put him all night into a feauer, and yet notwithſtanding, the next morning whē he heard that they caried Cæſars body to burial, being aſhamed not to accompany his funerals, he went out of his houſe, and thruſt himſelfe into the preaſe of the common people that were in a great vprore. And becauſe ſome one called him by his name, Cinna: the people thinking he had beene that Cinna, who in an oration he made, had ſpoken very euill of Cæſar, they falling vpon him in their rage, ſlue him outright in the market place. This made Brutus and his companions more affraid then any other thing, next vnto the change of Antonius. Wherefore they got them out of ROME, and kept at the firſt in the citie of ANTIVM, hoping to returne

againe to Rome, when the furie of the people was a little asswaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, considering that they had to deale with a fickle and vnconstant multitude, easie to be caried, and that the Senate stood for them: who notwithstanding made no enquirie for them that had torne poore Cinna the Poet in peeces, but caused them to be sought for and apprehended that went with firebrands to set fire on the conspiratours houses. The people growing weary now of Antonius pride and insolency, who ruled all things in a maner with absolute power, they desired that Brutus might returne againe; & it was also looked for, that Brutus would come himselfe in person to play the plaies which were due to the people, by reason of his office of Prætorship. But Brutus vnderstanding that many of Cæsars soldiers which serued vnder him in the warres, and that also had lands and houses giuen them in the cities where they lay, did lie in waite for him to kill him, and that they daily by small companies came by one and by one into Rome, he durst no more returne thither: but yet the people had the pleasure and pastime in his absence, to see the games and sports he made them, which were sumptuously set forth and furnished with all things necessary, sparing for no cost. For he had brought a great number of strange beasts, of the which he would not giue one of them to any friend he had, but that they should all be employed in his games: and went himselfe as farre as Byzantivm, to speake to some players of comedies and musitians that were there. And further he wrote vnto his friends for one Canutius an excellent player, that whatsoeuer they did, they should intreate him to play these plaies. For (said he) it is no reason to compell any Græcian, vnlesse he will come of his owne good will. Moreouer, he wrote also vnto Cicero, & earnestly prayed him in any case to be at these plaies. Now the state of Rome standing in these termes, there fell out another change and alteration, when the yong man Octauius Cæsar came to Rome. He was the sonne of Iulius Cæsars Neece, whom he had adopted for his sonne, and made his heire, by his last will and testament. But when Iulius Cæsar his adopted father was slaine, he was in ŷ city of Apollonia (where he studied) tarying for him, because he was determined to make war with the Parthians: but when he heard the newes of his death, he returned againe to Rome, where to begin to currie fauour with the common people, he first of all tooke vpon him his adopted fathers name, and made distribution among them of the money which his father had bequeathed vnto them. By this meanes he troubled Antonius sorely, and by force of money, got a great number of his fathers soldiers together, that had serued in the wars with him. And Cicero himselfe, for the great malice he bare Antonius, did fauour his proceedings: but Brutus marueilously reproued him for it, and wrote vnto him, that he seemed by his doings not to be sory to haue a master, but only to be afraid to haue one that should hate him: and that all his doings in the commonwealth did witnesse, that he chose to be subiect to a mild & courteous bondage, sith by his words and writings he did commend this yong man Octauius Cæsar, to be a good and gentle Lord. For our predecessors (said he) would neuer abide to be subiect to any Masters, how gentle or mild soeuer they were: and for his owne part, that he had neuer resolutely determined with himself to make war, or peace; but otherwise, that he was certainly minded neuer to be slaue nor subiect. And therefore he wondred much at him, how Cicero could be afraid of the danger of ciuil wars, and would not be affraid of a shamefull peace: and that to thrust Antonius out of the vsurped tyrannie, in recompence he went about to stablish yong Octauius Cæsar tyrant. These were the contents of Brutus first letters he wrote vnto Cicero. Now the city of Rome being diuided in two factions, some taking part with Antonius, other also leaning vnto Octauius Cæsar, and the soldiers making port-sale of their seruice to him that would giue most: Brutus seeing the state of Rome would be vtterly ouerthrowne, he determined to go out of Italy, and went on foote through the country of Lvke, vnto the citie of Elea, standing by the sea. There Porcia being readie to depart from her husband Brutus, and to returne to Rome, did what she could to dissemble the griefe and sorrow she felt at her heart: but a certaine painted table bewrayed her in the end, although vntill that time she shewed alwaies a constant and patient mind. The deuice of the table was taken out of the Greeke stories, how Andromachè accompanied her husband Hector, when he went out of the city of Troy to go to the warres, and how Hector deliuered her his little sonne, and how her eyes were neuer off him. Porcia seeing this picture, and likening her selfe to be in the same case, she fell a weeping: and coming thither oftentimes in a day to see it, she wept still. Acilius one of Brutus friends perceiuing that, rehearsed the verses Andromachè speaketh to this purpose in Homer:

Brutus playes and sports at Rome in his absence.

Octauius Cæsar coming to Rome.

Thou

Thou Hector art my father, and my mother, and my brother,
And husband eke, and all in all: I mind not any other.

Then Brutus ſmiling, anſwered againe: But yet (ſaid he) I cannot for my part ſay vnto Porcia, as Hector anſwered Andromaché in the ſame place of the Poet:

Tuſh, meddle thou with duly weighing out.
Thy maydes their taske, and pricking on a clout.

For indeed the weake conſtitution of her bodie, doth not ſuffer her to performe in ſhew, the valiant actes that we are able to do: but for courage and conſtant mind, ſhe ſhewed herſelfe as ſtout in the defence of her countrey, as any of vs. Bibulus the ſonne of Porcia, reporteth this ſtorie thus. Now Brutus embarking at ELEA in LVKE, he ſayled directly towards ATHENS. When he arriued there, the people of ATHENS receiued him with common ioyes of reioycing, and honorable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whom he went daily to heare the Lectures of Theomneſtus the Academicke Philoſopher, and of Cratippus the Peripateticke, and ſo would talke with them in Philoſophy, that it ſeemed he left all other matters, and gaue himſelfe onely to ſtudy: howbeit, ſecretly notwithſtanding, he made preparation for warre. For he ſent Hereſtratus into MACEDON, to win the Captaines and ſouldiers that were vpon thoſe marches, and he did alſo entertaine all the yong Gentlemen of the ROMAINES, whom he found in ATHENS ſtudying Philoſophie: amongſt them he found Ciceroes ſon, whom he highly praiſed and commended, ſaying: That whether he waked or ſlept, he found him of a noble mind and diſpoſition, he did in nature ſo much hate tyrants. Shortly after, he began to enter openly into armes: and being aduertiſed that there came out of ASIA a certaine fleet of ROMAINE ſhippes that had good ſtore of money in them, and that the Captaine of thoſe ſhips (who was an honeſt man, and his familiar friend) came towards ATHENS: he went to meet him as far as the Ile of CARYSTOS, and hauing ſpoken with him there, he handled him ſo, that he was contented to leaue his ſhips in his hands: whereupon he made him a notable banquet at his houſe, becauſe it was on his birth day. When the feaſt day came, and that they began to drinke luſtily one to another, the gueſtes dranke to the victorie of Brutus, and the liberty of the ROMAINES. Brutus therfore to encourage them farther, called for a bigger cup, & holding it in his hand, before he dranke ſpake this aloud:

How Brutus beſtowed his time at Athens.
Brutus prepareth himſelfe to warre.
Brutus commendeth Ciceroes ſon

My deſtinie and Phœbus are agreed,
To bring me to my finall end with ſpeed.

And for proofe hereof, it is reported, that the ſame day he fought his laſt battell by the citie of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his tent, he gaue them for the word and ſignall of battell, Phœbus: ſo that it was thought euer ſince, that this his ſodaine crying out at the feaſt, was a prognoſtication of his misfortune that ſhould happen. After this, Antiſtius gaue him of the money he caried into ITALIE, fiftie Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys ſouldiers that ſtraggled vp and downe THESSALY, came with very good will vnto him. He tooke from Cinna alſo, fiue hundred horſemen, which he caried into ASIA, vnto Dolabella. After that, he went by ſea, vnto the city of DEMETRIADE, and there tooke a great deale of armour and munition which was going to Antonius: and the which had been made and forged there by Iulius Cæſars commandement, for the wars againſt the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Hortenſius Gouernor of MACEDON, did reſigne the gouernment thereof vnto him. Beſides, all the Princes, Kings, and Noblemen thereabouts, came and ioyned with him, when it was told him, that Caius (Antonius brother) coming out of ITALY, had paſſed the ſea, and came with great ſpeed towards the citie of DYRRACHIVM, and APOLLONIA, to get the ſouldiers into his hands, which Gabinius had there. Brutus therefore to preuent him, went preſently with a few of his men in the middeſt of winter when it did ſnow hard, and tooke his way through hard and foule countries, and made ſuch ſpeede indeede, that he was there long before Antonius ſumpters, that caried the victuals. So that when he came neare to DYRRACHIVM, a diſeaſe tooke him, which the Phiſitians call βουλιμια to ſay, A cormorant and vnſatiable appetite to eate: by reaſon of the cold and paines he had taken. This ſickneſſe chanceth often, both to men and beaſtes, that trauell when it hath ſnowen: either becauſe the naturall heate being retired into the inward parts of the body, by the coldneſſe of the aire hardening the skinne, doth ſtraight digeſt and conſume the meate: or elſe becauſe a ſharpe ſubtil wind coming by reaſon of the ſnow when it is molten, doth pierce into the body, and driueth out the naturall heate which was caſt outward. For it ſeemeth, that the heate being quenched with the cold, which it meeteth withall coming out of the skinne of the body, cauſeth

the sweates that follow the disease. But hereof we haue spoken at large in other places. Brutus being very faint, and hauing nothing in his campe to eate, his souldiers were compelled to go to their enemies; and comming to the gates of the citie, they praied the warders to helpe them to bread. When they heard in what case Brutus was, they brought him both meate and drinke: in requitall whereof, afterwards, when he wan the citie, he did not onely intreate and vse the citizens thereof courteously, but all the inhabitants of the citie also for their sakes. Now when Caius Antonius was arriued in the citie of Apollonia, he sent vnto the souldiers thereabouts to come vnto him. But when he vnderstood that they went all to Brutus: and furthermore, that the Citizens of Apollonia did fauour him much: he then forsooke that city, and went vnto the city of Bythrotvs; but yet he lost three of his ensignes by the way, that were slaine euery man of them. Then he sought by force to winne certaine places of strength about Byllis, and to driue Brutus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obtaine his purpose, he fought a battell with Cicero, the sonne of Marcus Tullius Cicero, by whow he was ouercome. For Brutus made the yonger Cicero a Captaine, and did many notable exploits by his seruice. Shortly after, hauing stolen vpon Caius Antonius in certaine marrishes farre from the place frō whence he fled, he would not set on him with fury but onely rode round about him, cōmanding his souldiers to spare him and his men, as reckoning them all his owne without stroke striking: and so indeed it happened: for they yeelded themselues and their Captaine Antonius, vnto Brutus; so that Brutus had now a great army about him. Now Brutus kept this Caius Antonius long time in his office, & neuer tooke from him the markes and signes of his Consulship, although many of his friends, and Cicero among others, wrote vnto him to put him to death. But when he saw Antonius secretly practised with his Captaines to make some alteration, then he sent him into a ship, and made him to be kept there. When the souldiers whom Caius Antonius had corrupted, were gotten into the city of Apollonia, and sent from thence vnto Brutus to come vnto them, he made them answer, That it was not the maner of Romaine Captaines to come to the souldiers, but the souldiers to come to the Captaine, and to craue pardon for their offences committed. Thereupon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So Brutus preparing to goe into Asia, newes came vnto him of the great change at Rome: for Octauius Cæsar was in armes, by commandement and authoritie from the Senate, against Marcus Antonius. But after that hee had driuen Antonius out of Italy, the Senate began then to be afraid of him, because he sued to be Consul, which was contrarie to the law; and kept a great armie about him when the Empire of Rome had no need of them. On the other side, Octauius Cæsar perceiuing the Senate stayed not there, but turned vnto Brutus that was out of Italy, and that they appointed him the gouernment of certaine Prouinces: then he began to be affraid for his part, and sent vnto Antonius to offer him his friendship. Then coming on with his army neare to Rome, he made himselfe to be chosen Consul, whether the Senate would or not, when he was yet but a stripling or springall of twentie yeares old, as himselfe reporteth in his owne Commentaries. So when he was Consul, he presently appointed Iudges to accuse Brutus and his companions, for killing of the noblest person in Rome, and chiefest Magistrate, without law or iudgement: and made L. Cornificius accuse Brutus, and M. Agrippa, Cassius. So the parties accused were condemned, because the Iudges were compelled to giue such sentence. The voice went, that when the Herauld (according to the custome after sentence giuen) went vp to the chaire or pulpit for orations, and proclaimed Brutus with a loud voyce, summoning him to appeare in person before the Iudges, the people that stood by sighed openly, and the Noblemen that were present hung downe their heads, and durst not speake a word. Among them the teares fell from Publius Silicius eies: who shortly after, was one of the proscripts or outlawes appointed to be slaine. After that, these three Octauius Cæsar, Antonius and Lepidus made an agreement betweene themselues, and by those articles deuided the Prouinces belonging to the Empire of Rome among themselues, and did set vp bils of proscription and outlawrie condemning two hundred of the noblest men of Rome to suffer death, and among that number, Cicero was one, Newes being brought therof into Macedon, Brutus being then inforced to do it, wrote vnto Hortensius that he should put Caius Antonius to death, to be reuenged of the death of Cicero, & of the other Brutus, of the which the one was his friend, & the other a kinsmā. For this cause therfore, Antonius afterwards taking Hortensius at the battell of Philippes, he made him to be slaine vpon his brothers tombe. But when Brutus said, that he was more ashamed of the cause for the which Cicero was slaine, slaine, then he was otherwise sorie for his death; and that he could not but greatly reproue his friends he had at Rome, who were slaues more through their own fault, then through their valiantnesse or manhood which vsurped the tyranny: considering that they were so cowardly and faint hearted, as to suffer the sight of those things before their eyes, the report whereof should onely haue grieued them to the heart. Now when Brutus had passed ouer his army (that was verie great) into Asia, he gaue order for the gathering of a great number of ships together, as well in the coast of Bithynia, as also in the citie of Cyzicvm, because he would haue an armie by sea; and himselfe in the meane time went vnto the cities, taking order for all things, and giuing audience to princes and noblemen of the countrie that had to doe with him. Afterwards he sent vnto Cassius in Syria, to turne him from his iourney into Ægypt, telling him that it was not for the conquest of any kingdome for themselues, that they wandred vp and downe in that sort, but contrarily, that it was to restore their countrey againe to her liberty: and that the multitude of soldiers they gatherrd together, was to subdue the tyrants that would keepe them in slauerie and subiection. Wherefore regarding their chiefe purpose and intent, they should not be farre from Italy, as neare as they could possible, but should rather make all the haste they could, to keepe their countrimen. Cassius beleeued him, and returned. Brutus went to meete him, and they both met at the citie of Smyrna, which was the first time that they saw together since they tooke leaue each of other, at the hauen of Piræa in Athens, the one going into Syria, and the other into Macedon. So they were maruellous ioyfull, and no lesse couragious, when they saw the great armies together which they had both leauied: considering that they departed out of Italy, like naked and poore banished men, without armor and money, nor hauing any ship ready, nor soldier about them, nor any one towne at their commandement; yet notwithstanding, in a short time after they were now met together, hauing shippes, money, and soldiers enough, both footmen and horsemen, to fight for the Empire of Rome. Now Cassius would haue done Brutus much honour, as Brutus did vnto him, but Brutus most commonly preuented him, and went first vnto him, both because he was the elder man, as also for that he was sickly of bodie. And men reputed him commonly to be very skilfull in warres, but otherwise maruellous cholericke and cruell, who sought to rule men by feare, rather then with lenitie: and on the other side he was too familiar with his friends, and would iest too broadly with them. But Brutus in contrary manner, for his vertue and valiantnesse, was welbeloued of the people and his owne, esteemed of noblemen, and hated of no man, not so much as of his enemies; because he was a maruellous lowly and gentle person, noble minded, and would neuer be in any rage, nor caried away with pleasure and couetousnesse, but had euer an vpright mind with him, and would neuer yeeld to any wrong or iniustice; the which was the chiefest cause of his fame, of his rising, & of the goodwill that euery man bare him: for they were all perswaded that his intent was good. For they did not certainly beleeue, that if Pompey himself had ouercome Cæsar, he would haue resigned his authority to the law, but rather they were of opinion, that he would stil keepe the soueraignte and absolute gouernment in his hands, taking onely, to please the people, the title of Consul, or Dictator, or of some other more ciuil office. And as for Cassius, a hote, cholericke, and cruell man, that would oftentimes be caried away from iustice for gaine, it was certainly thought that he made warre, and put himselfe into sundrie dangers, more to haue absolute power and authoritie, then to defend the liberty of his countrey. For, they that will also consider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marius, & Carbo, it is out of doubt that the end & hope of their victorie, was to be the Lords of their countrey, and in manner they did all confesse, that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lords of the Empire of Rome. And in contrary maner, his enemies themselues did neuer reproue Brutus for any such change or desire. For, it was said that Antonius spake it openly diuerse times, that he thought, that of all them that had slaine Cæsar, there was none but Brutus onely that was moued to do it, as thinking the act commendable of it selfe: but that all the other conspiratours did conspire his death for some priuate malice or enuie, that they otherwise did beare vnto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutus did not trust so much to the power of his army, as he did to his owne vertue, as it is to be seene by his writings. For approching neare to the instant danger he wrote vnto Pomponius Atticus, that his affaires had the best hap that could bee. For, said he, either I will set my countrey at liberty by battell, or by honorable death rid me of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certaine and assured of all things else, this one thing

onely was doubtfull to them: whether they ſhould liue or die with liberty. He wrote alſo that Antonius had his due paiment for his folly. For where he might haue bin a partner equally of the glory of Brutus, Caſſius, and Cato, & haue made one with them, he liked better to chuſe to be ioyned with Octauius Cæſar alone: with whom, though now he be not ouercome by vs, yet ſhall he ſhortly after alſo haue war with him. And truly he proued a true prophet, for ſo came it indeed to paſſe. Now whileſt Brutus and Caſſius were together in the citie of SMYRNA, Brutus, prayed Caſſius to let him haue ſome part of his money whereof he had great ſtore; becauſe all that he could rap and rend of his ſide he had beſtowed it in making ſo great a number of ſhips, that by meanes of them they ſhould keepe all the ſea at their commandement. Caſſius friends hindered this requeſt, and earneſtly diſſwaded him from it: perſwading him, that it was no reaſon that Brutus ſhould haue the money which Caſſius hath gotten together by ſparing, and leauied with great euill will of the people their ſubiects, for him to beſtow liberally vpon his ſouldiers, and by this meanes to win their good wils, by Caſſius charge. This notwithſtanding, Caſſius gaue him the third part of this totall ſumme. So Caſſius and Brutus then departing from each other, Caſſius tooke the citie of RHODES, where he too diſhoneſtly and cruelly vſed himſelfe: although when he came into the city, he anſwered ſome of the inhabitants who called him Lord and King, that he was neither Lord nor King, but he onely that had ſlaine him, that would haue been Lord and King. Brutus departing from thence, ſent vnto the LYCIANS to require money, and men of war. But there was a certaine Orator called Naucrates, that made the cities to rebell againſt him, inſomuch that the countrimen of that country kept the ſtraights and little mountaines, thinking by that means to ſtop Brutus paſſage. Wherfore Brutus ſent his horſemen againſt them, who ſtole vpon them as they were at dinner, and ſlue ſixe hundred of them: and taking all the ſmall townes and villages, he did let all the priſoners he took, go without payment of ranſome, hoping by this his great courteſie to win them, to draw all the reſt of the countrey vnto him. But they were ſo fierce and obſtinate, that they would mutine for euery ſmall hurt they receiued as he paſſed by their countrey, and did deſpiſe his courteſie and good nature: vntill that at length he went to beſiege the citie of the XANTHIANS, within the which were ſhut vp the cruelleſt and moſt warlike men of LYCIA. There was a riuer that ranne by the wals of the city, in the which many men ſaued themſelues, ſwimming betweene two waters, and fled: howbeit they layd nets ouerthwart the riuer, and tied little bels on the top of them, to ſound when any man was taken in the nets. the XANTHIANS made a ſally out by night, and came to fire certaine engines of the battery that beat downe their wals: but they were preſently driuen in againe by the ROMAINES, ſo ſoone as they were diſcouered. The wind by chance was maruellous bigge, and increaſed the flame ſo ſore, that it violently caried it into the cranewes of the wall of the city, that the next houſes vnto them were ſtraight ſet on fire thereby. Wherfore Brutus being afraid that all the city would take on fire, he preſently commanded his men to quench the fire, and to ſaue the towne if it might be. But the LYCIANS at that inſtant fell into ſuch a frenſie, and ſtrange and horrible deſpaire, that no man can well expreſſe it: and a man cannot more rightly compare or liken it, then to a franticke and moſt deſperate deſire to die. For all of them together, with their wiues and children, maiſters and ſeruants, and of all ſorts of age whatſoeuer, fought vpon the rampiers of their wals and did caſt downe ſtones and fire-workes on the ROMAINES, which were very buſie in quenching the flame of the fire, to ſaue the citie. And in contrary manner alſo, they brought faggots, drie wood, and reeds, to bring the fire further into the city as much as might be, increaſing it by ſuch things as they brought. Now when the fire had gotten into all parts of the citie, and that the flame burnt bright in euery place: Brutus being ſorrie to ſee it, got vpon his horſe, and rode round about the wals of the citie, to ſee if it were poſſible for to ſaue it, and held vp his hands to the inhabitants, praying them to pardon their citie, and to ſaue themſelues. Howbeit they would not be perſwaded, but did all that they could poſſible to caſt themſelues away, not only men and women, but alſo litle children. For ſome of them weeping and crying out, did caſt themſelues into the fire: others headlong throwing themſelues downe from the wals, brake their neckes: others alſo made their backes bare, to the naked ſwords of their fathers, and vndid their clothes, praying them to kill them with their owne hands. After the citie was burnt, they found a woman hanged vp by the necke, holding one of her children in her hand dead by her, hanged vp alſo: and in the other hand a burning torch ſetting fire on her houſe. Some would haue had Brutus to haue ſeene her, but he would not ſee ſo horrible and tragicall a ſight: but when

when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and caused an Herauld to make proclamation by sound of trumpet, that he would giue a certaine summe of money, to euery soldier that could saue a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) aboue fiftie of them saued, and yet they were saued against their wils. Thus the XANTHIANS hauing ended the reuolution of their fatall destinie after a long continuance of time, they did through their desperation, renew the memorie of the lamentable calamities of their Ancestors, who in like manner, in the warres of the PERSIANS, did burne their citie, and destroyed themselues. Therefore Brutus likewise besieging the citie of the PATAREIANS, perceiuing that they stoutly resisted him, he was also afraid of that, and could not well tell whether he should giue assault to it, or not, lest they would fall into the despaire and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit hauing taken certaine of their women prisoners, he sent them backe againe, without payment of ransome. Now they that were the wiues and daughters of the noblest men of the citie, reporting vnto their parents, that they had found Brutus a mercifull, iust, and courteous man, they perswaded them to yeeld themselues and their city vnto him; the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded themselues, diuerse other cities also followed them, and did the like: and found Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they should haue done, but specially far aboue Cassius. For Cassius, about the selfe same time, after he had compelled the RHODIANS euerie man to deliuer all the ready mony they had in gold and siluer in their houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the summe of eight thousand talents: yet he condemned the city besides, to pay the summe of fiue hundred talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leauied of all the country of LYCIA but an hundred and fifty talents only, he departed thence into the countrey of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Now Brutus in all this iourney, did many notable actes and worthy of memorie, both for rewarding, as also in punishing those that had deserued it: wherefore among the rest, I will tell you of one thing, of the which he himselfe, and all the Noblemen of the ROMAINES were maruellous glad. When Pompey the Great (hauing lost the battel against Iulius Cæsar, in the fields of PHARSALIA) came and fell vpon the coast of ÆGYPT, hard by the citie of PELVSIVM, those that were protectors to the yong king Ptolomie, being then but a child, sate in councell with his seruants and friends, what they should determine in that case. They were not all of one mind in this consultation: for some thought it good to receiue Pompey: others also, that they should driue him out of Ægypt. But there was a certaine Rhetoritian called Theodotus, that was borne in the Isle of CHIO, who was the kings schoole master to teach him Rhetoricke. He being called to the councell for lacke of sufficient men, said, That both the one and the other side went awrie, aswell those that were of opinion to receiue Pompey, as the other that would haue had him driuen away: and that the best way was (considering the present time) that they should lay hold on him, and kill him; adding withall this sentence, That a dead man biteth not. The whole councell stucke to this opinion. So, for a notable example of incredible misfortune, and vnlooked for vnto Pompey, Pompey the Great was slaine, by the motion and counsell of this wicked Rhetoritian Theodotus, as Theodotus afterwards did himselfe boast of it. But when Iulius Cæsar came afterwards into Ægypt, the wicked men that consented to this counsell, had their paiment according to their deserts: for they died euery man of them a wicked death, sauing this Theodotus, whom fortune respited a little while longer, and yet in that time he liued a poore and miserable life, neuer tarying long in any one place. So Brutus going vp and downe ASIA, Theodotus could hide himselfe no longer, but was brought vnto Brutus, where he suffered paines of death: so that he wanne more fame by his death, then euer he did in his life. About that time, Brutus sent to pray Cassius to come to the citie of SARDIS, and so he did. Brutus vnderstanding of his comming, went to meete him with all his friendes. There both their armies being armed, they called them both Emperours. Now as it commonly happeneth in great affaires betweene two persons, both of them hauing many friends, and so many Captaines vnder them, there ranne tales and complaints betwixt them. Therefore, before they fell in hand with any other matter, they went into a little chamber together, and bade euery man auoid, and did shut the dores to them. Then they began to powre out their complaints one to the other, and grew hot and loud, earnestly accusing one another, and at length fell both a weeping. Their friends that were without the chamber, hearing them loud within, and angry betweene themselues, they were both amazed & afraid also, lest it wold grow to further matter: but yet they were cõmanded, that no man should come to them. M. Phaenius a follower of Cato, Phaonius, that had beene a friend and follower of Cato while he liued, and tooke vpon him to counterfeit a Philosopher, not with wisedome & discretion, but with a certaine bedlem and franticke motion: he would needs come into the chamber, though the men offered to keepe him out. But it was no boote to let Phaonius, when a mad moode or toy tooke him in the head: for he was a hote hastie man, and sudden in all his doings, and cared for neuer a Senator of them all. Now, though he vsed this bold manner of speech after the profession of the Cynicke Philosophers (as who would say, Dogs) yet his boldnesse did no hurt many times, becausse they did but laugh at him to see him so mad. This Phaonius at that time, in despite of the doore-keepers, came into the chamber, and with a certaine scoffing and mocking gesture, which he counterfeited of purpose, he rehearsed the verses which old Nestor said in Homer:

Cynicke Philosophers, counted dogs.

My Lords, I pray you hearken both to me,
For I haue seene moe yeares then suchie three.

Cassius fell a laughing at him: but Brutus thrust him out of the chamber, and called him dogge, and counterfeit Cynicke. Howbeit his coming in brake their strife at that time, and so they left each other. The selfe same night Cassius prepared his supper in his chamber, and Brutus brought his friends with him. So when they were set at supper, Phaonius came to sit downe after he had washed. Brutus told him aloud, no man sent for him, and bade them set him at the vpper end: meaning indeed at the lower end of the bed. Phaonius made no ceremony, but thrust in amongst the middest of them, and made all the company laugh at him. So they were merrie all supper time, and full of their Philosophie. The next day after, Brutus, vpon complaint of the SARDIANS, did condemne and note Lucius Pella for a defamed person, that had beene a Prætor of the ROMAINES, and whom Brutus had giuen charge vnto: for that he was accused and conuicted of robbery, and pilferie in his office. This iudgement much misliked Cassius, becausse he himselfe had secretly (not many daies before) warned two of his friends, attainted and conuicted of the like offences, and openly had cleared them: but yet he did not therefore leaue to employ them in any manner of seruice as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproued Brutus, for that he would shew himselfe so straight and seuere, in such a time as was meeter to beare a little, then to take things at the worst. Brutus in contrarie manner answered, that he should remember the Ides of march, at which time they slue Iulius Cæsar, who neither pilled nor polled the country, but onely was a fauourer and suborner of all them that did rob and spoile, by his countenance and authoritie. And if there were any occasion whereby they might honestly set aside iustice and equitie, they should haue had more reason to haue suffered Cæsars friends to haue robbed and done what wrong and iniurie they had would, then to beare with their owne men. For then said he, they could but haue said they had been cowards, but now they may accuse vs of iniustice, beside the paines we take, and the danger we put our selues into. And thus may we see what Brutus intent and purpose was. But as they both prepared to passe ouer againe out of ASIA into EVROPE, there went a rumour that there appeared a wonderfull signe vnto him. Brutus was a carefull man, and slept very little, both for that his diet was moderate, as also becausse he was continually occupied. He neuer slept in the day time, and in the night no longer then the time he was driuen to be alone, and when euery body else tooke their rest. But now whilest he was in warre, and his head ouer busily occupied to thinke of his affaires, and what would happen, after he had slumbered a little after supper, he spent all the rest of the night in dispatching of his weightiest causes; and after he had taken order for them, if he had any leisure left him, he would read some booke till the third watch of the night, at what time the Captains, pettie Captaines and Colonels, did vse to come to him. So, being readie to goe into EVROPE, one night very late (when all the campe tooke quiet rest) as he was in his tent with a litle light, thinking of weighty matters, he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the doore of his tent, that he saw a wonderfull strange and monstrous shape of a bodie coming towards him, and said neuer a word. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a god or a man, and what cause brought him thither. The spirit answered him, I am thy euill spirit, Brutus: and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Brutus being no otherwise affraid, replied againe vnto it: Well, then I shall see thee againe. The spirit presently vanished away: and Brutus called his men vnto him, who told him that they heard no noise, nor saw any thing at all. Thereupon Brutus returned againe to thinke on his matters as he did before: and when the day brake, he went vnto Cassius, to tell him what vision had appeared vnto him in the night.

A spirit appeared vnto Brutus in the citie of Sardis.

night. Cassius being in opinion an EPICVRIAN, and reasoning thereon with Brutus, spake to him touching the vision thus. In our sect, Brutus, we haue an opinion, that we doe not alwayes feele, or see, that which we suppose we do both see & feele, but that our senses being credulous and therefore easily abused (when they are idle and vnoccupied in their owne obiects) are induced to imagine they see & coniecture that, which in truth they do not. For, our mind is quicke and cunning to worke (without either cause or matter) any thing in the imagination whatsoeuer. And therefore the imagination is resembled to clay, and the mind to the potter: who without any other cause then his fancy and pleasure, changeth it into what fashion and forme he will. And this doth the diuersitie of our dreames shew vnto vs. For our imagination doth vpon a small fancie grow from conceipt to conceipt, altering both in passions and formes of things imagined. For the mind of man is euer occupied, and that continuall mouing is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you. For you being by nature giuen to melancholike discoursing, and of late continually occupied, your wits and senses hauing been ouer laboured, do easilier yeeld to such imaginatiõs. For, to say that there are spirits or Angels; and if there were, that they had the shape of men, or such voyces or any power at all to come vnto vs, it is a mockerie. And for mine owne part, I would there were such, because that wee should not onely haue soldiers, horses, and ships, but also the aide of the gods, to guide and further our honest and honourable attempts. With these words Cassius did somewhat comfort and quiet Brutus. When they raised their campe, there came two Eagles that flying with a maruellous force, lighted vpon two of the foremost ensignes, and alwaies followed the souldiers, which gaue them meate, and fed them, vntill they came neare to the citie of PHILIPPES: and there one day onely before the battell, they both flew away. Now Brutus had conquered the most part of all the people and nations of that countrey: but if there were any other citie or Captaine to ouercome, then they made all cleare before them, and so drew towards the coasts of THASSOS. There Norbanus lying in campe in a certaine place called the straights, by another place called CYMBOLON (which is a port in the sea,) Cassius and Brutus compassed him in in such sort, that he was driuen to forsake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in danger beside to haue lost all his armie. For, Octauius Cæsar could not follow him because of his sickenesse, & therfore stayed behind: whereupon they had taken his army, had not Antonius aide beene, which made such wonderful speed, that Brutus could scant beleeue it. So Cæsar came not thither of ten daies after: and Antonius camped against Cassius, and Brutus on the other side against Cæsar. The ROMAINS called ỹ valley between both camps, the PHILIPPIAN fields: and there were neuer seene two so great armies of the ROMAINES, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brutus army was inferiour to Octauius Cæsars, in number of men: but for brauery and rich furniture, Brutus army far excelled Cæsars. For the most part of their armors were siluer and gilt, which Brutus had bountifully giuen thẽ: although in all other things he taught his Captaines to liue in order without excesse. But for the brauerie of armor & weapon, which soldiers should cary in their hands, or otherwise weare vpon their backs, he thought that it was an encouragement vnto them that by nature are greedy of honor, and that it maketh them also fight like deuils that loue to get, & to be afraid to lose: because they fight to keepe their armor & weapon, as also their goods and lands. Now when they came to muster their armies, Octauius Cæsar tooke the muster of his army within the trenches of his camp, & gaue his men only a litle corne, & fiue siluer Drachmaes to euery man to sacrifice to the gods, & to pray for victorie. But Brutus scorning this misery & nigardlinesse, first of all mustred his army, and did purifie it in the fields, according to the maner of the ROMAINS: and then he gaue vnto euery band a nũber of weathers to sacrifice, and fiftie siluer Drachmaes to euery soldier. So that Brutus and Cassius soldiers were better pleased, & more couragiously bent to fight at the day of battel, thẽ their enemies soldiers were. Notwithstanding, being busily occupied about the ceremonies of this purification, it is reported that there chanced certaine vnluckie signes vnto Cassius. For one of his Sergeants that caried the rods before him, brought him the garland of flowers turned backward, the which he should haue worne on his head in the time of sacrificing. Moreouer it is reported also, that another time before, in certaine sports & triumph where they caried an image of Cassius victorie, of cleane gold, it fell by chance, the man stũbling that caried it. And yet further there was seene a maruellous number of fowles of prey, that feed vpõ dead carcasses: & Bee hiues also were found where Bees were gathered together in a certain place within the trenches of the camp: the which place the Soothſayers thought good to ſhut out of the precinct of the campe, for to take away the ſuperſtitious feare and miſtruſt men would haue of it. The which began ſomewhat to alter Caſſius mind from Epicurus opinions, and had put the ſouldiers alſo in a maruellous feare. Thereupon Caſſius was of opinion not to trie this warre at one battell, but rather to delay time, and to draw it out in length, conſidering that they were the ſtronger in money, and the weaker in men and armor. But Brutus in contrary maner, did alway before and at that time alſo, deſire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of battell, as ſoone as might be poſſible: to the end he might either quickly reſtore his countrey to her former liberty, or rid him forthwith of this miſerable world, being ſtill troubled in following and maintaining of ſuch great armies together. But perceiuing that in the daily skirmiſhes and bickerings they made, his men were alwaies the ſtronger and euer had the better, that yet quickened his ſpirits againe, & did put him in better heart. And furthermore, becauſe that ſome of their owne men had already yeelded themſelues to their enemies, and that it was ſuſpected moreouer diuers others would doe the like, that made many of Caſſius friends which were of his mind before (when it came to be debated in councel, whether the battel ſhould be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus mind. But yet was there one of Brutus friends called Atellius, that was againſt it, & was of opinion that they ſhold tary to the next winter. Brutus asked him what he ſhould get by tarying a yeare longer? If I get nothing elſe, quoth Atellius againe, yet haue I liued ſo much longer. Caſſius was very angry with this anſwer: and Atellius was maliced & eſteemed the worſe for it of all men. Therupon it was preſently determined they ſhould fight battel the next day. So Brutus all ſupper time looked with a cheereful countenance, like a man that had good hope, & talked very wiſely of Philoſophy, & after ſupper went to bed. But touching Caſſius, Meſſala reporteth that he ſupped by himſelfe in his tent with a few of his friends, & that all ſupper time he looked very ſadly, & was ful of thoughts, although it was againſt his nature: and that after ſupper he tooke him by the hand, & holding him faſt (in token of kindneſſe, as his maner was) told him in Greek: Meſſala, I proteſt vnto thee, & make thee my witneſſe, that I am compelled againſt my mind & wil (as Pompey the great was) to iopard the liberty of our country to the hazard of a battel. And yet we muſt be liuely, & of good courage, conſidering our good fortune, whom we ſhould wrong too much to miſtruſt her, although we follow euill counſell. Meſſala writeth, that Caſſius hauing ſpoke theſe laſt words vnto him, he bad him farewel, & willed him to come to ſupper to him the next night following, becauſe it was his birth day. The next morning by breake of day, the ſignall of battell was ſet out in Brutus & Caſſius campe, which was an arming ſcarlet coate: and both the Chieftaines ſpake together in the midſt of their armies. There Caſſius began to ſpeake firſt, and ſaid: The gods grant us O Brutus, that this day we may win the field, and euer after to liue all the reſt of our life quietly one with another. But ſith the gods haue ſo ordained it, that the greateſt and chiefeſt things amongſt men are moſt vncertaine, and that if the battell fall out otherwiſe to day then we wiſh or looke for, we ſhall hardly meet againe, what art thou then determined to doe, to flie, or die? Brutus anſwered him, being yet but a yong man, and not ouer greatly experienced in the world: I truſt (I know not how) a certain rule of Philoſophy, by the which I did greatly blame and reproue Cato for killing himſelfe, as being no lawfull nor godly act, touching the gods: nor concerning men, valiant; not to giue place and yeeld to diuine prouidence, & not conſtantly and patiently to take whatſoeuer it pleaſeth him to ſend vs, but to draw backe and flie: but being now in the midſt of the danger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God that this battel fall out fortunate for vs, I will looke no more for hope, neither ſeeke to make any new ſupply for war againe, but will rid me of this miſerable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I gaue vp my life for my countrey in the Iles of March, for the which I ſhall liue in another more glorious world. Caſſius fel a laughing to heare what he ſaid, & imbracing him, Come on then (ſaid he) let vs go & charge our enemies with this mind. For either we ſhal conquer, or we ſhal not need to feare the conquerors. After this talke, they fell to conſultation among their friends for the ordering of the battel. Then Brutus prayed Caſſius he might haue the leading of the right wing, ý which men thought was farre meeter for Caſſius, both becauſe he was the elder man, and alſo for that he had the better experience. But yet Caſſius gaue it him, and willed that Meſſala (who had charge of one of the warlikeſt legions they had) ſhould be alſo in that wing with Brutus. So Brutus preſently ſent out his horſemen, who were excellently well appointed, and his footmen alſo were as willing and ready to giue charge. Now Antonius men did caſt a trench from the marriſh by the which they

they lay, to cut off Cassius way to come to the sea: and Cæsar, at the least his army stirred not. As for Octauius Cæsar himselfe, he was not in his campe, because he was sicke. And for his people, they little thought the enemies would haue giuen them battell, but onely haue made some light skirmishes to hinder them that wrought in the trench, and with their darts & slings to haue kept them from finishing of their work: but they taking no heed to them that came full vpon them to giue them battell, maruelled much at the great noise they heard, that came from the place where they were casting their trench. In the meane time Brutus that led the right wing, sent litle bils to the Colonels and Captaines of priuate bands, in the which he wrote the word of the battel; and he himselfe riding a horse-backe by all the troupes, did speake to them, and incouraged them to sticke to it like men. So by this meanes very few of them vnderstood what was the word of the battell, and besides, the most part of them neuer taried to haue it told them, but ranne with great furie to assaile the enemies; whereby through this disorder, the legions were maruellously scattered and dispersed one from the other. For, first of all Misalaes legion, and then the next vnto them, went beyond the left wing of the enemies, and did nothing, but glancing by them, ouerthrew some as they went; and so going on further, fell right vpon Cæsars campe, out of the which (as himselfe writeth in his commentaries) he had bene conueyed away a litle before through the counsell and aduice of one of his friends called Marcus Artorius: who dreaming in the night, had a vision appeared vnto him, that commanded Octauius Cæsar should be caried out of his campe. Insomuch as it was thought he was slaine, because his litter (which had nothing in it) was thrust through and through with pikes and darts. There was great slaughter in this camp. For amongst others, there were slaine two thousand LACEDÆMONIANS, who were arriued but euen a litle before, coming to aid Cæsar. The other also that had not glanced by, but had giuen a charge full vpon Cæsars battell, they easily made them flie; because they were greatly troubled for the losse of their camp, and of them there were slaine by hand three legions. Then being very earnest to follow the chase of them that fled, they ran in amongst them hand ouer head into their campe, and Brutus among them. But that which the conquerors thought not of, occasion shewed it vnto them that were ouercome: and that was, the left wing of their enemies left naked and vnguarded of them of the right wing, who were straied too farre off, in following of them that were ouerthrown. So they gaue a hot charge vpon them. But, notwithstanding all the force they made, they could not breake into the middest of their battell, where they found them that receiued them, and valiantly made head against them. Howbeit they brake and ouerthrew the left wing where Cassius was, by reason of the great disorder among them, and also because they had no intelligence how the right wing had sped. So they chased them, beating them into their campe, the which they spoiled, none of both the Cheftaines being present there. For Antonius as it is reported, to flie the fury of the first charge, was gotten into the next marish: and no man could tell what became of Octauius Cæsar, after he was caried out of his campe. Insomuch that there were certaine souldiers that shewed their swords bloudied, and said that they had slaine him, and did describe his face, and shewed what age he was of. Furthermore, the voward and the middest of Brutus battell had already put all their enemies to flight that withstood them, with great slaughter: so that Brutus had conquered all on his side, and Cassius had lost all on the other side. For nothing vndid them, but that Brutus went not to help Cassius, thinking he had ouercome them, as himselfe had done; and Cassius on the other side taried not for Brutus, thinking he had bene ouerthrowne as himselfe was. And to proue that the victory fell on Brutus side, Messala confirmeth, that they wan three Eagles, and diuerse other ensignes of the enemies, and their enemies wan neuer a one of theirs. Now Brutus returning from the chase, after he had slaine and sacked Cæsars men, he wondred much that he could not see Cassius tent standing vp high as it was wont, neither the other tēts of his camp stāding as they were before, because all the whole camp had bin spoiled, and the tents thrown downe, at the first coming of their enemies. But they that were about Brutus, whose sight serued them better, told him that they saw a great glistering of harnesse, and a number of siluered targets, that went and came into Cassius camp, and were not (as they tooke it) the armors, nor the number of men that they had left there to guard the camp: and yet that they saw not such a nūber of dead bodies, & great ouerthrow as there should haue bin, if so many legions had bene slaine. This made Brutus at the first mistrust that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keepe the campe of his enemie which he had taken, and caused his men to be sent for that yet followed the chase, & gathered them together, thinking to leade them to aid Caſſius, who was in this ſtate as you ſhall heare. Firſt of all he was marueilous angrie to ſee how Brutus men ran to giue charge vpon their enemies, and taried not for the word of the battell, nor commandement to giue charge: and it grieued him beſide, that after he had ouercome them, his men fell ſtraight to ſpoile, and were not carefull to compaſſe in the reſt of y enemies behind: but with tarying too long alſo, more then through the valiantneſſe or foreſight of the Captaines his enemies, Caſſius found himſelfe compaſſed in with the right wing of his enemies armie. Wherupon his horſmen brake immediatly, and fled for life towards the ſea. Furthermore perceiuing his footmen to giue ground, he did what he could to keepe them from flying, and tooke an enſigne from one of the enſigne-bearers that fled, and ſtucke it faſt at his feet: although with much ado he could ſcant keepe his owne guard together. So Caſſius himſelfe was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, vnto a litle hill, from whence they might eaſily ſee what was done in all the plaine: howbeit Caſſius himſelfe ſaw nothing, for his ſight was very bad, ſauing that he ſaw (and yet with much ado) how the enemies ſpoiled his campe before his eyes. He ſaw alſo a great troupe of horſemen, whom Brutus ſent to aid him, and thought that they were his enemies that followed him: but yet he ſent Titinnius, one of thē that was with him, to go and know what they were. Brutus horſemen ſaw him coming a farre off, whom when they knew that he was one of Caſſius chiefeſt friends, they ſhouted out for ioy, and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their horſes, and went and embraced him. The reſt compaſſed him in round about on horsback, with ſongs of victory & great ruſhing of their harneſſe, ſo that they made all the field ring againe for ioy. But this marred all. For Caſſius thinking indeed that Titinnius was taken of the enemies, he then ſpake theſe words: Deſiring too much to liue, I haue lined to ſee one of my beſt friends taken, for my ſake, before my face. After that, he got into a tent where no body was, and tooke Pindarus with him, one of his bondmen whom he reſerued euer for ſuch a pinch, ſince the curſed battell of the PARTHIANS, where Craſſus was ſlaine, though he notwithſtanding ſcaped from that ouerthrow: but then caſting his cloake ouer his head, and holding out his bare neck vnto Pindarus, he gaue him his head to be ſtricken off. So the head was found ſeuered from the body: but after that time Pindarus was neuer ſeene more. Whereupon, ſome tooke occaſion to ſay that he had ſlaine his maiſter without his commandement. By & by they knew the horſmen that came towards them, and might ſee Titinnius crowned with a garland of triumph, who came before with great ſpeed vnto Caſſius. But when he perceiued by the cries & teares of his friends which tormented themſelues, the misfortune that had chanced to his Captaine Caſſius, by miſtaking, he drew out his ſword, curſing himſelf a thouſand times that he had taried ſo long, & ſo ſlue himſelf preſently in the field. Brutus in the meane time came forward ſtill, and vnderſtood alſo that Caſſius had bin ouerthrowne: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came very neare to his campe. So when he was come thither, after he had lamēted the death of Caſſius, calling him the laſt of all the ROMANES; being vnpoſſible that ROME ſhould euer breed againe ſo noble and valiant a man as he: he cauſed his body to be buried, and ſent it to the citie of THASSOS, fearing leſt his funerals within his campe ſhould cauſe great diſorder. Then he called his ſoldiers together, and did encourage them againe. And when he ſaw that they had loſt all their cariage, which they could not brooke well, he promiſed euery man of them two thouſand Drachmaes in recompence. After his ſoldiers had heard his oration, they were all of thē pretily cheared again, wondring much at his great liberality, & waited vpon him with great cries when he went his way, praiſing him, for that he onely of the foure Chieftaines was not ouercome in battel. And to ſpeake the truth, his deeds ſhewed that he hoped not in vain to be conqueror. For with few legions he had ſlaine and driuen all them away that made head againſt him: and if all his people had fought, and that the moſt of them had not outgone their enemies to runne to ſpoile their goods, ſurely it was like enough he had ſlain them all, and had left neuer a man of them aliue. There were ſlaine of Brutus ſide about eight thouſand men, counting the ſoldiers ſlaues, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the enemies ſide, as Meſſalla writeth, there were ſlaine as he ſuppoſeth, more then twiſe as many moe. Wherefore they were more diſcouraged then Brutus, vntill that very late at night, there was one of Caſſius men called Demetrius, who went vnto Antonius, and caried his maſters cloathes, whereof he were ſtripped not long before, and his ſword alſo. This encouraged Brutus enemies, and made them ſo braue, that the next morning betimes they ſtood in battell ray againe before Brutus. But on Brutus ſide, both his campes ſtood wauering, and that in great danger. For his owne campe being full full of priſoners, required a good guard to looke vnto them: and Caſſius campe on the other ſide tooke the death of their Captaine very heauily; and beſide, there was ſome vile grudge between them that were ouercome, and thoſe that did ouercome. For this cauſe therefore Brutus did ſet them in battell ray, but yet kept himſelfe from giuing battell. Now for the ſlaues that were priſoners, which were a great number, and went and came to and fro amongſt theſe armed men, not without ſuſpition: he commanded they ſhould kill them. But for the free men, he ſent them freely home, and ſaid, that they were better priſoners with his enemies, then with him. For with them, they were ſlaues and ſeruants: and with him, they were free men and citizens. So when he ſaw that diuers Captains and his friends did ſo cruelly hate ſome, that they would by no meanes ſaue their liues, Brutus himſelfe hid them, and ſecretly ſent them away. Among theſe priſoners, there was one Volumnius a ieſter, and Sacculio a common player, of whom Brutus made no account at all. Howbeit his friends brought them vnto him, and did accuſe them, that though they were priſoners, they did not let to laugh them to ſcorne, and to ieſt broadly with them. Brutus made no anſwer to it, becauſe his head was occupied otherwiſe. Whereupon Meſſala Coruinus ſaid, that it were good to whip them on a ſcaffold, and then to ſend them naked, well whipped, vnto the Captaines of their enemies, to ſhew them their ſhame, to keepe ſuch mates as thoſe in their campe, to play the fooles to make them ſport. Some that ſtood by, laughed at his deuice. But Publius Caſca, that gaue Iulius Cæſar the firſt wound when he was ſlaine, ſaid then: It doth not become vs to be thus merry at Caſſius funerals: and for thee Brutus, thou ſhalt view what eſtimation thou madeſt of ſuch a Captaine thy compeere, by putting to death, or ſauing the liues of theſe blouds, who hereafter will mocke him and defame his memory. Brutus anſwered againe in choler: Why then do you come to tell me of it, Caſca, and do not your ſelues what you thinke good? When they heard him ſay ſo, they tooke his anſwer for a conſent againſt theſe poore vnfortunate men, to ſuffer them to do what they thought good: and therefore they caried them away, and ſlue them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promiſe he had made to the ſouldiers, and gaue them the two thouſand Drachmaes apeece; but yet he firſt reproued them, becauſe they went and gaue charge vpon the enemies at the firſt battell, before they had the word of battell giuen them: and made them a new promiſe alſo, that if in the ſecond battel they fought like men, he would giue them the ſacke and ſpoile of two cities, to wit, THESSALONICA and LACEDÆMON. In all Brutus life there is but this onely fault to be found, and that is not to be gainſaid: though Antonius and Octauius Cæſar did reward their ſouldiers far worſe for their victory. For when they had driuen all ỹ naturall ITALIANS out of ITALY, they gaue their ſoldiers their lands and townes, to the which they had no right: and moreouer the only mark they ſhot at in all this warre they made, was but to ouercome and reigne, Where in contrary maner they had ſo great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voice and opinion of the world would not ſuffer him, neither to ouercome, nor to ſaue himſelfe otherwiſe then iuſtly and honeſtly, and ſpecially after Caſſius death; whom men burthened, that oftentimes he moued Brutus to great cruelty. But now, like as the mariners on the ſea after the rudder of their ſhip is broken by tempeſt, do ſeeke to naile on ſome other piece of wood in liew therof, and do help themſelues to keep them from hurt, as much as may be, vpon that inſtant danger: euen ſo Brutus, hauing ſuch a great army to gouerne, and his affaires ſtanding very tickle, and hauing no other Captaine coequall with him in dignity and authority, he was forced to imploy them he had; & likewiſe to be ruled by them in many things, and was of mind himſelfe alſo to grant them any thing, that he thought might make them ſerue like noble ſoldiers at time of need. For Caſſius ſoldiers were very euil to be ruled, and did ſhew themſelues very ſtubborne and luſty in the camp, becauſe they had no Cheftaine that did command them: but yet rank cowards to their enemies, becauſe they had once ouercome them. On the other ſide Octauius Cæſar and Antonius were not in much better ſtate: for firſt of all they lacked victuals. And becauſe they were lodged in low places, they looked to abide a hard & ſharp winter, being camped as they were by the mariſh ſide: and alſo for, that after the battell, there had fallen plenty of rain about the autumne, where through, all their tents were ful of mire & dirt, the which by reaſon of the cold did freeze incontinently. But beſide all theſe diſcomodities, there came newes vnto them of the great loſſe they had of their men by ſea. For Brutus ſhips met with a great aid and ſupply of men, which were ſent them out of ITALY, and they ouerthrew them in ſuch ſort, that there ſcaped but few of them: and yet they were ſo famiſhed, that they were cõpelled to eat the tackle & ſailes of their ſhips. Therupon they were very desirous to fight a battell againe, before Brutus should haue intelligence of this good newes for him: for it chanced so, that the battell was fought by sea, on the selfe same day it was fought by land. But by ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the captains, this victory came not to Brutus eare till twenty daies after. For had he knowne of it before, he would not haue bene brought to haue fought a second battell, considering that he had excellent good prouision for his army for a long time; and besides, lay in a place of great strength, so as his campe could not greatly be hurt by the winter, nor also distressed by his enemies: and further, he had bin a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by sea, as he was also by land. This would haue maruellously incouraged him. Howbeit the state of Rome (in my opinion) being now brought to that passe, that it could no more abide to be gouerned by many Lords, but required one only absolute Gouernour: God, to preuent Brutus that it should not come to his gouernment, kept this victory from his knowledge, though indeed it came but a litle too late. For the day before the last battel was giuen, very late in the night came Clodius, one of his enemies into his campe, who told that Cæsar hearing of the ouerthrow of his army by sea, desired nothing more then to fight a battell before Brutus vnderstood it. Howbeit they gaue no credit to his words, but despised him so much, that they would not vouchsafe to bring him vnto Brutus, because they thought it but a lie deuised, to be the better welcome for this good news. The selfesame night, it is reported that the monstrous spirit which had appeared before vnto Brutus in the city of Sardis, did now appeare againe vnto him in the selfsame shape and forme, and so vanished away, and said neuer a word. Now Publius Volumnius, a graue and wise Philosopher, that had bin with Brutus from the beginning of this warre, doth make no mention of this spirit, but saith: that the greatest Eagle and ensigne was couered ouer with a swarm of bees, and that there was one of the captains, whose armi sodainly fel a sweating, that it dropped oile of roses frō him, & that they oftentimes went about to drie him, but all would do no good. And that before the battell was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both armies, and all the time they fought, there was a maruellous great silence all the vally ouer, both the armies being one before the other, marking this fight between them; & that in the end, the Eagle towards Brutus gaue ouer & fled away. But this is certain, and a true tale, that when the gate of the camp was open, the first man the standard-bearer met that caried the Eagle, was an Æthiopian, whom the soldiers for ill luck mangled with their swords. Now after that Brutus had brought his army into the field, & had set them in battel ray, directly against the voward of his enemy, he paused a long time before he gaue the signall of battell. For Brutus riding vp & downe to view the bands & companies, it came in his head to mistrust some of thē, besides, that some came to tel him so much as he thought. Moreouer, he saw his horsmē set forward but faintly, & did not go lustily to giue charge, but stil staid to see what the footmen would do. Then sodainly, one of the chiefest knights he had in all his army, called Camulatius, & that was alway maruellously esteemed of for his valiātnes, vntil that time: he came hard by Brutus on horsback, and rode before his face to yeeld himself vnto his enemies. Brutus was maruellous sory for it: wherfore partly for anger, and partly for feare of greater treason and rebellion, he sodainly caused his army to march, being past three of the clock in the afternoone. So in that place where he himselfe fought in person, he had the better, and brake into the left wing of his enemies; which gaue him way, through the helpe of his horsmen that gaue charge with his footmen, when they saw the enemies in a maze and afraid. Howbeit, the other also on the right wing when the Captaines would haue had them to haue marched, they were afraid to haue bin compassed in behind, because they were fewer in number then their enemies, and therfore did spread themselues, and leaue the middest of the battell. Whereby they hauing weakened themselues, they could not withstand the force of their enemies, but turned taile straight and fled. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight vpon it to compasse Brutus behind, who in the middest of the conflict, did all that was possible for a skilful Captaine & valiant soldier, both for his wisdome, as also his hardinesse, for the obtaining of victory. But that which wanne him the victory at the first battel, did now lose it him at the second. For at the first time the enemies that were broken and fled, were straight cut in peeces: but at the second battell, of Cassius men that were put to flight, there were few slaine: and they that saued themselues by speed, being affraid because they had bene ouercome, did discourage the rest of the army when they came to ioyne with them, and filled all the armie with feare and disorder. There was the sonne of Marcus Cato slaine, valiantly fighting among the lustie youth. For notwithstanding that he was very weary wearie and ouer-harried, yet would he not therefore flie, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling aloud his name, and also his fathers name, at length he was beaten downe amongst many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had slaine round about him. So there were slaine in the field, all the chiefest Gentlemen and Nobilitie that were in his armie, who valiantly ranne into any danger to saue Brutus life: amongst whom there was one of Brutus friends called Lucilius, who seeing a troupe of barbarous men, making no reckoning of all men else they met in their way, but going altogether right against Brutus, he determined to stay them with the hazard of his life, and being left behind, told them that he was Brutus: and because they should beleeue him, he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he said he was afraid of Cæsar, and that he did trust Antonius better. These barbarous men being very glad of this good hap, and thinking themselues happie men, they caried him in the night, and sent some before vnto Antonius, to tel him of their coming. He was maruellous glad of it, and went out to meete them that brought him. Others also vnderstanding that they had brought Brutus prisoner, they came from all parts of the campe to see him, some pitying his hard fortune, and others saying, that it was not done like himselfe, so cowardly to be taken aliue of the barbarous people, for feare of death. When they came neare together, Antonius staid awhile bethinking himselfe how he should vse Brutus. In the meane time Lucilius was brought to him, who with a bold countenance said: Antonius, I dare assure thee, that no enemie hath taken or shall take Marcus Brutus aliue: and I beseech God keepe him from that fortune: but whersoeuer he be found, aliue or dead, he will be found like himselfe: and touching my selfe, I am come vnto thee, hauing deceiued these men of armes making them beleeue that I was Brutus, and do not refuse to suffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius words made them all amazed that heard him. Antonius on the other side, looking vpon all them that had brought him, said vnto them: My friends, I thinke ye are sorie you haue failed of your purpose, and that you think this man hath done you great wrong: but I assure you, you haue taken a better bootie then that you followed. For in stead of an enemy, you haue brought me a friend: and for my part, if you had brought me Brutus aliue, truly I can not tell what I should haue done to him. For I had rather haue such men as this my friends then mine enemies. Then he embraced Lucilius, and at that time deliuered him to one of his friends in custodie, and Lucilius euer after serued him faithfully, euen to his death. Now Brutus hauing passed a litle riuer, enuironed on either side with high rocks, and shadowed with great trees, being then darke night, he went no further, but staid at the foote of a rocke with certaine of his Captaines and friends that followed him, and looking vp to the firmament that was full of starres, sighing, he rehearsed two verses, of the which Voluminius wrote the one, to this effect:

Let not the wight from whom this mischiefe went (O Ioue) escape without due punishment.

And saith, that he had forgotten the other. Within a litle while after, naming his friends that he had seene slaine in battell before his eyes, he fetched a greater sigh then before, specially when he came to name Labio and Flauius, of whom the one was his Lieutenant, and the other Captaine of the pioners of his camp. In the meane time one of the company being thirstie, and seeing Brutus thirstie also, he ran to the riuer for water, and brought it in his sallet. At the same time they heard a noise on the other side of the riuer: whereupon Voluminius tooke Dardanus, Brutus seruant with him, to see what it was: and returning straight againe, asked if there were any water left. Brutus smiling, gently told him, All is drunke, but they shall bring you some more. Thereupon he sent him againe that went for water before, who was in great danger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly scaped, being sore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought there were not many of his men slaine in battell: and to know the truth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promised to go through his enemies, for otherwise it was impossible to go see their campe: and thereupon if all were well, he would lift vp a torch-light in the aire, and then returne againe with speed to him. The torch-light was lift vp as he had promised, for Statilius went thither: and a good while after Brutus seeing that Statilius came not againe, he said: If Statilius be aliue, he will come againe. But his euill fortune was such, that as he came backe, he fell into his enemies hands and was slaine. Now the night being far spent, Brutus as he sate bowed towards Cletus one of his men, and told him somewhat in his eare: the other answered him not, but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proued Dardanus, and said somewhat also to him: and at last he came to Voluminius himself, and speaking to him in Greeke, prayed him for the studies sake which brought them acquainted together, that he would helpe him to put his hand to his sword, to thrust it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his request, and so did many others: and amongst the rest, one of them said, there was no tarrying for them there, but they must needs flie. Then Brutus rising vp, said, We must flie indeed, but it must be with our hands, not with our feet. Then taking euery man by the hand, he said these words vnto them with a chearefull countenance: It reioyceth my heart, that not one of my friends hath failed me at my need, and I do not complaine of my fortune, but onely for my countries sake: for as for me, I thinke my selfe happier then they that haue ouercome, considering that I leaue a perpetuall fame of vertue and honestie, the which our enemies the conquerors shall neuer attaine vnto by force or money; neither can let their posteritie to say, that they being naughtie and vniust men, haue slaine good men, to vsurpe tyrannicall power not pertaining to them. Hauing so said, he prayed euery man to shift for himselfe, and then he went a litle aside with two or three onely, among the which Strato was one, with whom he came first acquainted by the studie of Rhetoricke. He came as neare to him as he could, and taking his sword by the hilt with both his hands, and falling downe vpon the point of it, ranne himselfe through. Others say, that not he, but Strato (at his request) held the sword in his hand, and turned his head aside, and that Brutus fell downe vpon it, and so ran himselfe through, and died presently. Messala, that had bene Brutus great friend, reconciled afterwards to Octauius Cæsars friend, and shortly after, Cæsar being at good leisure, he brought Strato, Brutus friend vnto him, and weeping said: Cæsar, behold, here is he that did the last seruice to my Brutus. Then Cæsar receiued him, and afterwards he did him as faithfull seruice in all his affaires, as any GREGIAN else he had about him, vntill the battel of ACTIVM. It is reported also that this Messala himselfe answered Cæsar one day, when he gaue him great praise before his face, that he had fought valiantly, and with great affection for him at the battell of ACTIVM, (notwithstanding that he had bene his cruell enemie before, at the battell of PHILIPPES, for Brutus sake) I euer loued, said he, to take the best and iustest part. Now Antonius hauing found Brutus bodie, he caused it to be wrapped vp in one of the richest coate-armors he had. Afterwards also, Antonius vnderstanding that this coate-armor was stolen, he put the thiefe to death that had stolen it, and sent the ashes of his body vnto Seruilia his mother. And for Porcia, Brutus wife, Nicolaus the Philosopher, and Valerius Maximus do write, that she determining to kill her selfe (her parents and friends carefully looking to her to keepe her from it) tooke hote burning coles and cast them into her mouth, and kept her mouth so close, that she choked her selfe. There was a letter of Brutus found written to his friends, complaining of their negligence, that his wife being sicke, they wold not helpe her, but suffered her to kill her selfe; chusing to die, rather then to languish in paine.

THE COMPARISON OF Dion and Brutus.

TO come now to compare these two noble personages: it is certaine that both of them hauing great gifts in them, namely this for the first, that by small occasions they made themselues great men: herein Dion of both deserueth the chiefe praise. For he had no coadiutor to bring him vnto that greatnesse, as Brutus had of Cassius, who doubtlesse was not comparable vnto him for vertue and respect of honour, though otherwise in matters of warre, he was no lesse wise and valiant then he. For many do impute vnto Cassius, the first beginning and originall of all the warre and enterprise: and said it was he that did encourage Brutus to conspire Cesars death: whereas Dion furnished himselfe with armor, ships, and souldiers, and wanne those friends and companions also that did helpe him to prosecute his warre. Nor he did not as Brutus, who rose to greatnesse by his enterprises, and by warre got all his strength and riches: but he in contrary manner, spent of his owne goods to make warre for the libertie of his countrie, and disbursed of his owne money that should haue kept him in his banishment. Furthermore, Brutus and Cassius were compelled of necessitie to make warres, because they could not haue liued safely in peace when they were driuen out of ROME, for that they were condemned to death, and pursued by their enemies. And for this cause therefore they were driuen to hazard themselues in warre, more for their owne safetie, then for the libertie of their countrie: whereas Dion on the other side, liuing more meerily and safely in his banishment, then the tyrant Dionysius himselfe that had banished him, did put himselfe to that danger, to deliuer SICILE from bondage. Now the matter was not alike vnto the ROMANES, to be deliuered from the gouernement of Cesar, as it was for the SYRACVSANS to be rid of Dionysius tyrannie. For Dionysius denied not, that he was a tyrant, hauing filled SICILE with such miserie and calamitie. Howbeit, the domination of Cesar when it came to be established, did indeed much hurt at the first beginning thereof vnto those that opposed against it: but afterwards, vnto them that being ouercome had receiued his gouernment, it seemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a tyrant, then otherwise that he was so indeed. For there neuer followed any tyrannicall or cruell act, but contrarily, it seemed that he was a mercifull Physitian, whom God had ordained of his speciall grace to be Gouernour of the Empire of ROME, and to set all things againe at quiet stay, the which required the counsell and authoritie of an absolute Prince. And therefore the ROMANES were marueilous sorie for Cesar after he was slaine, and afterwards would neuer pardon them that had slaine him. On the other side, the cause why the SYRACVSANS did most accuse Dion was, because he did let Dionysius escape out of the castle of SYRACVSA, and because he did not ouerthrow and deface the tombes of his father. Furthermore, touching the warres, Dion alway shewed himselfe a Captaine vnreprooueable, hauing wisely and skilfully taken order for those things which he had enterprised of his owne head and counsell, and did amend the faults others committed, and brought things to better state then he found them: whereas it seemeth that Brutus did not wisely to receiue the second battell, considering his rest stood vpon it. For after he had lost the battell, it was impossible for him euer to rise againe: and therefore his heart failed him, and so gaue vp all, and neuer durst striue with his euill fortune as Pompey did, considering that he had present cause enough in the field to hope of his souldiers, and being beside a dreadfull Lord all the sea ouer. Furthermore, the greatest reproch they could obiect against Brutus, was, that Iulius Cæsar hauing saued his life, and pardoned so many prisoners taken in battell, according to his request, taking him for his friend, and honouring him aboue all his other friends, Brutus notwithstanding had imbrued his hands in his bloud, wherewith they could neuer reproue Dion. For on the contrarie side, so long as Dion was Dionysius friend and kinseman, he did alway helpe him to order and gouerne his affaires. But after he was banished his countrey, and that his wife was forcibly maried to another man, and his goods also taken from him, then he entred into iust and open warres against Dionysius the tyrant. But in this point they were contrary together. For that wherein their chiefest praise consisted, to wit, the hatred of tyrants and wicked men, was most true and sincere in Brutus. For hauing no priuate cause of complaint or grudge against Cæsar, he ventured to kill him, onely to set his countrie againe at libertie: whereas if Dion had not receiued priuate cause of quarrell against Dionysius, he would neuer haue made warre with him. The which Plato proueth in his Epistles, where is plainely seene, that Dion being driuen out of the tyrants court against his will, and not putting himselfe to voluntarie banishment, he draue out Dionysius. Furthermore, the respect of the commonwealth caused Brutus, that before was Pompeys enemy, to become his friend, and enemy vnto Cæsar that before was his friend, onely referring his friendship and enmitie vnto the consideration of iustice and equitie. And Dion did many things for Dionysius sake and benefit, all the while he trusted him: and when he began to mistrust him, then for anger he made warre with him. Wherefore all his friends beleeued, that after he had driuen out Dionysius, he would stablish the gouernement on himselfe, abusing the people with a more courteous and gentle title then the name of a tyrant. But for Brutus, his very enemies themselues confessed, that of all those that conspired Cæsars death, he onely had no other end and intent to attempt his enterprise, but to restore the Empire of Rome againe to her former state and gouernment. And furthermore, it was not a like thing to deale with Dionysius, as it was to haue to do with Iulius Cæsar. For no man that knew Dionysius, but would haue despised him, considering that he spent the most part of his time in drinking, dicing, and haunting leud womens companie: but to haue vndertaken to destroy Iulius Cæsar, and not to haue shrunke backe for feare of his great wisedome, power, and fortune, considering that his verie name was dreadfull vnto euery man, and suffered not the kings of Parthia and India to be in rest for him: this could not come but of a maruellous noble mind of him that for feare neuer fainted, nor let fall any part of his courage. And therefore, so soone as Dion came into Sicile, many thousands of men came and ioyned with him against Dionysius. But the fame of Iulius Cæsar did set vp his friends againe after his death, and was of such force, that it raised a young stripling Octauius Cæsar (that had no meanes nor power of himselfe) to be one of the greatest men of Rome: and they vsed him as a remedie to encounter Antonius malice and power. And if men will say, that Dion draue out the tyrant Dionysius by force of armes, and sundrie battels: and that in contrarie maner Brutus slue Cæsar, being a naked man, and without guard: then do I answer againe, that it was a noble part, and of a wise Captaine, to chuse so apt a time and place, to come vpon a man of so great power, and to find him naked without his guard. For he went not suddenly in a rage and alone, or with a small companie to assaile him: but his enterprise was long time before determined of, and that with diuers men, of all the which, not a man of them once failed him: but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he chose them honest men, or else that by his choise of them he made them good men. Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wise choise in trusting of euill men, or else because he could not tell how to vse them he had chosen, of good men he made them become euill: so that neither the one nor the other could be the part of a wise man. For Plato himselfe reprooueth him, for that he had chosen such men for his friends, that he was slaine by them: and after he was slaine, no man would then reuenge his death. And in contrary maner, of the enemies of Brutus, the

the one (who was Antonius) gaue his body honourable buriall: and Octauius Cæsar the other, reserued his honours and memories after him. For at MILLAN (a citie of GAVLE on ITALIE side) there was an image of his in brasse, very like vnto him: the which Cæsar (afterwards passing that way) beheld very aduisedly, for that it was made by an excellent workman, and was very like him; and so went his way. Then he stayed sodainly againe, and called for the Gouernours of the citie, and before them all told them, that the citizens were his enemies, and traitours vnto him, because they kept an enemie of his among them. The Gouernours of the city at the first were astonied at it, and stoutly denied it: and none of them knowing what enemie he meant, one of them looked on another. Octauius Cæsar then turning him vnto Brutus statue, bending his browes, said vnto them: This man you see standing vp here, is he not our enemie? Then the Gouernours of the citie were worse afraid then before, and could not tell what answer to make him. But Cæsar laughing and commending the GAVLES for their faithfulnesse to their friends, euen in their aduersities, he was contented Brutus image should stand still as it did.

THE LIFE OF Aratus.

CHRISTPPVS the Philosopher (my friend Polycrates) being afraid as it seemeth, of the euill sound of an ancient prouerbe, not rightly as it was spoken, and in vse, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this manner:

What children do their ancestors commend,
But those whom fortune fauours to the end?

But Dionysodorus TROEZENIAN reprouing him, doth rehearse the prouerbe rightly as indeed it is:

What children do their ancestors commend,
But those whose life is vertuous to the end?

Saying, that this prouerbe stoppeth their mouthes, who of themselues are vnworthy of praise, and yet are still boasting of the vertues of their ancestors, whose praise they highly extoll. But before those that (as Pindarus saith)

Do match their noble ancestors in prowesse of their owne,
And by their fruits commend the stocke whence they themselues are growne.

(As thy selfe that conformest thy life vnto the examples and maners of thy vertuous ancestors:)

The example of our ancestors, wherein profitable to their posteritie.

it is no small good hap for them, often to remember the noble deeds of their parents in hearing them spoken of, or otherwise for themselues oftentimes to remember some notable doings of their parents. For in them, it is not for lacke of commendable vertues, that they report others praise and glory: but in ioyning their owne vertues to the vertues of their ancestors, they do increase their glory, as inheriting their vertuous life, as challenging their discent by bloud. Therefore, hauing written the life of Aratus thy country-man, and one of thy ancestours, whose glory and greatnesse thou doest not blemish, I do send it vnto thee, not that I thinke but that thou hast more diligently then any man else searched out all his deeds and sayings: but yet, because that thy two sonnes, Polycrates and Pythocles, reading and still hearing something reported, might be brought vp at home by the example of their ancestors, whose deeds shall lie before them to follow. For he loueth himselfe more then he regardeth perfect vertue or his credite, that thinketh himselfe so perfect, as that he need not follow any others example.

The commonweale of the Sicyonians conuerted into tyrannie.

The citie of SICYONE, after it fell from her first gouernment of the Optimacie and Nobilitie, which is proper to the citie of the DORIANS, like an instrument out of tune, it fell into ciuill warres and seditious practises, through the Orators of the people: and neuer ceassed to be plagued with those troubles and miseries, alway changing new tyrants, vntill that Cleon being slaine, they chose Timoclidas and Clinias their Gouernours, two of the noblest men and of greatest authoritie in all the citie. Now when the common-wealth beganne to grow to a certaine state of Gouernment, Timoclidas died: and Abantidas the sonne of Paseas, pretending to make himselfe Lord of the city, he slue Clinias, and put to death some of his parents and friends, draue away others, and sought also to put his sonne Aratus to death, that was then but seuen yeares old. But in this hurly burly and tumult, Aratus flying out of his fathers house, among them that ranne away, and wandring vp and downe the city, being scared and afraid, finding no man to helpe him, by good fortune he got into a womans house, called Soso, which was Abantidas sister, and wife vnto Periphantus, his father Clinias brother. She being of a noble mind, and iudging that the child Aratus by Gods prouidence fled vnto her, hid him in her house, and in the night secretly sent him vnto the city of ARGOS. Now after that Aratus had scaped, and was safe from this danger, from that time there bred in him a vehement malice against tyrants, the which still increased in him as he grew in yeares. So he was vertuously brought vp in the city of ARGOS, with his fathers friends: and perceiuing with himselfe that he waxed bigge and strong, he disposed his bodie to diuers exercises, and became so excellent in them, that he contended in fiue manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images and statues, he appeared in face full and well liking, as one that fed well, and the maiestie of his countenance argueth that he vsed such exercise: and such commonly are large eaters. From whence it came, that he did not giue himselfe so much to pleading, as peraduenture was requisite for a Gouernour of a commonwealth. Howbeit, some do iudge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he had an eloquenter tongue then seemed vnto some: because he wrote them in haste, hauing other businesse in hand, and euen as things came first into his mind. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Logician slue Abantidas, who did commonly vse to sit in the market place, to heare their matters, and to talke with them. And this gaue them good meanes and opportunitie to worke their feat they did. After Abantidas death, his father Paseas possessed the tyrannie, whom Nicocles afterwards slue also by treason, and made himselfe tyrant in his place. It is reported that this Nicocles did liuely resemble the countenance of Periander, the sonne of Cypselus, as Orontes PERSIAN was very like vnto Alcmaon, the sonne of Amphiaraus: and another young LACEDÆMONIAN, vnto Hector of TROIA, whom Myrsillus writeth, was troden vnder mens feet, through the ouer-great preasse of people that came to see him, when they heard of it. This Nicocles was tyrant foure moneths together, in the which he did wonderfull great hurt to the citie, and had almost lost it; the ÆTOLIANS coming on a sodaine, who were like to haue taken it. Now Aratus was come to the state of a stripling, and was greatly esteemed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they found in him, which was no small matter: and besides that, he had a maiestie in his countenance, being wiser then was looked for in a young man of his yeares: therefore the banished men from the city of SICYONE, repaired vnto him before any other man. Nicocles for his part also was not careless of his doings, but had an eye euer to see what Aratus intended, although he little mistrusted any such bold enterprise, nor so dangerous an exploit of him: but did onely onely coniecture that he did ſtirre vp the kings which had bene his dead fathers friends. And ſo indeed Aratus tooke that courſe. But when he ſaw that Antigonus ſtill delayed his promiſes, and did alwaies tract time, and that the hope of aid from king Ptolomy of Ægypt was ſo farre off, at length he determined to vndertake to deſtroy the tyrant himſelfe. So he firſt conſulted with Ariſtomachus and * Ecdelus; of the which the one was baniſhed from Sicyone, and the other an Arcadian, from the city of Megalipolis, a Philoſopher, and a valiant man of his hands and had bene ſcholer to Arceſilaus the Academicke, in the citie of Athens. Theſe two men being contented to ioyne with Aratus, he practiſed with other of the baniſhed men alſo: of the which there were ſome that were aſhamed, not to be partakers of his hope and noble attempt, and ſo did alſo ioyne with him. Howbeit the moſt part of them did not onely refuſe to enter into that practiſe, but further, went about to diſſwade Aratus from his enterpriſe, ſaying: that for lacke of knowledge and experience, he vnderſtood not the danger in vndertaking ſuch a matter, altogether ſo vnlikely. Now as Aratus was thinking in his mind to keepe a certaine place in the territory of Sycione, from whence they might make warre with the tyrant, there came a priſoner vnto them out of the city of Argos, that had broken priſon from the tyrant of Sicyone and was brother vnto Xenocles, one of the baniſhed men. He being brought by the ſame Xenocles vnto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he ſaued himſelfe, the ground within was almoſt as high as the top of the wall, the which in that part ioyned vnto high ſtony places: and that without the wall the height was not ſo great, but that it was eaſily ſcalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he ſent two of his men, Seuthas and Technon, with Xenocles to view the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to proue ſecretly to execute his pretended enterpriſe, & quickly to put it to a venture; then to begin a long warre, and to prepare an open army, he being a priuate mã, to go againſt the power of a tyrant. Xenocles being returned again to Aratus, after he had meaſured the height of the wall, he reported that the place was not vnſcalable, but yet very hard to come to it vndiſcouered, becauſe of certain litle curſt curres a gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would neuer leaue barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leaue off his enterpriſe ſo. Now it was not ſtrange to ſee euery man prepare themſelues of armour and weapon, becauſe at that time there were great robberies and cruell murthers committed by high wayes, and one would aſſault another: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a carpenter and maker of engines, did not ſticke to make them openly, becauſe his common occupation did take away all ſuſpition why they were made. For this carpenter was himſelfe alſo a baniſhed man from Sicyone, as the reſidue were. Furthermore, Aratus friends he had in Argos, of thoſe few men they had, did euery man of them lend him ten men, and armed thirty of his owne men: beſides them, Aratus himſelfe alſo did hire ſome prety number of ſoldiers, by the practiſe of Xenophilus, whom the Captaines of the theeues did furniſh. They were giuen to vnderſtand that they ſhould be led to the territorie of Sicyone, to take a prey of cattell and colts of the King, and they were ſent before, ſome one way, ſome another, with commandement; all to meet together at the tower of Polygnotus, where they ſhould tarie. So he ſent Capheſias alſo before, without any weapons, with foure companions with him: who ſhould come to this gardiners houſe in the night, like ſtrangers and trauellers, to lie in his houſe, and to lock him vp and his dogges, becauſe they had no other deuice to get in but that way. But in the meane time, there were certaine ſpials of Nicocles the tyrant diſcouered, that walked vp and downe the city (making no countenance of any matter) to ſee what Aratus did. Wherefore, Aratus went out of his houſe early in the morning (as his maner was) and walked to the market place with his friends. Then he went to the ſhew place (or place of exerciſes) and there ſtripped himſelfe, annointed him, and wreſtled, and in the end tooke certaine of the yong gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merry, and to paſſe the time away with him: and immediatly after, one of his ſeruants was ſeene in the market place, carying garlands of flowers, another was ſeen alſo buying of links & torches, and another hiring of theſe common dancing and ſinging women, which follow feaſts and banquets with their inſtrumẽts. Nicocles ſpials ſeeing that, were deceiued; for one of them laughing on another ſaid, that they might eaſily ſee by that, there was nothing more fearefull and timorous then a tyrant: conſidering that Nicocles being Lord of ſo great a city, was afraid of a young ſtripling, that ſpent all that he could rap and rend to keep him in his baniſhment, vpon vaine bankets and feaſts at noone daies. And thus were the tyrants ſpials finely mocked. Aratus ſelf departed immediatly after dinner out of Argos, and went vnto the ſoldiers, whom he had appointed before to meet him at the tower of Polignotus, and led them ſtraight vnto Nemea. There he told them openly his full intent & purpoſe; hauing before made an Oration vnto them to incourage them, and alſo made them maruellous faire promiſes. Then he gaue them for their watch-word Apollo fauorable, and ſo went directly to the citty of Sicyone, marching with great ſpeed at the firſt becauſe of the going downe of the Moone, and afterwards ſlackned his pace a little, ſo that they had Moone-light all the way as they came, and the Moone went not downe, vntill they were come to the gardiners houſe that was hard by the wall. So Capheſias, whom he had ſent before vnto the gardiners houſe, came to meet with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogges, becauſe they ranne away; howbeit that he had made faſt the gardiner in his owne houſe. This diſcouraged the moſt part of all the companie, who would needs haue him in any caſe to returne backe againe. But Aratus then beganne to comfort them, and promiſed that he would leade them backe againe, if it chanced that the dogges were too buſie with them: and therewithall preſently cauſed the ladder men to go before, whom Ecdelus and Mnaſitheus led, and he himſelfe came faire and ſoftly after. The dogges made a foule barking, and were baiting about Ecdelus and his company. This notwithſtanding, they came ſafe to the wall, and did ſet vp their ſcaling ladders. But euen as the firſt men got vpon them, the Captaine of the watch that had giuen place to him that ſhould ward in the morning, came by chance, and paſſed hard by them, viſiting the ſoldiers with a litle bell, and there was a number of torches, & a great noiſe of men that followed him. They that were vpon the ladders hearing them, ducked downe, and ſtirred not; and thereby the ſoldiers that paſſed by them, could not ſee them. But now the new morning watch came toward them alſo, which did put them in great danger to be diſcouered: but yet they once againe ſcaped them, and were not diſcouered, becauſe the ſecond watch went beyond them, and ſtayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnaſitheus immediatly ſcaled the wall, and ſent Technon with all poſſible ſpeed vnto Aratus, to will him to make all the haſt he could to come to them. Now there was no great diſtance betwixt the garden where the dogs were, and the wall, and a litle tower where they kept a great greyhound to keepe watch: but the greyhound neuer heard their coming, either becauſe he was a cowardly curre of nature, or elſe for that he had bin ouer-courſed and wearied the day before. But the gardiners litle curres that baulled and barked beneath, had wakened the greyhound with their barking, who at the firſt began to anſwer them with a ſoft girning; but when they came by the tower where he lay, he barked out aloud, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Inſomuch that the skout which was farther off, called aloud to the hunt that kept the dogge, and asked what he ailed, that he made ſuch a barking, and whether there were any thing ſtirring or not that angred him. The hunt within the tower anſwered, that it was nothing, but that his dog was naked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that paſſed by, and at the noiſe of the bell. This made Aratus ſoldiers a great deale the bolder: becauſe they thought that the hunt had bene made priuie to their enterpriſe, and that he went about to hide their ſecret attempt, and hoped alſo that there were many other within the citie that would further their enterpriſe. When they came to get vp vpon the wall, it was of a great height and very dangerous, becauſe the ladders ſhooke and bowed, by reaſon of the weight of the men, vnleſſe they did come vp faire and ſoftly one after another. Furthermore, the time did put them in ſome perill, becauſe the cockes began to crow, and the countrie folke that brought things to the market to ſell, began to come apace to the towne out of euery quarter. And therefore Aratus made haſte to get vp, hauing onely fortie men aboue with him, and looked for ſome beſides to come vp, which were yet beneath. Then he marched directly toward the tyrants pallace, where his hired ſouldiers kept watch and ward: and coming ſodainly vpon them, laid hold of euery man of them, and ſlue not one. Then he ſent into the citie to his friends, to will them to come vnto him. Thereupon they ranne out of euery corner to Aratus. Now the day began to break, and ſtraight the Theater was full of people that gathered together, becauſe of the noiſe and ſtirre they heard in the citie, not knowing what the matter meant, vntill at length an Herald proclaimed with open voice that it was Aratus the ſonne of Clinias who called his countrymen and citizens to the recouery of their liberty. Then they perſwading themſelues that the thing which they long wiſhed and looked for, was now come to paſſe, they ranne all in a troupe together to the tyrants houſe, and ſet it on fire. But the flame roſe ſo high and great after the fire had taken it in euery part, that it was ſeene to the citie of Corinth: inſomuch that the Corinthians wondering what the matter ſhould be, were in minde to haue gone to helpe it.

Aratus daungers, in deliuering of his countrey from the tyranny of Nicocles.

Aratus winneth the citie of Sicyone without bloud ſhed.

Now

Now for Nicocles, he ſaued himſelfe, and got out of the city by ſecret vaults he had made vnder the ground. The ſouldiers on the other ſide quenching the fire with the helpe of the citizens, did ſacke all they found in the tyrants pallace: the which Aratus hindred not, but did moreouer make all the reſt of the tyrants goods common amongſt them. So his enterpriſe had ſo good ſucceſſe, that there was none of his owne company ſlaine he brought with him, neither any of their enemies that were within the city; fortune kept this exploit ſo pure and cleane from any bloudſhed. Then Aratus reſtored foureſcore men vnto their lands and goods againe, whom the tyrant Nicocles had baniſhed: and others alſo, that had bene baniſhed by former tyrants, to the number of fiue hundred men, who had bene wel-neare fiftie yeares ſpace baniſhed out of their country. Now the moſt of them being come home poore and needie, would haue entred on their goods and lands they enioyed before: and ſo, entring againe vpon their lands in their country, and their houſes in the citie, they amazed Aratus withall, ſeeing Antigonus on the one ſide practiſe all the meanes he could to winne SICYONE being now free, and they all in an vprore and mutinie in the citie. Therefore, following the beſt counſell he could thinke vpon and deuiſe, conſidering the danger of the preſent time: he ioyned the citie in league and friendſhip with the ACHAIANS, and of them all made but one body. And becauſe the Citizens of SICYONE were DORIANS, they were glad to ſubmit themſelues to be gouerned & protected by the name of the ACHAIANS, who were at that time of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in little villages, and had no great bounds of lands, neither were they very ſpeciall good, for that they ſtood vpon the ſea ſide, where was no maner of hauen nor port, but ſtones, & rocks good ſtore: and the ſea beating vpon them, did eate into the maine land. This notwithſtanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of GREECE when it was vnited & gouerned by good policy, was of great force & almoſt inuincible. For the ACHAIANS being in compariſon of the ancient force of GREECE, of no regard, and but a part of one city enfeebled with ciuill & forraine warre; ſo long as they could ſubmit themſelues to be ruled by the wiſdome and vertue of their Captaine, and not enuy nor malice his proſperitie & ſoueraignty: they did not only maintaine themſelues as free men, in the middeſt of the ſeruitude of ſo many great cities, large and mighty, but did alſo deliuer many other people of GREECE from their tyrants. Now, for Aratus maners: he was one that by nature loued ciuill gouernment, and equity among citizens in one ſelfe citie: he was nobly minded, and more painefull about the affaires of the commonweale, then carefull of his owne buſineſſe, and hated tyrants to the death, & imployed his good or euill will wholy for the ſeruice of the commonwealth. And therfore he ſeemed not to be ſo ſound a friend, as he was a gentle and mercifull enemy: framing himſelfe in either of both, as time ſerued for the cõmonwealth. To be ſhort, it was a generall and common voice among all the cities confederates, in priuate company, and at open meetings in the Theaters: that Aratus loued nothing but vertue, and honeſtie; that in open wars he was not ſo valiant & couragious, and he was crafty and ſubtle to take a citie on the ſudden. Furthermore, though he was valiant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he wold neuer haue brought to paſſe: yet it ſeemeth he left many things poſſible vndone the which he might eaſily haue done, for that he durſt not venture on them. For as there be beaſts whoſe ſight is perfect by night, and by day they can ſee nothing, becauſe the ſubtiltie of the humor and moiſture in their eyes is dried vp, & cannot abide the bright light of the day: euen ſo, men that otherwiſe by nature are very wiſe, are eaſily afraid of danger, when they muſt venter on it at noone dayes: where contrarily they are bold in ſecret enterpriſes, ſuddenly to attempt any thing. Now this contrariety and difference in men well brought vp groweth through ignorance & lacke of inſtruction in Philoſophy, which of it ſelfe doth nouriſh vertue, as fruit that ſpringeth vp without planting, or helpe of mans hand. But this is beſt diſcerned by examples. So Aratus hauing ioyned himſelfe and his city SICYONE vnto the ACHAIANS, and ſeruing in perſon as a man of armes among the reſt, he was maruellouſly beloued of his Generals, that ſaw him ſo obedient. For, notwithſtanding, that he had made ſo large a contribution as the eſtimation of himſelf, and the force of his city vnto the commonwealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was as ready to obey & execute the commandements of the Generals, as the pooreſt and meaneſt ſoldier, were he of DYMA or of TRITA, or of any other ſmall village whatſoeuer. Furthermore, a great ſumme of money being ſent him from king Ptolemy for a gift, amounting to twentie and fiue talents, he tooke it, but forthwith diſpoſed it amongſt his poore countriemen, both to relieue their want, as alſo to redeeme priſoners. This notwithſtanding the baniſhed men ſtill vexed and troubled them that had their goods and lands, to haue them out of their hands, and otherwiſe would be ſatisfied by no meanes. Their commonwealth therefore being in great danger to fall into ciuill war, Aratus perceiuing there was no other way to helpe this miſchiefe, but by Ptolomies liberalitie: he determined to go vnto him, to pray him to helpe him with money, to pacifie this grudge and tumult. So he embarked at the hauen of METHONA, aboue the foreland of MALEA, to ſaile from thence into ÆGYPT: howbeit he had ſuch a contrary wind, and the ſea roſe ſo high, that the maſter of the ſhip, was driuē to let her go whither ſhe would to take ſea roome. So being driuen quite from his direct courſe, with great danger he got to the citie of ADRIA, which was his enemy: becauſe Antigonus kept it, and had a garriſon in it. But Aratus did wiſely preuent it, going aſhoare, and wandred farre from the ſea, with one of his friends called Timanthes, and got into a wood, whereby they had an euill nights reſt. He had not gone far after he had left his ſhip, but the Captaine of the garriſon came, and ſought for him. Notwithſtanding, his ſeruants had mocked him finely (being before inſtructed by Aratus what anſwer they ſhould make,) ſaying that he was gone, and fled into the Ile of EVBOEA. Howbeit, the Captaine of the garriſon ſtayed the ſhip, his men, and all things elſe ſhe had in her, and tooke her for a good prize. Within few daies after, Aratus being marueilouſly troubled, & at a ſtraight with himſelfe what he ſhould do, there happily arriued a ROMAINE ſhip hard by the place where he kept moſt, partly to hide himſelfe, and partly alſo to ſee if he could diſcouer any thing. This ſhip was bound for SYRIA. So he had dealt with the maſter of the ſhip in that ſort, that he tooke him aboord, and promiſed he would deliuer him in CARIA, and ſo he did. But he was in as much danger this ſecond iourney againe by ſea, as he was in the firſt he made towards ÆGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Aratus went into ÆGYPT, and ſpake with the king, who made very much of him: for Aratus fed him ſtill by ſending him paſſing faire tables, and pictures of GRECE, of excellent workmanſhip. And indeed hauing a ſingular good wit, he alwaies got together, and brought the excellenteſt painted pictures he could get, but ſpecially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to ſend them vnto the king. For learning flouriſhed yet in the city of SICYONE, and they eſteemed the painting of tables in that city, to be the perfecteſt for true colours and fine drawing, of all other places. Inſomuch as Apelles (though he was then of a marueilous fame for painting) went thither, & gaue to theſe two excellent painters a talent, to remaine a while in their cōpany: not ſo much to attaine to the perfection of the art, as thereby to win himſelfe fame. And therfore when Aratus had reſtored his city againe to liberty, he cauſed all the Images of the tyrants to be defaced and plucked downe: howbeit he ſtood doubtfull a long time, whether he ſhould deface Ariſtratus picture, or not, who reigned in the time of Philip. For he was painted with the hands of all the ſcholers of Melanthus, being by a triumphant chariot, that caried a victory, & as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a paſſing peece of worke to ſee to, ſo that Aratus at the firſt yeelded, and was contented to ſaue it for the excellency of the workmanſhip: yet in the end, ouercome with the extreme hate he bare vnto tyrants, he bad it ſhould be defaced. Now it is reported alſo, that Nealces the painter, being one of Aratus friends, prayed him with the teares in his eyes to pardon ſuch a notable peece of work. But when he ſaw Aratus ſo hard hearted that he would not grant it, he told him, it was good reaſon to make war with tyrāts, but not with their pictures. Let vs then (quoth he) leaue the chariot of triumph and victory, and I will make thee ſee Ariſtratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus was contented to let him haue his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Ariſtratus, and in place thereof drew onely a palme tree, and durſt adde nothing elſe to it of his own deuice. Some ſay, that vnder the chariot were conueyed Ariſtratus feet defaced. So Aratus by meanes of theſe tables and pictures, was marueilouſly well beloued of king Ptolomy. But after he was acquainted with him, & knew his conuerſation, he loued him then better then before. Inſomuch that he gaue him a hundred and fiftie talents to helpe his citie withall: of the which, he caried forty away with him vnto PELOPONNESVS, and the king afterwards ſent him the reſt at ſundrie times. Now this was a marueilous matter of him to get ſuch a maſſe of money together for his citizens: conſidering that the Orators, Captaines and Gouernors of free cities, for a litle ſumme of money only which they haue taken of kings & princes, haue bin corrupted & betrayed their townes & countrey. But this was a more wonder, that by means of this money he made peace and loue betwixt the poore and rich: and furthermore, ſaued vpright all the people of SICYONE, where he ſhewed himſelf marueilous wiſe and temperate, being of that great great power & authority he was. For after they had chosen him arbitrator to iudge, compound and absolutely to decide all quarels and strife betweene the banished men, he would neuer vndertake it himselfe alone, but tooke fifteene other of the chiefest citizens with him; and with them, by great paines and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his citizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore not only all the inhabitants and citizens of SICYONE together, decreed publike honors meete for him, but also the banished men themselues did priuately cast his iimage in brasse, and set it vp, vnder the which they caused this inscription to be grauen: Aratus temperãce.

Thy prowesse and thy feats of armes, thy counsell sage and wise,
Not onely are among the Greekes extolled to the skies,
But also to the vtmost straights of Marroke blowne by fame.
And we that through thy goodnesse home into our countrey came,
Haue set this image vp to thee Aratus, as a signe
Of our deliu'rance through thy loue, and through the power diuine.
For thy good nature furthred by good fortune doth restore
Vs countrey, lawes, and liberty, bereft vs quite before.

Aratus hauing done all these things, he suppressed the enuie of the citizens, through the great good turnes he had done vnto them. But then king Antigonus being angrie with Aratus in his mind, and seeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be mistrusted of Ptolomie, he did him many other great courtesies, Aratus neuer seeking them at his hands. But one day specially aboue the rest, as he did sacrifice vnto the gods at CORINTH, he sent Aratus part of his weathers he had sacrificed, vnto SICYONE. And at the feast of his sacrifice in ỹ hearing of many noble men that were bidden guests, he said openly of Aratus: I did alway thinke that this yong SICYONIAN could not but haue a liberall mind, louing the liberty of his country and countrimen: but I perceiue now he is a man that can iudge of Princes maners and affaires. For heretofore he made no account of vs, because his hope was out of his countrey, and he greatly esteemed the riches of ÆGYPT, hearing talke of so many Elephants, of such a great fleet of ships, and of such a sumptuous Court, as king Ptolomies Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a smoake and vaine pompe, he is come to vs: and for my part, he is welcome to me, and I wil haue you al to take him for my friend. These words of king Antigonus, were straight taken at bound of certaine enuious men, and caried for lacke of better matter vnto king Ptolomy, euery man striuing who should write all the euill they could against him: so that Ptolomie thereupõ sent a messenger of purpose vnto him, to reproue him for it. Thus fell there out much enuy and malice, betweene the earnest loue of these Princes and Kings, that contended with each other who should haue Aratus. Furthermore, the first time that Aratus was chosen Lieutenant generall of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, he forraged and spoiled the country of LOCRIDE, which lieth directly ouer against ACHAIA, and CALYDONIA also. Howbeit he came not time inough to aid the BOEOTIANS, in the battel which they lost before the city of CHÆRONEA, against the ÆTOLIANS: where Abæocritus, gouernour of BOEOTIA was slaine in the field, with a thousand other BOEOTIANS. Howbeit the next yeare following, he being the second time chosen Lieutenant generall, he attempted to winne the castell of CORINTH againe, being an enterprise which not only concerned the priuate benefit of SICYONE it selfe, and the tribe of the ACHAIANS, but also of all GRECE besides. For, he was fully bent to driue the garrison of the MACEDONIANS thence, the which seemed euen a very yoke that held all the GRECIANS noses to the grindstone. For like as Chares, Captaine of the ATHENIANS, hauing in a certaine conflict discomfited the kings Lieutenants, wrote vnto ỹ ATHENIANS, that had won a victory halfe sister to the victory of MARATHON: euen so me thinks it were no disgrace to say, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrãts, which was done by Pelopidas THEBAN, and Thrasybulus ATHENIAN; sauing that this last act was more famous, because it was not against GRECIANS, but amongst strangers and forreine power and gouernment, vpon whõ it was executed. For the Isthmus or barre of PELOPONNESVS, which separateth the sea Ægeum from the sea Ionium, doth come and ioyne the firme land of the rest of GRECE with the PRESCHE an Iland of PELOPONNESVS. Euen so likewise the mountaine called Acrocorinth, on the which the castel standeth, rising vp in the middest of GRECE, when there is any garrison of men of war in it, it cutteth off all traffike and passage by, of any armies of them which inhabit within the ſtraight, for them that are without the ſtraight, both by ſea and by land, and maketh him only Lord of the countrey that keepeth the caſtell. So that it was not for ſport, but for truth, and in good earneſt, that Philip the yong king of MACEDON was wont to call the citie and caſtell of CORINTH, the ſtockes and giues of GRECE. And therfore was this caſtel maruellouſly wiſhed and deſired of euery man, but ſpecially of Kings and Princes. But the deſire Antigonus had of it was ſo vehement, that it differed nothing from the paſſions of a franticke louer. For he did nothing elſe continually but ſtudy and deuiſe how he might winne it vpon the ſudden, from them that kept it: becauſe otherwiſe by open force, it was impoſſible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that caſtell, being poiſoned (as it is reported) by Antigonus practiſe, the caſtell being left in the hands of his wife Nicæa, who gouerned the ſtate of CORINTH, & did carefully cauſe the Acrocorinth to be kept, he immediatly ſent his ſonne Demetrius thither, and put Nicæa in good hope to marry her with this yong Prince: a thing that pleaſed this Lady well, hough ſhe was very old. So, for her ſelfe ſhe was wonne ſtraight, by meanes of his yong ſonne Demetrius, whom he vſed as a ſtale to intrap her. Howbeit Nicæa for all this goodly offer, forſooke not her caſtell, but alwaies made it ſtraightly to be looked vnto. Antigonus ſeemed to make no account of it, but daily gaue himſelfe to make ſumptuous ſacrifices, feaſts, and playes to the gods, within the citie of CORINTH for the mariage: as though he had meant no other thing, but banqueting and iollitie all that might be. When the houre was come to ſee theſe ſports, and that the muſitian Amœbeus, began to ſing, he himſelfe made as though he would accompany Nicæa vnto the Theater, being conueyed thither in a ſumptuous rich litter, as it had bene for a Queene. She was very glad of this honour, and thought nothing leſſe then of that which happened her. But when Antigonus came to the end of a ſtreete that turned to go vp the hill towards the caſtel, he bade her keepe on ſtill to the Theater: and himſelfe in the meane time left Amœbeus there with his ſinging, and all the feaſt of the mariage, and went ſtraight vp to the caſtell, forcing himſelfe aboue his ſtrength and yeares. When he was at the top of the hill, and found the gates ſhut, he knocked with his ſtaffe, and commanded the garriſon to open him the gates. They wondering to ſee him there in perſon, did let him in. When he was gotten into the caſtell, he was ſo exceeding ioyfull of it, that he had no reaſon to moderate his ioy; but would banquet in the middeſt of ſtreetes, and in the market place, hauing minſtrels to play vpon their inſtruments at his table, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads for ioy; and did ſo fondly and lightly behaue himſelfe, as if he had bene a light yong man (and not as he was) an old man, who had proued ſuch ſundry changes of fortune, and yet ſuffered himſelfe to be thus caried away with pleaſure, that he embraced and ſpake to euery man he met. Whereby it is eaſie to iudge, that ioy poſſeſſing a man without wit or diſcretion, it maketh him beſides himſelfe, and doth more trouble his wits, then paine or feare. Now Antigonus hauing won the caſtell of the Acrocorinth, as you haue heard, he put it into the hands of thoſe he truſted beſt, to be ſafely kept: and therfore made Perſæus the Phyloſopher, Captaine of the caſtell. But indeed Aratus was in mind to haue attempted the taking of the caſtell in Alexanders life time: yet he let it alone, becauſe he ioyned himſelfe with the ACHAIANS. But at that time there was offered him another occaſion againe to attempt it, & this it was. At CORINTH there were foure brethren borne in SYRIA, of the which, one of them being called Diocles, was a ſouldier of the caſtell: and the reſt hauing robbed the kings treaſure, went ſtraight vnto SICYONE, to Ægias the banker, whom Aratus imployed in his facultie. Theſe three brethren immediatly ſold him part of the gold they had robbed: and afterwards, one of them (called Erginus) coming often to ſee him, by litle and litle ſold him all the reſt. By this meanes Ægias fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the garriſon of the caſtell of the Acrocorinth. Erginus told him, that going vnto his brother vp thoſe ſteepe and high rockes, he found a path as it were cut out of the rocke, that went to a place of the wall of the caſtell, which was verie low. Ægias hearing that, anſwered him ſmiling: Alas, my friend, what meane you to ſteale a litle peece of gold to hinder the king, when in one houres ſpace you can ſell ſuch a great maſſe of money together? For as well ſhall you die if you be apprehended for this fellonie, as if you were otherwiſe attainted for treaſon. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promiſed that he would feele his brother Diocles minde in it, for he did not greatly truſt his other brethren. So returning ſhortly after, he bargained with Aratus to bring him to a place of the wall that was not aboue fifteene foote high, promiſing that he would helpe him to execute the reſt, with his brother Diocles. Aratus promiſed then to giue him fifty talents, if he brought his enterprise to passe: and if he failed, that he would then giue either of them, a house and a talent. Erginus would haue the whole fifty talents put into Ægias the bankers hands. Aratus had not so much ready money, and besides he would not take it vp at vsury, for feare of giuing cause to suspect his enterprise. Wherefore he tooke all his plate of gold and siluer, and his wiues iewels, and laid them to gage to Ægias, to disburse the said summe. But Aratus had so great and noble a mind in him, and was so bent to do notable acts, that knowing how Phocion and Epaminondas had bene esteemed for the iustest and honestest men of Greece, because they had refused great gifts that were offered thē, & would neuer sel nor staine their honour for money: he yet surpassing them, was contented to spend his owne, to bring any good enterprise to passe, and did put his life in danger for the common benefite of his countrey men; they themselues knowing nothing of his enterprise, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimitie and courage of such a man, and that will not euen now as it were, be willing to aide him, considering how dearely he bought so great a danger of his person, and how he laid his plate and all the riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middest of his enemies, where he was to fight for his owne life, hauing no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of such a noble enterprise, and nothing else? But now, though the enterprise of it selfe was dangerous, an error chancing through ignorance at the first, made it yet more dangerous. For Aratus had sent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the wall. This Technon had neuer spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his mind what manner of man he was, by the markes that Erginus had giuen him of him: that he had a blacke curled haire, that his face was blacke, and that he had no beard. Now Technon being come to the place where Erginus said he would be with Diocles, he staied before the towne in a place called Ornis. So whilest he was tarying there, the elder brother of Diocles (called Dionysius, who knew nothing of the enterprise, nor was made acquainted withall, & looked very like his brother Diocles) came that way by chance. Technon being moued by the marks he saw in him, like vnto those he was told of, asked him if he were nothing a kin vnto Erginus. The other answered, he was his brother. Then Technon perswading himself it was certainly Diocles that spake to him, without asking him his name, or making other enquiry of him, he tooke him by the hand, & began to talke with him of the practise he had with Erginus, and to aske him of it. Dionysius taking the matter vpon him, & feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the city, holding him on still with talke, Technon mistrusting nothing. But euen as Dionysius was readie to take him fast by the coller, his brother Erginus came. Who, perceiuing how Technon had mistaken the matter, and the danger he was in, beckned to him with his head to flie; and so they both ran for life vnto Aratus, to saue themselues. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more discouraged for this, but sent Erginus straight to cary his brother Dionysius mony, and to pray him not to be aknowne of any thing: who furthermore brought him with him vnto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him sure for starting: for they bound him, and locked him vp fast in a chamber, whilest they went about their enterprise. So when all things were readie, Aratus commanded the rest of his army that they should tary behind, armed all night: and he himselfe with foure hundred of the best men he had (not knowing themselues wheither they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the gates of the city, passing by the temple of Iuno. This was about the middest of summer, when the Moone was at the ful, & the element very cleare without clouds: insomuch that they were afraid their armors would glister by Moone-light, and bewray them. But as the foremost of them came neare vnto the city, there arose clouds out of the sea that darkned all the city and places thereabouts, and shadowed them. Then al of them sitting downe on the ground, plucked off their shoes, both because they should make lesse noise, as also for that their footing should be surer, and that they should slip lesse vpon the ladders. But Erginus, and seuen other companions with him, like men that trauell, came secretly into the gate of the citie, and slue the porter and warders there. At that very instant, Aratus caused the ladders to be set vp against the wals, and made an hundred of his souldiers get vp on them: and sent also to command the rest, that they should follow him with all possible speed. Then drawing vp his ladders after him, as fast as he could, he went through the city, with his hundred men toward the castel, with such a ioyful cheare, as if he had had it already in his hand; for that he saw he was not discouered. But as he went on, he saw foure of the watch coming with a light against them. They saw not Aratus and his company, but the enemies saw them plainly a farre off Aratus and his men therefore ſtood vp cloſe againſt old wals to tarie their coming, and at the firſt onſet, ſlue three of them: but the fourth hauing a blow on his head with a ſword, ranne away, making an out-crie, that the enemies were in the citie. The trumpets forthwith ſounded the alarme, all the citie was in an vprore, the ſtreets were ſtraight full of people running vp and downe, and of lights in euery corner, both beneath the citie, and alſo in the caſtel, and the noiſe was great euery where. Aratus in the meane time forced to get vp the high rocks faire and ſoftly at the firſt, and with great paine & difficultie, being out of his path he ſhould haue found, which he miſſed being very deepe into the rocks, and with many crooks and cranks went to the foote of the caſtell: but ſuddenly, euen as it had bene by miracle, the Moone appearing through the clouds, when they were in their worſt way, it gaue them light, and brought them to that part of the wal where they ſhould be, and ſtraight the Moone was ſhadowed againe. Now the three hundred ſouldiers whom Aratus had left by the gate of the temple of Iuno, when they were come into the citie being full of lights and in vprore, and beſides could not find the path by the which their Captaine Aratus went before them: they ſtood cloſe together vnder a rocke that ſhadowed them, ſorowfully looking to heare ſome newes of Aratus: who was then fighting with the garriſon of the caſtell, the which made head againſt him, with all the force and power he could. Vnder the caſtell there were a great noiſe heard of men that fought, but yet the noiſe was ſo confuſed by the ſound rebounding againſt the rockes and mountaine, that they could not deuiſe whence it ſhould come. So they being in this perplexity, not knowing which way to turne thẽſelues, Archelaus, captaine of king Antigonus men, hauing a good number of ſouldiers with him, went vp the hill with great cries and noiſe of trumpets, to ſet vpon Aratus and his company behind. But after he was paſſed by theſe three hundred ſoldiers of Aratus band, they gaue charge vpon him, as if they had bin laid there in ambuſh of purpoſe, and ſlue the firſt they encountred withall, and made the others ſo afraid, and Archelaus himſelfe, that they diſperſed them, & made ſome flie one way, ſome another. So, as they were ouerthrowne, Erginus came to theſe three hundred men, coming immediately from them that fought, and brought the newes that Aratus and them of the caſtell, were come to the ſword together, and valiantly defended themſelues, luſtily fighting for the wall, and therefore it was time for them to help him quickly. Then the ſoldiers bad him bring them thither ſtraight, and ſo he did. So they climing vp the hill, did ſignifie by their cries to their men, that they came to aide him. Furthermore, the Moone being then at the full, and ſhining on their harneſſe, made their enemies in the caſtell thinke that they were a greater number then indeed they were, becauſe of the long way they had to make to get vp vpon the rocks; and alſo becauſe of the ſound in the night, that made their crie ſeeme to be of a greater number then they were. At length they ioyned with Aratus, they fought it out ſo luſtily, that they draue the garriſon out of the wals, and by breake of day wanne the caſtel. So that their exploit was diſcouered by the riſing of the Sunne, and beſides, all the reſt of their armie that came from the city of SYCIONE: whom the CORINTHIANS very gladly receiued, and did ſet open their gates vnto them; and aided them to take King Antigonus men. Afterwards, when they thought that all was ſafe, then Aratus ranne from the caſtell vnto the Theater of the citie, whither repaired an infinite number of people, as well for the deſire they had to ſee him, as alſo to heare him ſpeake vnto the CORINTHIANS. So, hauing placed the ACHAIANS on either ſide, at the coming into the Theater, Aratus being armed went vp into the chaire or pulpit for Orations, hauing his face quite changed, both for the great paines he had taken, and alſo for lacke of ſleepe: ſo that his bodie being ouer-wearied, his ſpirits were euen done. Now when all the aſſemby of the people (ſeeing him in the chaire) did humble themſelues to ſhew him all the honour and kindneſſe they could poſſible: he tooke his ſpeare out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and bodie ſomewhat, he leaned vpon it, and ſo ſtood a great while in this manner before he ſpake, receiuing the cries of ioy and clapping of hands which the people made, praiſing his valiantneſſe, and bleſſing his good hap and fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet againe, he framed his countenance, and began to make an Oration vnto them in the name of all the tribe and commonwealth of the ACHAIANS, meete for the enterpriſe from whence he came: and perſwaded them to ioyne to the ACHAIANS. So therewithall, they preſently deliuered him the keyes of their citie, the which were neuer before that time in their power, ſince the reigne of king Philip. Now touching the other Captaines of King Antigonus, Aratus hauing taken Archelaus priſoner, he let him go, but put Theophraſtus

And it is reported, that as he was afterwards in talke of Philoſophy, where one maintaining, that a man could not be a good Captaine, vnleſſe he were a perfect wiſe man: This (quoth he) is one of Zenoes opinions rightly, the which heretofore pleaſed me beſt: but now this yong SICYONIAN Aratus, hath made me of another mind. Many writers do report this ſaying of Perſæus. Furthermore, Aratus wan preſently the temple of Iuno, and the hauen of LECHÆVM, where he tooke fiue and twentie ſhips of king Antigonus, and fiue hundred horſe of ſeruice for the war, & foure hundred SYRIANS, which he ſold euery one of thē. The ACHAIANS left within the caſtel of the Acrocorinth, a garriſon of foure hundred footmen, and fiftie dogs, and as many hunts; all the which were kept for the watch of the caſtel. Now, the ROMAINS wondering at the valiantneſſe of Philopœmen, they called him the laſt of the GRECIANS. Euen ſo might I alſo (in my opinion) ſay, that this act is the laſt and moſt famous of all the GRECIANS, and deſerued to be equall, aſwell for valiantneſſe, as alſo good ſucceſſe, with the greateſt exploits of the moſt famous ancients: as that which followed immediatly after, doth amply declare. For the MEGARIANS reuolting frō king Antigonus, did ſtraight ioyne with Aratus: and the TROEZENIANS alſo with the EPIDAVRIANS, did likewiſe enter into league & friendſhip with the ACHAIANS. So at the firſt inuaſion he made, he went to ſpoile the country of ATTICA, and croſſed ouer to the Iſle of SALAMINA, and ſpoiled and deſtroyed it, euen as if he had deliuered the power and force of the ACHAIANS out of priſon, to ſerue his owne turne in any thing he thought good of. Howbeit, he ſent home the ATHENIANS priſoners without paying of ranſome: and all of policy to make them deſirous to rebell againſt the MACEDONIANS. Furthermore, he made king Ptolomy a friend and confederate of the ACHAIANS, with condition, that he ſhould be Lieutenant generall both by ſea & by land. For theſe reſpects Aratus was of maruellous eſtimation and credit with the ACHAIANS: inſomuch that where they could not yearely chuſe him their Generall, being contrary to their law; they choſe him at the leaſt euery ſecond yeare: but in effect, all was done by his aduice and coūſel. For they ſaw plainly, that it was neither honor, nor riches, nor friendſhip of kings & princes, nor the priuate benefit of his owne city wherein he was borne, nor any other thing elſe that he preferred, before the glory & increaſe of the cōmonwealth of the AHCAIANS. For he was of opinion, that cities thēſelues were but weake, and being ioyned together with the chaine of cōmon benefit, they were a ſtrength one to preſerue the other. And in like maner, euen as the parts that are in the bodies of brute beaſts, haue life and ſuſtenāce, being ioyned & knit together, and ſtraight ſo ſoone as there is any ſeparation of thē the one from the other, they liue no more, but putrifie: euen ſo cities alſo were brought to decay by them that did diſperſe their ſociety among them; and in contrary maner did then againe increaſe, when ioyning with any other great body and city, they were gouerned with wiſdome and good counſell. So Aratus ſeeing the chiefeſt cities therabouts enioy their lawes & liberties, thought it a ſhamefull thing to leaue the ARGIVES in ſlauery and bondage. Wherfore he practiſed to kil the tyrant Ariſtomachus that gouerned thē, both to ſhew himſelfe thankfull to the city for his bringing vp there: as alſo to ioyne that great and mightie citie vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Now there were diuerſe men, that had the hearts & courage to vndertake to do it, of the which the chiefeſt were Æſchylus and Charimenes the Soothſayer, but they had no ſwords: for they were ſtraightly forbidden by the tyrant, and grieuous puniſhments ordained for thē that ſhould be found with their ſwords. Aratus therefore cauſed litle ſhort daggers to be made at CORINTH for thē, ỳ which he ſowed vp in packs caried on certain beaſts loden with other baggage & ſtuffe. But the Soothſayer Charimenes did impart this enterpriſe vnto a third man, and made him one of the conſpiracy with them. Æſchylus being very much offended with it, began therefore to enter into practiſe by himſelfe, and left their company. Charimenes perceiuing that, tooke ſuch a toy in his head in a mad mood, that he bewraied thē as they went about to execute their enterpriſe. This notwithſtanding, the moſt part of the conſpirators ſaued themſelues, and fled to CORINTH. So the tyrant Ariſtomachus was ſlaine ſhortly after by his owne men. But then another tyrant Ariſtippus, a crueller man then the firſt, made haſt to take the tyranny before he could be reſiſted. This notwithſtāding, Aratus with all the young men of the ACHAIANS able to ſerue in the field, went ſodainly thither with aide, hoping to find them of the city very glad to recouer their liberty. Howbeit the people being acquainted, & of long time vſed patiētly to beare the yoke of bondage, there was not a man of thē

that would once take his part. So he returned backe againe and did nothing, ſauing that thereby the Achaians were accuſed, becauſe that in open peace they had made war, and therefore they were put in ſuite before the Mantineans, at Ariſtippus requeſt, tyrant of Argos. The matter was pleaded in Aratus abſence, and the Achaians were condemned to pay the ſumme of thirty Minaes. After this proofe and attempt of Aratus, Ariſtippus being affraid of Aratus, and hating him to the death, ſought wayes to kill him, with the helpe of Antigonus, who did aide him in it: and there were ſpials almoſt in euery corner, that did nothing elſe but lie in waite to execute Ariſtippus mind. Now, there is no ſurer guard vnto a Prince, then the perfect loue and good will of his ſubiects. For after that the Nobilitie & common people haue bene vſed to feare, not him, but thoſe that for him command them, he then ſeeth with many eyes, heareth with many eares, and knoweth what is done farre off. Here therefore I will a little digreſſe from my hiſtorie, to ſhew you the manner of Ariſtippus life the tyrant, whereunto he was brought by this ſo much deſired tyrannicall gouernment, and ſmoke of ſeigniorie, ſo eſteemed of all men. Now though Ariſtippus had king Antigonus his friend, and that he kept a great guard of ſouldiers about him for the ſafety of his perſon, & that there was not an enemy of his left aliue in al the city: yet he made his ſouldiers watch and lie without his pallace, vnder the cloiſters and galleries thereabouts; and after ſupper turned all his men out of the doores, and then ſhut his court gates to him, and locked himſelf alone with his concubine, in a litle high chamber with a trap dore, and ſet his bed vpon it, and ſo ſlept, as one that continually was affraid of himſelfe. Then, after he was come vp, his concubines mother came to take vp the ladder, and locked it in another chamber: and ſo did let it downe againe the next morning, and called this trimme tyrant, that went downe out of his chamber, like a ſnake that ſhould haue crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not hauing obtained by force of armes, but lawfully through vertue, a continuall gouernment, being ſimply apparelled with a poore gowne of ſmall priſe, and ſhewing himſelfe a mortall enemy vnto al ſorts of tyrants, hath left a race and noble offſpring among the Grecians, which remaine yet vntil this preſent day. Contrarily alſo, there are few tyrants that do vſurp the caſtels of free cities, that keepe ſo many ſoldiers in pay, that make ſuch prouiſion for armor & weapon, and haue ſo many gates & drawbridges for the ſafetie of their perſons; that in the end can keepe themſelues from violent death, no more then hares: neither do leaue alſo any poſterity, houſe or graue, why their memory ſhould be honoured after their death. So Aratus hauing diuerſe waies made ſundrie attempts, both by open force, and otherwiſe ſuddenly to take the city of Argos, and to thruſt out the tyrant Ariſtippus, he euer failed of his purpoſe, but ſpecially one night, among the reſt, when he entred the city very dangerouſly, with a few ſouldiers with him & ſlue the ſoldiers that came to giue ſupply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, & that the tyrant with all his forces came to ſet vpō him, the Argiues ſtirred not at al; as if Aratus had not fought for their liberty, but as though they had bin Iudges appointed to ſit to ſee the ſports of the games Nemee, to iudge the game vnto the conqueror without partialitie, & with indifferency. Aratus in the meane time fighting like a valiant man, was truſt ar with a pike, and runne through the thigh. This notwithſtāding, at length he wan that part of the city where he fought, and was not thruſt out til night, what force ſoeuer the enemies made vpon him. And if he could poſſibly haue holden it out all night, he had vndoubtedly obtained his purpoſe: for the tyrant looked for none other but to flie, and had already ſent diuerſe of his goods to ỹ ſea. Howbeit no man once came to tel Aratus any newes of it; beſides alſo, lacking water, & for that he could not help himſelfe becauſe of his wound, he was driuen to leade his men away, and failed of his purpoſe. So, deſpairing that he could euer take it by ſtealth, he went thither with open wars, & ſpoiled and deſtroyed all the country of Argos: and hauing fought a great battell againſt the tyrant Ariſtippus, by the riuer of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he forſooke the victory & cowardly retired out of the battell. For the reſt of his army doubtleſſe had the better, and had followed the enemies farre in chaſe: when he fled being afraid, not compelled by his enemies, but miſtruſting his fortune, and retired to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chaſe of their enemies were offended, for that they hauing put them to flight, and alſo ſlaine a great number more of them then they had loſt of theirs, and yet for cowardlineſſe ſhould ſuffer their enemies (whom they had ouercome and put to flight) to ſet vp markes of triumph in token of victorie: Aratus being aſhamed of it, determined to fight once againe, for the markes of triumph. Whereupon reſting his men but one day, he led them againe into the field, and ſetting his

his armie in battell ray, offered to fight once more. This notwithstanding, when he saw a great supply coming to his enemie, and that the tyrants men came to fight more lustily, and with better courage then before, Aratus durst not abide them, but retired, and sent to demand leaue to take away his dead men, to burie them; yet he could speake so courteously, and behaue himselfe so wisely, by the experience he had in gouernment, and also for the good will they bare him, that they forgate the fault he committed, and he wanne the citie of CLEONES vnto the ACHAIANS, where he caused the feasts of the games of Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquitie, rather vnto the CLEONEIANS, then vnto the ARGIVES. This notwithstanding, the ARGIVES did keepe it also; and then was the first time that the sanctuarie and priuiledge was broken, which was wont to be granted vnto all them that came to play for the games: because the ACHAIANS did make them prisoners that fought in ARGOS, as they returned through their countrey, and sold them as enemies. So maruellously did Aratus and the ACHAIANS hate all sorts of tyrants, without respect of person. Shortly after he was aduertised, that the tyrant Aristippus did lie in waite to spie oportunitie, to take the citie of CLEONES from him: howbeit that he was affraid of it, because he remained at that time in CORINTH. So Aratus straight sent out commandement into euery place, to assemble the armie of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, and that they should bring victuals with them for many dayes: and so craftily came downe to the citie of CENCHREES, to intice Aristippus, by his going away so farre off, that in his absence he should attempt to set vpon the CLEONEIANS, as indeede he did. For he failed not presently to go thither with his armie. But Aratus returning from CENCHREES vnto CORINTH, very late in the night, and hauing layed good watch euery way, he sodainely brought the armie of the ACHAIANS vnto CLEONES with such speede and quietnesse, that they were not seene as they came, but entred into the citie of CLEONES by night, and were readie to fight with the tyrant, before he knew they were come. So the gates of the citie were set open by breake of day, and the signall of battell giuen by sound of trumpets: and so setting vpon the tyrants men with great cries, they suspecting nothing, were presently put to flight. And because the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, had many turnings, Aratus, following the chase, thought the way which he tooke the tyrant fled in. The chase continued to the citie of MYCENES: there the tyrant was ouertaken by a CRETAN called Tragiscus, (as Dinias reporteth) who slue him: and there were slaine of his men also aboue fifteene thousand. But now Aratus hauing wonne such a famous victory, and lost neuer a man, he could not yet winne the citie of ARGOS, nor set it again at liberty. For one Ægias, and another Aristomachus, got into the towne with the kings armie, and kept it: but notwithstanding, by this noble victory Aratus did race out a great part of the reproch that they gaue him, and of the scoffes and flents the flatterers of the tyrants deuised of him: who to please them, reported, that when they should come to fight indeed, the Generall of the ACHAIANS had the wind colicke in his belly, and a dimnesse in his eyes, with a giddines in his head, when he heard but the sound of the trumpets. And furthermore also, when he had set his men in battell ray, and giuen them the word of battell, he asked the Generalls if he should neede to be there in person, because he was hurt in the heele; and then would get him as farre off as he could, to see the end of the battell. This talke was so common, that the Philosophers themselues disputing of it, to wit, whether to tremble and change colour in present danger and perill, be signes of a faint heart, or of an ill complexion and coldnesse of bodie: they alway vouched Aratus, that had bene a good and valiant Captaine, and yet when he began to fight, he was euer in that taking. So when he had ouercome Aristippus, he sought meanes also to destroy Lysiadas MEGALIPOLITAN, who as absolute Lord and king of the countrey, kept the city of MEGALIPOLIS. Notwithstanding he had no base mind in him, neither was he caried away with a cruell desire of tyrannie to liue at his pleasure, nor through extreme couetousnesse, as most Princes be: but being a young man, and pricked forward with desire of honor and fame, and hauing vnaduisedly conceiued in his mind (which was great & highly bent) the vaine reasons he heard men talke of principality, as of a state most blessed, and worthy of admiration: he found the meanes to make himselfe Lord of his countrey. But afterwards he was soone weary of the dangers & troubles such maner of gouernment bringeth with it, and desired to follow Aratus, whom he saw prosper, & of great honor. Furthermore also, fearing his secret practises against him, he tooke hold of a noble deuice: first to rid himself of the malice and feare of the prison and guard of his souldiers: and lastly, to be a benefactor to his countrey. So he ſent for Aratus, gaue vp his gouernment, and deliuered vp his citie to the tribe of the ACHAIANS. They ſo extolled him for this act, that they choſe him their Lieutenant generall of all their tribe. Wherfore, Lyſiadas ſtriuing at the firſt to excel Aratus in honour, attempted diuers things which were not very needfull: as among others, to make warre with the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Aratus was very much againſt him in that, though ſome think it was for enuie. Thereupon the choſe Lyſiadas Generall of the ACHAIANS the ſecond time: although Aratus openly both ſpake and made what meanes he could to the contrarie, and would haue had another to haue bene choſen. For he himſelfe was euery other yeare Generall. So Lyſiadas was choſen againe Generall of the ACHAIANS the third time, with euery bodies goodwil: and Aratus and he had abſolute power and gouernment by turnes, one after the other. But when they ſaw that Lyſiadas became open enemy vnto Aratus, and did ſtill accuſe him in all their councels and aſſemblies: they fell in ſuch miſliking with him, that they reiected him. For they thought his but a counterfeit vertue, to contend with the perfectneſſe of Aratus vertue, much like vnto one of Æſops fables, ſaying, That litle birds did anſwer the cuckow on a time, asking them why they did flie from her: Becauſe we are affraid (ſaid they) thou wilt be a ſparhawke one day. Euen ſo it ſeemeth, that there was a certaine ſuſpition in mens minds of Lyſiadas tyranny, which made them miſtruſt that he went not from his tyranny with goodwill. Now Aratus on the other ſide, wanne as great praiſe and honour by his doings againſt the ÆTOLIANS. For when the ACHAIANS would needs haue fought vpon the confines of the terrritorie of the MEGARIANS, and that Agis king of LACEDÆMON, being come with his army to ỹ camp of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, did perſwade them hardily to giue battell: Aratus was ſtoutly againſt it, and did abide many mockes and taunts they gaue him, ſaying, That it was for cowardlineſſe he would not go. This notwithſtanding, he would not leaue his wiſe and ſafe determination, for all that open ſhame: but ſuffered the enemies to paſſe ouer the mountaine Gerania, and to inuade PELOPONNESVS, and would neuer fight with them. But afterwards, when he ſaw that at their firſt comming they had taken the city of PALLENA, he then changed his mind, and would deferre time no longer to tarie till all his power were come together, but marched forthwith, with thoſe few he had, againſt his enemies; who maruellouſly weakened themſelues by their inſolencie and diſorder after their victorie, keeping no watch nor ward. For after they had entred the citie of PALLENA, the ſouldiers ran into euery houſe, one thruſting in anothers necke, and fighting for the goods they found. The Captains alſo fel to rauiſhing of maides, & the PALLENIANS wiues, and put their burganets and morrions vpon their heads, that none other ſhould take them: becauſe that by the ſame the ſoldiers ſhould know whoſe they were, and to whom the women belonged. So they being in this ruffe and iolitie, newes came ſuddenly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for feare, when they ſaw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all vnderſtood of the danger by their ſudden ſetting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting alreadie within the ſuburbs and gates of the citie, againſt the firſt that reſiſted, whom they ſlue. They being broken and put to flight, made the reſt ſo afraid that were gathered together to aid them, that they wiſt not what to do. In this tumult and hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a priſoner, that was the daughter of Epigethes one of the nobleſt men of the citie, and ſhe a maruellous goodly woman, and paſſing faire: who being ſet in the temple of Diana, whither a Captaine that had choſen her for himſelfe had brought her, and had put his burganet on her head, when ſhe heard the noiſe of them that fought, ſhe ſuddenly ranne to the gate of the temple with the burganet on her head, to ſee them fight. The Citizens ſeeing her in that array, found her the goodlier to behold, and of greater maieſtie, then any worldly creature. The enemies on the other ſide were ſo afraid to ſee her, thinking ſhe had bene ſome ſpirit, that not a man of them durſt once defend themſelues. So the PALLENIANS ſay, that the image of Diana all the reſt of the time is kept locked vp, and no body touched it; and that when the Nunne that keepeth it doth carie it elſe where, no man dare looke on it, but euery man turneth his eyes away: becauſe the ſight of it is not onely fearefull and hurtfull vnto men, but it alſo killeth the fruite of the trees it paſſeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cauſe that then troubled the ÆTOLIANS minds ſo much, becauſe the Nunne remouing the image of the goddeſſe Diana, ſhe turned it towards them. Howbeit, Aratus in his Commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth, that when he had defeated the ÆTOLIANS, following them in chaſe, he entred hand ouer head with them that fled into the citie, out of the which he draue them, and

and slue seuen hundred of them. This noble victory hath bene esteemed amongst the chiefest afterwards: and the painter Timanthes hath drawne and set it forth in table very lively. This notwithstanding, becausse diuerse Princes and people did immediatly prepare force against the Achaians, Aratus presently made peace with the Ætolians by the practise of Pantaleon, who bare great sway and authority amongst thē. Furthermore, Aratus being desirous to set the Athenians at liberty, he suddenly attempted to take the hauen of Pirea: for the which the Achaians reproued him, because he had broken the peace they had made with the Macedonians. But Aratus in his Commentaries doth stoutly deny that it was he, and layeth the fault vpon Erginus, by whose meanes he wanne the castell of the Acrocorinth; saying, that it was he, that of his owne mind did set a scaling ladder to the wall, and that his ladder breaking vnder him, he fled vpon it; and perceiuing he was followed neare by the enemies, he still cried out, Aratus, as if he had bene there; and by this policie mocked his enemies, and saued himselfe. Howbeit, me thinketh this answer is not true. For it not credible, that Erginus a priuate souldier, and a Syrian borne, should haue so great an enterprise in his head, vnlesse it had bene by Aratus consent and commandement, who had giuen him men, time and meanes to vndertake it. And this appeared plainely afterwards: for, Aratus did not attempt it twice or thrice onely, but oftener then so (as those that extremely desire a thing) to take the hauen of Pirea on the sodaine, not giuing ouer for once failing, but rather emboldened himselfe again with good hope, because he missed it but little, and that he came so neare the taking of it. And another time also amongst others, flying through the plaine of Thriasia, he brake his legge, and was driuen to make many incisions to heale it: so that he was a long time together caried in his litter vnto the warres. After that king Antigonus was dead, and that Demetrius his sonne succeeded him in the kingdome, he attempted then more earnestly then euer before, to set the citie of Athens at liberty, making small account of the Macedonians. Aratus therefore being ouerthrowne in battell neare vnto Phylacia, by king Demetrius Lieutenant, called Bithis, and the rumour running straight abroad, that Aratus was dead, or at the least that he was taken prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captaine of the hauen of Pirea, wrote a letter vnto Corinth, and commanded the garrison of the Achaians that kept it, to deliuer the towne, for Aratus was dead. But he by chance was at the selfe same time in Corinth: so that they which brought the letters went home with a mocke, without their purpose, and made all the company merrie. Furthermore, King Demetrius himselfe sent a Galley out of Macedon, to bring Aratus bound vnto him. The Athenians themselues also, to please the Macedonians, exceeding all lightnesse of flatterie, wore garlands on their heads a whole day together, in token of common ioy, when newes was brought them of Aratus death. Aratus was so madde in his mind to heare this, that he brought his army presently against them, euen to the verie suburbes of the Academie. Notwithstanding at their earnest requests, he did no hurt there. And afterwards the Athenians acknowledging his valiantnesse, when king Demetrius died, it tooke them in the heads to recouer their libertie againe. So Aratus, though that yeare another man was Generall of the Achaians, and that he kept his bed lying sicke of a long disease: yet to further this, he was caried vnto Athens in a litter, and so perswaded Diogenes (Captaine of the Garrison there,) that for the summe of an hundred and fiftie talents (towards the which Aratus gaue of his owne, twenty talents) he made him deliuer to the Athenians, the hauen of Pirea, the castell of Mvnichia, the Isle of Salamina, and the castell of Svnivm. After this the Æginetes, the Hermionians, and the most part of Arcadia it self, did presently ioyne with the Achaians: so that the Macedonians being occupied with warres at that time in other places against their neighbours, the power of the Achaians maruellously increased, hauing also the Ætolians their confederates. Then Aratus to performe his old promise, and being angry to see the city of Argos (being so neare neighbour vnto them) yet kept in bondage, he sent vnto Aristomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his citie againe at libertie, and to ioyne it to the tribe of the Achaians, as Lysiadas had done his towne of Megalipolis: and rather to like to be made a Generall with honour and praise of so great and famous a state as the Achaians, then tyrant of one onely citie, hated, and euery houre of the night and day in danger of his life. Aristomachus gaue eare to his perswasions, and sent vnto Aratus, telling him that he had neede of fiftie talents to discharge the souldiers he had about him. The money was straight prepared. And Lysiadas that was at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that maruellously desired this matter might be brought to passe by his meanes: he secretly sent vnto Aristomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed how he had bene alwaies a mortall enemy vnto tyrants, and therefore counselled him rather to put himselfe into his hands, as indeed he did. For Lysiadas brought Aristomachus vnto the councell of the ACHAIANS. There all the councell plainely shewed their good wils, and the confidence they had in Aratus: for when he spake against it, that they should not receiue Aristomachus, they reiected him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was won, and that he began to moue the contrary to the councell, they straight agreed to receiue the ARGIVES, & the PHLIASIANS in league with them; and also the next yeare following they chose Aristomachus Lieutenant generall of all their tribe. Aristomachus seeing himselfe in credit now with the ACHAIANS, would needs inuade the countrey of LACONIA with a maine army, and sent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote vnto him, and wished him in any wise not to meddle with that iourney, because he would not haue the ACHAIANS to deale with Cleomenes king of LACEDÆMON, that was a couragious and stout young Prince, and maruellously growne in short time. Howbeit, Aristomachus being self-willed in that point, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in person all that iourney. So Cleomenes being come to them vpon the sodaine with his armie, neare vnto the city of PALANTIVM, Aristomachus would needs fight with him; but Aratus disswaded him from it. Wherupon Lysiadas afterwards accused him to the ACHAIANS, and the next yeare following he contended with him, suing to be Generall: howbeit he was reiected by most voices, and Aratus chosen Generall the twelfth time. The selfe same yeare he was ouerthrowne in battell by Cleomenes, neare vnto the mountaine Lycæum, & being fled, wandred vp and down in the night, that euery man thought he had bene slaine, and it ran for good paiment among all the GRECIANS. Howbeit, he saued himselfe, and hauing gathered his men together againe, not contenting him that he had escaped with life, but wisely taking the oportunitie and occasion offered, no man knowing it, nor mistrusting his coming: he suddenly went to assaile the MANTINEANS, which were confederates of Cleomenes, and hauing taken the city of MANTINEA, he left a great garrison in it, and made the strangers that were there, free of the city. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being ouercome, wan the ACHAIANS that which they themselues could scarcely haue won if they had bene conquerors. Afterwards, ỳ LACEDÆMONIANS inuading the territories of the MEGALIPOLITANS with a great armie, Aratus sodainly went thither to aid them, but would hazard battel no more, nor giue Cleomenes vantage, who desired only to fight, & still constantly resisted the MEGALIPOLITANS, that prouoked him to come into the field. For besides that in nature he was not meete for a set battel, at that time also he was the weaker in men, and had to do with a vertuous young man, that was all fire: where his courage and ambition on the other side was coole and quiet enough. Furthermore, he considered, that as king Cleomenes sought honour by valiant venturing, which he had not before: euen so it was his part wisely to keepe that which he had long since gotten, and to stand vpon his guard and safetie. This notwithstãding, the light armed men being put out into the field, and hauing chased the LACEDÆMONIANS euen into their campe, and entring in with them hand ouer head: Aratus would neuer bring out his citizens, but staied them in a great valley that lay betweene them both, and would not let them come on any farther. Wherewithall Lysiadas being mad with himselfe, and falling out with Aratus, he called for the horsemen, and said, that he would yet helpe them that followed the chase; & praied them not to lose the victory so cowardly, of the which they were so sure: nor to forsake him at a pinch, fighting for the defence of their country. So hauing gotten a great number of choise horsemen together, he went with a great furie and gaue charge on the right wing of his enemies battell, and hauing dispersed them, and put them to flight, he vnaduisedly followed thẽ with great courage, into euill fauoured crooked waies, among trees & great broad ditches. Whereupon Cleomenes came, and so lustily set on him, that he slue him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending himself. The other men of armes flying also, rushed in againe, into the battell of the footmen, and so disordered their rankes, that they made all their army fly for feare. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, because he had forsaken Lysiadas: and being enforced vnto it by the ACHAIANS that went without his leaue, he followed them at length, and fled himselfe also vnto the city of ÆGIVM. There the ACHAIANS sitting in councel, they decreed, that they wold furnish Aratus with no more mony, neither wold they pay his strangers any more: and bad him pay them at his owne charge, if he would entertaine them for the warre.

The death of Lysiadas.

Aratus once againe ouerthrown by Cleomenes.

Aratus perceiuing that they did him great wrong, ſtood euen indifferent to deliuer vp his commiſſion of Lieutenancy, and to diſcharge himſelfe of his office: but after he had bethought himſelfe better, he bare it patiently, and led the ACHAIANS directly to the citie of ORCHOMENE. There he valiantly fought with Megiſtonus, king Cleomenes father in law, and had the vpper hand of him: for he ſlue three hundred of his men, and tooke Megiſtonus ſelfe priſoner. Furthermore, where before euery ſecond yeare they did vſe to chuſe him their Lieutenant generall, when his turne came about againe, they called him to giue him the office; but he refuſed it, and Timoxenus was choſen in his roome. Now the cauſe alledged for his refuſall, was ſaid to be, for that he miſliked of the common people. But that ſoundeth like a lie: for the truth of it, to my ſeeming, was, for that he ſaw the ſtate of ỹ ACHAIANS to decline. For king Cleomenes proceeded no more faire and ſoftly as he did at the firſt, when he was controlled and bridled by the Ephori: but hauing ſlaine them, and equally deuided the lands through LACEDÆMONIA, and made the ſtrangers free citizens of SPARTA, being then abſolute Lord of LACEDÆMON, he ſtraight ſet vpon the ACHAIANS with all the power he could, and ſought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deſerueth iuſt reproofe, for that he forſooke his countrey in ſuch extreme trouble and danger, that being as the maſter of a ſhip, he gaue another the ſterne to ſteare, when it had bene moſt honorable and meeteſt for him to haue taken it in hand (though they would not haue giuen it him) to haue ſaued his countrey. Or otherwiſe, if he had indeed vtterly deſpaired of the good ſucceſſe of the ACHAIANS, he ſhould then haue put it rather into Cleomenes hands, & not to haue poiſoned PELOPONNESVS againe with the maners of the barbarous people (bringing in as he did, the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS, filling ỹ caſtel of the Acrocorinth with GAVLES and ILLYRIAN ſoldiers, and making them his Lords & Maſters, whom he had ſo often ouercome in wars, & bereaued of their gouernment, and of whom he alſo ſpake ſo much euill in his Commentaries;) nor to haue put them into townes, and calling them friends & confederates, to think thereby to colour and diſguiſe his wicked practiſe. Admit Cleomenes had bene a tyrant, & a cruell man (if I ſhould ſo terme him,) yet came he of the bloud of Hercules, & was born in SPARTA: from whence they ſhould rather haue choſen the meaneſt man Gouernor, then the greateſt king of MACEDON; and thoſe ſpecially that prefer the honor and glory of GREECE, before ſtrangers. Yet king Cleomenes required no more of al the ACHAIANS, but the name only to be their Lieutenant generall: and ſo they would grant him that honor, he promiſed he would be very good vnto the cities confederates to ACHAIA. Where Antigonus notwithſtanding, when they had choſen him their Lieutenant generall, with abſolute power and authoritie both by ſea and alſo by land, refuſed the charge, vnleſſe they would let him haue the caſtel of the Acrocorinth for his hire. The which was euen like to Æſops hunter, that bridled his horſe: for he would not get vpon the ACHAIANS that requeſted him, and that by their Ambaſſadors and decrees of counſell, did referre all vnto himſelfe, before he had firſt ſadled and bridled them, by the garriſon he made them receiue, and the pledges he cauſed them to giue him; and yet he ſpake as much as might be to cleare himſelf of the accuſation againſt him, bearing thē in hand that he was forced to it. Howbeit Polybius writeth, that long time before he was compelled, being afraid of Cleomenes valiantneſſe, he had ſecretly practiſed that with Antigonus, which he was openly ſeene in afterwards: and that he had entiſed the MEGALIPOLITANS (who were the firſt that moued it to the counſell of the ACHAIANS) to call king Antigonus to their aide, becauſe they were neareſt neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Cleomenes war, that alwaies knocked at their gates to come and ſpoile them. Thus much is affirmed by Philarchus in his hiſtorie, who were hardly to be credited notwithſtanding, had not Polybius confirmed it. For he loued Cleomenes ſo well, that it ſeemed he was rauiſhed with ſome ſpirit as often as he ſpake of him: and frameth his hiſtorie, as a common counſeller that ſhould pleade a caſe in law before the Iudges, ſtil accuſing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS loſt the citie of MEGALIPOLIS againe, the which king Cleomenes tooke of them, and ouercame them in a great battell by Hecatombæon. Wherewithall they were ſo amazed, that they ſent Ambaſſadors preſently vnto him, and praied him to come to the city of ARGOS, and there they would make him their Lieutenant generall. But when Aratus heard he came indeed, and that he was not far from the citie of LERNA with his armie: being afraid, he ſent other Ambaſſadors to tell him that he ſhould ſafely come with three hundred men only, as vnto his friends and confederates: and yet if he miſtruſted craft and euill dealing, that then they would giue him pledges for the ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes answered him, That was a plaine mockerie, and an iniurie they offered him. Wherefore he presently departed thence, and sent a letter before to the Councell of the ACHAIANS, full of foule words and reproches he gaue vnto Aratus: who likewise replied to him againe, bitterly taunting each other, that they came to talke of their mariage & wiues. After this letter, Cleomenes sent defiance by an Herald vnto the ACHAIANS, and proclaimed open war against them: insomuch as he had almost gotten the citie of SICYONE by practise of traitors. Howbeit, failing of his purpose he returned sodainly, and went vnto the city of PALLENA, which he took, & droue out the Generall of the ACHAIANS thence, and immediatly after he wan the cities also of PHENEA, and PENTELION. After that, the ARGIVES & PHLIASIANS willingly yeelded vnto him, so that of all which the ACHAIANS had conquered, and ioyned vnto their tribe, they could reckon of nothing of certainty vnto them. Then Aratus was maruellously troubled in his mind, to see all PELOPONNESVS in tumult and vprore, and that all the cities fell to open rebellion by those that practised change and alteration. For no man was contented with the state and gouernment at that time, but diuerse of the SICYONIANS and CORINTHIANS both were bewraied which had secretly practised with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the gouernment of the ACHAIANS, desiring themselues to be Lords and Gouernors of their cities. Aratus hauing full commission and authority from the Councell of the ACHAIANS, to make enquirie of them, and to put them to death, without further triall of law, he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faulty in the city of SICYONE. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at CORINTH, he made inquirie of them, and put them to death: whereby he made the common people very angry with him, who otherwise of thēselues were weary of the gouernment and subiection of the ACHAIANS. The CORINTHIANS therefore gathering together in the temple of Apollo, they sent for Aratus, intending to make him prisoner before they would openly enter into actuall rebellion. Aratus went thither, to shew that he neither feared nor mistrusted them, but yet he held his horse in his hand following of him. Then many rose vp against him, and did both reproue and iniuriously intreate him. But Aratus with staied countenance and gentle words, praied them to keepe their places, and not to crie out in such rage vpon their feete, & withal, caused them also to come in that were at the temple doore. But as he spake vnto them, by litle and litle he drew backe out of the presse, as though he meant to haue giuen his horse to some body to hold. So being gotten out of the presse, he gently spake without any feare vnto the CORINTHIANS he met, & bad them go to the temple of Apollo. When he was come to the castell, he then sodainly tooke his horse backe, & cōmanded Cleopater, Captaine of the garrison of the ACHAIANS there to looke well to the safe keeping of the castell. Then he set spurres to his horse, and galloped towards the citie of SICYONE for life, being followed onely by thirtie of his soldiers, all the rest hauing forsaken him, and dispersed themselues here & there. Shortly after, the CORINTHIANS vnderstanding that Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could neuer ouertake him: whereupon they straight sent for king Cleomenes, and deliuered the citie of CORINTH into his hands, the gaine whereof pleased him not so much, as he was sory for the losse of Aratus, whom they had let go. So king Cleomenes ioyning vnto him all the people dwelling along the sea coast, commonly called the riuer of CORINTH, who yeelded vp themselues, holds and townes into his hands, he then intrenched in the castell of the Acrocorinth with a great trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the citie of SICYONE, many of the ACHAIANS gathered about him, and holding a Counsel and assembly, he was chosen their Lieutenant generall, hauing absolute power and authority to do what he would, and gaue him of their owne citizens to guard his person. So, hauing managed the affaires of the state and commonwealth of the ACHAIANS the space of three and thirtie yeares together, and hauing all that time bene counted of all men the chiefest man of power and authoritie in GREECE, he then found himselfe in poore estate, forsaken, and in great miserie, as in the shipwracke of his countrey beaten with storme, and in great danger of himselfe. For when he sent vnto the ÆTOLIANS for aide, they flatly denied him, and would send him none. Furthermore, the ATHENIANS being very desirous to send aid for Aratus sake, were disswaded from it through the practise of Euclydas and Micion. Aratus also had a house in CORINTH, where all his money was: the which king Cleomenes at the first medled not withall, neither would suffer any other to touch it, but sent for his friends and officers, and charged them to looke to it, to giue Aratus a good account of it afterwards. Furthermore, he priuily sent Tripylus vnto him, and his father in law Megistonus, and offered him great gifts, and specially tially an annual penſion of twelue talents, which was double as much as king Ptolomy gaue him, who ſent him yearely ſixe talents. Beſides, he only praied the ACHAIANS, that they would make him their Lieutenant generall, and alſo that the garriſon in the caſtell of Acrocorinth, might be deuided in common betweene them. Aratus made anſwer, that he had no abſolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a deuice and excuſe of Aratus, he preſently inuaded the countrey of the SICYONIANS, and deſtroyed all as he came, and continued the ſpace of three moneths. Aratus in the meane time ſtood doubtful how to determine, whether he ſhould receiue king Antigonus or not: becauſe Antigonus would not aide him before he deliuered him the caſtell of the Acrocorinth into his hands. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the city of ÆGIVM to conſult vpon it, they ſent for Aratus thither. Howbeit, it was dãgerous coming thither, becauſe Cleomenes camp lay hard by the city of SICYONE: beſides alſo that the citizens kept Aratus, and held him by force, ſaying, That they would not let him venture himſelfe in ſuch apparent danger, their enemies being ſo neare vnto them. Moreouer, the women and litle children, hung about him, weeping and compaſſing him about, as their common father and ſauiour. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be afraid, and ſo tooke his horſe, with ten of his friends and his ſonne (that was a yong ſtripling growne) and went towards the ſea, and imbarked in certaine ſhips that rode at anker. Thence he ſayled vnto ÆGIVM, where the diet or parliament was kept: and there it was reſolued, that they ſhould ſend for Antigonus, and deliuer the caſtell of the Acrocorinth into his hands. And ſo it was performed: for Aratus ſent thither his owne ſonne among the other hoſtages. The CORINTHIANS were ſo ſore offended withal, that they made hauocke of his goods, and gaue his houſe he had in CORINTH vnto king Cleomenes. So king Antigonus being onwards on his way to come into PELOPONNESVS with his armie, bringing with him twenty thouſand footmen all MACEDONIANS, & foure hundred horſemen: Aratus with the greateſt ſtates & officers of the ACHAIANS, vnwitting to their enemies, went to meete him as farre as the citie of PEGES, hauing no great truſt nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembred very well, that he came firſt to his greatneſſe, by the iniuries he had offered them: and how that the chiefeſt cauſe of his riſing, was the malice he bare vnto old Antigonus. Howbeit making vertue of neceſſitie, and weighing the inſtant occaſion of their preſent extremity, (of Gouernors, to be driuen to be ſubiects,) he put himſelfe in aduenture. So, when Antigonus was told that Aratus was come in perſon to him, hauing with good countenance after a common ſort ſaluted thoſe that came in his company: to Aratus himſelfe at his firſt coming he gaue an honorable welcome and entertainment. Afterwards alſo, finding him a good and diſcreete man, he fell into inward friendſhip and familiaritie with him. For Aratus was not onely skilfull to giue direction in matters of ſtate touching good order and gouernement: but moreouer, his companie and conuerſation was very pleaſant, to entertaine a Princes leaſure with. Wherefore though Antigonus was but yong at that time, yet ſeeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meete man to be well thought of, and eſteemed about a Prince, he vſed his counſell & aduice more then any other mans, in all matters, not only touching the affaires of the ACHAIANS, but of the MACEDONIANS alſo. And ſo all things came to paſſe, which the gods had promiſed in their ſacrifices. For in a beaſt that was ſacrificed, there were two galles wrapped in one ſelfe caule: the which the Soothſayers interpreted did prognoſticate, that two which before were mortall enemies, ſhould now become aſſured frieds. But Aratus made no account of their prediction, neither did he giue any credite to the ſacrifices, but truſted rather to his owne determination. So, the warres afterwards hauing good ſucceſſe, and Antigonus making a feaſt in the city of CORINTH where he had bidden many gueſts, he would needs haue Aratus lie vpon him at the table, and a litle while after, commanded his men to bring him a couerlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a cold. Aratus anſwered him, It freezed. Then Antigonus bad him come neare him, and when the ſeruants brought a couerlet for the king, they caſt it ouer them both. Then Aratus remembring the ſacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the king what a wonder he had ſeene in the ſacrifice, and what interpretation the Sooth ſayers made of it. This was long after. So Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the city of PEGES, they were ſworne brethrẽ together: and then went both with al ſpeed againſt the enemies. Thus there fel out hote skirmiſhes betweene them, hard by the city of CORINTH. For Cleomenes was very well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valiantly defended themſelues. In the meane time, Ariſtoteles of ARGOS (Aratus friend) ſecretly ſent him word, that he would make the citie rebell, if he came himselfe with any number of souldiers. Aratus told it vnto king Antigonus, who gaue him fifteene hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and passed ouer with great speed from the Isthmus (or barre in the straight) vnto the citie of EPIDAVRVM. Howbeit, the ARGIVES taried not Aratus coming, but were all vp before he came, and did set vpon king Cleomenes men, and had driuen them into the castell, Cleomenes being aduertised of it, and fearing lest his enemies (keeping the citie of ARGOS) should cut off his way from returning into his countrey againe with safetie, if he were driuen to a straight: he forsooke the castell of the Acrocorinth, and went his way by night to helpe his men in the city of ARGOS. So he came thither in time, and ouerthrew certaine of his enemies. But shortly after, Aratus and king Antigonus both being come thither with all their aide, Cleomenes was driuen to flie to the citie of MANTINEA. After the recouerie againe of the citie of ARGOS, all the residue of the cities of PELOPONNESVS did againe returne to the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus took the castell of the Acrocorinth. So Aratus being chosen Generall by the ARGIVES, he counselled them to present Antigonus with all the tyrants goods, & those that had bin traitors to the commonwealth. And after they had cruelly tormented the tyrant Aristomachus in the citie of CENCHREES, in the end they cast him into the sea, and drowned him. Aratus was maruellously reproued for his death, that would suffer the poore man to be so vilely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleasure: who through his perswasion willingly resigned vp his tyrannie, and deliuered the citie of ARGOS vnto the ACHAIANS. But besides this, they blamed him for many other things else: for that the ACHAIANS through his meanes had put the citie of CORINTH into Antigonus hands, as though it had bene some meane village: for that when they had sacked the city of ORCHOMENE, they suffered him to place a garrison of the MACEDONIANS there: for that they had enacted by parliament, that they should neither write, nor send Ambassadors any whither, without Antigonus priuitie and consent: furthermore, for that they were compelled to giue pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made sacrifices, feasts, and games vnto Antigonus, as if he had bene a god; following the example of Aratus citizens, who were the first that began, and had receiued Antigonus into the citie by the perswasion of Aratus, that lodged and feasted him in his owne house. With all these faults they burdened Aratus, and considered not, that after they had put the reynes of the gouernment into Antigonus hand, Aratus himselfe (whether he would or not) was cõpelled to follow the swinge of the vnbridled Prince, hauing no other meanes to stay it, but onely the liberty of speech to admonish him: and that also was not to be exercised, without apparent and great danger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Aratus mind: as amongst others that Antigonus caused the tyrants images of ARGOS to be set vp, which he had before pulled downe: and also that he made them to be ouerthrowne, which Aratus had set vp for those that had taken the castell of CORINTH, and onely left Aratus one statue, notwithstanding all the earnest intreaty Aratus made to the contrarie, yet he could get no grant of any thing to be requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS dealt not so friendly with ỹ MANTINEANS, as became GRECIANS one to another. For they hauing the citie in their hands by Antigonus meanes, did put al the noblest and chiefest men of MANTINEA to death; others they sold as slaues, & sent the rest into MACEDON with irons on their legs, and brought the poore women and children into bondage, and sold them for slaues: and of the money they got by spoile, they deuided the third part among themselues, and left the other two parts vnto the MACEDONIANS. Now surely it cannot be said, but this was done for some cruell reuenge. For though it was an ouer-great crueltie, in rage and passion of mind, to handle people of one selfe bloud and language in this lamentable sort: yet Simonides saith, When men are driuen and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to ease their great stomackes enflamed with rage & malice. But for that which was done afterwards vnto the citie, no man can excuse Aratus, nor say, that he was either driuen to it by necessitie, or that he had otherwise any honest occasion to do it. For king Antigonus hauing giuen the citie of MANTINEA vnto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colonie, and chose Aratus their Generall: who made a decree, that thenceforth the citie should no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTIGONIA, as it beareth name vnto this day. Thus it seemeth that gentle MANTINEA (for so ỹ Poets called it) was vtterly destroyed, & bare the name of another city through Aratus means, preferring the name of him that destroyed the citie, and did put all the inhabitants of the first to death. After that, king Cleomenes being ouerthrown in a great battel by ỹ city of SELLASIA, he left left the city of SPARTA, and fled into ÆGYPT. So Antigonus hauing vſed Aratus with all kind of honourable courteſie, he returned againe into MACEDON. There falling ſicke, he ſent Philip that ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome (being a yong ſtripling growne) into PELOPONNESVS, & ſtraightly charged him ſpecially to follow Aratus counſell, and to imploy him when he would ſpeake vnto the cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus hauing receiued him in that ſort, made him ſo well affected and louing towards him, that he ſent him againe into MACEDON, being throughly determined to make wars with GREECE. So after the death of Antigonus, the ÆTOLIANS began to deſpiſe the careleſneſſe and cowardlineſſe of the ACHAIANS (becauſe that they being vſed to be defended by ſtrangers, and hauing bene altogether gouerned by the armies of the MACEDONIANS, they liued very idlely & diſſolutely,) wherupon they tooke vpon them to make themſelues Lords of PELOPONNESVS. So they aſſembled an armie, and by the way as they went, they onely tooke ſome prey and ſpoile vpon the lands of the PATRÆIANS, & the DYMÆIANS: but inuading the territory of MESSINA with all their army, they deſtroyed the whole countrey before them. Aratus being angry withall, & perceiuing that Timoxenus (who at that time was General of the ACHAIANS) did ſtill tract and delay time in vaine, becauſe he was vpon his going out of his yeare; he being appointed Generall for the yeare following, did anticipate his time fiue daies before, to go & aide the MESSINIANS. Wherfore leauing an army of ý ACHAIANS, whoſe perſons were now neither exerciſed in armes, nor yet had any deſire to go to the wars, he was ouerthrown by the city of CAPHYES. Now, becauſe it was thought that he went ſomewhat too hotely and couragiouſly to the wars, he ſo extremely cooled againe, & left things in ſuch caſe, that all hope being caſt aſide, he ſuffered the ÆTOLIANS in maner to tread PELOPONNESVS vnder their feet before his eyes, with al the inſolency & cruelty that might be poſſible, notwithſtanding that they ſundrie times gaue him great aduantages of them. Thus were the ACHAIANS once again forced to pray aide out of MACEDON & to ſend for yong king Philip to make warres in GREECE: hoping, for the loue he bare vnto Aratus, and the great truſt he had in him, that he would vſe them gently, and do as they would haue him. But when firſt of all began Apelles, Megareus, and a few other Courtiers to accuſe Aratus: vnto whom King Philip giuing eaſie eare, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrarie faction vnto Aratus, was choſen Generall by the ACHAIANS. Howbeit, this new Generall Eparatus being extremely hated by the ACHAIANS, and Aratus alſo leauing to deale any more with matters of ſtate, no act was done to any purpoſe. Whereupon King Philip finding his fault, returned again vnto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him: and when he found that his affaires proſpered in all things he went about, he then let him alone with all, as from whom came all his honour and greatneſſe. Thereupon euery man eſteemed Aratus a wiſe Gouernour, not onely to rule a Common-wealth, but alſo a whole Realme and kingdome. For his maners, intent, and chiefeſt purpoſe appeared in the deeds of this yong king, as a rich colour that did ſet forth and beautifie them. For the clemencie this yong Prince Philip vſed to the LACEDÆMONIANS that had offended him, the great courteſie he ſhewed to the CRETANS, whereby in few dayes he wanne all the Iſle of CRETA: and the iourney he made againſt the ÆTOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great exploite, wanne the Prince great fame, for following good counſell, and Aratus to be accounted a wiſe Gouernour, and of deepe vnderſtanding. Now the kings flatterers enuying Aratus more then before, and perceiuing that they got no good by ſecret backe-biting of him, they then began with open mouth very inſolently to reuile him at the table, and with great deriſion: inſomuch as one night going home to his tent after ſupper, they pelted him with ſtones all the way as he went. King Philip when he knew it, was ſo offended therewith, that he did condemne them in the ſumme of twentie talents: and afterwards alſo, becauſe they troubled his affaires, he did put them to death. But king Philip in the end being puffed vp with the good fortune and ſucceſſe of this warre, which proſpered as he would haue it, he then grew to be couetous, and beganne to ſhew his naughtie nature, and to bewray his diſſimulation wherewith he diſguiſed himſelfe, and by litle and litle to make his vices plainly to appeare. For firſt of all, he abuſed young Aratus wife, which was kept ſecret a long time, becauſe he lay in their houſe, and began daily to grow more ſeuere and cruell to the common weales; and then the world ſaw plainely that he cared no more for Aratus. For the firſt ſuſpition and beginning of the miſtruſt he had of Aratus, came for that which was done at MESSINA. For the MESSINIANS being fallen togethet by the eares, and in great ciuill warres one with another,

Aratus went thither to make peace betweene them. Howbeit, king Philip came thither the next day following, and in ſtead of pacifying the quarrell, he ſet them further out together then they were before. Firſt, he asked the Gouernours of the citie, whether they had no lawes to bridle the inſolencie and ſtomacke of the common people; and priuately alſo talked with the heads of the faction of the people, and asked them if they had not hands to defend themſelues from tyrants. So both the one and the other faction truſting to king Philip, the Gouernours would haue layed hold on the Oratours of the citie: but they riſing with the common people, ſlue of their Nobilitie and Magiſtrates, well neare two hundred of them. Aratus that came ſoone after this fact, ſhewed that he was greatly offended with King Philip, and cauſed his ſonne with open mouth ſhamefully to reproue him. Now it ſeemed that this yong Aratus was in loue with King Philip before: but then he told him before all the people, that for this ſhamefull act he had done, he thought him now no more faire of face, but the fowleſt creature that could be. Philip made no anſwer to it, although euery man looked he would haue anſwered him in rage, and that oftentimes as the other reproued him, he bit it in with his teeth: but yet as if he had not bene offended at all with the bigge words his ſonne had ſpoken againſt him, (for that he was a ciuill man, and mild of nature,) he tooke Aratus the father by the hand, and caried him out of the Theater where the aſſembly was kept, to the caſtell of Ithome, to do ſacrifice there to Iupiter, and to ſee the fort. This fort was of no leſſe ſtrength then the caſtell of the Acrocorinth: and when any garriſon is in it, it keepeth all the countrey about it in obedience: and beſides it is very hard to driue them out of it. Now Philip being gotten vp into that caſtell, he did ſacrifice there: and when the Soothſayer had brought him the intrailes of the oxe which they had ſacrificed, he tooke it himſelfe with both his hands, and ſhewed them vnto Aratus, and to Demetrius PHALERIAN, now turning to the one, then to the other, and asked them what they iudged of theſe ſignes of the ſacrifice: whether he ſhould keepe the caſtell to himſelfe, or elſe deliuer it to the MESSINIANS. Demetrius ſmiling, anſwered him: If thou beeſt of the Soothſayers minde, then thou ſhalt deliuer it vp: but if thou haſt a Kings minde in thee, thou ſhalt then hold the oxe by both hornes. (By the oxe, he ment the countrie of PELOPONNESVS: and moreouer, that if he kept both theſe caſtels, of Ithome and the Acrocorinth, all PELOPONESVS were wholy at his commandement.) Aratus ſtill held his peace, and ſaid not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to ſpeake, he ſaid: In CRETA, and in the countrie of the BOEOTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many ſtrong caſtels ſituated on high hils from the vallies. Moreouer, there are alſo many places of great ſtrength in the marches of the ACARNANIANS, both within maine land, as alſo vpon the ſea coaſt: of all the which thou haſt not taken one of them by force, and yet they all do willingly obey thee notwithſtanding. It is for theeues to hide their heads in high rocks and mountaines, but a King can haue no ſtronger caſtell, then the loue, faith, and goodwill of men. That is it, that opened the ſea of CRETA. That is it, that hath brought thee into PELOPONNESVS. Thoſe are the meanes which haue made thee being ſo yong a man, ſome of them to chooſe thee their Captaine, and others alſo to make thee their abſolute Lord and Maſter. Aratus going on with his tale, Philip gaue the intrailes againe to the Soothſayer that brought them, and taking Aratus by the hand (as if by force he had caſt him out of the caſtell, and had alſo taken the citie of MESSINA from him) ſaid vnto him: Come on then, let vs euen take that courſe. But after that time, Aratus came as little to the court as might be, and ſo by little and little left Philips company. For when he went to make warre in the Realme of EPIRVS, he was earneſtly in hand with Aratus to go that iourney with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excuſed, and ſo remained at home, being afraid to be brought into an euill name with Philips doings. For Philip afterwards hauing ſhamefully loſt his armie by ſea againſt the ROMAINES; and beſides, hauing had alſo very ill ſucceſſe in all other his affaires, he returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, and thought once more to haue deceiued the MESSINIANS. But when they found his practiſe, then he beganne with open force to ſpoyle their countrey, Aratus then flatly fell out with Philip, and vtterly refuſed his friendſhip, for that he perceiued then the iniurie he had done his ſonnes wife, the which grieued him to the heart; but yet he made not his ſon priuy to it, becauſe he could get no other amẽds, then to know what iniury had bene done to him, conſidering that he had no way nor meanes to be reuenged. For king Philip was maruellouſly changed, and from a courteous and chaſt yong Prince, become a vitious and cruell tyrant: the which to ſpeake truely, was not a change or alteration in

in nature, but a manifeſt declaration (when he was no more afraid of any man) of his wicked and diuelliſh mind, the which through feare had of long time bene kept ſecret. Now, to proue that Philips firſt loue & good wil he bare vnto Aratus, was alſo mingled with feare & reuerence, that which he did afterwards vnto him did plainely ſhew it. For he being deſirous to put Aratus to death, not thinking himſelf free ſo long as he liued, neither king, nor tyrant: he durſt not go about to kill him himſelfe, but procured one of his Captaines called Taurion, & commanded him to make him away as ſecretly as he could poſſible, & ſpecially with poyſon in his abſence. This Taurion fell in friendſhip with Aratus, and poiſoned him with no violent poyſon, but ſo tempered and qualified it, as it did by litle and litle heate the body, and procure a pretie cough which brought him into a conſumption. Aratus knew he was poyſoned: but becauſe he ſaw it booted not to bewray it, he bare it patiently, and made no words of it, as if he had had ſome natural diſeaſe about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefeſt friends being in his chamber with him, who wondered to ſee him ſpit bloud as he did: he told him, Friend Cephalon mine, this is the reward of a kings loue. So he died of this poyſon in the city of Ægivm, being the ſeuenteenth time choſen General of ỹ Achaians, who would haue had him buried in the ſelfe ſame place, & haue made ſome honorable monument for him, worthie of his noble life. But the Sicyonians thinking themſelues diſhonoured, if his bodie were buried any where elſe but in their owne citie, they ſo perſwaded the counſell of the Achaians, that they ſuffered them to take Aratus bodie with thē. Yet was there an ancient law that forbad buriall within the walles of the city, of any maner of perſon whatſoeuer: and beſides that law, they had a certaine ſuperſtitious feare in them, that made them they durſt not. Whereupon they ſent to Apolloes temple at Delphes, to aske counſell of his Nunne that gaue the Oracles, who made them this anſwer:

Aratus poyſoned by king Philips meanes.

A kings friendſhip dangerous. The death of Aratus.

A law for buriall among the Sicyonians.

The Oracle for Aratus buriall.

Thou happy ſoile of Sicyon, Aratus natiue place,
Whereas thou aſketh counſell in that noble Captaines caſe,
For keeping of a yeare mind, and for making feaſtfull daies
In honor of that worthy wight, to laſt henceforth alwaies:
If any hinder your intent, through fondneſſe or through ſpite,
Both ſea and land, and heauen it ſelfe will puniſh that ſame wight.

This Oracle being brought, all the Achaians were marueilous glad of it, but ỹ Sicyonians ſpecially: who preſently changing their mourning into publike ioy, they caried the body from the city of Ægivm, and brought it home as in maner of proceſſion, in white robes, and garlands of flowers on their heads, ſinging hymmes and ſongs of ioy, and dancing, till they came to the citie of Sicyone. And there they choſe out the chiefeſt place, and buried him as their founder, father, and ſauiour of their citie: and the place is called at this preſent time, Arativm. There they yearely make two ſolemne ſacrifices, the one the fifth of Nouember, at which time he deliuered the city of Sicyone from tyranny; and they call this ſacrifice Soteria, as much to ſay, as the feaſt of health: and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the firſt ſacrifice, that was done by the Prieſt of Iupiter the ſauiour. The ſecond ſacrifice alſo was done by Aratus ſon, who was girt about with a cloath, not altogether white, but mingled with purple colour. So during the ſacrifice, they ſung hymnes vpon the Harpe in praiſe of him; and the maſter of the Muſitians made a proceſſion round about, being accompanied with boyes and yong men of the citie, after whom followed the Senate crowned with garlands of flowers, and other citizens that were diſpoſed to go to a proceſſion: Howbeit the moſt part of the honors that were appointed to be done vnto him, were left off by proceſſe of time, and change of things that followed afterwards. Thus you ſee what the life of Aratus the father hath bene, as we find in hiſtories. Now Philip being a wicked man, and cruell of nature, cauſed his ſon Aratus alſo to be poiſoned, not with a deadly poyſon, but with ſuch a poyſon as troubleth a mans wits ſo, that through their diuelliſh receit, he becometh a ſtarke foole without any wit at al, & maketh him to attēpt ſtrāge and abhominable things, and to haue certaine ſhamefull and deteſtable deſires: inſomuch as his death (though he died in the prime of his youth) could not be thought miſerable, but rather a happy deliuerance to him out of al his miſeries & miſhaps. But Philip afterwards, ſo long as he liued, paied vnto Iupiter (protector of all iuſtice and friendſhip) the puniſhment his wicked life deſerued. For, after he was ouercome in battell by the Romaines, he was compelled to yeeld himſelfe to their mercie; by whom he was depriued from all the reſt of his lands and dominions he had, and of all his ſhips, but fiue only, and condemned beſides to pay a thouſand talents for a fine, and to giue his ſonne in hoſtage: and they onely left him for pities ſake, the kingdome of MACEDON, with all the appertenances. And there he daily putting to death the chiefeſt of his Nobilitie, and neareſt of bloud vnto him, he filled his realme with crueltie and mortall hate againſt him. Furthermore amongſt ſuch a heape of euils, hauing but one onely ioy, to haue a vertuous ſonne, he put him to death, for ſpite and malice that he ſaw the ROMAINES honour him; and left his other ſonne Perſeus ſucceſſor of his realme: who, as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten ſonne, but taken for his ſonne, and borne of a tailors wife called Gnathenium. It is that Perſeus, whom Paulus Æmylius ouercame, and led in triumph in ROME: and at him the race of the kings deſcended from Antigonus, failed; where the iſſue and offspring of Aratus continueth yet vntill our time, in the cities of SICYONE, and PALLENA.

THE LIFE OF Galba.

Iphicrates ſaying, what maner of man a mercenary ſouldier ſhould be.

Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captaine ſaid, that a mercenary ſoldier ſhould be couetous, a louer, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleaſure, he ſhould be the valianter, and readier to put himſelf into any danger. But moſt men thinke, that ſouldiers ſhould be as one entire ſtrong body, that ſtirreth not of it ſelf without ỹ mouing of the Generall. And to approue this opinion, it is ſaid that Paulus Æmylius arriuing in MACEDON, and finding the ſouldiers full of words and curioſity (euery man medling with the affaires of the Generall) he made open proclamation, No man ſo hardie to meddle with his office & affaires; but euery man only to keep his ſword ſharp, & to be quick of hand againſt the enemy: and for the reſt, to refer all to him, who wold take ſufficient order for things of his charge & gouernment. Therfore Plato ſaith, that it litle auaileth to haue a good and wiſe Captaine, if the ſouldiers alſo be not wiſe and obedient; thinking it as requiſite for the vertue of obedience, to haue men of a noble mind and good education, as otherwiſe it is meete for a Captaine to know how to direct and command well; conſidering it is that which with lenitie and mildneſſe doth mitigate all fury & choler. He hath diuers other examples & ſufficient proofes to proue his words true; and namely, the great miſeries & calamities which came to the ROMAINS after ỹ death of Nero, do plainly ſhew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, thẽ a great army liuing licentiouſly & diſorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexãder the great, compared Alexanders army vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out: conſidering how blindly & looſly they

they were gouerned. Howbeit the Empire of ROME being deuided into ſundrie factions at one ſelf time and riſing againſt it ſelf in many places, it fel into the like misfortunes & calamities fained by the Poets of the TITANS: not ſo much through the ambitiouſneſſe of the Emperors; as by meanes of the couetouſneſſe and inſolency of the ſoldiers, who draue the Emperors out of their Imperial ſeates one after another, as one naile driueth out another. And Dionyſius alſo the tyrant of SICILE, was wont to call Pharetus (who had bin tyrant of THESSALIA onely ten moneths ſpace) a tyrant in a play, deriding his ſo ſudden change of ſtate. But the Imperiall houſe of the Ceſars at ROME, receiued foure Emperors, in leſſe then ten moneths ſpace, the ſoldiers now putting in one, and then taking out another, as if they had bene in a play on a ſcaffold. So that the ROMAINES being thus grieuouſly oppreſſed, had yet this comfort: that they needed not to ſeeke to be reuenged of them that did oppreſſe them. For they ſaw one of them murther another, and him firſt and moſt iuſtly of all other murthered, that had firſt of all corrupted the ſoldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the change of the Emperors: and ſo deprauing a worthy deed of it ſelfe, which was their forſaking of Nero: and mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treaſon. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captaine of the Emperors guard, which are called the Prætorian ſoldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he ſaw Nero in deſpaire of himſelfe and of his eſtate, and that he was ready to flie into ÆGYPT: he perſwaded the guard they ſhould call Galba Emperor, as if Nero had not bene at ROME, but fled and gone; and promiſed euery one ſeuen thouſand fiue hundred Drachmaes apeece: and to the reſt of the ſouldiers that were diſperſed vp and downe in garriſon vpon the prouinces, twelue hundred and fiftie Drachmaes a man. For the leauying of which ſumme, they could not poſſibly do it, but they muſt needs cõmit ten thouſand times more extortion on euery body, then Nero had done. This large promiſe made them preſently put Nero to death, and ſhortly after him, Galba himſelfe alſo. For the ſoldiers forſooke Nero, for the hope they had to receiue this promiſed gift: and ſhortly after they ſlue the ſecond, which was Galba, becauſe they receiued not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards alſo, in ſeeking who ſhould ſtill feed them with like gifts, before they could obtaine their wiſhed hope, one of thẽ deſtroyed another by treaſon and rebellion. But now to ſet down all things particularly which hapned at that time, it were to write one whole entire hiſtorie: and therefore, I will content my ſelfe, not to paſſe ouer with ſilence the notableſt deeds, and lamentable calamities, which happened at that time vnto the Ceſars.

The Empire of Rome, wherein likened.

The hope of gifts deſtroyed the Empire of Rome.

It is manifeſtly known to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a priuate man, was the richeſt & wealthieſt that came to be in the number of the Ceſars: who, though he came of a very noble houſe, deriuing himſelfe from the race & family of the Seruij: yet he was honored the more, becauſe he was akin vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue & eſtimation, was one of the chiefeſt men of his time, albeit that otherwiſe he willingly reſigned his authority and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was ſomewhat akin vnto Liuia the wife of Auguſtus Ceſar, and therefore for her ſake he came out of the Emperors pallace, whẽ he went to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhip. Moreouer it is reported, that whẽ he had charge of the army in GERMANY, he did valiãtly behaue himſelf. And in the gouernment of LIBIA alſo, where he was Vice-conſull, he did as honorably behaue himſelfe, as any man whatſoeuer. Howbeit his meane and ſimple ordinary of diet, voide of all exceſſe, was reputed miſery and niggardlineſſe in him, when he was proclaimed Emperor: becauſe the practiſe of ſober and temperate diet which he would haue brought in vſe, was then ſo raw a thing, that it was taken for a new & ſtrange deuice. He was ſent gouernor alſo into SPAINE by Nero, before he had learned to be afraid of the citizens of great authority: howbeit, beſides that he was of a courteous & gentle nature, his age moreouer increaſed the opinion they had of him, that he was timerous and feareful. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe and torment the prouinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to helpe them: yet was it ſome cõfort to them, which were iudged & ſold as ſlaues by the officers, to ſee that Galba did lamẽt the miſeries & calamities they endured, as if they had bin done vnto himſelf. So whẽ any ſlãderous rimes were made againſt Nero, which were ſong vp & downe in euery place, he would neither forbid thẽ, nor yet was offended as Neroes officers were. Therefore he was maruellouſly beloued in the countrey, of them that were acquainted with him: becauſe he was then in the eight yeare of his gouernment as Procõſul amongſt thẽ, at which time Iunius Vindex being Proprætor of GAVLE, rebelled againſt Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred into open action of rebellion. But Galba did neither beleeue him, nor alſo accuſe & bewray him, as diuerſe others which were gouernors of armies and prouinces did: who ſent Vindex letters vnto Nero which he himſelfe had written vnto them, and ſo did as much as in them lay to hinder the enterpriſe, who afterwards being of the cõſpiracy did confeſſe they were traitors to thẽſelues, as much as vnto him. Howbeit when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed opẽ war againſt Nero, he wrote againe vnto Galba, and praied him to take the Imperiall crowne vpon him, and to become the head of a ſtrong and mightie bodie (which were the GAVLES) that lacked nothing but a head & gouernor, being a hundred thouſand fighting mẽ ready armed, & might alſo leauie a great number more of them. Then Galba conſulted therupon with his friends, & among them ſome were of opinion that he ſhould ſtay a while, to ſee what change and alteration would grow at ROME vpon this ſtirre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, ſaid vnto him: O Galba, what meaneth this ſo doubtfull a deliberation? Be not we wiſe men, to call in queſtiõ, whether we ſhal allow of Vindex friendſhip; or accuſe him; yea, & with armes perſecute him, that deſired rather to haue thee Emperor, then Nero tyrant ouer the ſtate of ROME? Afterwards Galba by bils ſet vp euery where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchize ſuch as would make ſuite for it. This rumor flying ſtraight abroad, he gathered a great number of ſoldiers together, that were very willing to rebel: and he was no ſooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of ſtate, but all the ſouldiers did ſalute him by the name of Emperor. Howbeit he was not cõtent with this name at the firſt, but accuſing Nero, & lamenting the death of the nobleſt men whom he had cruelly put to death, he promiſed that he would employ his beſt wit and diſcretion to the ſeruice and benefit of his countrey, neither naming himſelfe Cæſar, nor Emperor, but only Lieutenant to the Senate, & ſtate of ROME. Now, that Vindex did wiſely to cal Galba to be Emperor, Nero himſelf in his doings doth witneſſe it: who hauing alwayes made a countenance as though he paſſed not for Vindex, & that he weighed not the rebellion of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperour, being then at ſupper, for ſpite he ouerthrew the table. Moreouer, though ẏ Senate had iudged Galba an enemy, yet Nero to be pleaſant with his friends, made as though he was nothing afraid of it, & ſaid, This news made al for him, becauſe he ſtood in need of mony, & alſo that it was a happy occaſion offered him to helpe him withall. For ſaid he, we ſhall ſoone haue all the GAVLES goods, as the ſpoile of a iuſt warre, after we haue once againe ouercome & conquered them: and moreouer, Galbaes goods alſo would quickly be in his hands, that he might ſel them, conſidering that he was become his open enemy. So he preſently commanded Galbaes goods ſhould be openly ſold, to them that would giue moſt. Galba vnderſtanding that, did alſo by ſound of trumpet ſell all Neroes goods he had in all the prouince of SPAINE, and did alſo find more men readier to buy, thẽ there were goods to ſel. Daily men roſe againſt Nero in euery country, who tooke Galbaes part, Clodius Macer only excepted in AFRICK, and Verginius Rufus in GAVLE, both of them hauing charge of legiõs appointed for the ſafe keeping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow ſeuerall directions by themſelues, varying in mind & intent. For Clodius Macer hauing robbed much, & put diuers men alſo to death through his crueltie and couetouſneſſe, ſhewed plainly, that he ſwam betweene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, not yet keepe it. Verginius alſo on the other ſide, being generall ouer great & mightie legions, who had ſundry times called him Emperor, and did in maner force him to take vpon him the name & Empire: he notwithſtanding did euer anſwer them, that he neither minded to take ẏ Empire vpon him, nor yet to ſuffer any other to do it, then ſuch as the Senate ſhould chuſe & cal vnto the ſame. This at the firſt ſomewhat amazed Galba. But whẽ both the armies of Vindex & Verginius, in ſpite of their Captaines (who could not ſtay nor keep them backe, no more then coach-men can keepe backe the horſe with their bridles) were ioyned in a great battell together, where were ſlain 20000 GAVLES in the field, & Vindex alſo ſlue himſelf ſhortly after: it was giuen out, that the conquerors after ſo great a victory obtained, would cõpel Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperor, or elſe that they would take Neroes part again. Then Galba being not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perſwaded him to ioyne with him to hold vp the Empire & liberty of the ROMAINS, and therupon fled ſtraight into a city of SPAINE called* COLONIA, rather repenting him of that he had done, & wiſhing for his wonted peaceable and quiet life wherein he was brought vp, thẽ otherwiſe occupying himſelf about any neceſſary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterpriſe. Now it was about the beginning of ſommer, & one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of his ſlaues enfrãchiſed, a SICILIAN born, that was come from ROME in ſeuen daies: who vnderſtanding that Galba was alone, went presently to his chamber dore, and opened it, and coming in against the wils of the grooms of the chamber, that stood at the dore, he told him, that Nero being yet aliue, but seene no more, first the people of Rome, and then the Senate had proclaimed him Emperor, & that immediatly after, newes came that Nero was dead: the which he hardly beleeuing notwithstanding, went thither himselfe, saw his body laid out vpon ỹ ground, and then made towards him with all speed to bring him these newes. The newes maruellously reuiued Galba, & a multitude of men thronged straight about the dore, which began to be couragious, seeing him liuely again, although the speed of the messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two daies after, Titus also arriued, with certaine others of the camp, who told Galba particularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalf. So this Titus was called to great honor: and the slaue enfranchised had priuiledge giuen him to weare rings of gold, & he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the enfranchised bondmen, became the chiefest man about his master Galba. In the meane time, Nymphidius Sabine began at Rome, not couertly, but with open force, to take vpon him the absolute gouernment of the Empire, perswading himselfe that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought in a litter vnto Rome, being at the least 73 yeares old: besides also, that the army of ỹ Prætorians which were in Rome, did beare him good wil of long time, & then acknowledged none other Lord but him only, for the large promise he had made thẽ, for the which he receiued the thanks, and Galba remained the debter. So he presently cõmanded Tigellinus, his companion and Captaine with him of the army of the Prætorians, to leaue off his sword: and disposing himselfe to banqueting and feasting, he sent for all those that had bin Consuls, Prætors, or Procõsuls of prouinces, & made them all to be inuited in the name of Galba. So, there were certain soldiers gaue out this rumor in the campe, that they should do well to send Ambassadors vnto Galba, to pray him that Nymphidius might be their only Captaine stil, without any cõpanion ioyned with him. Furthermore, the honor & good wil the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, & going daily to visit him in his house, procuring him to be the author of al their decrees passed in Senate, & that he should authorise thẽ: this made him high minded, and the bolder by much; in so much that shortly after, they that came to honor him in this sort, did not only hate & mislike his doings, but moreouer he made thẽ afraid of him. Furthermore, whẽ the Consuls had giuen to common pursiuants any commissions vnder seale, or letters patents signifying the decrees of the Senate, to cary them to the Emperor (by vertue of which letters patents, when the officers of the citie do see the seale, they straight prouide the pursiuants of coaches and fresh horses to further their speed and hastie iourney:) Nymphidius was very angrie with thẽ, becaule they did not also come to him for his letters, sealed by him & his soldiers, to send likewise to the Emperor. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to haue deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing themselues vnto him, and craning pardon, did appease his anger. And to please the commons also, he suffered them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could meete withall. Among other, they slue a fencer called Spicillus, whom they put vnder Neros statues, which they dragged vp and downe the citie. Another also called Aponius, one of Neroes accusers, they threw him to the ground, & draue carts ouer him loden with stones. And diuerse others also, whom they slue in that maner, of the which some had done no maner of offence. Hereupon one Mauriscus, one of the noblest men of the citie, and so esteemed, said openly in the Senate: I feare me we shall wish for Nero againe, before it be long. So Nymphidius being come in maner to the fulnesse of his hope, he was very glad to heare that some repined at him, because he was the sonne of Caius Cæsar, that was the next Emperor after Tiberius. For this Caius Cæsar, when he was a yong man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bin a faire yong woman, and the daughter of one Callistus, one of Cæsars enfranchised bondmen, whom he had gotten of a laundresse he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Caius Cæsar could know his mother: and men thought that he was begotten of a fencer called Martianus, with whom his mother Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in Rome; and indeed Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor, then vnto any other. So, he cõfessed that he was the son of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascribe the glory of the death of Nero vnto himself, & thought himself not sufficiently recõpenced with the honors they gaue him, neither also with the goods he enioyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus whõ Nero loued so dearly, whom he sent for to Neroes funerals whilest his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppæus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet ſecretly he aſpired to be Emperor, partly practiſing the matter in Rome it ſelfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were ſecretly his friends: and partly alſo through one Gellianus, whom he ſent into Spaine, to ſee how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things proſpered with Galba, ſauing Verginius Ruſus only, who ſtood doubtful yet, & made him ſorely miſtruſt him; for that he was afraid (beſides that he was Generall ouer a great and puiſſant army, hauing alſo newly ouerthrown Vindex, & ſecretly ruling the beſt part of the Empire of Rome, which was all Gavle, and then in tumult & vprore, ready to rebell,) leſt he would hearken vnto them that perſwaded him to take the Empire to himſelf. For there was no Captaine of Rome at that time ſo famous, and of ſo great eſtimation as Verginius: and that deſeruedly, for that he had done great ſeruice to the Empire of Rome in time of extremitie, hauing deliuered Rome at one ſelfe time from a cruell tyrannie, and alſo from the danger of the warres of the Gavles. This notwithſtanding, Verginius perſiſting ſtill in his firſt determination, referred the election of the Emperour vnto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly knowne, the common ſort of ſoldiers were earneſtly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the ſoldiers (otherwiſe called a Colonell of a thouſand men) went into his tent with a ſword drawne in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, or elſe to look to haue the ſword thruſt into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legion, was ſworne vnto Galba, & that he had receiued letters from Rome, aduertiſing him of the ordinance and decree of the Senate: in the end, with much ado, he perſwaded the ſouldiers to proclaime Galba Emperor, who ſent Flaccus Ordeonius to ſucceed him, vnto whom he willingly gaue place. So, when Verginius had deliuered vp his army vnto him, he went to meet with Galba, on whom he waited, coming on ſtill towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither ſhewed him euill countenance, nor yet greatly eſteemed of him, Galba himſelfe being cauſe of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but ſpecially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius thinking to hinder his riſing, did vnwittingly indeed further his good hap, and deliuered him occaſion to draw him out of the ciuill warres and miſchiefs (the which lighted afterwards vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambaſſadors were ſent frō the Senate, & met with Galba at Narbona, a city of Gavle: where after they had preſented their humble duty, they perſwaded him to make all the haſt he could poſſible to ſhew himſelfe to the people of Rome, who were maruellouſly deſirous to ſee him. Galba receiued them very graciouſly and courteouſly, and made them great cheare, howbeit very modeſtly. For notwithſtanding that Nymphidius had ſent him diuerſe officers, and ſtore of Neroes moueables: yet he would neuer be ſerued with any of them, at any feaſts or banquets he made, nor with other then his owne ſtuffe; wherein he ſhewed his noble mind, and how he could maſter all vanity. But Titus Iunius ſhortly after told Galba, that this noble mind, & ciuill moderation, without pride or pompe, was too lowly a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine reſpect of honeſty that knew not it ſelfe, and became not his greatneſſe and maieſtie. So, he perſwaded him to vſe Neroes money and ſtuffe, and to be ſumptuous & Princely in his feaſts, without niggardlineſſe. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainly to ſhew, that he would be ruled by Titus Iunius: who aboue all other was extreme couetous, and beſides too much giuen to women. For when he was a yong man, the firſt time he went to the warres vnder Caluiſius Sabine, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good fellowſhip) diſguiſed like a ſouldier into the campe, into his Generals tent (which the Romains called Principia) and there was ſomewhat bold with her. Wherfore Caius Cæſar committed him to priſon, but he eſcaped at his death. Another time, whē he ſupped with Clodius Cæſar, he ſtole a ſiluer pot. Clodius hearing of it, bade him againe to ſupper the next night: but he commanded his men they ſhould giue him drinke in a earthen cruſe. Thus this theft (through Cæſars pleaſantneſſe) ſeemed rather a matter of ſport, then of anger: howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extreme couetouſneſſe of money (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the ſway about him) gaue vnto ſome iuſt cauſe, and vnto others apparent colour of tragicall miſchiefes, and grieuous calamities. For Nymphidius, ſo ſoone as Gellianus was returned out of Spaine, whom he had ſent thither to ſee what Galba did, informing him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the guard and houſe of the Emperor; and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could neuer be ſuffered to come neare Galba, nor to ſpeake with him apart, becauſe thoſe which were about Galba did miſtruſt him, and euer had an eye to him to ſee what he did; he was maruellouſly perplexed perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and pettie Captaines of the campe of the Prætorian armie, and perſwaded them that Galba touching his owne perſon, was a good old and diſcreet man, howbeit that he did not follow his owne aduice and counſel, but was ruled altogether by Iunius & Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good (before they came to be of greater power, and to haue ſuch great authoritie in managing the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before) to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Emperor, in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting thoſe two men from about him, he ſhould be the better welcome to Rome, and to all men elſe beſides. The Captaines vtterly miſliked this deuice. For they thought it too ſtrange, and beyond all reaſon, to ſeeme to teach an old Emperour, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: and to appoint him what ſeruants and friends he ſhould keepe, & whom he ſhould truſt or miſtruſt. Nymphydius perceiuing this, tooke another courſe, and wrote letters vnto Galba to terrifie him; one time ſending him word that he was maruellous euill beloued of many in Rome, and that they were readie to rebell againſt him: another time alſo that the legions of Germanie were reuolted, and that he vnderſtood the like from the legions of Iurie and Syria: and another time alſo that Clodius Macer in Africke ſtayed all the ſhips fraughted with corne that were bound for Rome. But in the end finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings, he determined firſt of al to ſet vpon him. Howbeit Clodius Celſus, born in the city of Antioch, a wiſe man, and his faithful friend, diſſwaded him maruellouſly not to do it: declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one houſe nor family in Rome that would call Nymphidius, Cæſar. Howbeit in contrary manner, diuers others mocked Galba, and ſpecially one Mithridates of the Realme of Pont, that ſaid he was a bald writhen man. For the Romains (ſaid he) haue him indeed now in ſome eſtimation: but when they haue once ſeene him, they wil think it a perpetuall ſhame and reproch to our time, that he was called Cæſar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about midnight into the camp, & there openly to proclaime him Emperor. Howbeit the chiefe Tribune of the ſouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his ſouldiers together in the night, and before them all did firſt openly reproue himſelfe, and then them, for that they had ſo often turned and changed in ſo ſhort time, without any wit or diſcretion, hauing no iudgement to chuſe the beſt way, but to be pricked forward & caried headlong in that ſort by ſome wicked ſpirit, which brought thē out of one treaſon into another. And yet (ſaid he) our firſt change had ſome countenance of reaſon, to wit, the horrible vices and faults of Nero: but now wherein can we accuſe Galba, to haue any countenance to falſifie our faith vnto him? hath he ſlaine his mother? hath he put her to death? hath he ſhamefully played the tumbler or common player vpon a ſcaffold in ỹ Theater? And yet for all theſe vile parts, we neuer durſt once begin to forſake Nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius words, who told vs that Nero had firſt forſaken vs, and that he was fled into Ægypt. What ſhall we do? ſhall we kill Galba after Nero? what ſhall we kil him that is a kin vnto Liuia, to make the ſonne of Nymphidia Emperor, as we haue already ſlaine the ſonne of Agrippina? or ſhall we rather kill him that hath raſhly entred into this enterpriſe, and thereby to reuenge the death of Nero, and to ſhew our ſelues faithfull ſouldiers vnto Galba? All the ſouldiers yeelded ſtraight to the Colonels words, and therewith went to their other companions to perſwade them to keepe their faith and promiſe they auowed vnto the Emperor: ſo that they made many of them reuolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereupon the noiſe and cries being great, Nymphidius ſuppoſing (as ſome thought) that the ſouldiers did call for him, or elſe hoping betimes to quench this tumult, to ſtay ſuch as were yet wauering: he went thither himſelfe with great ſtore of torch light, and caried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and the which he had learned without book to ſpeake vnto the ſoldiers. But when he found the gates of the campe ſhut, and ſaw diuers men armed vpon the wals, he began to be afraid: and coming nearer, asked them what they meant by it, and by whoſe commandement they had armed themſelues as they did. Anſwer was made him by them all, that they acknowledged no other Emperor but Galba: the which he ſeemed to like of, and alſo commanded them that followed him to do the like, & therewithall drew nearer. Whereupon certain of the ſouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and ſuffered him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit as ſoone as he was come in, firſt there was a dart throwne at him, the which one Septimius that went before him receiued vpon his ſhield: and then others alſo came with their ſwords drawn in their hands to ſet vpon him, and followed him as he fled into a ſouldiers cabine, where they ſlue him.

Nymphidius aſpireth to be Emperor.

Nymphidius Sabinus ſlaine.

Then they layed his bodie in an open place,& railed it about,that euery man that would,might the next day ſee it. So Nymphidius being ſlain in this ſort,Galba vnderſtanding of his death,commanded that all Nymphidius friends and confederators that had not bin ſlain at that time,ſhould for his ſake be put to death,as indeed they were. Amongſt thē they ſlue Ciconius that had made the oration for Nymphidius,and Mithridates alſo of PONT. Howbeit,though indeed they had deſerued it,yet men thought it a very cruell part to command theſe men to be put to death in that ſort,which were men of ſuch qualitie and calling as they were, without due forme and order of law. For euery man ſtood in good hope vpon the coming in of this new Emperour, to haue ſeene another manner of gouernment then they had yet ſeene: howbeit they were deceiued of their hope at the firſt chop. But yet they miſliked this moſt of all, when he commanded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus,that had bene Conſull, becauſe he was Neroes faithfull friend. But now for the death of Clodius Macer,whom Trebonianus ſlue in AFRICKE by his commandement, and for Fonteius that was alſo ſlaine in GERMANIE by Valens, he had ſome reaſon to feare them becauſe they were in armes,& commanded great armies. But for Tertullianus,that was an old man, naked and vnarmed,truly he ſhould haue put him to his triall by law, if he would haue miniſtred iuſtice,the which he promiſed to keepe at his firſt coming to the Imperiall crowne. Herein they greatly reproued Galba. Now when he drew neare to ROME within fiue & twenty furlongs,he was compaſſed about with a multitude of mariners & ſea-faring men,that kept the high way on euery ſide,wandering vp & down in euery place. Theſe were the men whom Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the oare and made them ſouldiers. So they were come thither to be ſuters to him, that he would allow them ſtill to be ſouldiers; and they preſſed ſo arrogantly vpon him,that they would not ſuffer thoſe which came to the new Emperor,to ſee him nor ſpeake with him,but they fel to tumult & vprore,crying out to haue enſignes for their legion,& to be appointed a place to lie in, in garriſon. Galba referred them ouer to another time,& bade them they ſhould then let him vnderſtād their demand. They told him againe, that this delay was a kind of deniall,and thereupon fell to plaine mutinie,& followed him with great cries: inſomuch that ſome of them ſtucke not to draw out their ſwords. Then Galba commanded the horſemen he had about him, to ſet vpon them. So there was not a man of them that reſiſted,but ſome of them were ouerthrown,and troden vnder their horſe feete,and others alſo ſlaine as they fled. This was a very euill ſigne and preſage for him,to enter into ROME with ſuch bloudſhed,vpon ſo many poore dead mens bodies as lay ſlaine on the ground. Howbeit,where ſome before did deſpiſe & mocke him for an old feeble man,euery man then was afraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, becauſe he would ſhew a great change and alteration from the vnreaſonable vaine gifts & expences of Nero, it ſeemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Canus an excellent plaier on ỹ recorder,had plaied all ſupper time,becauſe it was maruellous ſweet muſick to heare,he prailed and commended it maruellouſly,and commanded one to bring him his casket,out of the which he took a few crowns,and put them into his hand,ſaying;that it was not mony of the common treaſure,but of his owne. Furthermore,he gaue ſtraight commandement that they ſhould require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had giuen and beſtowed vpon common players, minſtrels, wreſtlers, and people of ſuch kind of faculties and profeſſion, and to leaue them onely the tenth part. But he got litle by this deuice. For the moſt part of thoſe that had gifts giuen them,had ſpent and conſumed it all, as men that liued without any rule or order,& ſpent at night that which they got in the day: and beſides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them,and to make them reſtore it againe. But this was an endleſſe worke: for things had bene ſo conueyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinit number of mens hands. But of all this, the ſhame and diſhonor returned to Galba himſelf,though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who only made the Emperour ſtraight-laced to all others,whileſt he himſelfe tooke vnreaſonably of all men, making port-ſale of euery thing that came to hand. For Heſiodus the Poet ſaith:

As well when the veſſell is full that it ſpill,
As when it is emptie, thirſt craueth drinke ſtill.

But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be old and feeble, would wiſely take his fortune and time while time ſerued, ſuppoſing it almoſt to be at an end ſo ſoone as he began to enter into it. So in the meane time he did much diſhonour the poore old man, ouer-greatly abuſing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefeſt and weightieſt matters,in reprouing, or altogether hindering thoſe, the

the which the Prince himself had a good desire to deale vprightly in, as to punish the officers of Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruellously reioyced, and cried out, as they went to execution through the market place, that it was a goodly and blessed procession, and required Tigellinus of the gods and men, that had bene chiefe master and guide of all Neroes tyrannie. Howbeit the trim man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Iunius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, and had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of the wicked parts he played when he was aliue. Whereas he that made Nero worthy of death, and that afterwards had also betrayed him, was let alone, and nothing said vnto him; being a manifest proofe to all others, that they should not doubt to hope to obtaine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, so they fed him with gifts. For the commō people of Rome neuer desired any thing so much, as to see Tigellinus to be caried to execution: and they neuer left crying out to demand him in all assemblies of the Theater or shew place, vntill such time as the Emperor Galba did forbid them by proclamation, the which declared that Tigellinus would not liue long, because he was sicke of a consumption of the lungs, which by litle and litle did weare him to nothing: and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloudy. The people were much offended with this, but yet they seemed to laugh at it: & Tigellinus did sacrifice to the gods for his health & safety, and prepared a sumptuous feast. Where Iunius rising from supper, being set by the Emperor, went vnto Tigellinus to be merry with him, and tooke his daughter being a widow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offered her a gift of fiue & twentie Myriades of siluer: and commanded one of his chiefest concubines to take from her necke a carcanet she wore, being worth fifteene Myriades, and to giue it the other. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done vprightly and with iustice, were reproued and taken in euill part: as the thing that was granted to the Gavles, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the subsidies and taxes they were wont to pay, nor that they were made free of Rome, so much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the soldiers still liued in good hope, for the gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promised them, yet they should enioy as much as Nero had giuen them. But Galba vnderstanding that they complained of him, spake a word meet for so noble & worthy a Prince as he was: that he vsed to chuse soldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the soldiers, it bred a maruellous mortall hatred in them against him: because they thought it was not only to take the gift away from thē which they hoped presently to haue receiued, but that it was also a president to teach the Emperors that should come after him, what they should do. Howbeit the rebelling mindes of the Prætorian guard at Rome appeared not yet, but was secretly kept in for the reuerence they bare vnto the maiesty & person of Galba, who kept them that were desirous to rebell, because they saw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did somewhat smother & keepe in the shew of their wicked intent. But they which had before serued vnder Verginius, and were at that time vnder Flaccus in Germanie, thinking themselues worthy of great reward for the battell they had won against Vindex, and hauing nothing giuen them in recompence, they would not be pleased with any thing their Captaine said vnto them, neither did they make any account of Flaccus, because he could not stirre himselfe, he was so plagued with the gout, and besides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine sports were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonels & Captaines (according to the maner of the Romaines) made praiers vnto the gods for ý health & prosperity of the Emperor Galba: there were diuers of thē that made a noise at the first, and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their praiers, in the end the soldiers answered: If they be worthy. The legions in like maner vnder Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vse such insolent parts: whereof Galbaes officers did aduertise him by letters. Wherfore Galba being afraid, & mistrusting that they did not only despise him for his age, but also because he had no childrē, he determined to adopt some yong gentlemā for his son, of the noblest house of ý city of Rome, & to proclaime him his successor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but euer giuen to sensualitie and pleasure from his cradle, as much as any Romaine could be. And as Homer oftētimes doth call Paris ý husbād of the faire Helen, naming him by the name of his wife, becauſe he had no other commendable vertue in him: euen ſo Otho came to be knowne in Rome, by marying Poppæa, whom Nero loued when ſhe was Criſpinus his wife: howbeit, bearing ſome reſpect to his wife, and being affraid alſo of his mother, he had inticed Otho to be his baud vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearely, and much delighted in his companie, becauſe he was ſo good a fellow and free of his fleſh: and was very glad ſometime to heare how he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was annointing himſelf with precious oyles & perfumes, he caſt a litle vpon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feaſt in his houſe, where ſodainly were thruſt into the hal, diuers veſſels of gold and ſiluer ful of this perfumed oyle, that ran out of thē like conduit water, & did wet all the hall. So Otho hauing firſt poſſeſſed Poppæa, and abuſed her vnder hope of Neroes loue, he perſwaded her to be diuorced from her husbād. The which ſhe did, & he receiued her home to his owne houſe, as his lawfull wife: not being ſo wel pleaſed to haue part, as he was ſory & angry alſo to let another enioy her. Now Poppæa her ſelf (as it is reported) did not miſlike this his ielouſie, for ſometimes ſhe would ſhut her doore againſt Nero, though Otho were not within: either becauſe ſhe would keepe Nero in breath, and in loue-liking ſtill, or elſe as ſome thought, becauſe ſhe would not haue Cæſar to her husband; and likewiſe that ſhe would not refuſe him for her friend, becauſe he was wantonly giuen. But ſo it is, Otho was in danger of his life by marying of Poppæa: and ſo was it alſo a ſtrange thing, that Nero hauing put his wife & ſiſter to death, onely to marry Poppæa, he did yet pardon Otho, & ſaued his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes ſake that was his friend, through whoſe perſwaſion he was ſent to ỹ fartheſt part in Spaine along the Ocean ſea, to be gouernor of Lvsitania. And there he gouerned ſo wiſely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troubleſome vnto the country: knowing that this honorable charge was giuē him only to mitigate and hide his baniſhment. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the firſt of all the Gouernors of the prouinces that ioyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both gold and ſiluer, vnto the mint-maſter, he gaue it him to put into bullion, and ſo to be conuerted into currāt coine. Moreouer, he gaue of his officers vnto Galba, thoſe which he thought the meeteſt men to ſerue a Prince: and otherwiſe when he was tried, he ſhewed himſelfe as faithfull and skilful in matters of ſtate, as any one that followed the Emperors traine. Inſomuch as al the way he went many dayes iourney in coach with Galba himſelf, & did marueilouſly curry fauor with Titus Iunius, beſtowing great gifts vpon him, & alſo entertaining him with pleaſant ſpeeches: but ſpecially, becauſe he willingly gaue him the vpper hand, wherby he was aſſured to be the ſecond perſon in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Iunius, for that he granted mens ſuits frankly & freely without one penie taking, and was beſides eaſie to be ſpoken with of euery man that had any ſuite to him: but ſpecially of the ſoldiers, whom he did greatly help and further, & cauſed diuers alſo to be called to honorable office, he himſelf partly mouing ỹ Emperor for them, without any labour or ſuite made vnto him, and partly alſo obtaining them at Iunius hands, and of the two infranchiſed bondmen of Galba, Icelus, and Aſiaticus. For theſe three men did beare al the ſway & credit about the Emperor in the court. Moreouer, alwaies when he inuited the Emperor to his houſe, he baſhed the Prætorian guard that waited vpon him, and gaue euery ſoldier a crown. Now this in ſight, ſeemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with: though indeed it was a fine deuice to ouerthrow him, to bribe the ſoldiers in that ſort as he did. So Galba conſulting whom he ſhould make his ſucceſſor, T. Iunius preferred Otho vnto him: the which he did not ſimply of himſelf, nor without reward, but only with promiſe that Otho ſhould mary his daughter, if Galba did adopt him his ſonne, and proclaime him ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit, Galba did alway ſpecially regard the cōmonwealth before his priuate liking, & ſought to adopt ſuch a one, as ſhould not ſo much pleaſe himſelfe, as otherwiſe ſhould be profitable and meet for the Empire. But ſurely in my opinion Galba would not make Otho heire of his goods, conſidering what an vnreaſonable ſpender he was, and how ſumptuous in all his things, and beſides, far gone in debt: for he ought aboue fiue thouſand Myriades. So when he had heard Iunius counſel about this adoption, he gently without other anſwer, did put ouer his determination vntil another time, and made Otho only Conſul at that time, and T. Iunius Conſul with him: whereby it was ſtraight ſuppoſed, that at the beginning of the new yeare, he would proclaime him his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Which was the thing the ſouldiers moſt deſired of all other. But now, delaying ſtill his determination, the legions of the Romaines in Germany, did riſe and rebel againſt him all at an inſtant. For he was generally hated of all his ſouldiers, becauſe he paid them not

not the gift he had promiſed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alledged for their cauſe of riſing, that he had diſhonorably reiected Verginius Rufus: and that the GAVLES which had fought againſt them, were rewarded with great and rich priuiledges, and they that tooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuouſly puniſhed and put to death. Moreouer, that Galba did onely honour Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his good will vnto him; offering publike oblations and funerall ſacrifices for him, as if by him only he had bene proclaimed Emperour. Now ſuch ſpeeches and rumors ran through the camp amongſt them, when the firſt day of the yeare came, which the ROMAINS call the Calends of Ianuary; on which day whē Flaccus had called the ſouldiers together, to ſweare them to the Emperour according to the cuſtome, they plucked downe Galbaes images, and ſware onely in the name of the people and Senate of ROME. The Captaines ſeeing what courſe they tooke, were as much afraid of the danger to be without a head, as they ſtood doubtful of the miſchief of their rebellion. So there ſtept vp one amongſt them and ſaid: My fellowes in armes, what do we meane? we neither chuſe any other Emperor, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperor at this preſent: wherby we ſhew plainly, that we do not onely refuſe Galba, but alſo all other to be our head and Emperor that may command vs. Now for Flaccus Ordeonius, that is but Galbaes ſhadow and image, I would wiſh we ſhould let him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, Gouernor of the lower GERMANY, he is not far from vs, but one daies iourney only, whoſe father was Cenſor at ROME, & thrice alſo Conſull, and that was in a maner a Peere and companion of Clodius Cæſar in the gouernment of the Empire: whoſe pouerty if any man miſlike in him, is a manifeſt proofe of his goodnes and magnanimitie. Him therefore let vs chuſe, and let the world know that we can tell how to chuſe an Emperour, better then the SPANIARDS or LVSITANIANS. Some of the ſouldiers that ſtood by, confirmed theſe words, but others miſliked of them: inſomuch that among the reſt there was an enſigne-bearer that ſtole ſecretly out of the campe to carie Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great ſupper, and had great ſtore of good company with him. Theſe newes running ſtraight through his campe, Fabius Valens Colonell of a legion, came the next morning with a great number of horſemen, and was the firſt man that named Vitellius Emperor, who before ſeemed to refuſe that name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of ſo great an Empire vpon him: but after dinner, being full of wine and meate, he came out among them, and accepted the name of Germanicus which they gaue him, and refuſed the name of Cæſar. But therewithall incontinently after, Flaccus ſouldiers leauing their goodly popular oath which they had ſworne in the name of the people and Senate, they all then took their othes faithfully to do what it ſhould pleaſe the Emperour Vitellius to command them. Thus Vitellius was choſen Emperour in GERMANIE. So Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to deferre time longer for the adoption he had intended: wherefore certainely vnderſtanding that thoſe whom he truſted moſt about him, were parties in this matter, ſome taking part with Dolabella, and the moſt part of them with Otho, neither liking the one nor the other, ſodainly without any word ſpoken to any man, he ſent for Piſo (that was the yonger ſonne of Craſſus and Piſo, whom Nero had put to death) a yong man faire conditioned, and ſhewed by his graue and modeſt countenance he had by vertue, that he was indued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe preſently from his pallace, and went ſtraight to the campe to proclaime Piſo Cæſar, and his ſucceſſor in the Empire. Howbeit at his ſetting out of his pallace, there appeared many great ſignes in the firmament which followed him. And moreouer, when he was alſo come into his campe, and that he began to ſay without book part of his oration, and partly alſo to reade it, it lightned al the while he ſpake, and there fell ſuch a great ſhower of raine vpon it, and a maruellous thicke miſt in the campe, and ouer all the citie, that men might eaſily ſee the gods did not like this adoption, and that it wold not proſper. The ſouldiers themſelues ſhewed their diſcontentment by their heauy lookes, and the rather, becauſe at that time there was no ſpeech of reward or liberalitie. And furthermore, they that were preſent alſo maruelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Piſo) that Piſo nothing reioyced at this great fauour, although he lacked not wit and vnderſtanding otherwiſe to acknowledge it. And on the other ſide alſo, they found eaſily by Othoes lookes, many ſignes and proofes that he was maruellouſly offended in his mind, to ſee that he was thus deceiued of his hope. For he being the man that was firſt ſpoken of, and thought moſt worthie of all other, and being come alſo ſo neare vnto it, now to ſee himſelfe thus whipped out of it, he ſuppoſed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him,& that he maliced him in his heart, ſo that after that time he ſtil ſtood in feare of his life. For he being afraid of Piſo, hating alſo Galba, and being grieuouſly offended with T. Iunius, he went his way full of diuers thoughts in his mind. But the Soothſayers, Aſtronomers, and Chaldeans, which he euer kept about him, did perſwade him not to be diſcouraged for this, nor to caſt all hope aſide: and ſpecially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great confidence, becauſe he had oftentimes before foretold and aſſured him, that Nero ſhould not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero ſhould die firſt, & he himſelf ſuruiue him, & ſhould become Emperor of Rome. Whereby Ptolomy hauing proued his firſt prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, and feare not that to come. But now beſides him, thoſe that ſecretly complained vnto him, did prick him forward the more, ſighing to ſee him ſo euill dealt with by Galba, and diuers of them chiefly, which bare great authoritie and credit about Tigellinus & Nymphidius: who being then caſt off, and diſcountenanced, came all vnto him, and ſtirred him vp the more. As amongſt others, Veturius and Barbius chiefly, of the which the one had bene Optio, & the other Teſſerarius; (for ſo the Romaines call thoſe that be their meſſengers, ſpials, and officers to the captaines) who with an infranchiſed bondman of his called Onomaſtus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted ſome ſoldiers with readie monie, and other ſome with faire words, being of themſelues euill inclined, and expected but occaſion to vtter their malice. For otherwiſe had the ſoldiers bin all of one mind, it had not bin an enterpriſe to haue bin brought to paſſe in foure dayes ſpace (being no more betwixt the adoption and murther) to make a whole camp rebel in that ſort. For they were ſlain ỹ fifteenth day of Ianuary, on which day Galba did ſacrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his friends. But at that time the Soothſayer called Ombricius, whē he had the intrails of the beaſts ſacrificed in his hands, and had looked vpon them, he ſpake not doubtfully but plainly, that he ſaw ſignes of great tumult and rebellion, & that the Emperor was in preſent danger of great treaſon. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the gods had put Galba into Othoes hands: for he ſtood at that time behind Galba, and both heard and ſaw all that the Soothſayers did. So he ſeeming to be grieued withall in his mind, and his colour changing oft for the feare he was in, his infranchiſed bondman Onomaſtus came and told him, that the maſons and chiefe carpenters were come to ſpeake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch-word agreed vpon betweene them, at which time Otho ſhold then go vnto the ſoldiers. Then Otho ſaid, that he went to looke to an old houſe he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would ſhew it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius houſe, into the market place, where the goldē pillar ſtandeth, where alſo the greateſt high waies of all Italy do meete together. There certaine met him that firſt called him Emperour, which were not in all aboue three and twentie perſons. Thereupon, though Otho was not vnconſtant, as it appeared (notwithſtanding he was ſo fine and effeminate a man) but rather reſolute and ſtout in inſtant danger: yet feare ſo oppreſſed him at that time, that he would faine haue left his enterpriſe. Howbeit the ſoldiers would not ſuffer him, but compaſſing his litter round about with their armes, and their ſwords drawne in their hands, they commanded the litter men to go forward. So Otho as he went haſtening on his driuers, he often muttered to himſelfe, I am but dead. Some hearing him as they paſſed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwiſe troubled, to ſee ſuch a ſmall number of men about him, that they durſt venter vpon ſo hard an enterpriſe. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three and by foure in a company: all which came and ioyned with him, and cryed Cæſar, Cæſar, hauing their ſwords drawne in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to guard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conſpiracie, but being amazed and afraid with their ſodaine coming, he ſuffered them to come in. So when Otho was come in, he foũd no man that reſiſted him. For they that knew nothing of the practiſe, being compaſſed in with thoſe that were made priuy to it, & had knowne it of long time, being found ſtragling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the reſt for feare at the firſt, & afterwards for good will. This was brought ſtraight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothſayer being yet buſie about this ſacrifice: inſomuch that they which before gaue no credite to thoſe diuinations, began then to maruell much at this heauenly ſigne. Then there ran immediatly a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Thereupon Iunius and Lacon, and certaine other of Galbaes infranchiſed bondmen, ſtood to guard Galbaes perſon with their ſwords drawne in their hands. Piſo alſo went out to ſpeake vnto the ſoldiers that guarded the Emperors perſon.

Moreouer,

Moreouer, becauſe the ILLYRIAN legiõ lay out of the camp in a place called Vipſanus, they diſpatched away Marius Celſus with al ſpeed, a very honeſt man to get that place. Galba in the mean time ſtood in doubt whether he ſhould come out of the pallace or not: for Iunius would not let him go, but Celſus and Lacon perſwaded him to go out: inſomuch as they fell at great words with Iunius that went about to diſſwade him from it. In this ſtirre there ranne a rumor that Otho was ſlaine in the field. Immediatly after came Iulius Atticius, one of the nobleſt men of all the Emperours guard, and ſhewed his ſword drawne, crying that he had ſlaine Cæſars enemie: and thruſt through the preaſe, and got to Galba, and ſhewed him his ſword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who cõmanded him to do it. The ſoldier anſwered him: the faith and oath he had made vnto him: Therewith all the people that ſtood by cried out, it was nobly done of him, and clapped their hands for ioy. Then Galba taking his litter, went out of his pallace to do ſacrifice to Iupiter, and alſo to ſhew himſelf openly. Howbeit he was no ſooner come into the market place, but he heard contrary newes, that Otho was Lord and maſter of the whole camp & army. Then as it happeneth in ſo great a preaſe of people, ſome cried out to him to returne back again, others would haue him to go forward: others bad him be afraid of nothing, & others willed him to looke to himſelf. So his litter being thus turmoiled to and fro, as toſt vpon the ſea, ſometime borne back, otherwhile caried forward, firſt of all they ſaw certain horſmen, and then footmen alſo armed, coming from Paules pallace, al of them together crying out with loud voice, Hence, hence, priuate man. Then all the people ſet vpon a running, not flying diſperſedly, but in heapes, vpon porches and ſtals in the market place, as it had bin to haue ſeene ſome ſight or ſport. Then one called Attilius * Sarcello, ouerthrew one of the images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of open warres. Others round about threw darts on euery ſide of him againſt his litter. But when they ſaw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his litter with their ſwords drawne in their hands, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, ſauing one man onely, whom the Sunne ſaw that day, amongſt ſo many thouſands of men, worthy of the Empire of ROME: and he was called * Sempronius. He hauing receiued priuately no manner of pleaſure at Galbaes hand, but onely to diſcharge his oath and dutie, ſtepped before the litter, and lifting vp a vine branch he had in his hand (with the which the ROMAINE Captaines do vſe to beate their ſoldiers that haue offended) he fell out with them that did ſet vpon him, and prayed them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he ſaw they would not leaue, but that they fell to it in good earneſt, he then drew his ſword, and bare off the blowes as well as he could, vntill they hought him, that he fel to the ground. Then Galbaes litter being ouerthrowne right in the place called Curtius lake, Galba lay on the ground armed in his curaces. The traiterous ſouldiers flew vpon him, and gaue him many a wound: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bade them ſtrike hardily, if it were to do their countrey good. So he had many wounds on his armes and his thighs, as it is reported: howbeit the ſoldier that ſlue him was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others do report that it was one Terentius, other alſo ſay Arcadius: and ſome other do call him Fabius Fabulus: who hauing ſtricken off his head, wrapped it in the lap of his gowne, becauſe he could not otherwiſe take hold of it, for that he was all bald. Howbeit his fellowes & conſorts would not ſuffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he had done ſhould be ſeene. Therefore he ſet it vpon the point of his lance, and ſo ſhaking the face of this poore old man, (a wiſe and temperate Prince, and chiefe Biſhop, and Conſull) he ranne vp and downe (like mad women poſſeſſed with the ſpirit and furie of Bacchus at the feaſts of Bacchus) bowing down his launce being all of a goare bloud. When his head was brought to Otho, it is ſaid he cried out aloud: Tuſh, my fellowes, this is nothing, vnleſſe you bring me alſo Piſoes head. So not long after, they brought him his head alſo. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who ſlue him hard by the temple of Veſta. So did they alſo kill Titus Iunius: who openly confeſſed that he was one of the conſpiracy againſt Galba, and cried out to them that ſlue him, that Otho did not know that they did kill him. This notwithſtanding, the ſoldiers ſtrake off his head and Lacons alſo, and brought them both to Otho to receiue the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilochus ſaith:

Of ſeuen peraduenture ſlaine dead on the ground,
A thouſand will ſay, that they all gaue the wound.

So there was diuerſe men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloudied all their hands and ſwords, and ſo ſhewed them bloudied to haue reward alſo: but Vitellius not-withſtanding made inquirie of them afterwards, and cauſed them to be put to death. There came into the field alſo, one Marius Celſus, whom diuers men accuſed to haue perſwaded the ſouldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bade he ſhould be put to death. Howbeit Otho would not ſuffer them to kill him: and yet being afraid to contrary the ſouldiers minds, he told them they ſhould not kill him ſo raſhly, becauſe he was firſt to learne ſome things more of him. So he commanded them to bind him, and deliuered him to be kept of thoſe he truſted moſt. Afterwards the Senate was preſently aſſembled: who, as if men had bene ſodainly changed from them they were, or as if there had bene new gods, they all ſware by the name of Otho, (the which oath he himſelfe had before ſworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him beſides, Auguſtus & Cæſar; the bodies of them that were ſlaine lying yet headleſſe on the ground in the market place, all in their Conſuls robes. And as for their heads, the ſouldiers after they could tell no more what to do with them, they ſold the head of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter, for the ſumme of two thouſand fiue hundred Drachmaes. And for Piſoes head, his wife through intreatie begged it of one Veranius. On the other ſide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patrobius and Vitellius ſeruants: who, after they had vſed it as vilely as they ſhould deuiſe, they threw it at length in a place where their bodies are caſt, whō the Cæſars put to death, the which they call Seſtertium. Now for his bodie Heluidius Priſcus, through Othoes ſufferance, caried it away, and Argius, one of his infranchiſed bondmen, buried it by night. Thus haue you heard the hiſtorie of Galba, a man that in nobilitie and wealth, was inferior to few ROMAINES, and in them both was the chiefeſt man of all his time, & had alway liued in honorable fame and eſtimation, in the reigne of fiue Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him, and not through his owne force and power. For of them that ſtroue to make themſelues Emperours at that time, ſome found no man that thought them worthy of it: others did put forth thēſelues, as thinking themſelues worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vſing his name againſt Vindex boldnes: whereby he procured, that his riſing (which before was called innouation and rebellion) was then called ciuill warre, after that his faction came to haue a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperor. And therefore he did not ſo much deſire to be Emperor for himſelfe, as to do good to his countrey and common-wealth. But yet he erred, in ſeeking to command the ſouldiers, whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had ſpoiled by their flatteries: euen as in old time Scipio, Fabricius, and Camillus did command the ſouldiers of the Empire of ROME at that time. So he being now a very old man, ſhewed himſelfe a good Emperour and after the old ſort, in his behauiour towards the ſouldiers only: but in all other things elſe, being caried away with the couetouſneſſe of Titus Iunius and Laco, and of other his infranchiſed bondmen, he left none deſirous to be gouerned by him, but many that were ſorie for his death.

THE next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the Capitoll, and sacrificed, and there sent for Marius Celsus to come vnto him, whom he courteously saluted, and prayed him rather to forget the cause of his imprisonment, then to remember his deliuerie. Marius Celsus made him a wise and noble answer againe, and said, that the matter for the which they would haue accused him vnto him, did witnesse his behauiour, shewing himselfe faithfull vnto Galba, who neuer did him any pleasure. These words of them both did maruellously please the people: and so did they like the souldiers also wonderfully well. Moreouer, after he had very fauourably & graciously taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Consul, he employed partly about Verginius Rufus, and did also establish them Consuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honoured the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation, with certaine priesthoods. Besides all this, he restored vnto all those Senators that were banished by Nero and called home againe, all their goods yet vnsold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrates and Noblemen of the citie that quaked before for feare, supposing that he was not a man, but rather a diuell or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour, they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling & gracious reigne they were so lately entred into. Moreouer, nothing pleased all the ROMAINES together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men so much, as that he did vnto Tigellinus: for it was punishment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the punishment euery man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his bodie was infected withall. Now, though the Noblemen thought his vnreasonable insolencie and lust of the flesh (following naughtie-packs and common strumpets, burning still in filthie concupiscence) an extreme punishment, comparable to many deaths; and being also no better then a dead man in a manner, still following pleasure and sensualitie as long as he could: this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they should see such a wicked creature as he liue, that had put so manie noble men to death. So Otho sent for him, who liued very pleasantly at his houses in the countrey, by the citie of SINVESSA, and had ships euer readie vpon the sea coast, to flie if necessitie draue him to it. Thereupon he first sought to bribe him with money which was sent with commission to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him escape: but when he saw he could not frame him to his mind, yet he refrained not to giue him gifts, and praied him to giue him leaue to shaue his beard. The other granted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razor, and did cut his owne throate. So Otho hauing pleased the people thus well, he sought not otherwise to be reuenged of his priuate iniuries. Moreouer, to currie fauour with the common people, he refused not to be called Nero, in any open assemblies at the Theaters. Also when certaine priuate men had set vp Neroes images in open sight, Otho was not offended withall: but moreouer, Cladius Rufus writeth, that the letters patents & commissions were sent into SPAINE by posts, subscribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Otho. Howbeit; when it came to his eares that the noblemen of ROME misliked of it, he left it off, and would write it no more in his letters. So Otho hauing begun in this sort to establish his Empire, the soldiers maruellously troubled him. For they continually perswaded him to take heed to himself, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neare vnto him: which they did, either for that indeed they bearing him good will, were afraid some treacherie or treason should be secretly practised against him; or els it was some feined deuice to set all together by the eares, and to bring it to ciuill war. For when Otho himselfe had sent Crispinus with his seuenteenth legion to bring him certaine prisoners, and that Crispinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commission, hauing loden carts with armour and weapon for the souldiers: the desperatest and bouldest men among them, began to crie out, and said, that Crispinus meant no good in his heart, and that the Senate went about to make some change and stirre, and that his armour and weapons were not for Cæsar, but against him. These words moued many mens consciences, and made them to rebell: so that some laid hold vpon the carts to stay them, others slue two Centurions out of hand, and Crispinus himself also that would haue staied them. Thereupon all of them together, one encouraging another, went directly to ROME, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, vnderstanding that there were foure score Senators at supper with the Emperour, they ranne straight to the pallace, crying out, that it was a good occasion offered them to kil all Cæsars enemies at a clap. Hereupon all ROME was straight in armes, looking immediatly after to be sacked and spoiled of all that euer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, Otho himselfe also being in great feare and distresse. For men might easily see he was afraid, because of his guests he had bidden, not for himselfe, seeing them all amazed with the matter, for feare not speaking a word vnto him, but staring on him still, and specially those that came and brought their wiues with them to supper. So Otho sodainly sent the Captaines vnto the souldiers, and commanded them to speake with them, and to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the boord, and conueyed his guests out of his pallace by secret posternes. So they saued themselues, passing through the souldiers, a litle before they entred into the hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cæsars enemies. So the Emperour rising from his bed, he pacified them with gentle words, the teares standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he sent them all away. The next morning he liberally bestowed vpon euery souldier a thousand two hundred and fiftie Drachmaes: and then he went into the market place, and there gaue great commendation vnto the common people for their readie good wils they shewed vnto him: howbeit, he said there were some among them, that vnder colour and pretext of honestie, did commit many leud parts, and made his goodnesse and grace towards them to be euill spoken of, and their constancie and faith also to be misliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offenders might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him aloud he should do it. So Otho thereupon caused two of them onely to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatly offended with the punishment of them, and then went his way. Those that loued and trusted him, maruelled much to see this change. Other were of opinion, that it stood him vpon so to do, to winne the souldiers hearts, because of the warre at hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all parts, that Vitellius had taken vpon him the authoritie to be Emperour, and posts came to him one in anothers necke, to tel him that numbers of people came in daily to submit themselues vnto Vitellius. Others told him also, how the legions remaining in PANNONIA, DALMATIA, and MYSIA, had chosen Otho. Immediatly after, friendly letters were brought him also from Mutianus and Vespasianus, the one of them being in SYRIA, and the other in IVDÆA, with great and mightie armies. Whereupon Otho giuing credite vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he medled with any deeper enterprise then became a priuate souldier: and that that he would giue him gold and ſiluer enough, and a great citie, where he might liue quietly, and take his pleaſure. Vitellius gently anſwered him at the firſt, and ſported with him: but afterwards the falling out one with another, ſpitefull letters were ſent betwixt either parties, one of them reproching another not faſly, but fondly, & fooliſhly detecting each others vices. For indeed it was hard to iudge, which of them two was moſt licentiouſly giuen, moſt effeminate, leaſt skilfull, poorer, or moſt indebted before. Now at that time they talked of wonderful ſignes that had bene ſeene: howbeit they were but flying tales, and there was no man to iuſtifie them. But in the Capitol there was the image of Victory ſet vp in a triumphing chariot, the which euery body ſaw did let ſlacke the reines of the bridles of the horſes which ſhe had in her hands, as though ſhe could not ſtay them any more. The ſtatue of Caius Cæſar alſo within ỹ Iland, which ſtandeth in the middeſt of the riuer of Tyber at Rome, without any earthquake or ſtorme of wind, turned of it ſelf frō the Weſt to the Eaſt: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Veſpaſian began to take vpon him to be Emperour. Many alſo tooke the ouerflowing of the riuer of Tyber for an ill ſigne. For indeed it was at that time of the yeare when riuers do ſwell moſt, yet was it neuer ſo great before, neither had it euer done ſo much hurt as it did at that time. For it had ouerflowne her bankes, and drowned the moſt part of the city, and ſpecially the corne-market: inſomuch that they ſuffered famine many daies after in Rome. In all this ſtirre newes came that Cecinna and Valens (two of Vitellius captains) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes: and moreouer in Rome, Dolabella a noble man, was ſuſpected by the Prætorian ſouldiers, that he practiſed ſome treaſon. Now Otho, either becauſe he was afraid of him, or of ſome other, he ſent him to the city Aqvinvm, promiſing him he ſhould haue no other hurt. Then chooſing the choiſeſt Gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellius and did not depriue him of any iote of his honor and dignitie. Moreouer, he was very carefull to ſee his wife and mother ſafe, that they ſhould not be afraid of themſelues. Beſides all this, he appointed Flauius Sabinus, Veſpaſians brother, gouernor of Rome in his abſence: and did it for Neros ſake, who had before giuen him the ſame honor and authority, the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Veſpaſian ſee, that he loued & truſted him. So he taried behind at Bresselle, a city ſtanding vpon the riuer of Po: and ſent his army before vnder the conduct of Marius Celſus, of Swetonius Paulinus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great perſonages: howbeit they could not haue their wils to rule the armie as they would, becauſe of the inſolency and ſtubburnneſſe of the ſouldiers, who would haue no other Captaines but the Emperour onely, ſaying, that he and none other ſhould command them. Indeed, the enemies ſouldiers alſo were not much wiſer, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and luſtie vpon the ſelfe ſame occaſion: howbeit they had this aduantage ouer the other, that they could tel how to fight, and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardneſſe, and neuer ſhrunke from it: whereas the Prætorian ſouldiers that came from Rome, were fine meale-mouthed men, becauſe they had bene long from the warres, and had liued at eaſe in Rome, and taken their pleaſure in banqueting and playes: and therfore in a brauerie and iolitie, they would needs haue men thinke, that they diſdained to do what their Captaines commanded them, as men that were too good to do it, & not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that, when Spurina would haue compelled them, he was in danger of death, & eſcaped very narrowly that they ſlue him not. For they ſtucke not to reuile him, and giue him as foule words as they could, calling him traitor, & curſing him, ſaying that he marred all Cæſars affaires. Yea, and there were ſome of them, that hauing their full cups, went in the night to his tent, to aske him leaue to depart, ſaying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flout they had giuen them by their enemies about that time, hard by the citie of Placentia, did ſtand Spurina and his affaires to great purpoſe. For Vitellius ſouldiers coming hard to the wals of the citie, did mocke Othoes men that were at the cranewes of the ſame, and called them fine dancers and goodly ſtage-players, that had ſeene nothing but playes and feaſts: and that for feates of armes, and battels, they knew not what it meant: and that the greateſt act they euer did, was that they ſtrake off the head of a poore naked old man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the field before men, their heartes were in their heeles. Theſe vile words galled them to the heart, and made them ſo mad withall, that they came of themſelues to pray Spurina to command them what he thought good, promiſing that from thenceforth they would neuer refuſe any paines or danger he would put them to. Thereupon there was a hote assault giuen to the citie of PLACENTIA, with great store of sundrie engines. Howbeit Spurinaes men had the better, and hauing with great slaughter repulsed the assailants, they saued one of the goodliest, the greatest, and most flourishing cities of all ITALIE. So Othoes Captaines were farre more familiar, curteous, and ciuil to deale with cities and priuate men, then Vitellius souldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna was neither for person nor manners accompaniable for the people, but strange, monstrous, and troublesome, to see him only a mightie made man, wearing gally gascoignes, and coates with sleeues, after the fashiō of the GAVLES, & spake in this attire vnto the ensigne-bearers and Captaines of the ROMAINES. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted on horseback, gallantly apparelled, & accompanied with a troupe of the choisest men of armes of al the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was so couetous, that no spoile of enemies, no polling of subiects, nor bribes taken of their frieds and confederates, could quench or satisfie his vnsatiable couetousnesse: whereby it seemeth that was the let, that coming on so slowly, he was not at the first battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecinna for it, that made too much hast, for the desire he had to haue the only honour of the victory to himselfe: and this was the cause, that besides his other light faults, he also made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and season, and when it came to the point indeed, yet he fought it not out valiantly, so that he had almost cast all away: For when he had the repulse frō PLACENTIA, he went vnto CREMONA another great citie. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was besieged in the citie of PLACENTIA, when he heard by the way that the PLACENTINES had the better, and that the CREMONENSES were in great danger and distresse, he marched thither with his armie, and went and camped hard by the enemies. After that also, the other Captaines of either side came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna hauing laied a great number of his best souldiers well armed in ambush, in certaine thicke groues and woods, he commanded his horsemen to march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they should retire litle and litle, making as though they fled, vntill they had drawne them within his ambush. So there were certaine traitors that bewrayed the ambush vnto Marius Celsus, who came against them with his choice men of armes, and did not follow them ouer rashly, but compassed in the place where the ambush lay, the which he raised, & in the meane time sent to his campe with all possible speed to his footmen to make hast thitherward: and it seemeth, that if they had come in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched vpon the bellies of all Cecinnaes armie, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should haue done. But Paulinus being come too late to aide them, for that he came so slowly, he was burdened that he did not the dutie of a Captaine that bare the name and countenance he caried. Furthermore, the common soldiers accused him of treason vnto Otho, and stirred vp their Emperour against him, & spake very big words of themselues, saying, that they had ouercome for their owne parts, had not the cowardlinesse of their owne Captaines bene, who put them by the victorie. So Otho did not trust him so much, that he would not make him beleeue but that he mistrusted somewhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the camp, and Proclus with him, Captain of the Prætorian guard, who indeed commanded all; but in sight, Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenant. Marius Celsus and Paulinus followed after, bearing the name of Counsellers and friends onely: howbeit otherwise they medled with nothing, neither had any authoritie giuen them. On the other side, the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially whom Valens led. For when newes was brought of the cōflict that was betweene them in this ambush, they were angrie with him, becausse they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were slaine: insomuch that he had much ado to pacifie and quiet thē, they were so readie to haue flowne vpon him. So Valens at length remoued his campe, and went and ioyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his camp at the towne of BRIXIACVM, which is a litle towne hard by CREMONA, he consulted with his Captaines whether he should giue battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus gaue him counsell to fight, considering that the souldiers were very willing to it, by reason of the late victorie they had wonne, and wished him not to deferre it: for thereby he should but discourage his armie, which was now willing to fight, and also giue their enemies leysure to stay for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came himselfe out of GAVLE. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alledged, that the enemies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for another armie out of

of MYSIA and PANNONIA, as great an army as his enemies had already, ſo that he could tary his time, and not ſerue his enemies turne: and alſo, that if the ſouldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they ſhould then be much more encouraged, when they ſhould haue greater company, and ſhould alſo fight with better ſafety. Furthermore he perſwaded thē, that to delay time was for their auaile, conſidering that they had plenty & ſtore of all maner of prouiſion: where the enemies on the other ſide, being alſo in their enemies countrey, their victuals would quickly faile them. Marius Celſus liked very well of theſe perſwaſions; and ſo did Annius Gallus, who was not preſent at this councell (but gone from the camp, to be cured of a fal he had from his horſe) but he was written to by Otho to haue his opinion alſo. So Annius Gallus returned anſwer, that he thought it not beſt to make haſte, but to ſtay for the army that came out of MYSIA, conſidering they were onwards on their way. Howbeit Otho would not hearken to this counſell, but followed their minds that concluded of battell: for the which were alledged diuerſe occaſions. But the chiefeſt and likelieſt cauſe of all was, that the ſouldiers which are called the Prætorian guard (being the daily guard about the Emperours perſon) finding then in effect what it was to profeſſe to be a ſouldier, and to liue like a ſouldier, they lamented their continuing in ROME, where they liued at eaſe and pleaſure, feaſting and banqueting, neuer feeling the diſcommodities and bitter paines of war: and did therfore ſo earneſtly cry out to fight, that there was no ſtaying of them, as if they ſhould at their firſt cry & ſetting forward, haue ouerthrowne their enemies. Moreouer, it ſeemed alſo that Otho himſelf could no more away with the feare & doubt of the vncertaine ſucceſſe to come, neither could any longer abide the grieuous thoughts of the danger of his eſtate, he was ſo effeminate, and vnacquainted with ſorow and paines. This was the cauſe that caried him on headlong, as a man that ſhutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and ſo to put al at aduenture. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, & Othoes Secretary. Others alſo do report, that both armies had diuerſe determinations and minds: as to ioyne all together in one campe, and ioyntly to chuſe among them, if they could agree, the worthieſt man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to aſſemble the whole Senate in a place together, and there to ſuffer the Senators to chuſe ſuch a one Emperour, as they liked beſt of. And ſure it is very likely it was ſo, conſidering that neither of thē both which were then called Emperors, was thought meet for the place they had: and therefore that theſe counſels & conſiderations might eaſily fall into the ROMAINE ſouldiers heads (who were wiſe men and expert ſouldiers,) that indeed it was a thing for them iuſtly to miſlike, to bring themſelues into the like miſerable time and calamitie, which their predeceſſors before them had cauſed one another to ſuffer: firſt for Sylla and Marius ſakes, and afterwards for Cæſar and Pompey; and now to beſtow the Empire of ROME either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkennes & gluttonie: or elſe vpon Otho, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cauſe that moued Celſus to delay time, hoping to end the wars without trouble & danger: and that cauſed Otho to make the more haſt, being afraid of the ſame. Howbeit Otho returning backe again into BRESSELLES, he committed another fault, not only becauſe he tooke his mens goodwils from them to fight, the which his preſence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but becauſe alſo he caried away with him for the guard of his perſon, the valianteſt ſouldiers and moſt reſolute mē of al his hoſt. About that time there chanced a skirmiſh to fal out by the riuer of Po, becauſe Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. Howbeit when they ſaw they preuailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and dry wood, all rubbed ouer with brimſtone and pitch, and ſetting them on fire, they ſent them downe the ſtreame. When the barges were in the middeſt of the ſtreame, there ſuddenly aroſe a winde out of the riuer, which blew vpon this wood-ſtacke they had prepared to caſt among the enemies workes of this bridge, that firſt made it ſmoke, and immediatly after fell all on a flame; which did ſo trouble the men in the barges, that they were driuen to leape into the riuer to ſaue themſelues: and ſo they loſt their barges, and became themſelues alſo priſoners to their enemies, to their great ſhame and mockerie. Furthermore, the GERMAINS vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othoes fencers, which of them ſhould win a litle Iland in the middeſt of the riuer, they had the vpper hand, and ſlue many of the fencers. Thereupon Othoes ſouldiers which were in BEBRIACVM, being in a rage withall, and would needs fight, Proclus brought them into the field, and went and camped about fiftie furlongs out of the city; ſo fondly, and to ſo litle purpoſe, that being the ſpring of the yeare, and all the countrey thereabout full of brookes and riuers, yet they notwithſtanding lacked water. The next morning they raiſed their campe to meete with their enemies the ſame day, and were driuen to march aboue an hundred furlongs. Now Paulinus perſwaded them to go faire and ſoftly, and not to make more haſt then needed; and would not ſo ſoone as they ſhould come (being wearied with their iourney and trauell) ſet vpon their enemies that were wel armed, & beſides had leiſure & time inough to ſet their men in battell ray, whileſt they were coming ſo long a iourney with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of diuerſe opinions about this matter, there came a horſeman from Otho, one of thoſe they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commanded them to make all the haſt they could, and to loſe no time, but to march with all ſpeed towards the enemie. So when the letters were read, the Captaines preſently marched forward with their army. Cecinna vnderſtanding of their coming, was aſtonied at the firſt, and ſuddenly forſooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he found the moſt part of his ſouldiers ready armed, and Valens had giuen them their ſignall and word of battell. And in the meane time, whileſt the legions were taking their places to ſet themſelues in battell ray, they ſent out before, the choiſeſt horſemen they had, to skirmiſh. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cauſe) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on Othoes ſide in battell, inſomuch that when theſe men of armes came neare to meet with the voward of Othoes army, Othoes men did ſpeake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other ſide tooke this ſalutation in euill part, and anſwered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight: Inſomuch that thoſe which had ſpoken to them, were quite diſcouraged: and the reſidue alſo began to ſuſpect their companions which had ſpoken to them, and miſtruſted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefeſt cauſe of all their diſorder, being ready to ioyne battel. Furthermore, on the enemies ſide alſo, all was out of order: for the beaſts of cariage ran in amongſt them that fought, and ſo did put them maruellouſly out of order. Beſides that alſo, the diſaduantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to diſperſe one from another, becauſe of ſundry ditches & trenches that were betweene them, whereby they were compelled to fight in diuerſe companies together. So there were but two legions only, the one of Vitellius, called the Deuourer: & the other of Otho, called the Helper: which getting out of theſe holes & ditches apart by themſelues, in a good plaine euen ground, fought it out ſo a long time together in good order of battell. Othoes ſoldiers were men of goodly perſonages, ſtrong & valiant of their hands, howbeit they had neuer ſerued in the warres, nor had euer foughten battel but that. And Vitellius men on the other ſide, were old beaten ſoldiers, & had ſerued all their youth, & knew what wars & battels meant. So when they came to ioyne, Othoes men gaue ſuch a luſty charge vpon the firſt onſet, that they ouerthrew, & ſlue all the firſt ranke, and alſo wan the enſigne of the Eagle. Vitellius men were ſo aſhamed of it, and therewith in ſuch a rage, that they tooke heart againe vnto them, and ran in ſo deſperately vpon their enemies, that at the firſt they ſlue the Colonell of all their legion, & wan diuerſe enſignes. And furthermore, againſt Othoes fencers (which were accounted the valianteſt men, and readieſt of hand) Varus Alphenus brought his men of armes called the Battavii, which are Germaines in the lower part of Germanie, dwelling in an Iland compaſſed about with the riuer of Rhene. There were few of his fencers that ſtucke by it, but the moſt of them ran away towards the riuer, where they found certaine enſignes of their enemies ſet in battell ray, who put them all to the ſword, and not a man of them ſcaped with life. But aboue all other, none proued more beaſts & cowards, then the Prætorian guard. For they would not tary till the enemies came to giue them charge, but cowardly turned their backes, and fled through their owne men that were not ouerthrowne: and ſo did both diſorder them, and alſo make them afraid. This notwithſtanding, there were a great number of Othoes men who hauing ouerthrown the voward of thoſe that made head againſt them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were conquerours, and ſo valiantly returned backe into their campe. But of their Captaines, neither Proclus nor Paulinus durſt returne backe with them, but fled another way, being afraid of the fury of the ſoldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbeit Annius Gallus receiued them into the city of Beriacvm, that came together after this ouerthrow; and told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celſus gathering the noble men & gentlemen together that had charge in the army, he fel to cõſultation what they ſhould do in ſo great a calamity, and extreme ſlaughter of the Romaine citizens. For if Otho himſelfe were an honeſt man, he ſhould ſhould no more attempt Fortune: conſidering that Cato and Scipio were both greatly blamed for that they were the cauſe of caſting away of many men in AFRICKE to no purpoſe (though they fought for the liberty of the ROMAINES) and only of ſelf-will, for that they would not yeeld to Iulius Ceſar after he had won the battel of PHARSALIA. For though Fortune in all other things haue power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, ſhe cannot preuent them to determine the beſt for their ſafety. Theſe perſwaſions ſtraight caried away ý Captains, who went preſently to feele the minds of the priuate ſoldiers, whom they found all of them deſirous of peace. So Titianus perſwaded them to ſend Ambaſſadours vnto the enemies to treate of peace: and Celſus and Gallus tooke vpon them the charge to go thither, to breake the matter vnto Cecinna and Valens. But by the way they met with certaine Centurions, who told them how all the army of the enemies were coming onwards on their way, to come directly to the city of BEBRIACVM, and that their Chieftaines had ſent before to offer treatie of peace. Celſus & his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions that they would returne with them vnto Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celſus was in great danger of his life: becauſe the men of armes which he had ouerthrowne certaine dayes before in an ambuſh, coming before, when they ſpied him, they flew vpon him with great ſhouts. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his company, ſtepped before him, and cloſed him in: and ſo did the other Captaines that cried vnto them they ſhould do him no hurt. Cecinna vnderſtanding what the matter was, rode thither, and pacified the tumult of theſe men of armes: and then ſaluting Celſus very courteouſly, he went with him towards BEBRIACVM. But now Titianus in the meane time, repenting himſelf that he had ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the enemies, he placed the deſperateſt ſouldiers he had vpon the wals of the citie, and incouraged the reſt alſo to do the like, and to ſtand to the defence. But Cecinna came to the wall, and being on horſe-backe, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more reſiſtance, but thoſe that were vpon the wals, ſaluted the ſouldiers: and they that were within the city opened the gates, and thruſt in amongſt Vitellius men, who receiued them, and did no man any hurt, but courteouſly imbraced them, and ſaluted each other. Then they all ſware and tooke their oaths to be true to Vitellius, and ſo yeelded themſelues vnto him. So do the moſt part of thoſe that were at this battell, report the ſucceſſe thereof: granting notwithſtanding, that they knew not euery thing that was done, becauſe of the great diſorder among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was ſtriken, with Metius Florus that had bene Conſull, he ſhewed me an old man that when the field was fought in that place, was yong & againſt his will was at the ſame battel on Othoes part. Who told vs, that after the battel was fought, he came into the field to ſuruey the number of thoſe that were dead: and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of thoſe that came to view them. And ſaid moreouer, that he made inquirie of the matter, but he neither could imagine it himſelfe, nor be ſatisfied by others. Now indeed it is likely, that in ciuill wars betweene countrimen of one ſelfe city, where one of the two armies is ouerthrown, that there ſhold be greater ſlaughter among them, then againſt the other enemies, becauſe they take no priſoners of either ſide: for thoſe they ſhould take, would ſerue them to no good purpoſe. But after they were ſlaine, one to be layed on heapes ſo by another, that is a hard thing to iudge. But now to the matter. The news of this ouerthrow came firſt but obſcurely vpon Otho, a common thing in a matter of ſo great importance: but afterwards, when ſome that were hurt came and brought him certaine newes of it, it was no maruell then to ſee Othoes friends & familiars to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good cheare, and not to be diſcouraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the priuate ſouldiers ſhewed vnto him at that time, did paſſe and exceed all ſpeech and expectation. For they forſooke him not, neither went they to ſubmit themſelues to their enemies the conquerors, neither tooke they any regard of themſelues, to ſee their Emperor in that deſpaire: but all of them ioyntly together went vnto his lodging, and called him their Emperor. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men repreſented in a triumph lying on the ground, & kiſſed his hands, with the teares running down their cheekes, and beſought him not to forſake and leaue them to their enemies, but to command their perſons whileſt they had one drop of bloud left in their bodies to do him ſeruice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongſt others, there was a poore ſoldier drawing out his ſword, ſaid vnto him: Know, ô Cæſar, that all my companions are determined to die in this ſort for thee, & ſo ſlue himſelf. But all theſe lamentable things did neuer melt Othoes heart; who looking with a stout countenance round about him, and casting his eyes euery where, spake vnto them in this maner. I think this a more happy day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you first chose me Emperor: to see you loue me so well, and do me such honor, with so great shew of loyalty. But yet I beseech you not to deny me of a greater fauour, which is: To die valiantly and honorably, for the safety of so many honest men as you be, and so good citizens of ROME. It by your election you made me worthy to take vpon me the Imperiall crowne, I must now needs shew my selfe an Emperour, not sparing to spend my life for your and my countries safety. I am certaine that the victorie is not altogether mine enemies. For newes are come vnto me, that our armies of MYSIA and PANNONIA are in their way coming to vs, and that they are not farre off from the Adriaticke sea. ASIA, SYRIA, and ÆGYPT, & the legions that made warre with ITALY, are all ours. The Senate taketh our part, and our enemies wiues and children be in our hands. But this warre is not against Hannibal, nor Pyrrus, nor against the CIMBRES, to fight who should be owners of ITALIE: but it is against the ROMAINES themselues. For in this ciuill war, both the conqueror and vanquished do offend their countrey: for where the conquerours haue benefit, the countrey and commonwealth alwaies receiueth losse. Assure your selues I had rather die then reigne Emperor: considering also that my life with victorie cannot so much benefite the ROMAINES, as the sacrifice of the same may do my countrey good, for the peace and quietnesse of my countrimen, keeping ITALIE thereby from seeing such another battell as this hath bene. So when he had made this oration vnto them, and put those by, that would haue perswaded him the contrary: he commanded all the Senatours and his friends that were present, to auoid. Then he wrote letters to them that were absent, and also vnto the cities wherethrough they passed, to vse them very courteously, and to see them safely conueyed. Then came his nephew Cocceius to him, who was yet but a young boy; and he did comfort him, and bad him not be afraid of Vitellius, for he had safely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as carefull of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his sonne though he was desirous to do it, vntill such time as he saw the end of this warre: to the end that if he ouercame, he should quietly reigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouercome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cause of his death. But this one thing onely I command and charge thee, my sonne, euen as the last commandement that I can giue thee: that thou do not forget altogether, neither ouer-much remember, that thine Vncle hath bin Emperor. When he had told him this tale, he heard a noise at his doore: they were the souldiers that threatned the Senators which came from him and would kill them, if they did not remaine with him, but would forsake their Emperor. Vpon this occasion he came out once againe among them, being afraid least the souldiers would do the Senators some hurt, and made the soldiers giue backe, not by intreating of them, nor speaking courteously to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage: insomuch that they all shrunke backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was athirst, and dranke a little water: and hauing two swords, he was prouing a great while which had the best edge. In the end, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his seruants, & liberally to giue out his mony among them, to some more, to some lesse, not prodigally throwing it away without discretion, as being another mans mony: but discreetly gaue to euery man according to his desert. Then, after he had dispatched them away, he laid him downe to sleepe all the rest of the night, and the groomes of his chamber heard him snort, he slept so soundly. In the morning he called one of his enfranchised bondmen, whom he had commanded to helpe to saue the Senators, and sent him to see if they were all safe, and gone. So when he vnderstood that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: Come on, said he then vnto him, looke to thy selfe I reade thee, and take heed the souldiers see thee not, if thou wilt scape with life, for sure they will kill thee, thinking thou hast holpen me to kill my self. So, assoone as his enfranchised bondman was gone out of his chamber, he took his sword with both his hands, and setting the point of it to his breast, he fell down vpon it, seeming to feele no other paine, sauing that he fetched a sigh: whereby they that were without knew that he had done himselfe hurt. Thereupon his friends made straight an out-cry, & all the campe and city was incontinently full of teares and lamentation. The souldiers suddenly ranne with a great noise to his gates, where they bitterly bewailed, and lamented his death, falling out with themselues that they were such villaines so slenderly to haue guarded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing himselfe for their sakes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, though

though the enemies were hard at hand: but hauing honorably buried him, and prepared a great ſtacke of wood, they cõueyed him armed to the fire of his funerals, euery man thinking himſelf happie, that could firſt ſet his ſhoulders to the coffin to helpe to cary him. Others coming to it, kneeled downe on their knees, and kiſſed his wound. Others tooke and kiſſed his hands. Others that could not come neare him honored him, and did reuerence him a farre off; and ſome there were alſo that after the ſtacke of wood was ſet on fire, ſlue themſelues hard by the fire: who had neuer receiued benefit by him that was dead (at the leaſt to any mans knowledge,) neither had they any occaſion to be affraid of him that was conquerour. And truly me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was ſo ambitiouſly giuen to reigne, as they vehemently deſired to be commanded by Otho, and to obey him: conſidering that their deſire left them not euen after his death, but was ſo liuely rooted in their minds, that in the end, it turned to a deadly hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will ſpeake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried Othoes aſhes, they did ſet vp a tombe for him, neither for magnificence of building, nor for glorious Epitaph, ſubiect to enuy. For I haue ſeene his tombe in the city of Brvsselles a meane thing, and the Epitaph vpon it tranſlated out of Latine, ſaith no more but this: This is the tombe of Marcus Otho. He died being but ſeuen and thirtie yeares old, and was Emperour but three moneths; and there were as famous men that commended his death, as they that reproued his life. For though he liued not much more honeſter then Nero, yet he died farre more honorably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would haue compelled his ſouldiers preſently to haue taken their oathes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and vnderſtanding that there were yet remaining ſome Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his doores armed, and called him by his name, and commanded him to take charge of them, and to go as ambaſſador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were alreadie ouercome, conſidering he refuſed it when they had ouercome: and alſo he was afraid to go ambaſſador to the Germaines, becauſe he had compelled them to do things againſt their wils. Therefore he went out at his backe-doore, and ſaued himſelfe. So when the ſouldiers heard of it, they were at length contented to be brought to be ſworne vnto Vitellius: and ſo ioyned themſelues with Cecinnaes ſouldiers, ſo they might be pardoned for all that was paſt.

Hannibal.

The parentage of Hannibal.

IF we do call to mind the firſt PVNICK war the CARTHAGINIANS had with the ROMAINES, we ſhall find many Captaines who by the glorie of their noble deeds, haue left great fame and renowne vnto their poſteritie. Howbeit amongſt all the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and ſo commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilcar, Hannibals father, otherwiſe firnamed Barcha, a valiant man doubtleſſe, and in his time a skilfull ſouldier as any was. The ſame Hamilcar, firſt of all made warre with the ROMAINES, a longer time in SICILE then was looked for, who had done great hurt to his countrey and commonwealth. After that alſo in the warres of AFRICKE (at what time the mercenarie ſoldiers through their rebellion did put the country of CARTHAGE in great danger) he did ſo valiantly appeaſe the inſurrection, that to euery mans iudgement, he was reputed the onely preſeruer of his countrey. Then he was ſent Gouernour and Captaine into SPAINE, and caried with him at that time (as it is reported) his ſonne Hannibal, being but a young boy, where he did noble ſeruice. In fine, in the ninth yeare of his aboade there in that prouince, he died fighting valiantly againſt the VETHEONS. After his death, Haſdrubal his ſonne in law (whom the CARTHAGINIANS through the aide and friendſhip of the BARCINIAN faction had made Generall of all their armie) remained Gouernour there the ſpace of eight yeares. This Haſdrubal ſent for Hannibal into SPAINE, after

after his father Hamilcars death, against ẏ minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction; to the end that as he had bene trained from his youth in the diſcipline of wars, in his father Hamilcars life: euen ſo in like manner, that now being come to mans ſtate, he ſhould the better harden his bodie, to away with the paines and dangers of the warres. Now although at the firſt, the remembrance of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and good will of the ſouldiers: yet he himſelfe afterwards, through his diligence and induſtrie ſo handled the matter, that the old ſouldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they only deſired to chooſe him (and none other) for their gouernor. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wiſhed for in a noble Captaine or Generall. He had a preſent and readie wit to giue counſell what was to be done, in greateſt attempts: and beſides, he lacked neither manhood nor induſtrie to put it in execution. He had a valiant and inuincible mind, euen in greateſt dangers and aduerſities of body: the which are wont to ſtay others from performing their endeuors and dutie. He would watch and ward as any priuate ſoldier, and was quicke and ready to do any kind of ſeruice, either like a valiant ſouldier, or a good Captaine. In this ſort Hannibal continued in ſeruice in the warres, the ſpace of three yeares, vnder the conduct of Haſdrubal. In that time he ſo wan the hearts of all the army, that immediatly after Haſdrubals death, he was choſen to be Lieutenant generall, with the common conſent of all the ſouldiers: and this honour was laid vpon him without contradiction of any of the Carthaginians, through the friendſhip and good will of the Barcinian factiō. Hannibal was now ſixe and twentie yeares old, when the ſouldiers made him their Lieutenant generall. For at what time his father Hamilcar brought him into Spaine, he was then but nine yeares old: and from that time vnto Haſdrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it was ſeuenteene yeares moe. So he was no ſooner made Lieutenant generall of all the camp, and his countrey, but he bent himſelf to make war with ẏ Romains: hauing long before determined it. For firſt of all, he chiefly maintained almoſt a common hate of all the Carthaginians againſt the Romaines, becauſe of the loſſe of Sicile & Sardinia. Beſides alſo, he bare thē ſecret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilcar: who of all the Captaines the Carthaginians euer had, was the mortalleſt enemy vnto the Romaines. And it is written alſo, that at what time Hamilcar made his preparation to go into Spaine, he compelled Hannibal (being but a boy) to ſweare in a ſacrifice he made, that he would be a mortall enemy to the Romaines, aſſoone as euer he came to the ſtate of a man. So, the remembrance of theſe things were ſtill freſh in the yong mans mind, as the Idea (or Image) of his fathers hate, and ſtill prouoked him to ſpie out all the meanes he could, how to deſtroy the Empire of Rome. Beſides alſo, the Barcinian faction neuer left to pricke him forward vnto it, becauſe by wars he might raiſe himſelfe to greatnes, and ſo increaſe his eſtate. Theſe cauſes, as well common as particular, inticed Hannibal to attempt war againſt the Romaines, and gaue the ſtout yong man occaſion by theſe means to practiſe innouatiō. There was a people at that time called ẏ Sagvntines, who confined indifferently betwixt the Romaines & Carthaginians: and were left free by the former peace concluded. Theſe Sagvntines euer after tooke part with the Romaines and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the Romaines alwaies found thē very true and faithfull to the Empire of Rome. Hannibal therefore thought with himſelfe, he could not deuiſe to make a better match to anger the Romaines withal, & to kindle the fire of his malice alſo againſt them, then to make war with the Sagvntines their confederates. Howbeit, before he would be openly ſeene to ſet vpon thē, he firſt determined to leade his army againſt the Olcades, and other people on the other ſide of the riuer Iberus: and after he had ouercome them, then to find occaſion to moleſt the Sagvntines, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begunne by them, then purpoſely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the Olcades, he did ſet vpō the Vaccians, ſpoiled their country, beſieged many cities, & took Hermandice, and Arbocole, great and rich cities. Now he had in manner ouercome all the whole countrey, when diuerſe fugitiues from the citie of Hermandice, encouraging one another, conſpired againſt him, leauied men, and inticed the Olcades that were fled, to take their part. Then they perſwaded the Carthaginians their neighbours, that they would all agree ſodainely to ſet vpon Hannibal at his returne. They being a people that deſired nothing more then to fight, and conſidering alſo that they had receiued iniuries by Hannibal, did eaſily hearken vnto that counſell; and thereupon leauying a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thouſand, they went to aſſaile Hannibal at his returne from the Vaccaians, by the riuer of Tagus.

When the CARTHAGINIANS discouered their army, they staied vpon it, and were maruellously affraid. And doubtlesse they had had a great ouerthrow, if they had fought with those so fierce people, being affraid of their sodaine coming, and also loden as they were with so great spoiles: the which Hannibal deepely considering, like a wise Captaine as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his campe in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he passed his armie ouer the riuer with as litle noise as he could, leauing the passage where the enemies might easilieſt come ouer, vnguarded: because vnder pretence of dissembled feare, he might intice the barbarous people to passe ouer the riuer, to take the oportunity and occasion offered them. Now indeed as he was the subtilleſt Captaine, and had the fineſt straragemes of any other Captaine of his time: so his policie was not in vaine, and his purpose to good effect, in abusing of the enemy: for the wild barbarous people reposing too great trust in the multitude of their men, supposing the CARTHAGINIANS had bene affraid, with great furie entred the riuer to passe ouer it. So they being greatly troubled, & out of order by this meanes, and specially before they could passe all ouer the riuer, they were set vpon by the CARTHAGINIANS, first by certain horsmen, and afterwards with the whole army; so that there was a great number of them slaine, and the residue were put to flight. After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the riuer of Iberus, yeelded themselues vnto him, sauing the SAGVNTINES: who, though they saw Hannibal at hand coming towards them, trusting to the friendship of the ROMAINES, they prepared to defend themselues against him: and therewithall sent ambassadors presently to ROME, to shew the Senate in what great danger they were, & also to pray aide against their so great enemy, that made wars so hotely with them. The Ambassadours that were sent to ROME, were scant gone out of SPAINE, when Hannibal made open war on them with all his army, & pitched his camp before the city of SAGVNTVS. When this matter was reported at ROME, and consulted of for the wrongs that had bin done to their confederates, the Senators dealt but slackly in it, & by decree only sent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Pamphilus vnto Hannibal, to will him to raise his siege from SAGVNTVS: and if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they should thence repaire to CARTHAGE, & to pray them to deliuer their generall Hannibal vnto them, because he had broken ỹ peace. Polybius writeth, that Hannibal did heare these ambassadors, howbeit, that he made thẽ a slender answer. Liuius writeth in contrary maner, that they were neuer heard, nor came at any time to his camp. Howbeit, they both agree thus far, that they came into SPAINE, & afterwards went into AFRICKE, & from thence came to CARTHAGE; where after they had deliuered their message vnto the Coũcel, the BARCINIAN faction was so much against them, that they dishonourably returned to ROME, and obtained not their desire. Now in the Senate of CARTHAGE there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the first took his beginning from the gouernment of Hamilcar, surnamed Barca, & so descended as it were by succeſſiõ to his son Hannibal, and grew afterwards vnto such greatneſſe, that that faction (as well abroad as at home) ruled all matters iudicial. The second faction came of Hanno, a graue man and of great authority in the same commonwealth: howbeit, a man more giuen to imbrace peace & quietnes, then otherwise disposed to war and trouble. It is he only (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambassadors of the ROMAINS came to CARTHAGE, to cõplaine of the iniuries done to their confederates, that did then in maner against the will of all the whole Senate, counsell them to keep peace with the ROMAINS, & to beware of wars, the which one day might peraduenture vtterly destroy their country. Doubtlesse, if the CARTHAGINIANS would haue followed the graue counsell of Hanno, rather then to haue giuen place to their desires, and had followed the author of peace, and not to haue bene ruled by them that gaue counsell to make warres, they had not tasted of those miseries which their countrey afterwards came vnto: but giuing place to the fury and ambitious mind of a yong man, they heaped such mischiefes on their heads, as afterwards fell out vpon them. Therfore it is very meete for wise magistrates & gouernors of cõmonweales, alwaies rather to haue an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end; & euer to decide all matters by aduice & counsel, before they should take any wars in hand. Now the SAGVNTINES seeing themselues besieged by Hannibal, & that against al reason & equitie he made wars vpon them, they notwithstanding valiantly defended the siege many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Hannibal had many mo men then they (hauing a hundred and fiftie thousand men in his camp) & that the most part of their rampars were battered & ouerthrown: they liked rather to abide the sacke of their citie, then to yeeld themselues to the mercie of their mortall mortall enemy. So ſome do report, that SAGVNTVS was taken the eight moneth after ſiege was laid vnto it. But Liuie ſeemeth not to agree to that, neither to ſet downe any certaine time of the continuance of the ſiege. Now the taking of this ſo wealthy a city, was a great furtherance diuerſe waies to Hannibals enterpriſes. For many cities taking example of the ſacke of SAGVNTVS, who before miſliking to be ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, were ready to rebell, kept themſelues quiet, and the ſouldiers alſo waxed liuely and couragious: ſeeing the rich ſpoiles that were diuided in the campe. So Hannibal ſent great preſents of the ſpoiles of the SAGVNTINES, vnto CARTHAGE, whereby he wan the chiefeſt men of the city, and made them like the better of warres: whom he determined to leade with him againſt the ROMAINES, not in SPAINE, as many ſuppoſed, but into ITALY it ſelfe. Whileſt theſe matters were in hand, the Ambaſſadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the ſlender anſwer they had receiued, in maner at the ſelfe ſame time when they had intelligence of the ſacke of SAGVNTVS. Hereupon the ROMAINS greatly repented themſelues (though ſomewhat too late) for that they aided not their friends & confederates in ſo great a danger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very ſory for it, and therewith alſo maruellouſly offended, they deuided the prouinces vnto the Conſuls, to wit, SPAINE vnto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICKE and SICILE alſo vnto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certaine of the nobleſt men of the city were ſent Ambaſſadors vnto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senate for breach of the peace, and alſo to denounce vnto them the cauſe of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to proclaime open warre againſt them, after they had declared the occaſion thereof to come of themſelues. This was as brauely receiued of the CARTHAGINIANS, as luſtily offered vnto them: but therein they were not ſo well aduiſed, as the ſucceſſe of that war in the end ſufficiently proued it to them. Now Hannibal being aduertiſed how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with himſelfe that it was time to go into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the poſſible ſpeed he could to prepare his ſhips and things readie, and ſo required aide of the cities that were his beſt friends and confederates, and commanded that all the bands ſhould meete him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good garriſons in places moſt conuenient, in AFRICK & SPAINE, which he thought aboue all things elſe to be moſt neceſſary: becauſe that when he ſhould go into ITALY, the ROMAINS ſhould not win it from him. Therfore he ſent into AFRICK twelue hundred horſemen, and thirteene thouſand footmen, all SPANIARDS: and beſides, he brought out of diuerſe parts of AFRICK foure thouſand ſoldiers, & placed them in garriſon in CARTHAGE, obtaining both hoſtages and ſouldiers by this meane. So he left the gouernment of SPAINE to his brother Haſdrubal, and gaue him an army of fifty ſhips of warre, two thouſand horſemen, and twelue thouſand footmen. Theſe were the garriſons he left in both thoſe prouinces. Now he thought them not ſufficient to withſtand the power of the ROMAINS, if they bent their wars into SPAINE or AFRICKE: but he thought them ſtrong enough to ſtay the enemy from ouerrunning of the country, vntill that hauing brought his army by land, he had ſet foot in ITALY. Moreouer, he knew that the CARTHAGINIANS were ſtrong enough to leauie a new army if they liſted: and if need ſo required, to ſend him aide alſo into ITALY. For, after that they had driuen away this ſo dangerous a warre, procured againſt them through the ſpite of the mercenary ſouldiers, hauing euer after obtained victory: firſt vnder the conduct of Hamilcar: ſecondly, vnder Haſdrubal: and laſtly, vnder Hannibal: they were growne to ſuch greatneſſe and ſtrength, that at what time Hannibal came into ITALY, their Empire and dominions were maruellouſly enlarged. For they had all the coaſt of AFRICK, which lieth ouer againſt the ſea Mediterraneum, from the altars of the Philenians, which be not farre from the great Syrte, vnto Hercules pillars, and containeth in length * two thouſand paces. So after they had paſſed the ſtraight which deuideth AFRICKE from EVROPE, they poſſeſſed almoſt all SPAINE, to the mountaines Pirenei, which do deuide SPAINE from GAVLE. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICKE and SPAINE, Hannibal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his army was ready for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his men together, and encouraging them with great and large promiſes, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALY: and made great account vnto them of the friendſhip of the GAVLES, and in the end bad them be of good courage, and ſet luſtily forward. Thereupon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and brought his army all along the coaſt, vnto the riuer of Iberus. It is reported, that the next day following, Hannibal dreamed he ſaw a yong man, of a maruellous terrible looke and ſtature, who bad him follow him into ITALY: but afterwards, that he ſaw a ſnake of a wonderfull greatneſſe, making a maruellous noiſe: and being deſirous to vnderſtād what the ſame might ſignifie, that it was told him, that it betokened the deſtruction of ITALIE. It is not to be maruelled at, though the great care and thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALY, made his mind to run of ſuch fancies in the night, as dreaming of victory or deſtruction, or ſuch other calamities of war. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator ſaith: that our thoughts and words do beget ſuch things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homer: to wit, like to thoſe his mind moſt ran on, or that he talked of moſt. Now after Hannibal had paſſed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had won the GAVLES hearts with bountifull gifts, in few daies he came to the riuer of Rhone. The head of the riuer of Rhone, is not farre from the heads of the riuers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at GENEVA. Then it runneth from thence towards the weſt, and deuideth the GAVLES a pretie way: and then being increaſed by the riuer of Arar (called in French, Saone) & with other riuers, in the end it falleth into the ſea with diuers heads betwixt the VOLSCES & the

CAVARIANS. The VOLSCES at that time inhabited both the ſides of ỹ riuer of Rhone, & were full of people, and the richeſt of all other GAVLES. They hauing vnderſtanding of Hannibals cōming, paſſed ouer the riuer, and armed themſelues, and prepared on the other ſide to ſtoppe the CARTHAGINIANS, that they ſhould not paſſe ouer. Now, though Hannibal had won all the other GAVLES, yet thoſe he could neuer win neither by gifts nor threates, to cauſe them rather to proue the friendſhip of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Hannibal perceiuing he was to handle ſuch enemies rather by policy, he commanded Hanno the ſonne of Bomilcar, ſecretly to paſſe ouer the riuer of Rhone, with part of the army, and ſo to ſet vpon the GAVLES on the ſodaine. Thereupon Hanno (as he was commanded) made a long iourney, and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer at paſſable foords, he ſhewed himſelfe hard by the enemies campe before they ſaw him, or that they knew what he was. The GAVLS hearing their ſhouts & cries behind them, and hauing their hands full of Hannibal before them, who had many boats ready to paſſe ouer his men: they hauing no leiſure to conſult of the matter, neither to arme thēſelues to ſtand to defence, left their campe and fled for life. So they being driuen from the other ſide of the riuer, the reſt of the army of the CARTHAGINIANS paſſed ouer it with ſafetie. In the meanetime,

P. Cornelius Scipio Conſull: ſent againſt Hannibal, and arriued at Maſſilia.

P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a litle before was come vnto MASSILIA, ſtill heard newes of Hannibals armie. Wherefore, to be more aſſured of the matter, he ſent a band of choiſe horſemen to diſcouer what the enemies intent was: who making great ſpeed as they were commanded, met by chance with fiue hundred horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, whom Hannibal had alſo ſent to bring him word of the ROMAINES army. So, they firſt ſodainly gaue charge vpon the NVMIDIANS, and after a hote and valiant conflict betweene both the parties, in the end the ROMAINS ouercoming them, they made them flie, but with great loſſe of their men: howbeit the greateſt loſſe and ſlaughter fell vpon the enemies. So Hannibal by this meanes found where the ROMAINES lay, and ſtood in a great doubt with himſelfe, whether he ſhould keepe on his way into ITALIE, or elſe lead his armie againſt the Conſul that then was, and ſo to proue his hap & ſucceſſe. At length debating many wayes in his mind, and vncertaine which way he ſhould determine, the Ambaſſadors of the BOIANS perſwaded him to leaue all other deuiſes, & to go on into ITALIE. For before that Hannibal had paſſed ouer the mountains Pirenei, the BOIANS hauing by craft taken the ROMAINS Ambaſſadors, and done great miſchiefe vnto Manlius the Prætor, and intiſed the INSVBRIANS alſo, they were reuolted from the ROMAINES, & tooke part with Hannibal, and onely becauſe the ROMAINS had repleniſhed the cities of PLACENTIA, & CREMONA with people, and had made the Colonies to ROME. So Hannibal being ruled by their counſell, raiſed his campe, and keeping the riuers ſide, ſtill going againſt the riuer in few daies he came to the place which the GAVLES do call the Iland, the which the riuer of Arar and Rhodanus, coming from diuers mountaines, do make there. So at this preſent, there is the famous citie of LIONS in GAVLE, which they ſay was built long time after by Plancus Munatius. Frō thence he came to the country of the ALLOBROGES, & hauing pacified the variance betwixt two brethren for the Realme, he came through the countrey of the CASTINIANS and VOCONTIANS, to the riuer of Durance. The head of this riuer cometh from the Alpes, and from thence running with a ſwift ſtreame, falleth into the riuer of Rhone: & as it oftentimes changeth her courſe

ſo hath it in manner no paſſable foord. Yet Hannibal hauing paſt it ouer, he led his army vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine countries, as farre as he could: howbeit, as he paſſed through them, he had great loſſes, as it is reported. Inſomuch that ſome that were liuing at that time, did affirme, that they heard Hannibal himſelfe ſay, that he had loſt aboue thirtie thouſand men, and the moſt part of his horſemen. For he was forced not oney to fight with the inhabitants of the mountaines, but alſo compelled to make wayes through the ſtraights: ſo that in certaine places of the higheſt rockes, he was driuen to make paſſages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had paſſed the Alpes in fifteene dayes ſpace, he came downe into the valley, not farre from the citie of TVRINE. Whereby it ſeemeth to me, that he paſſed ouer the mountaine they commonly called Genua, the which on the one ſide of it hath the riuer of Druentia, and on the other ſide it goeth down to ỹ city of TVRINE. Now it is hard to ſay truly, what number of men he had when he was come into ITALIE, becauſe of the diuerſitie of mens opinions. For ſome write, that he had a hundred thouſand footmen, and twenty thouſand horſemen: others alſo write, that he had twentie thouſand footemen, and ſixe thouſand horſemen, all AFRICANS and SPANIARDS. But others reckoning the GAVLES and LIGVRIANS, do count foureſcore thouſand footemen, and ten thouſand horſemen. Yet it is not credible, that his army was ſo great, as the firſt men report, and ſpecially hauing paſſed through ſo many countries, and alſo receiued ſuch loſſe as he had: neither alſo could his number be ſo ſmall, as the ſecond reporters do make it, if a man will conſider the famous exploits and great enterpriſes he did afterwards. So that I like their opinions beſt, which keepe the meane betweene them both: conſidering that he brought into ITALIE, the better part of foureſcore thouſand footemen, and ten thouſand horſmen, the which he had leuied in SPAINE: as it is manifeſtly knowne alſo, that a great number of the LIGVRIANS and GAVLES came to ioyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMAINES, that gaue no place nor ground vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Hannibal being come from TVRINE, into the countrey of the INSVERIANS, he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull ſpeede from MASSILIA, and hauing paſſed the riuers of Po and Teſin, he camped not farre from the enemy. So ſhortly after, both the Generals being come into the field to view each others campe, the horſemen of either ſide grew to skirmiſh, which continued long, and was not to be diſcerned which of them had the better. Howbeit, in the end the ROMAINES ſeeing the Conſull hurt, and alſo that the horſemen of the NVMIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compaſſe them in, they were driuen to giue ground; and ſo pretily retired, defending the Conſul the beſt they could to ſaue him, and ſo at length recouered their campe. It is reported, that Publius Cornelius Scipio was ſaued at that time through his ſons helpe, who afterwards was called AFRICAN, and at that time was but a young ſtrippling: whoſe praiſe, though it was wonderfull in ſo greene a youth, yet it is likely to be true, becauſe of the famous and valiant acts that he did afterwards. Now Scipio hauing prooued how much his enemie was ſtronger then himſelfe in horſemen, he determined to place his campe ſo, as his footmen might be in beſt ſafetie, and alſo fight with greateſt aduantage. And therefore the next night following he paſſed the riuer of Po, & made as litle noiſe as he could, and went vnto PLACENTIA. The like ſhortly after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had bene reſtored frō baniſhment by the Senate, and ſent for out of SICILE: becauſe both the Conſuls ſhould gouerne the cōmon wealth by one ſelfe authoritie. Hannibal alſo followed them both with all his armie, and pitched his campe neare vnto the riuer of Trebia, hoping that becauſe both camps lay ſo neare together, ſome occaſion would be offered to fight: the which he chiefly deſired, both becauſe he could not long maintaine war for lacke of victuals, as alſo that he miſtruſted the ficklenes of the GAVLES; who like as they ſoone fell in league and friendſhippe with him, drawne vnto it with hope of change, and with the fame alſo of his victorie obtained: ſo he miſtruſted that vpon any light occaſion (as if the war ſhould continue any long time in their countrey) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the ROMAINES, againſt him as the onely author of this warre. For theſe reſpects therefore, he deuiſed all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time Sempronius the other Conſull met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with ſpoile, ſtraggling vp and downe the fields, whom he charged and put to flight. So, imagining the like ſucceſſe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall, he had good hope of victorie, if once both the armies might come to fight. Therefore being maruellouſly deſirous to do ſome noble enterpriſe before Scipio were recouered of his hurt, and that the new Conſull ſhould be choſen, he determined to ioyne battell against the will of his other colleague & fellow Consul Scipio: who thought nothing could be to lesse purpose, then to put all the state and commonwealth in ieopardie, specially hauing all the whole Gavles in maner in the field against him. Now Hannibal had secret intelligence of all this variance, by spials he had sent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politicke and subtill as he was, found out a place straight betweene both campes, couered ouer with bushes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lie in ambush, with a company of chosen men. Then he commanded the horsemen of the Nvmidians, to scurrie to the trenches of the Romains, to intice them to come to battell: and thereupon made the residue of his army to eate, and so put them in very good order of battell, to be readie vpon any occasion offered. Now the Consull Sempronius, at the first tumult of the Nvmidians, sodainely sent his horsemen to encounter them, and after them put out sixe thousand footmen, and in the end came himselfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middest of winter, and extreme cold, and specially in the places inclosed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Now the Nvmidians as they were commanded, inticed the Romaines by litle and litle on this side the riuer of Trebia, vntil they came to the place where they might discerne their ensignes: and then they suddenly turned vpon the enemies which were out of order. For it is the manner of the Nvmidians, oftentimes to flie of set purpose, and then to stay vpon the sodaine when they see time, to charge the enemie more hotely and fiercely then before. Whereupon Sempronius incontinently gathered his horsemen together, and did set his men in battell ray, as time required, to giue charge vpon his enemie, that stayed for him in order of battell. For Hannibal had cast his men into squadrons, ready vpon any occasion. The skirmish beganne first by the light horsemen, and afterwards increased hoter by supply of the men of armes: howbeit, the Romaine Knights being vnable to beare the shocke of the enemies, they were quickly broken; so that the legions maintained the battell with such furie and noble courage, that they had bene able to haue resisted, so they had fought but with footmen only. But on the one side, the horsemen and Elephants made them affraid, and on the other side the footemen followed them very lustily, and fought with great furie against famished and frozen men. Wherefore the Romains notwithstanding, suffering all the miseries that vexed them on euery side, with an vnspeakeable courage and magnanimitie, such as was aboue their force and strength, they fought still, vntill that Mago coming out of his ambush, came and sodainly assailed them with great shoutes and cries; and that the middle squadron of the Carthaginians also (through Hannibals commandement) flew vpon the Cinomanians. Then the Romaines seeing their confederates flie, their hearts were done, and vtterly discouraged. It is said that there were ten thousand footmen of the Romains got to Placentia, and came through the enemies. The rest of the army that fled, were most part of them slaine by the Carthaginians. The Consull Sempronius also scaped very narrowly from the enemies. The victory cost Hannibal the setting on also: for he lost a great number of his men, and the most part of his Elephants were slaine. After this battell, Hannibal ouercame all the countrie, and did put all to fire and sword, and tooke also certaine townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the countrimen flie, that were disorderly gathered together in battel. Then at ỹ beginning of the Spring, he brought his army into the field sooner then time required: & meaning to go into Thvscan, he was driuen backe by a great tẽpest at the very top of the height of Appenine, and so compelled to bring his army about Placentia: howbeit, shortly after he put himselfe again into the fields for diuers vrgent & necessarie causes. For had he not saued himself by that policie, he had almost bene taken tardie by the ambush of the Gavles: who being angry with him that the war cõtinued so long in their country, they sought to be reuenged of him, as the only author & occasion of the war. Therfore perceiuing it was time for him to auoid this danger, he made all the hast he could to lead his army into some other prouinces. Furthermore, he thought it wold increase his estimation much among strangers, and also greatly encourage his owne people, if he could make the power of the Carthaginians to seeme so great, and also their captaine to be of so noble a courage, as to dare to make war so neare to ỹ city of Rome. All things therfore set a part, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and so coming through the countrey of the Ligvrians, he came into Thvscan, by the way that bringeth thẽ into the champion countrey, & to the marishes about the riuer of Arnus. The riuer of Arnus at that time was very high, & had ouerflowne al the fields thereabouts. Hannibal therefore marching with so great an armie as he had, could not

auoid it, but that he muſt needs loſe a number of his men and horſe, before he could get out of thoſe euill-fauoured mariſhes. Inſomuch that he himſelfe loſt one of his eyes, by reaſon of the great paines he had taken day and night without ſleepe or reſt, and alſo through the euill aire: though he was caried vpon a high Elephants backe, which onely was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meane time, C. Flaminius Conſull, to whom the charge of Sempronius armie was giuen, he was come vnto ARETIVM againſt the Senates mind, who were maruellouſly offended with him, becauſe he left his companion Cn. Seruilius at ROME, and went vnto his prouince by ſtealth as it were, without the furniture of a Conſull & his officers. This was a very haſtie man of nature, & one that the people had brought to that dignitie & office: ſo that he was become ſo proud & inſolent, that men might ſee how he wold hazard all things without wit or iudgement. Hannibal hauing intelligence thereof, thought it the beſt way to anger the Conſull, and to do what he could poſſible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Conſull ſhould come to ioyne with him. Therefore he marching forward with his campe through the countrey of FESVLA ARETIVM, he burnt & ſpoiled all the country thereabouts, and filled them all with feare, neuer leauing to deſtroy all before him, vntill he came to the mountains Cortonenſes, and ſo to the lake called Thraſimene. When he had viewed the place he went about to ſurpriſe his enemie by ſome ambuſh: whereupon he conueyed certaine horſemen vnder the hils, hard by the ſtraight that goeth vnto Thraſimene, and behind the mountaines alſo he placed the light horſemen. Then he himſelfe with the reſt of his army came downe into the field, ſuppoſing that the Conſull would not be quiet: and ſo it fell out. For hote ſtirring heads are eaſily intrapped, & fall into the enemies ambuſh, and oftentimes do put all in hazard, becauſe they will follow no counſel nor good aduice. C. Flaminius therfore ſeeing their country vtterly ſpoiled, the corne deſtroyed & cut downe, & the houſes burnt, he made great haſt to lead his army againſt the enemy contrary to all mens minds, who would haue had him taried for his cõpanion Cn Seruilius the other Conſul. So euen at Sun ſet, when he was come to the ſtraights of the lake of Thraſimene, he cauſed his campe to ſtay there, although his men were not wearie with the long iourney they had taken by the way. So the next morning by break of day making no view of the country, he went ouer the mountaines. Then Hannibal, (who long before was prepared for this) did but ſtay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he ſaw the ROMAINES come into the plaine, he gaue a ſignall vnto all his men to giue charge vpon the enemy. Theruppon the CARTHAGINIANS breaking out on euery ſide, came before and behind, and on the flankes to aſſaile the enemie, being ſhut in betweene the lake and the mountaines. Now in contrary manner, the ROMAINES, beginning to fight out of order, they fought incloſed together, that they could not ſee one another, as if it had bene darke: ſo that it is to be wondered at, how, and with what minde they fought it out ſo long, conſidering they were compaſſed in on euery ſide. For they fought it out about three houres ſpace, with ſuch furie and courage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that preſent time, neither did they offer to flie or ſtirre a foot: vntil they heard that the Conſull C. Flaminius going from ranke to ranke to encourage his men, was ſlaine by a man of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had loſt their Generall, and being voide of all hope, they fled, ſome towards the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which diuerſe of them flying, were ouertaken and ſlaine. So there were ſlaine * fifteene thouſand in the field, and there ſcaped about ten thouſand. Furthermore, the report went, that there were ſixe thouſand footemen which forcibly (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and there ſtayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Hannibals promiſe: but they were betrayed, and ſlaine euery mothers ſonne of them. After this great victorie, Hannibal did let diuers ITALIAN priſoners go free without ranſome paying, after he had vſed them maruellous courteouſly: becauſe that the fame of his clemency & curteſie ſhould be known vnto all nations, whereas indeed his own nature was contrary to all vertues. For he was haſty and cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in wars, and exerciſed in murther, treaſon and ambuſhes laid for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor ciuill gouernment. So by this meanes he became one of the crueleſt Captaines, the moſt ſubtile and craftieſt to deceiue and intrap his enemie, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemy, ſo thoſe whom he could not ouercome in war by plaine force, he went about to intrap by ſleight & policy. The which appeareth true by this preſent battel, and alſo by the other he fought againſt the Conſull Sempronius, by the riuer of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leaue this talke

till another time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow & death of the Conſull Flaminius was reported at Rome, hauing loſt the moſt part of his army: there was great moane and lamentation made through all the city of Rome: ſome bewailing the common miſerie of the cõmonwealth, others lamenting their priuate particular loſſe, & ſome alſo ſorowing for both together. But indeed it was a wofull ſight, to ſee a world of men & women to run to the gates of the city, euery one priuately asking for their kin & friends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very ſory & penſiue, deſpairing of the ſafetie of their ſons, died ſodainly for the extreme ioy they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they ſaw their ſons aliue & ſafe. At the ſelfe ſame time, Cn. Seruilius, the other Conſull with C. Flaminius, did ſend him 4000 horſemen, not vnderſtanding yet of the battel that was fought by the lake of Thraſimene. But when they heard of the ouerthrow of their men by the way, & therefore thought to haue fled into Vmbria, they were cõpaſſed in by the horſmen of the enemies, & ſo brought vnto Hannibal. Now the Empire of Rome being brought into ſo great extremity, & danger, becauſe of ſo many ſinal loſſes one in the necke of another: it was ordained, that an extraordinary Gouernor or Magiſtrate ſhould be choſen, who ſhould be created Dictator: an office ſpecially vſed to be reſerued for the laſt hope and remedy in moſt extreme danger & perill of the ſtate & cõmonwealth. But becauſe the Cõſull Seruilius could not returne at that time to Rome, all the waies being kept by the enemy: the people contrary to their cuſtome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the ſurname of Maximus, to ſay, Very great) who likewiſe did name M. Minutius Generall of the horſmen. Now this Fabius was a graue & wiſe counſeller, and of great authority, & eſtimation in the cõmonwealth: inſomuch as the citizens had all their hope & cõfidence in him only, perſwading thẽſelues, that the honor of Rome might be better preſerued vnder the gouernment & conduct of ſuch a Generall, rather then vnder the gouernment of any other man whatſoeuer. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefully & diligently giuen order for all things neceſſary: he departed from Rome, and when he had receiued the army of the late Conſull Cn. Seruilius, he added vnto them two other legions, and ſo went vnto the enemy. Now Hannibal was gone from the lake of Thraſimene, and went directly towards the city of Spoletvm, to ſee if he could take it at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſaw that the townes-men ſtood vpõ the rampiers of their wals, and valiantly defended themſelues: he then left the towne and deſtroyed the countrey as he went, and burnt houſes and villages, and ſo went into Apvlia, through the marches of Ancona, and the country of the Marsians and Pelignians. The Dictator followed him at the heeles, and camped hard by the city of Arpy, not farre from the campe of the enemy, to the end to draw out the war at length. For the raſhneſſe and foole-hardines of the former Captains aforetime, had brought the ſtate of Rome into ſuch miſerie, that they thought it a victorie vnto them, not to be ouercome by the enemy, that had ſo often ouercome them. Whereby all things were turned ſtraight with the change and alteration of the Captaine: for though Hannibal had ſet his men in battell ray, and afterwards perceiuing his enemies ſtirred not, went and deſtroyed the countrey, hoping thereby to intice the Dictator to fight, when he ſhould ſee the country of his confederates ſo ſpoiled, as it was before his face: the Dictator, this not withſtanding, was not mooued withall, but ſtill kept his men cloſe together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Hannibal was in a maruellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often remoued his campe, to the end that going diuerſe wayes, ſome occaſion or oportunitie might fall out to deceiue the enemy, or elſe to giue battell. So when he had paſſed the mountaine Appenine, he came vnto Samnivm. But becauſe ſhortly after, ſome of Campania, who hauing bene taken priſoners by the lake of Thraſimene, had bin ſet at liberty without ranſome: they putting him in hope that he might take the city of Capva, he made his army march forward, and took a guide that knew the countrey, to bring him vnto Casinvm. Now the guide ouerhearing Casinvm, vnderſtood it Casilinvm, and ſo miſtaking the ſound of the word, brought the army a cleane contrary way vnto Calentinvm and Calenvm, & frõ thence about Stella. So when they came into a countrey enuironed about with mountaines & riuers, Hannibal knew ſtraight they had miſtaken their way, and ſo did cruelly put the guide to death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patiently, and was contented to giue Hannibal libertie to take his pleaſure which way he would, vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Caſilinum, where he placed his garriſon, being places of great aduantage and commoditie. So the armie of the Carthaginians was in manner compaſſed in euery way, and they muſt needes haue dyed died for famine in that place, or elſe haue fled, to their great ſhame and diſhonour: had not Hannibal by this ſtratageme preuented the danger. Who knowing the danger all his armie ſtood in, and hauing ſpied a fit time for it: he commanded his ſouldiers to bring foorth two thouſand oxen which they had gotten in ſpoile in the fieldes, hauing great ſtore of them, and then tying torches of fire-linkes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimbleſt men he had to light them, & to driue the oxen vp the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe of the firſt watch. All this was duely executed according to his commandement, and the oxen running vp to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them faire and ſoftly. Now the Romaines that had long before placed a ſtrong garriſon vpon the mountaines, they were affraid of this ſtrange ſight, and miſtruſting ſome ambuſh, they foorthwith forſooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius himſelfe miſtruſting alſo that it was ſome ſtratageme of the enemy, kept his men within the campe, and could not well tell what to ſay to it. In the meane time Hannibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Sweſſa, which the countrimen do call, The tower of the bathes, and brought all his army ſafe into Alba: and ſhortly after, he marched directly as though he would go to Rome, howbeit he ſuddenly turned out of the way, and went preſently into Apvlia. There he tooke the citie of Glerenvm, a very rich and wealthy towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, and came and camped by Lavrinvm, not farre from the Carthaginians camp. So he being ſent for to Rome about weightie affaires of the ſtate, there was no remedie, but that he muſt needes depart from thence with all the ſpeede he could: howbeit before he went, he left Marcus Minutius Generall of the horſemen, his Lieutenant of all the armie, and commanded him in his abſence not once to ſtir nor to meddle with the enemies. For he was fully bent to follow his determination, which was: not to vexe the enemie, nor to fight with him, though he were prouoked vnto it. Howbeit Marcus Minutius litle regarding the Dictators commandement, his backe was no ſooner turned, but he ſet vpon a companie of the enemies diſperſed in the field a foraging, and ſlue a great number of them, and fought with the reſt euen vnto their campe. The rumor of this skirmiſh flew ſtraight to Rome, and there was ſuch great account made of it, that it was eſteemed for a victorie: and the common people were ſo ioyfull of it, that they ſtraight made the power of the Lieutenant equall with the Dictator Fabius, the which was neuer heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreme iniurie with a noble courage, hauing no way deſerued it, he returned againe into the campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one ſelfe time, (a thing neuer ſeene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the army betweene thē, either of them commanded his armie apart, as the Conſuls were wont to do before. Marcus Minutius thereupon grew to ſuch a pride and haughtie mind, that one day he ventured to giue battel, and made not his companion Fabius of counſell withall: the which Hannibal hauing ſo often ouercome, durſt ſcantly haue enterpriſed. So he led his armie into ſuch a place, where the enemie had compaſſed them in: inſomuch that Hannibal ſlue them at his pleaſure, without any hope left them to eſcape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather reſpecting the honour of his countrey, then remembring the priuate iniurie he had receiued. For he coming freſh with his armie to the battell, made Hannibal affraid, that the Romaine legions had libertie to retire with ſafetie. Whereby Fabius wan great fame for his wiſdome and valiantneſſe, both of his owne ſouldiers, as alſo of the enemies themſelues. For it was reported that Hannibal ſhould ſay (returning into his campe,) That in this battell he had ouercome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was alſo ouercome by Fabius. And Minutius himſelf alſo confeſſing Fabius wiſedome, and conſidering that (according to Heſiodus ſaying) it was good reaſon to obey a better man then himſelfe: he came with all his army vnto Fabius camp, and renouncing his authoritie, came and humbly ſaluted Fabius as his father, and all that day there was great ioy, and reioycing among the ſouldiers. So both the armies being placed in garriſon for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Conſuls created, L. Paulus Æmylius, and C. Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was brought to be Conſull. So they had libertie and commiſſion to leauie a greater army then the Generals before them had done. Whereby the legions were newly ſupplied, and alſo others added vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Conſuls were come into the armie, as they were of ſeuerall diſpoſitions, ſo did they alſo obſerue diuerſe manners in their gouernment. Lucius Paulus, who was a graue wiſe man, and one that purpoſed to follow Fabius counſell and fashions: he did desire to draw out the warre in length, and to stay the enemy without fighting. Varro on the other side was a hasty man, and venturous, and desired nothing but to fight. So it chanced, that not long after it was knowne, to the great cost and danger of the citie of ROME, what difference there was betwixt the modestie of Æmylius, and the foole-hardinesse of Varro. For Hannibal being affraid of some stir and tumult in his campe for lacke of victuals, he departed from CLERENVM, and going into the warmest place of APVLIA, came and camped with all his armie, by a village called CANNES. So he was followed with both the Consuls, who came and camped seuerally hard by him, but so neare one to another, that there was but the riuer of Aufidus fl. Aufide that parted them. This riuer (as it is reported) doth alone deuide the mountaine of the Appenine, and taketh his head on that side of the mountaine that lyeth to the sea side, from whence it runneth to the sea Adriaticum. Now Lucius Paulus finding that it was impossible for Hannibal being in a strange countrey, to maintaine so great an armie of such sundrie nations together: he was fully bent to protract time, and to auoid battell, perswading himselfe that it was the right and onely way to ouercome him, being as much to the enemies disaduantage, as also maruellous profitable and beneficiall for the common wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Varro, had caried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Hannibals armie had bene ouerthrowne by the ROMAINES, without stroke striking. Howbeit he had such a light head of his owne, and was so fickle minded, that he neither regarded wise counsell, nor Paulus Æmylius authoritie: but in contrary manner would fall out with him, and also complained before the souldiers, for that he kept his men pent vp and idle, whilest the enemie did put foorth his men to the field in battell ray. So when his turne came, that he was absolutely to command the whole armie, for they had both absolute power by turnes) he passed ouer the riuer of Aufide by breake of day, and gaue the signall of battell without the priuitie of his companion Æmylius, who rather followed him against his will then willingly, because he could do none otherwise. So he caused a scarlet coat of armes to be put out very earely in the morning, for a signall of battell. Hannibal on the other side being as glad of it as might be possible, that he had occasion offered him to fight: (considering that the continuall delaying of battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his army ouer the riuer, and had straight put them in very good order. For he had taken great spoiles of his enemies to furnish himselfe very brauely. Now the Battell at Cannes. armie of the ROMAINES stood South-ward, insomuch that the South winde (which the men of the countrey call Vulturnus) blew full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrarie maner had the vantage of the winde and Sunne vpon their backes, and their battell stood in this manner. The AFRICANS were placed in both the wings, and the GAVLES and SPANIARDS set in a squadron in the middest. The light horsemen first beganne the skirmish, and after them followed the men of armes: and because the space betwixt the riuer and the footemen was very narrow, so as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So, the horsemen of the ROMAINES being ouerthrowne, the footemen came with such a lustie courage to receiue the charge, that they thought they should not haue day enough to fight. Howbeit, the ouer-earnest desire they had to ouercome their enemies, made their ouerthrow more miserable, then their ioy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, (who as we haue said before kept the battell) not A strata geme of Hannibal. being able any longer to withstand the force of the ROMAINES, they retired towards the AFRICANS in the wings. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, ranne vpon the enemies with all the furie they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middest of them. Then the CARTHAGINIANS that were in both wings, came and compassed them in before they were aware. Moreouer, there were fiue hundred of the NVMIDIAN horsemen, that colourably fled vnto the Consuls, who receiued them very courteously, & placed them in the rereward of the army. They seeing their time, shewed behind the enemies, and did sodainely giue them charge. Then the armie of the ROMAINES was vtterly ouerthrown, and Hannibal obtained victory. Liuie writeth, that there were slain in this battel* forty thousand footmen, & aboue two thousand seuen hundred horsemen. Polybius saith, that there were many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the ROMAINS had neuer greater losse, neither in the first war with AFRICKE, nor in the second by the CARTHAGINIANS, as this ouerthrow that was giuen at CANNES. For there was slaine the Consul Paulus Æmylius himselfe, a man vndoubtedly deseruing great praise, and that serued his countrey and common wealth euen to the howre

of death: Cn. Seruilius (Conſull the yeare before) was alſo ſlaine there, and many other that had bene Conſuls, Prætors, and others of ſuch like dignity, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other Senators and honeſt citizens, and that ſuch a number of them, that the very cruelty it ſelfe of the enemy was ſatisfied. The Conſul Terentius Varro, who was the onely author of all this war and ſlaughter, ſeeing the enemy victor euery way, he ſaued himſelfe by flying. And Tutidanus a Chieftaine of a band, comming through his enemies with a good company of his men, he came vnto CANVSIVM. Thither came alſo about ten thouſand mē, that had eſcaped frō their enemies, as out of a dangerous ſtorme: by whoſe conſent, the charge of the whole army was giuen vnto Appius Pulcher, and alſo vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwards did end this war. Thus was the end of the battell fought by CANNES. Newes flew ſtraight to ROME of this ouerthrow, the which though they iuſtly filled all the city with ſorrow & calamity, yet the Senate & people of ROME kept alwaies their countenance and greatneſſe, euen in this extreame miſery. Inſomuch they had not onely good hope to keepe their city ſafe, but furthermore they leauied a new army, and made yong men to beare armor, and yet left not SICILE and SPAINE vnprouided in the meane time: ſo that they made the world to wonder at them, to conſider theſe things, how they could in ſo great calamity and trouble haue ſo noble hearts, and ſuch wiſe counſell. But to let paſſe the former ouerthrowes, and great loſſes they ſuſtained at TICINVM, at TREBIA, and at the lake of THRACIMENE: what nation or people could haue borne this laſt plague, wherby ŷ whole force and power of the ROMAINES was in manner vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrowne? and yet the people of ROME ſo held it out, and that with ſo great wiſedome and counſell, that they neither lacked manhood nor magnanimity. Beſides, to helpe them the more, Hannibal being conqueror, trifling time in taking his leiſure, & refreſhing his army: he gaue the ROMAINES leiſure that were ouercome to take breath again, and to reſtore themſelues. For doubtleſſe, if Hannibal being conqueror, had immediatly after the victory obtained, brought his army directly to ROME, ſurely ŷ ROMAINES had bene vtterly vndone, or at the leaſt had bin cōpelled to haue put al in venture. So it is reported, that Hannibal oftentimes afterwards repented himſelfe he followed not his victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counſell which wiſhed him to let his ſouldiers reſt, then Maharbals aduice, generall of his horſemen, who would haue had him gone ſtraight to ROME, and ſo haue ended all this war. But he ſeeing Hannibals delay, told him (as it is reported) this that is now commō in euery mans mouth: Hannibal, thou knoweſt how to ouercome, but thou knoweſt not how to vſe victory. But what? al things are not (as Neſtor ſaith in Homer) giuē to mē altogether. For ſome had no skill to ouercome, others knew not how to follow their victory, and ſome alſo could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES that made war with the ROMAINES, was one of the famouſeſt captains that euer was: yet as men write of him, though he was maruellous fortunate to conquer realmes, he wold neuer keep thē. Euen ſo in like maner, ſome captaines haue bin endued with excellent vertues, and yet notwithſtanding haue bene inſufficient in martial affaires deſeruing praiſe in a captaine, as we may reade in diuers hiſtories. Now after this battel fought by CANNES, the ATTELLANIANS, the CALATINIANS, the SAMNITES, after them alſo the BRVTIANS, LVCANIANS, & diuers other nations and people of ITALY, caried away with the fame of this great victory: they all came and yeelded to Hannibal. And the city of CAPVA alſo (which Hannibal was deſirous to haue won long before) forſaking their old friends and confederates, made new league and friendſhip with Hannibal: the which wan him great eſtimatiō with other nations. For at that time the city of CAPVA was very populous and of great power, and the chiefeſt city of eſtimation of all ITALY next to ROME. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPVA, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the THVSCANS, ŷ which was firſt called VVLTVRNVM, & after that CAPVA, by ŷ name of their gouernor called Capius; or otherwiſe, (as it is moſt likely) becauſe of the fields round about it: for on euery ſide of it, there are goodly pleaſant fields, ful of al kinds of fruits growing on the earth, called in Greek, Kepi. Furthermore, all the country is confined round about with famous nations. Towards the ſea there dwell the SVESANIANS, the CVMANIANS, & the NEAPOLITANS. On firme land alſo towards the north, are the CALENTINIANS and the CALENIANS. On the Eaſt & Southſide, the DVNIANS & the NOLIANS. Furthermore, ŷ place is of a ſtrong ſituation, and on the one ſide is compaſſed in with the ſea, & on ŷ other ſide with great high mountaines. Now the CAMPANIANS floriſhed maruellouſly at that time: & therfore ſeeing the ROMAINS in maner vtterly vndon by the battel they had loſt at CANNES, quickly took part with the ſtrōger, as it commonly falleth out: and furthermore beſides that they made league with Hannibal, they receiued him into their citie with great triumph, hoping that the warre being ended, they ſhould be the chiefeſt and wealthieſt of all ITALY. But marke how men are commonly deceiued in their expectation. Now when Hannibal came into the citie of CAPVA, there was a world of people that went to ſee him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had won of the enemy. So being come into the citie, they brought him vnto Pacuuius houſe, his very familiar friend, who was a man of great wealth and authoritie, as any among all the CAMPANIANS. Then he made him a notable banket, to the which no citizens were bidden, ſauing onely Iubellius Taurea a ſtout man, and the ſonne of Pacuuius his hoſt: who through his fathers meanes, with much ado, was reconciled to Hannibal, for that Hannibal hated him as he did, becauſe he followed Decius Magius, who alwaies tooke the ROMAINES part. But now let vs conſider a litle I pray you, how great men ſometimes vnawares are ſubiect to great dangers and misfortunes. For this yong man diſſembling his reconciliation with Hannibal, watching time and occaſion notwithſtanding to do him ſome diſpleaſure, in the time of this feaſt, while they were making merry, he tooke his father aſide into a ſecret corner of the houſe, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor and good will againe of the ROMAINS, the which they had loſt through their great wickednes. Then he told him how he was determined to kill Hannibal the enemy of his country, and all ITALY beſides. His father that was a man of great countenance and authoritie, was maruellouſly amazed withall, to heare what his ſonne ſaid: wherefore embracing him with the teares running downe his cheekes, he prayed him to leaue off his ſword, and to let his gueſt be ſafe in his houſe. The which his ſonne in the end yeelded with great ado. Thus Hannibal hauing before withſtood all the force of his enemies, the ambuſhes of the GAVLES, and hauing brought with him alſo a great army from the ſea, & the fartheſt part of SPAINE, through ſo many great and mightie nations: he ſcaped killing very narrowly by the hand of a yong man, whileſt he was at the table making merry. The next morning Hannibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promiſes, and told them many things, which the CAMPANIANS eaſily beleeued; and therefore flattered themſelues, that they ſhould be Lords of all ITALY: howbeit they reckoned beſide their hoſt. And to conclude they did ſo cowardly ſubmit themſelues to Hannibal, that it ſeemed they had not only ſuffred him to come into their city, but that they had alſo made him their abſolute Lord, like men that neither remembred nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainly by one example I will ſhew you amongſt many. Hannibal willed them to deliuer Decius Magius, the head of the country faction to him. Wherunto the Senate not only obeyed with all humilitie, but worſt of all, ſuffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the preſence of all the people: who becauſe he would not forſake the ancient league and friendſhip with the ROMAINES, had ſhewed himſelfe a more faithfull citizen to his countrey and commonwealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whileſt theſe things paſſed thus in CAPVA, Mago (Hannibals brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the newes of his happy victory to his countrimen, which they had won of the enemies: and withall, before the Senate to declare the noble exploits of armes done by Hannibal. And to proue the words true he ſpake, he powred out at the coming in of the Senate-houſe, the golden rings which had bin taken frō the ROMAINE knights: of the which there were (as ſome do report) aboue a buſhell ful, and as other ſome do write, aboue three buſhels full and a half. After that, he prayed a new ſupply for Hannibals army; which was granted them by the Senate with greater ioy then afterwards it was ſent. For the CARTHAGINIANS, perſwaded themſelues by the things preſent, that the war would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was faire: they thereupon decreed to continue the warre, and to aid Hannibals attempts, by leuying of ſoldiers. Now no man withſtood this new ſupply to be ſent to Hannibal, but Hanno a perpetual enemie of the BARCINIAN faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS weighed not his counſell and aduice then, though it tended to peace, and was good counſell for them, as oftentimes before he had vſed the like. So when Hannibal had made league with the CAMPANIANS, he led his camp before the citie of NOLA, hoping they would yeeld of themſelues without cōpulſion. And certainly ſo it had come to paſſe, had not the ſodaine coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the ſedition, and repulſed the enemy that was coming into the citie, by a ſally he made vpon him at three ſeuerall gates, chaſing and killing them euen to their campe with great loſſe. This is that noble Captaine and valiant ſouldier Marcellus, who with

with a noble courage made the world know, that Hannibal was not inuincible. Hannibal perceiuing that there was no other way, but to let NOLA alone til another time: he came to ACERRES, and tooke and spoiled it without resistance. Then going on further with greater power vnto CASILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win thē that lay there in garrisō: but when he saw that neither his faire promises, nor otherwise his threats could preuaile, he left part of his army to besiege the citie, and bestowed the residue in garrisons before the winter season. Howbeit he chose for his chiefest seate and strength the citie of CAPVA, which stood very pleasantly, and had plentie of all things. There it was that Hannibals souldiers being vsed to lie hard, and easily to away with cold, hunger and thirst, became then of valiant men, rank cowards, of strong men weaklings, and of seruiceable and ready men, timorous and effeminate persons, through the dayly pleasures they enioyed at will. For sweete inticing pleasures do corrupt the strength and courage of the mind, and mans disposition vnto vertue: moreouer they spoile his wit, and take all good counsell from him, al which things are dangerous for men. And therefore Plato rightly calleth pleasure, the baite of all euils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS, more then otherwise the highest Alpes, & all the armies of the ROMAINES did. For one onely winter passed ouer in such pleasure and wantonnesse, was of such great force to extinguish the vehement courage in the soldiers, that when they were brought into the field at the beginning of the spring, sure you would rightly haue said that they had forgotten all martial discipline. Thus the winter being passed ouer, Hannibal returned againe to CASILINVM, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeeld vnto him, after they had abidden so long a siege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extremity, before they would yeeld to their so cruell an enemy, although they lacked victuals. Wherfore liuing first by spealt, or beare barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had receiued of the ROMAINES by the riuer of VVLTVRNVS: they held it out so long, that Hannibal in the end being angrie with the continuance of the siege, he was content to take the citie vpon composition, the which he had refused before. Now this warre, in the which the CARTHAGINIANS had alwayes had great victories and good fortune, and receiued no losse worthy of memory, began at that time to decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the new aid and supply that was sent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSTANTIA, and of other cities of the countrey of the BRVTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other side, the great victories which the ROMAINES had wonne vpon the enemies of SPAINE and SARDINIA, did greatly encourage them, and gaue them also good hope that their affaires would prosper better and better. They had also chosen three excellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man most worthy of praise for martiall discipline: who so wisely gouerned the affaires of the state, that Hannibal found he should make warre with an enemy, no lesse politicke and wise, then hardie and valiant. For first of all, he was driuen from the citie of CVMES, with great slaughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, and forced to raise his siege: and shortly after he was ouercome by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at NOLA. For there were slaine aboue a thousand ROMAINES and* 6000 CARTHAGINIANS slaine and taken flying. Now it is easily seene what great importance that battell was of: because Hannibal immediatly vpon it, raised his siege from NOLA, and went into APVLIA to winter his army there. By this meanes came the ROMAINES to recouer againe, as out of a great sickenesse, and sent a great power against the enemy: and were not content onely to keepe their owne, but they durst also inuade others. So their chiefest intent was, to besige the city of CAPVA, for the iniurie they had but lately receiued of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the battell was fought at CANNES, they forsooke the ROMAINES, euen in their greatest extremitie and miserie, and tooke part with Hannibal that was conquerour, forgetting the great pleasures their citie had receiued in old time by the ROMAINES. On the other side, the CAMPANIANS knowing they had made a fault, and being afraid of this new preparation of the ROMAINES, they sent to Hannibal into APVLIA, to pray him to come and ayd their citie (being of the number of the confederates) in their greatest necessitie. Hannibal departed out of APVLIA without delay, and came on with great iourneys into CAMPANIA, and camped by TIPATA ouer CAPVA, whereby he rather deferred till another time, then preuented the plague hanging ouer the CAMPANIANS heads: so spoyling the countrey round about NAPLES, he began to take conceit of a new hope, that he might take NOLA by treason.

The victories of the Romaines against Hannibal

* Plutarch in the life of Marcellus speaketh of fiue thousand Carthaginians slaine, and only of fiue hundred Romaines.

Two factions in Naples.

For in NOLA, the people & Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewise in diuers other cities of ITALY. The common people desirous of change, fauored Hannibal and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of ROME. So when Hannibal went to take the city of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his army in battel ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, euen at the first meeting. There ỹ ROMAINS ouercame, and draue the enemy with such manhood and readinesse, that if the horsemen which had taken another way had come in in time, as Marcellus commanded them; no question the CARTHAGINIANS had bin vtterly ouerthrown. Hannibal after he had retired his army into his camp with great slaughter, he shortly after departed thence, and went into the country of the SALENTINIANS. For certain yong TARENTINES that had bin taken prisoners in former battels, where the ROMAINS had bin ouerthrowne, and that were afterwards deliuered free without ransome: they to shew themselues thankfull, had put Hannibal in hope to deliuer him the city of TARENTVM, so he would bring his army before the city. Hannibal inticed by their promises, did what he could to obtaine it, because he might haue some city vpon the sea in his power, the which he had desired of long time. And indeed, of all the cities vpon the sea coast, there was none so meete as TARENTVM, to bring aid out of GRECE thither, and also to furnish the camp with many things that were to be occupied daily. So though this thing was drawn out in length, by the garrison of the ROMAINS that valiantly resisted: yet Hannibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprise, vntill that Nico and Philomenes, the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the citie into his hands. The ROMAINS kept only the castle, the which is in maner enuironed with the sea on three sides: & on the fourth side, that lay vpon the firme land, it was very strong with rampiers & bulwarks. Hannibal perceiuing that he could do no good on that side, because of their great strength: he determined to shut vp the mouth of the hauen of TARENTVM, hoping that was the only way to make the ROMAINS yeeld, when their victuals should be cut from them. Yet the enterprise seemed very hard because the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, & the ships also that should besiege the issue of the hauen, were shut vp in a narrow litle place, and were to be drawne out of the hauen, at the foot of the castle, to bring them into the next sea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprise to passe: Hannibal himselfe perceiued that these ships might be drawne out of the hauen with certaine engines, and then to cart them through the citie to the sea. So hauing his cunning workmen in hand with the matter, the ships within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, & caried into the sea, & then came & shewed before the bar of the hauen. Thus the city of TARENTVM being won again, after the ROMAINS had kept it the space of a hundred years: Hannibal leauing the castle besieged both by sea & land, he returned into SAMNIVM. For the Consuls of the ROMAINS had spoiled & stripped the CAMPANIANS that went out to forrage, & hauing brought their army before CAPVA, they determined (if it might be) to win it by siege. Wherfore Hannibal being very sory for the siege of CAPVA, he came with all his army against the enemy: and seeing shortly after that the ROMAINS did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward, & doubtlesse to fight, it wold haue proued a bloudy battel, had not Sempronius army seuered them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA vnder the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the countrey of LVKE. For they seeing this army far off, before they could know who they were, the ROMAINES & CARTHAGINIANS were both affraid, and so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into seuerall countries, the one into LVKE, and the other towards CVMES, to make Hannibal remoue from CAPVA: who went into LVCANIA, and found occasion to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly and desperatly did hazard his army left him in charge, against a subtill & dangerous enemy. The battel being begun, M. Centenius was slaine valiantly fighting, and few other escaped. After this also there hapned another losse: for Hannibal returning shortly after into APVLIA, he met with another army of the ROMAINES, the which Fabius the Prætor led, who also entrapped that army by ambushes, and slue the most of them: so that of 20000 men, 2000 scant escaped the edge of the sword. In the meane time the Consuls perceiuing that Hannibal was gone, they came with all their army vnto CAPVA, and did besiege it round. This being come to Hannibals eare, he came with his army into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed: and at his first coming he set vpon the campe of the ROMAINES, hauing first willed the CAMPANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a sallie out on them. The ROMAINE Consuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betweene them, and went against them. The Campanians were easily driuen againe into the city: howbeit against Hannibal, the battell was very bloudy. For if euer he proued himselfe a valiant Captaine or noble souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to surprise the Romains by some stratageme. For as his men were about to breake into the Romaines campe, he sent one thither that had the Latine tong excellently well, who cried out by the commandement of the Consuls, that the Romains shold saue themselues in the next mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their campe & strength. This cry made on ỹ sudden had easily moued thẽ that heard it, if the Romains being throughly acquainted with Hannibals subtilties, had not found out his deceit. Wherfore one of them incouraging another, they made the enemy retire, and compelled him in despite of his beard to flie into the campe. When Hannibal had done what he could by all deuice and practise possible to raise the siege from Capva, & perceiuing al would not serue, being sory for the danger of his confederates: he then determined to call a counsel, the which he had passed ouer a long time, hauing reserued it for the last refuge. For he trussed vp his cariage, and marched away with his army, and as quietly as he could, he passed ouer the riuer of Vulturnus, and coasting through the countries of ỹ Sidicinians, Atifanians, & Cassinians, he came to Rome with ensignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them raise their siege, being so earnestly bent to win Capva. This flying straight to Rome by currers, they were so afraid there, as Rome was neuer in like feare it stood in then. For they saw their mortal enemy come to thẽ with ensignes displaid whom they had so often proued, almost to the vtter destruction of their Empire: and now they saw him present, whom they could not resist being absent, threatning to bring the Senate & people of Rome into subiection. So all Rome being in feare & tumult, it was ordained that Fuluius Flaccus (one of the Consuls lying before Capva) should be sent for home. And that the new Consuls Sulpitius Galba, & Cornelius Centimalus, should lie in camp out of the city: & that C. Calpurnius Prætor should put a strong garrison into the Capitoll, and also that the citizens that had borne any office or dignitie, should be appointed by their countenance and authority to pacifie the sudden tumults that might happen in the citie. So Hannibal marched forward without staying, till he came to the riuer of Anienes, & there camped within 24. furlongs of Rome: & shortly after that, he came with 2000 horse so neare vnto Rome, that riding frõ the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leisure to view at his pleasure, the situation and wals of so great a citie. Fulius Flaccus seeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certaine men at armes of the Romaines against him: who coming with great fury to giue charge vpon him as they were commanded, they easily sent him packing. The next morning Hannibal brought his army out of the campe, and did set them in battell ray, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the enemy to battell. The Romains on the other side did the like. So, both armies marched one against the other with such life and courage, that to see them, they appeared men that feared no danger, so they might obtaine the victorie that day. For on the one side, the Carthaginians were to fight (in manner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended vpon this battel, as being the last they shold fight. The Romains in cõtrary maner, they were to fight for their country liberty, & their goods, to see whether they could keep them, or that they shold come into their enemies hands. Howbeit there fell out a thing worthy of memory. For as they were ready set in battell ray, tarying but for the signall of battell to giue charge, there fell such a wonderfull great shower and storme vpon them, that both of them were driuen in spite of their teethes, to bring backe their army into their forts again. The next day following in like maner, vnto the which it seemed the battell had bene deferred, when they had againe both of them set their men in battell ray, there fell the like storme vpon them, which did as much hurt the Romaines and Carthaginians, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to saue themselues, & not to thinke otherwise to fight. Hannibal perceiuing this, he turned to his friends and told thẽ, that the first time he thought not to win to Rome, & that at the second time the occasiõ was taken from him. So there was a thing that greatly troubled Hannibal, and that was this. That though he came so neare to Rome, with an army of horsemen and footmen: yet he heard that the Romaines had sent aid into Spaine, and that he had redeemed the country where he had bene, at a farre greater price then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the goldsmiths and bankers shops of the Romaines citizens to be sold by the Cryer. But afterwards casting with himselfe, what a hard enterprise it was to take the citie of Rome, or else being afraid to lacke victuals (for he had stored himselfe onely but for ten dayes,)

Hannibal cumeth to inuade Rome.

A wonder.

he raiſed his campe, and remouing thence came vnto the holy wood of the goddeſſe Feronia, and rifled the rich temple there, and afterwards went thence into the countrey of the Brvtians and Lvcanians. The Capvans hauing intelligence thereof, being left out of all hope, they yeelded vp their city vnto the Romaines. The city of Capva being thus yeelded vp, & brought againe to the ſubiection of ý Romaines, it was of great importance to all the people of Italii, and withall brought great deſire of change. Hannibal himſelfe alſo following euill counſell, did ſpoile and deſtroy many cities he could not keepe: whereby he did ſtirre vp the hearts of diuerſe nations againſt him. For where before when he was conquerour, he had often let priſoners go without ranſome paying, through which liberality he had won the hearts of many men: euen ſo at that preſent time, his barbarous cruelty made diuers cities (miſliking to be ſubiect to the Carthaginians) to rebell againſt him, and to take part with the Romaines. Amongſt them was Salapia, the which was yeelded vp vnto the Conſull Marcellus, by Blacius meanes chiefe of all the Romaine faction: and a band alſo of choiſe horſmen which was left there in gariſon, were in maner ſlaine euery man of them. This is the city where Hannibal fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, & therefore they greatly reproue his immoderate luſt & laſciuiouſneſſe. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continency of this Captaine, ſay, that he did neuer eate lying, and neuer dranke aboue a pinte of wine, neither when he came to make war in Italy, nor after that he returned into Africke. Some there be alſo that ſay, Hannibal was cruell & vnconſtant, & ſubiect to diuerſe ſuch other vices: howbeit they make no maner of mention of his chaſtity or incõtinency. But they report that his wife was a Spaniard, borne in Castvlo, a good towne: and that the Carthaginians granted her many things, and truſted her very much, becauſe of the great faith and conſtancy of that nation. Now Hannibal after he had loſt (as we haue told you) the city of Salapia, he found the meanes to cry quittance, & to make the Romains loſe more then he had loſt. For at the ſelfe ſame time Fuluius Viceconſull lay beſieging of Herdonea, hoping to win the citie without reſiſtance. And becauſe he ſtood in no feare of any enemie round about him (for Hannibal was gone into the countrey of the Brvtians) he kept no watch, and was altogether negligent in martial affaires, contrary to the nature of the Romains captaines. Hannibal being aduertiſed thereof by ſpials, would not loſe ſuch a goodly opportunity: & therfore coming into Apvlia with his army ready, he came ſo haſtily vpõ Herdonia, that he had almoſt ſtolne vpon Fulvius, vnprouided in his camp. Howbeit the Romains valiantly receiued the firſt charge with ſuch courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithſtanding in the end, as the Romains two yeares before that had bin ouercome not far from thence, with their Conſul Fulvius: euen ſo likewiſe vnder the conduct of this Fulvius Viceconſul, the Romaine legions were vtterly ouerthrowne, & their Captaine ſlaine, with the moſt part of his army. The Conſull Marcellus was at that time in the city of Samnivm, who being aduertiſed of this great ouerthrow, deſired to be euen with him: and though it ſeemed he came too late to helpe things paſt remedy, yet he brought his army into the countrey of the Lvcanians, whither he vnderſtood Hannibal was gone after his victory, and came and camped directly ouer againſt his enemy, & ſoone after came to battel. The which the Carthaginians refuſed not, but gaue ſuch a fierce onſet on either ſide, that they fought it out till Sunne-ſet, and no man knew who had the better, and ſo the night parted them. The next morning the Romains ſhewing againe in field in battell ray, made it knowne that the enemies were afraid of them. For Hannibal kept his men within the campe, and the next night following ſtole away without any noiſe, and went into Apvlia. Marcellus alſo followed him foote by foote, and ſought to put all to hazard by ſome notable battell: for he bare himſelfe thus in hand, that of all the Romains Captaines there was none matchable with Hannibal but himſelfe, either in counſell, wit, or policy, or elſe in martiall diſcipline, or warlike ſtratagemes. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any ſet battell with the enemie: for after he had made a few light skirmiſhes, becauſe he would not trouble his ſouldiers any more in vaine, he beſtowed them in garriſon for the winter time. At the beginning of the next ſpring, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Conſuls for that yeare) and partly alſo through his owne diſpoſition, he brought out his garriſons ſooner then they were looked for, and came with his army againſt Hannibal, who lay at that time at Canvsivm. Now it chanced, that through the nearneſſe of both their camps, and the good deſire they both had to fight, in few dayes they fought three ſeuerall times. The firſt battel, when they had fought it out till night, in maner like hope of both

both sides, and that it could not be iudged which of them had the better: they both of purpose retired into their campe againe. The second day Hannibal was conqueror, after he had slaine almost two thousand seuen hundred enemies, and put the residue of the army to flight. The third day, the ROMAINES to recouer the shame and dishonor they had lost the day before, they were the first that prayed they might fight, & so Marcellus led them out to battell. Hannibal wondring at their valiantnesse, said vnto his people, that he dealt with an enemy that could neuer be quiet conqueror, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before: because the ROMAINES did their best to be reuenged of their losse, and the CARTHAGINIANS on the other side were mad in their minds, to see that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanquishers vnto battell. In the end, the ROMAINES being sharply reproued, and also perswaded by Marcellus to sticke to it valiantly like men, that the news of their victory might come to ROME, before the newes of their ouerthrow: they flew in among the preasse of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thrise broken their enemies, they made them all flie. At the selfe same time Fabius Maximus tooke the citie of TARENTVM againe, almost after the selfe same sortit was lost. This being reported vnto Hannibal, he said: the ROMAINES haue also their Hannibal. The next yeare following, Marcellus & Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put themselues in readinesse for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Hannibal despairing that he was not able to resist thē in battel, he sought all the wits he had to deuise some way to intrap thē by subtilty, whom he could not ouercome by battel. So Hannibals head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for. Betweene both camps, there was a prety groue, in the which Hannibal laid certaine bands of the NVMIDIANS in ambush, to intrap the enemies passing too & fro. On the other side, the Consuls by consent of them all, thought it best to send to view this groue, and to keepe it if need required: lest in leauing it behind them, the enemies should come, and so be vpon their backes afterwards. Now before they remoued their army, both the Consuls went out of their campe, with a small company of horsmen with them, to view the situation of this place: and so going on very vndiscreetly, and worse appointed then became men of their authority & place, they vnfortunately fell into Hannibals ambush. So, when they saw themselues in a moment compassed about on euery side with enemies, that they could not go forward, and were also fought withall behind: they defended themselues the best they could, rather by cōpulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So, Marcellus was slaine fighting valiantly: and Crispinus the other Consull also very sore hurt, who hardly scaped the enemies hāds. Hannibal being aduertised that Marcellus was slaine, who was the chiefest man of al the ROMAINE Captains, that had most hindered the happy successe of his victories, & had besides troubled him most: he presētly went and camped there where the battell was fought, & when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue it honorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may see how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, are esteemed of all men: considering that the cruell and most mortall enemy gaue honorable buriall to so noble and excellent a Captaine. The ROMAINS in the meane time seeing one of their Consuls dead, and the other Consull very sore hurt, they drew straight to the next mountaines, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Crispinus had sent to the next townes of the mountaines, to aduertise them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ring he sealed his letters withall, wherfore he wished them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus messenger came but newly vnto SALAPIA, when letters were brought also from Hannibal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they sent his messenger away, and carefully looked for Hannibals coming. About the fourth watch of the night, Hannibal came to the citie of SALAPIA, who of purpose had put all the ROMAINES that had fled, in the vauntguard, because that they speaking the Latine tongue, might make them beleeue that Marcellus was there in person. So when the citizenes had suffered 600 of them to come in, they shut too the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the army, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the city. Thus Hannibal being in a maruellous rage he had missed of his purpose, he remoued thence, & went into the country of the BRVTIANS, to aid the LOCRIANS that were besieged by the ROMAINES, both by sea and by land. After all these things, at the earnest request of the Senate and people, two new Consuls were created, both famous captaines, & valiant souldiers, Marcus Liuius, & Claudius Nero: who hauing deuided ẏ army betwixt them, went vnto their ſeueral charge and prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the country of the SALENTINIANS, & M. Liuius into GAVLE, againſt Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alps, & made haſt to ioyn with his brother Hannibal, bringing with him a great army both of foote & horſemen. Now it chanced at the ſame time, that Hannibal had receiued great loſſe by Claudius the Cõſul. For firſt of al, he ouercame him in the country of the LVCANIANS, vſing the like policies & fetches that Hannibal did. Afterwards again, meeting with Hãnibal in APVLIA, by the city of VENVSIA, he fought ſuch a luſty battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the field. By reaſon of the great loſſes, Hannibal ſuddenly went to METAPONT, to renew his army again. So hauing remained there a few daies, he receiued the army from Hanno, the which he ioyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not far from VENVSIA with his campe: who hauing intercepted letters of his enemies, he vnderſtood by them that Haſdrubal was at hand with his army. Therupon he bethought himſelf night & day, what policy he might vſe to preuent the ioyning of two ſo great armies together as theſe. So, after he had taken aduice of himſelfe, he followed in ſight a dangerous determination, but peraduenture neceſſary, as the time required. For leauing the camp vnto the charge of his Lieutenant, he took part of the army with him, & making great iourneyes, came to PISENVM (being the marches of ANCONA) ſo that on the ſixt day he came to SENA. There both the Conſuls ioyned their forces together, & ſetting vpon Haſdrubal by the riuer of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For, as it is reported, there were ſix and fifty thouſand of the enemies ſlaine on that day: ſo that they almoſt had as great an ouerthrow, as the ROMAINES had receiued before at the battel of CANNES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victory, returning as ſpeedily vnto VENVSIA as he went thence, he ſet vp Haſdrubals head, where the enemies kept the watch: and did let certaine priſoners go, to carie news to Hannibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwards it was knowne, that Hannibal knew nothing yet of Claudius ſecret enterpriſe, nor of the ſpeedy executiõ & great ſlaughter he had made. Whereat ſure I can but wonder, that ſo ſubtle a Captaine as Hannibal, could be deceiued by Clodius, conſidering both their campes lay ſo neare together: ſo that he firſt heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and of all his army, before he vnderſtood any thing of the Conſuls departure, or heard of his returne againe to the campe. Now Hannibal hauing not only receiued a generall, but alſo a particular great loſſe by the death of his brother, he ſaid then, he plainly ſaw the change and alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune: and ſhortly after remoued his campe, and went thence into the countrey of the BRVTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow giuen by the riuer of Metaurum, was a maruellous incouragement to the ROMAINES, and would alſo be a great log in his way, for the ſucceſſe of this warre. This notwithſtãding, he gathered togther al his power he had left in ITALY, after ſo many great battels and conflicts, and ſo many cities taken: and maintained the warre with an inuincible courage. But the moſt ſtrangeſt thing in Hannibal was this, that through his authoritie & wiſdome, he kept all his army in peace and amity together (being a medley of SPANIARDS, AFRICANS, GAVLES, and of diuerſe other nations) & neuer man heard that there was any brawle or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMAINES themſelues, after they had wonne SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAINE againe, they could neuer vtterly ouercome him nor driue him out of ITALY, before they had ſent P. Cornelius Scipio into AFRICKE: who making warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, he brought them to ſuch great extremity, that they were driuen to ſend for Hannibal home out of ITALY. Hannibal at that time (as we haue ſaid before) was in the countrey of the BRVTIANS, making war by inrodes and ſudden inuaſions, rather then by any fought battell: ſauing that once there was a battell fought in haſt betwixt him and the Conſull Sempronius, and immediatly after he came & ſet vpon the ſame Sempronius with all his army. At this battell Hannibal had the victory: but at the ſecond, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time, I can find in no Greeke nor Latine Author, that Hannibal did any famous act in ITALY worthie memorie. For being ſent for into AFRICKE by the CARTHAGINIANS, he left ITALY ſixteene yeares after this AFRICKE war was begun, greatly complaining of the Senate of CARTHAGE, & of himſelf alſo. Of the Senate, becauſe that all the time he had bene in his enemies countrey ſo long, they had allowed him ſo litle money: and ſo ſcanted him beſides with all other things neceſſary for the wars. And of himſelf, becauſe that after he had ſo often ouercome the ROMAINS, he had alwayes delaied time after the victory, and had giuen the enemy liberty to gather force againe. It is reported alſo, that before he imbarked and tooke ſea, he ſet vp a triumphing arch or pillar, by the

the temple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his noble victories, both in the Punicke and Greeke tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind serued him so well, that in few daies he arriued at LEPTIS, & lading all his army, he first came to ADRVMENTVM, & afterwards vnto ZAMA. There receiuing aduertisement how the affaires of the CARTHAGINIANS prospered, he thought it best to deuise some way to end this war. For this cause he sent vnto Scipio, to pray him to appoint him some conuenient place where they might both meet, & talke together of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainely knowne, whether Hannibal did this of his owne head, or by commandement of the Senate. Scipio refused not to come to parly. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous Generals of mightie nations, in a great plaine together, either of them hauing his interpreter, to talke together of diuerse matters touching peace and warre. For Hannibal was altogether bent to peace, because he saw the affaires of ỹ CARTHAGINIANS waxe worse & worse euery day: that they had lost SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAINE: because the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICKE: because Syphax (a mighty king) was taken prisoner of the ROMAINES: and also because that their last hope consisted in the army he had brought into AFRICKE, which was the only remaine and reliefe of so long a war as he had made in ITALY: and also because that the CARTHAGINIANS had so smal a power left (both of strangers, and also of citizens) that there were scarce men inough to defend the city of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio with a long Oration he made, rather to agree to peace, then to resolue of warre. Howbeit Scipio that liued in hope to bring this warre to a good end, would not seeme to giue eare to any peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either side, in the end they brake off, & made no agreemẽt. Shortly after, was this famous battel striken by the city of ZAMA, in ỹ which the ROMAINS obtained victory. For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army, so that they did put all Hannibals horsemen out of order. And Lælius and Masinissa, who made both the wings, increasing their feare, gaue the horsemen no leisure to gather themselues in order againe. Howbeit the footmen fought it out a long time, and with a maruellous great courage: insomuch that the CARTHAGINIANS (trusting in their former victory) thought that all the safety and preseruation of AFRICKE, was all in their hands, and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMAINES on the other side had as great hearts as they, and besides, they stood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeed did the ROMAINES great seruice to helpe them to the victory: and that was, Lælius and Masinissaes returne from the chase of the horsemen, who rushed into the battell of the enemy with great furie, and did put them in a maruellous feare. For at their coming, the CARTHAGINIANS hearts were done, and they saw no other remedy for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were slaine that day, aboue twenty thousand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more prisoners. Hannibal their Generall, after he had taried to see the end of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the great slaughter. Afterwards when he was sent for to CARTHAGE, to helpe to saue his country, he perswaded the Senate not to hope any more in wars, but did coũsel them, that setting all deuices apart, they should send vnto Scipio the ROMAINE Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condition. When the ten Ambassadors had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto CARTHAGE of the articles of peace, it was reported that there was one Gisgo, who misliking to heare talke of peace, made an Oration, and perswaded all he could to renew warre against the ROMAINES. Wherefore Hannibal perceiuing that diuerse men confirmed his opinion, and being much offended to see such beasts, & men of no vnderstanding, to dare to speake of such matters, in so dangerous a time: he cast himselfe downe headlong, whilest he was yet in his Oration. So when he saw that the citizens and all the whole assembly thought this too presumptuous a part of him, & vnmeet altogether for a free citie, he himself got vp into the pulpit for Orations, and said: Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth had bene alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought vp all his life time in wars, be ignorant of the lawes & ordinances of the city. After that, he spake so wisely of the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moued by the authority of so great a person, they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquisher, & the necessitie of time offered them. The articles out of doubt were very extreme, and such as the vanquished are wont to receiue with all extremity by the conquerours. But besides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMAINES an annuall tribute, vntill a certaine time were run out. So when the day came that the first pension was to be

payed to the Romaines, and that euery man grudged when the subsidie was spoken of: some say, that Hannibal being offended with the vaine teares of the Carthaginians, he fell a laughing. And when Hasdrubal Haedus reproued him because he laughed in such a common calamity of all the city, he answered, that it was no laughter nor reioycing from the heart, but a scorning of their fond teares, that wept when there was lesse cause (and onely because it touched euery priuate mans purse) then before, when the Romaines took from the Carthaginians their ships, armor, and weapons, and their spoiles of the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gaue lawes and ordinances vnto them that were vanquished. I know some Authors write, that Hannibal immediatly after he had lost the battel, fled into Asia, for that he was afraid they would deliuer him into Scipioes hands, that perhaps might demand him of them. But whether that was done suddenly, or some time after the battell was lost at Zama, it makes no great matter: considering that all the world knoweth, that when he saw things brought to extremity, he presently fled into Asia vnto king Antiochus. So it is most true, that king Antiochus receiued him with great courtesie, and vsed him very honorably: insomuch as he made him of councell with him all in all, both in priuate and publike causes. For the name of Hannibal caried great reputation with all men: besides that, he had a cõmon and mortal hate to the Romaines, which was a pricking spurre still to moue warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy houre into that countrey, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king against them, but also to set wars at liberty against the Romaines. So he told him, that the only way to make warre with the Romaines, was to go into Italy to leauy Italian souldiers, by whom only, that victorious countrey of all other nations might be subdued. He requested of the king a hundred ships, 16000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen onely. With this small army he promised to inuade Italy, and that he would maruellously trouble the Italians: whom he knew yet to stand in no small feare of him, for the very sound of his name onely, because of the late warres he had made there, so fresh yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke heart againe vnto him to renew the warres of Africke, if the king would licence him to send men vnto Carthage, to stirre vp the Barcinian faction, whom he knew hated the Romaines to death. When he had gotten the king to grant him his request, he called Ariston Tyrian vnto him, a fine subtle fellow, and meete for such a purpose: to whom he made large promises, and perswaded him to go to Carthage to his friends, and to carie them letters from him. Thus Hannibal being a banished man, and fled out of his countrey, raised warre in all parts against the Romaines. And surely his counsell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his aduice, as he did at the first, then the vaine perswasions of his fine courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes courts, bread Hannibal great enemies. For they being afraid that by his counsels he should grow in great fauour with the king (for he was a wise and politicke Captaine) and that thereby he should beare great sway and authority: to preuent it, they lacked no deuice to bring him in disgrace with the king. And it so chanced at that time that P. Villius, who came Ambassador vnto Ephesvs, had often conference with Hannibal. Hereupon his priuie enemies tooke occasion to accuse him, and withall, the king himselfe became so iealous of it, that from thenceforth he neuer more called him to counsell. At the selfe same time also, as some do report, Publius Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambassadours sent vnto king Antiochus) talking familiarly with Hannibal, prayed him amongst other things to tell him truly, whom he thought the worthiest Captaine of all others. Hannibal answered him. First he thought Alexander, king of Macedon the chiefest: next vnto him, Pyrrhus, king of the Epirotes: and thirdly, himselfe. Then Scipio African smiling, asked him: what wouldest thou say Hannibal, if thou hadst ouercome me? Truly said he, then I would be chiefest my selfe. This answer pleased Scipio maruellous wel, because he saw he was neither dispised, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peerelesse, by some secret flattery of Hannibal. After these things Hannibal found occasion to talke with king Antiochus, and began to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, & bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the Romaines: whereby he so satisfied the king, that he was againe receiued into his grace and fauour, which he had almost vtterly lost. Thereupon the king was determined to haue made him Admirall of his army by sea, the which he had put in readinesse for Italy, and also to make proofe of his great courage and seruice, whom he knew to be a worthie man, and a mortall enemie to the Romaines. But one Thoas, Prince of the Ætolians, thwarting this

this opinion, either for malice, or elſe for that his fancy was ſuch: he altered the kings mind, and cleane changed his purpoſe, the which was a matter of great importance for the war he pretẽded to make. For he gaue counſeil vnto Antiochus, that he ſhould go himſelfe into GRECE, & direct his own affaires: & that he ſhould not ſuffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this war. So king Antiochus ſhortly after went into GRECE, to make war with the ROMAINS. Within few daies after, when he cõſulted whether he ſhold make league with the THESSALIANS, Hannibals opinion was ſpecially asked: who ſpake ſo wiſely touching the ſtate of the THESSALIANS, & the chiefeſt matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, & gaue their conſents vnto it. Now his opinion was, that they ſhould not need much to care for ỹ THESSALIANS, but rather to make all the means they could, to get king Philip of MACEDON to take their part, or els to perſwade him to be a Newter, and to take neither part. Furthermore, he gaue counſell to make war with the ROMAINS in their own country, & offered himſelf to aid him the beſt he could. Euery man gaue good eare to his words, but his opinion was rather cõmended, then followed. Wherfore euery man maruelled, that ſuch a Captaine as he, that had ſo many yeares made warre with the ROMAINS (who had in maner conquered all the world) ſhould then be ſo light ſet by of the king, when it ſpecially ſtood him vpon, to haue ſuch a mans help & counſell. For, what captaine liuing could a man haue foũd more skilful or politike, or meeter to make war with the ROMAINS then him? Howbeit the king made no reckoning of him at the firſt beginning of this warre, but ſhortly after, diſdaining all their counſell, he confeſſed that Hannibal onely ſaw what was to be done. For after the ROMAINS had obtained victory in the warre he made in GRECE, Antiochus fled out of EVROPE into EPHESVS, where making merry, and following pleaſure, he hoped to liue in peace, litle thinking the ROMAINES would come with an army into ASIA. Now, theſe flattering courtiers fed ſtil his humor: a perpetuall plague to kings & princes, that ſuffer thẽſelues to be flattered, & are cõtented to be deceiued, becauſe they giue good eare to that that pleaſeth them. But Hannibal, who knew the power & ambition of the ROMAINES, perſwaded the king to hope for any thing rather then peace, & bad him truſt to it, that the ROMAINS would neuer ſtay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICK, & EVROPE. Antiochus perſwaded by the authority of ſuch a man, ſtraight cõmanded Polyxenidas, a very ſeruiceable man, & skilful in ſea ſeruice, that he ſhould go meet with the army of the ROMAINES that was coming thither. Then he ſent Hannibal into SYRIA, to leauy a great number of ſhips together, and afterwards made him and Apollonius (one of his fauoured courtiers) Generals of his army by ſea: who notwithſtanding that Polyxenidas was put to the worſt by the ROMAINS, they went & ſet vpon the RHODIANS, that were confederates with them. Hannibal in this battel aſſailing Eudamus the Captaine of the RHODIANS, that led the left wing, he had already compaſſed in the Admirall galley, and doubtleſſe had obtained the victory, but that ỹ other wing came in to reſcue, after they had followed Apollonius in chaſe, and tooke the victory from him, that was his owne. After this battell by ſea, which had no great good ſucces, we do not find that Hannibal did any thing worthy of memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, beſides other conditions, the ROMAINES offered him, they deſired that Hannibal (the mortall enemy of the countrey) ſhould be deliuered vnto them. Hannibal foreſeeing this long before, he ſuddenly ſtole from Antiochus, after this notable battell that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the kings power was ouerthrown. So, after Hannibal had wandred vp and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Pruſias king of BYTHINIA, for ſuccor. Now he did not ſo much truſt to his friendſhip, but becauſe he ſought for the meeteſt place he could come by, as alſo for the ſafeſt, the which he moſt deſired: conſidering that the ROMAINES had the moſt part of the ſea and land in their ſubiection. Some ſay, that after king Antiochus was ouercome, Hannibal went into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumour ran immediatly, he had brought a great maſſe of gold and ſiluer with him. Wherefore being afraid leſt the CRETANS ſhould offer him ſome violence, he deuiſed this ſhift to ſcape the danger: he filled earthen pots with lead gilt, and ſent them into the temple of Diana, faining that he was maruellous carefull for them, as though all his treaſure had bene there. On the other ſide he had hid all his gold in images of braſſe, the which he had left careleſly lying on the ground in the houſe. In the meane time, whileſt they watched the temple carefully, that theſe earthen pots ſhould not be caried away without their priuity, Hannibal hoiſed ſaile, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a village vpon the ſea ſide, which the countrey men cal LIBYSSA, of the

There Hannibal lay, not ſpending his time idly, but paſſing it away in exerciſing of the marriners, riding of horſes, and training of his ſouldiers. Some Authors alſo do write, that at that time Pruſias made war with Eumenes, king of PERGAMVS, who was a confederate and friend of the ROMAINS: and that he made Hannibal his Lieutenant generall of his army by ſea: who aſſailing Eumenes with a new found and vnknowne deuice, wan the victory of the battell by ſea, For before they began to fight, it is reported that Hannibal had gotten an infinite number of ſnakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begun, & they buſily tending their fight: he threw thoſe pots with ſnakes into the enemies ſhips, and that by this fearefull and ſtrange deuice he made them flie. Now whether this was true, or not, the old Chronicles do make no maner of mention, but only Æmylius and Trogus: and therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diſſention betwixt theſe two kings, Pruſias and Eumenes being brought to ROME, the Senate ſent T. Q. Flaminius Ambaſſador into ASIA, whoſe name was famous for the noble victories he had obtained in GREECE: to the end (as I conieƈture) to make peace betwixt theſe two kings. Flaminius being come vnto king Pruſias, he was maruellouſly offended, and ſory in his mind to ſee Hannibal yet aliue (that was the mortalleſt enemy of the ROMAINES) after the conqueſt of ſo many nations, and the ſacking of ſo many people: therefore he was very earneſtly in hand with king Pruſias, to deliuer him Hannibal. Hannibal from the firſt beginning miſtruſted king Pruſias inconſtancy very much, & therefore had digged diuerſe vaults in his houſe, & made ſeuen ſeuerall vents to flie out at, if he were ſuddenly taken. The report of Flaminius coming did increaſe his ſuſpitiō the more, for that he thought him the greateſt enemy he had in ROME: both generally for the hate he bare vnto all ỹ ROMAINS, as alſo particularly for the remēbrance of his father Flaminius, that was ſlaine in the battel fought by the lake of Thraſymene. So Hannibal being ful of care & griefe (as it is reported) he found deuices to eſcape, the which ſtood him to no purpoſe againſt ſuch a great power. For when the kings guard which were ſent to take him, had cōpaſſed his houſe about, Hannibal thought to flie at their firſt coming, & to ſaue himſelfe by the ſecreteſt vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the guard, then he determined to rid himſelf out of the ROMAINS hand, by deſtroying himſelf. So ſome do report, that he was ſtrangled by one of his men, whom he had cōmanded to helpe to diſpatch him. Others write againe, that he had drunke buls bloud, & when he had drunke it, died, as Clitarchus, & Stratocles do falſly report of Themiſtocles. Howbeit Titus Liuius, that famous Hiſtoriographer writeth, that Hannibal called for the poyſon he had ready for ſuch a miſchiefe, & that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke, he ſaid: Come on, let vs rid the ROMAINS of this paine & care, ſith their ſpite & malice is ſo great, to haſtē ỹ death of a poore old man, that is halfe dead already. The ancient ROMAINS aduertiſed Pyrrhus king of the EPIROTES, who came with enſignes diſplaied to the very wals of the city of ROME, that he ſhould looke to himſelf, & beware of poyſoning: and theſe ROMAINS now do make a friend forgetting his kingly ſtate & faithfull promiſe, vilely to betray his poore gueſt. After he had ſaid, bitterly curſing king Pruſias, he poyſoned himſelf, being 70 yeares old, as ſome writers do teſtifie. His body was buried in a tombe of ſtone by LIBYSSA, on the which was engrauen no more but this: Here lieth Hannibal. The ROMAINS being aduertiſed of his death, euery man ſaid his opinion, as his fancy ſerued him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius cruelty, who to make himſelfe famous by ſome notable act (as he thought) made a poore old man put himſelfe to death, that was in maner halfe dead by age, and beſides, was paſt doing the ſtate of ROME any more hurt, they being conquerors in maner, of all the world. But ſome again on the other ſide, commended Flaminius for it, & ſaid, it was a good deed of him, to rid the ROMAINES of their mortall enemy: who though he had a weake body, yet he lacked no wit, wiſe counſell, & great experience in warres, to intice king Pruſias to make war, & to moleſt all ASIA beſides, with new wars. For at that time, the power of ỹ king of BITHYNIA was ſo great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the ſame BITHINIA, did maruellouſly moleſt the ROMAINS both by ſea & by land, & moreouer fought battels with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the ROMAINES. And ſo the ROMAINES might alſo be afraid of Pruſias, and ſpecially hauing Hannibal his Captaine. So ſome iudge, that T. Q. Flaminius was ſpecially ſent Ambaſſador vnto king Pruſias, ſecretly to practiſe Hannibals death.

Howbeit

Howbeit it is to be ſuppoſed, that Q. Flaminius was not ſo deſirous to haue Hannibal ſo ſuddenly put to death, as he would haue bin glad otherwiſe to haue brought him again to ROME, that had done ſuch miſchiefe to his country: and this had bene a great benefit for ROME, & much honor alſo vnto himſelfe. Such was the death of Hannibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous man doubtleſſe, and highly to be commended for martial praiſe, ſetting his other vertues aſide. So we may eaſily iudge, of what power and force his noble mind, his great wiſdome and courage, and his perfit skill of martiall diſcipline was in all things. For in all the wars the CARTHAGINIANS had ſo vehemently, and with ſuch great preparation enterpriſed, they neuer thought themſelues ouercome, till Hannibal was ouerthrowne at that great battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth that all their ſtrength and skill of warres began, and alſo ended with Hannibal their Captaine.

THE LIFE OF Scipio African.

PVblius Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the family of the Cornely (who was the firſt ROMAINE Captaine againſt whom Hannibal fought in ITALIE) was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards ſurnamed African, the firſt: ſo called, becauſe he had conquered that nation. The ſame Scipio, after he had obtained many great victories in SPAINE, and done notable feates of armes, was in the end ſlaine with a wound he had in a battell againſt his enemies, as he was plying and encouraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greateſt danger and fury of the battell. Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio alſo end his life, much after one ſelf maner, & was ſlaine valiantly fighting. So theſe two Captains, beſides the fame they atchieued by their noble deeds, left behind the great praiſe of their faithfulneſſe, modeſty, & courage: the which made them not only wiſhed for of their ſouldiers that were then liuing, but alſo of all the SPANIARDS beſides. Cn. Scipio had a ſon called P. Cornelius Naſica, one that had bin Conſull, and had alſo triumphed: who being but a yong man, was thought the meeteſt man of all the city of ROME to receiue Idea the mother of the gods. This Publius had two ſonnes, the ſo famous Scipiones: of the which the one was called Aſian, becauſe he conquered ASIA: and the other African, becauſe he ſubdued AFRICKE at that famous battel of ZAMA, where he ouerthrew Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, as we ſaid before. Whoſe life we purpoſe now to write, not ſo much to make the glory of his name (ſo famous by all the Greeke and Latine Authors) the greater by our history, as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds, & morall vertues, to the end that all Princes and noble Captains in reading it, should behold the liuely image of perfit vertue, which many moue an earnest desire in thē to follow the example of P. C. Scipios life, who from his childhood gaue great hope and shew of a noble nature, and excellent vertue, after he followed the instruction of martiall discipline, vnder the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the second war with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but 17 yeares old, and in a very short time grew so toward and forward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all maner of paines like a souldier, that he wan great commendation of his own father, and besides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit and noble courage, that he made him beloued, and also feared of his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Consull fought with Hannibal, by the riuer of Thesin: & some writers do affirme, that Cornelius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemy, had not his son Scipio saued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was so yong. After that also, at the battell that was fought by CANNES, to the great losse, and in maner vtter destruction of the Empire of ROME, when the 10000 men that fled to CANVSIVM, had all together with one consent referred the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, & vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very yong: the same Scipio shewed then by his deeds, what noble mind and courage was in him. For when he saw certaine yong men consult together betweene themselues to forsake ITALY, he thrust in among them, and drawing out his sword, made them all sweare they would not forsake their country. These, and such like deeds done by him with a liuely courage and noble mind, being then but a yong man, wan him such fauour with the ROMAINES, that not respecting his yong yeares, nor their ancient custome, they called him forward, & laid offices of great charge and gouernment vpon him. Insomuch that when he sued for the office of Ædilis before his due time, notwithstanding that the Tribunes of the people were against his suite, because he was so young a man: yet the people suffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, and so was presently chosen Ædilis with the most voyces. So after his father and vnkle (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene slaine one after the other in SPAINE, and that the ROMAINES were in consultation to appoint some worthy Captaine in the roome: they could find no man that durst vndertake this so dangerous war, considering the losse of two so great Captaines before. Wherfore the whole assembly being called to chuse a Viceconsul, all the other Princes and Peeres of the Realme being silent at so worthy a motion; Scipio only of all the rest, being but 24 yeares old, stood vp in the middest of them, and said, with a good hope and confidence he wold willingly take the charge vpon him. He had no sooner offered this promise, but he was presently made Viceconsull of SPAINE, with the wonderfull good wil and fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voices. Howbeit the Senators afterwards considering better of the matter, against what Captains and nations he should make warre, they thought it vnpossible so yong a man could performe so weighty a charge. Wherfore mens minds were wonderfully changed againe on the sudden, as if the tribes of the people had repented them of their voices & election. Scipio perceiuing it, called an assembly presently, and made such an Oration of his age, and discipline of wars, that euery man that heard him wondred at him, and the people began againe to renew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not only a noble courage in him, being indued with so many singular vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, and very comly of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance: all which things together, are great meanes to win him the loue and good will of euery man. Moreouer, euen in his gesture and behauior, there was a certaine Princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline being ioyned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature, it was to be doubted, whether ciuil vertues made him more acceptable vnto strangers, then wonderfull for his skill in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples hearts with a certaine superstitious feare, because he did daily (after he had taken the mans gowne) vse to go vp to the Capitoll, and so into the Church without any company: insomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret things in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymph Ægeria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in old time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wit, that oftentimes there was a snake seene in his mothers chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with ten ten thousand footemen, and a fleete of thirty galleys, euery one of them hauing fiue oares to a banke, he sailed into SPAINE: & in few daies arriuing at EMPORIA, he landed his men, and marched by land to TARRACON. There he kept a councell, and many Ambassadors of the cities their confederates came thither, who being courteously receiued, returned to their lodgings with such answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the warre he had taken vpon him, he thought it best to ioyne the remain of the old bands with his army, which had bin saued through the manhood and valiantnesse of Lucius Martius. For after both the Scipioes were slaine, and both SPAINES almost lost, and the ROMAINE legions also ouerthrowne and put to flight, Lucius Martius a ROMAINE Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both armies, resisted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies puffed vp with glorie of the victorie they had gotten, and with great valiantnesse, and vnspeakeable industrie he maintained warre in SPAINE, against three Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being come to this army that lay in garrison for the winter time, euery man did certainly perswade themselues that the warre should prosper: and when they saw him, they remembred their old Captaines, insomuch that there was neuer a souldier could haue his fill with looking vpon this young man. Howbeit, after he had commended the souldiers for their noble courage, not despairing for the calamity of their country, he greatly honored Lucius Martius: to shew, that who so trusteth in his owne vertues, need not enuy the glory of another man. So winter being past, he tooke the old and new bands out of the garrisons, and first of all determined to go & lay siege vnto new CARTHAGE. For of all the cities of SPAINE it was the wealthiest, and none more meete to make war both by sea & land, then that. Moreouer, the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed in this city all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the city, and castell. But the Captaines themselues were deuided in diuerse countries, to the end that they there might keepe the whole region frō spoile, least of all looking then, that CARTHAGE should be besieged. But Scipio hauing put all in readinesse, he came and besieged new CARTHAGE with all his army both by sea and land. This seemed to be a maruellous hard enterprise, and would continue long, both because the city was very strong of it selfe, and also for that the men within it were so couragious, that they did not only thinke themselues able to defend the city, but their hearts serued them also to make sallies out vpon the enemy, and to skirmish with them, euen to the very trenches of the ROMAINES campe. Howbeit it hapneth often, that what a man cannot obtaine by force, he may winne by industry. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or meare which is not farre from the wals of CARTHAGE, did ebbe and flow with the tide, and that it was passable by foord on that side where they might easiliest come to the wals: so, he thinking to imbrace this occasion, & that he could not possibly meete with a better deuice to take CARTHAGE: when he saw his time, he set his men in battell ray, and hauing deuided them into seuerall squadrons, gaue a more desperate assault vpon the city, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose out a band of the valianteſt men he had, and commanded them to wade ouer the lake, and to scale the wals on that side, where they within the towne made least account of it. So, these souldiers that were commanded to giue this attempt, after they had passed ouer the lake without any let or trouble, they found that part of the wall without any watch or guard, because the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other side of the citie. Therefore they easily getting vp on the wall, came and assailed the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of the garrison, perceiuing they were vnwares fallen into that great danger, they immediatly forsooke the wals, and seeing themselues charged on euery side, betooke them to their legges, and fled. The ROMAINES pursued them so hotly, that they wan the citie, and sacked it: where they found a wonderfull great spoile, and abundance of all things necessarie for warre. Scipio greatly praised his souldiers, and did reward them, for that they had done so valiant seruice. Howbeit when he should come to giue the scaling crowne of the wals, vnto the first man that got vp vpon the wals, there were two souldiers at such variance for the matter, that all the army was in danger of diuision and mutiny vpon that occasion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open assembly told them, that he knew they both got vp on the wall together, and so gaue them both a scaling crowne: and by this meanes their tumult was presently pacified. Afterwards he sent vnto all the cities of SPAINE, the hostages that were found in ỹ city, which were a maruellous number: the which wanne him great fame for his courtesie and clemencie, whereby he allured many nations to yeeld themselues vnto the ROMAINES, and to forsake the

CARTHAGINIANS. But one thing aboue all the reſt chiefly increaſed his praiſe, and wanne him great loue and goodwill, as a mirrour and example of all vertue. There was a yong Ladie taken priſoner, that in beautie excelled all the women in CARTHAGE: whom he carefully cauſed to be kept and preſerued from violence and diſhonour. And afterwards when he knew that ſhe was maried vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS, he ſent for her husband, that was a very yong man, and deliuered her vnto him, vntouched or diſhonoured. Luceius not forgetting his noble courteſie vnto her, did let all his ſubiects vnderſtand the great bountie, modeſtie, and rare excellencie of all kind of vertues that were in this ROMAINS General, and ſhortly after, he returned again to the ROMAINES camp with a great number of horſmen. The three Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Haſdrubal, the ſonne of Giſgo) knowing that the loſſe of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other ſtrange nations: as alſo by the cõiecture diuers made of the ſucceſſe of this war: they firſt practiſed to diſſemble the loſſe of it, and then in ſpeech to make light of it, as much as they could. Scipio hauing ioyned to him diuers nations and Princes of SPAINE, (among the which were the two litle kings, Mandonius and Indibilis,) vnderſtanding where Haſdrubal BARCINIAN lay, he marched towards him with his army to fight with him, before Mago and the other Haſdrubal came to ioyne with him. Haſdrubal BARCINIAN lay in campe by the riuer of Beſula, & was very deſirous to fight, truſting wholy to his ſtrength and army: but when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of prety ſtrength. The ROMAINS legions followed him, and gaue him no reſpite, but purſued ſo neare, that he came and aſſaulted his campe at the firſt coming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampires, as if they had bene at the aſſault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIANS truſting to the ſtrength of the place, and driuen vnto it of neceſſitie (which maketh cowards moſt deſperate,) they valiantly reſiſted their enemies the beſt they could. The ROMAINS in contrary maner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out luſtily like men, and the fight was ſo much more cruell, for that it was in the ſight of their Generall Scipio, & of all the army beſides: inſomuch that their valiant ſeruice there could not be hidden. Therfore they neuer gaue ouer the aſſault, vntill that hauing done their vttermoſt indeuour, they got vp vpon the rampiers, and entred in diuers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Haſdrubal Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, ſaued himſelfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMAINES entred into their fort. After this battel, Scipio according to his maner, cauſed all the Spaniſh priſoners to be brought before him, and then gaue them libertie to depart without paying of ranſome. Among the priſoners, there was a yong Gentleman of the kings bloud, & nephew vnto Maſiniſſa, whõ when he had vſed very honourably, he ſent vnto Maſiniſſa, with great and rich gifts: to ſhew therby, that a Generall of an armie, ſhould be as bountifull and full of ciuill vertues, as otherwiſe skilfull and expert in martial diſcipline. For the end of war is victorie: the benefite whereof conſiſteth in bounty and clemencie. From thence cometh the glorie and all other praiſes due to Captaines: as it happened in thoſe things whereof we now treate. For a great number of SPANIARDS being preſent, wondering at the great clemencie of the General of the ROMAINS, they could do no leſſe but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Scipio ſtrake that word dead ſtraight, the which was no cõmon ſound to the ROMAINES eares, & therfore he would by no means allow that title, which he knew to be hateful to the Noble men of his coũtry, & alſo vnmeet for the liberty of the ROMAINES. He only prayed the SPANIARDS, that if they had any mind & deſire not to ſhew themſelues vnthankfull to him, that then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of ROME. So whileſt theſe things were done by Scipio, the other two Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Haſdrubal the ſonne of Giſgo) after they vnderſtood of the ouerthrow of their men by the riuer of Beſula, made all the ſpeede they could to ioyne together: and ſhortly after came and met with Haſdrubal BARCINIAN, to conſult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and conſidered all things, they concluded thus: that Haſdrubal BARCINIAN ſhould go into ITALIE to his brother Hannibal, where the warre was greateſt: and that Mago, and the other Haſdrubal ſhould remaine in SPAINE, ſhould ſend for aide from CARTHAGE, & ſhould not fight with the ROMAINS vntil all their forces looked for, were aſſembled, and ſo might make a great and puiſſant army. When Haſdrubal was gone into ITALY, Hanno was ſent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practiſing in his iourney to make the CARTHAGINIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and ſet vpon him by Scipioes commandement, and

and was ſo fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him priſoner. Now there was a city which the country men called ORINGE, the which was very wealthy, & meete to renew ỹ war. Lucius Scipio was ſent thither with part of the army to beſiege it: but finding it a very ſtrong ſituation, and too well manned to take it at the firſt aſſault, he enuironed the towne, and within few daies took & ſacked it. Winter came on apace, & the time of the yeare made thẽ both to retire into their garriſons, for the winter. So Scipio hauing had ſo good fortune in this war, he went vnto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Haſdrubal, the ſonne of Giſgo, went to the ſea ſide, The next ſommer, wars growing more bloudy & cruell then before in the lower SPAINE, the ROMAINES & CARTHAGINIANS met, and ioyned battell by the riuer of Beſula, & fought ſet battels. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victory, and made the enemies flie (of the which there were ſlaine a great number in the field) and giuing them no leiſure to gather together againe, and to make head againſt him, he fought with them, & followed the chaſe ſo hotly, that Haſdrubal and Mago were driuen to leaue the maine land, & to flie to GADES, after they had loſt all their army. In the army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a yong man of a noble courage, and very wiſe, called Maſiniſſa, who finding meanes to haue ſecret conference with Syllanus, he was the firſt man that offered him friendſhip, either being brought to it through Scipioes liberality, or elſe becauſe he thought the time was come, that it was the ſureſt way to take part with the ROMAINS, which were the conquerors. It is that Maſiniſſa that afterwards (through the goodneſſe of the ROMAINES) became the great and mighty king of NVMIDIA, and indeed he was diuerſe waies a profitable friend vnto the ROMAINES. Furthermore, the ſelfe ſame yeare (which was the fourteenth of the ſecond war with the AFRICANS) SPAINE was the firſt nation and people of the vpland men dwelling in the heart of the Realme, that was conquered vnder the happy conduct of the Viceconſull Scipio: howbeit it was the laſt Realme that was made a prouince long time after, by Auguſtus Cæſar. Now Scipio not cõtenting himſelfe with the great victories he had obtained, in very ſhort time in SPAINE (for he had an imaginatiõ and good hope alſo to conquer AFRICK) he thought it his beſt way, to make all the meanes he could poſſible, to get Syphax king of the MASÆSYLIANS, a friẽd to the ROMAINS. Wherfore after he had felt the kings mind, perceiuing that he was well inclined to make league with the ROMAINES, he preſently ſet all his other affaires aſide, & ſailed into AFRICK with two galleys only, at fiue oares to a banke. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo came Haſdrubal, the ſon of Giſgo thither, from GADES: ſo that both theſe valiant and luſty Captaines came of purpoſe to the king, enuying one the other, to craue the kings good will, vnto their countrey and commonwealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his court, and did vſe them very honourably and courteouſly, and appointed that they ſhould both eate at one table, and lie in one ſelfe chamber, becauſe the one ſhould not thinke his entertainment better then the other. It is reported that Haſdrubal wondering at the magnanimity & great wiſdome of Scipio that was preſent, he conſidered with himſelfe the great danger the city of CARTHAGE and all AFRICKE beſides was in, through that mans meanes: for he ſaw him yet a yong man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, and that had continually obtained ſuch victories: and therefore conſidering the luſty youth of this gentleman, he imagined that it was impoſſible to perſwade him to embrace peace, rather then warre. Beſides, he was afraid alſo that Syphax, moued by the perſonage and authoritie of him that was preſent, would take part with the ROMAINES: and indeed his mind gaue him rightly, for ſo it happened. For though Syphax at the firſt ſhewed himſelfe indifferent to them both, & had moued talke to end the war betwixt the ROMAINS and the CARTHAGINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio told him he could conclude no peace without conſent of the Senate of ROME, he reiected Haſdrubal, and inclining to Scipioes requeſt, he made league with the people of ROME. So Scipio being returned againe into SPAINE, himſelfe partly by force, and partly alſo by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITVRGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refuſed to yeeld themſelues vnto the ROMAINES. And to the end nothing ſhould be lacking for all kind of ſports and pleaſures, after he had ſo fortunately obtained ſo many famous victories: when he was come to new CARTHAGE, he cauſed the fencers to prepare thẽſelues to fight with great pompe, where there were many great eſtates, not onely to ſee that paſtime, but alſo they themſelues to handle the weapons in perſon. But amongſt other SPANIARDS of noble houſes, there were two called, Corbis and Orſua, which were at ſtrife together for the kingdome: but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being ſlaine by the others hand. The fight was very lamentable and grieuous to the beholders: but the death of him that was ſlaine, troubled them much more, for they were both couſin-germains. After all this, Scipio hauing his mind ſtill occupied in matters of greater weight & importance, then thoſe which he had already brought to paſſe, he fell ſicke. His ſickneſſe being caried through all SPAINE, and as it happeneth often, his diſeaſe being reported to be much greater and dangerous then it was indeed: thereupon, not onely the nations of SPAINE began to riſe in hope of change, but the army it ſelf alſo of the ROMAINES, the which he had left at SVCRO. Firſt of all, martiall diſcipline was corrupted through the abſence of the Generall. Afterwards alſo, the report of his ſickneſſe, and danger of his life being ſpred abroad in the armie, raiſed ſuch a rebellion among them, that ſome of them little regarding the authoritie and commandement of the head Captaines of the bandes, they drawe them away, and choſe two meane ſouldiers for their Captaines; who preſumptuouſly tooke vpon them the name giuen vnto them by men of no authoritie, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundles of roddes and axes to be caried before them. Such folly doth furie and vaine ambition oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other ſide, the SPANIARDS ſlept not, & ſpecially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aſpiring to the kingdome of SPAINE, came to Scipio when he was conquerour, after he had taken new CARTHAGE. But afterwards, being offended to ſee the power of the ROMAINES increaſe daily, they ſought occaſion to made ſome alteration. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipioes ſickneſſe, but alſo how he was at deaths doore, and did beleeue it: they preſently leauied an army, and went and made warre with the SWESSITANS which were confederates of the ROMAINS. But Scipio being recouered again of his ſickneſs, like as vpon the falſe rumour of his death euery man began to riſe: euen ſo after the truth was known indeed of his recouery, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durſt proceed any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skilfull in martial diſcipline, then acquainted with ſedition and rebellion, although he was maruellouſly offended with the ſouldiers that had committed this folly; yet in the end, leſt following his anger, men ſhould haue thought him to haue exceeded all bounds of reaſon in puniſhing of them, he referred all vnto the Conſull. The moſt part of them gaue aduice, that the authours of the rebellion ſhould be puniſhed, and all the reſt pardoned: for by this meanes, ſaid they, the puniſhment ſhall light vpon a few that haue deſerued it, and all the reſt ſhall take example by them. Scipio followed that aduice, and preſently ſent for all the ſeditious bands, to come to new CARTHAGE to receiue their pay. The ſouldiers obeyed his commandement, ſome of them making their fault leſſe then it was, as men do often flatter themſelues: others alſo truſting to the Captaines clemencie, as knowing him not to be extreme in puniſhment. For Scipio was wont to ſay, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then to kill a thouſand enemies. This rumour ran alſo, that Scipio had another army readie, the which he looked for to ioyne with them, and then to ſet vpon the kings (Mandonius and Indibilis) who made warre with the SWESSITANS. Theſe ſouldiers departing from SVCRO, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came vnto CARTHAGE. Howbeit the next day after they were come into the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armor and weapons being taken from them, they were enuironed with all the legions armie. Then the ROMAINE Generall ſitting in place of iudgement, ſhewed himſelf before all the company in as good health and good diſpoſition of body, as euer he was in all his youth. Then he made a ſharpe and bitter oration, full of grieuous complaints: inſomuch as there was not one of all the ſouldiers that were vnarmed, that durſt caſt vp their eyes, or looke their Generall in the face, they were ſo aſhamed. For their conſciences did accuſe them for the fault they had committed, and the feare of death did take their wits and ſences from them, & the preſence of their gracious Captaine, made them bluſh as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherfore there was a generall and ſorowfull ſilence of all men. So after he had ended his oration, he cauſed the chiefe authors of this rebellion to be brought forth before the whole aſſembly: who after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were preſently beheaded, the which was a feareful and lamentable ſight to the beholders. Theſe matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other ſoldiers to be ſworne again, and then went and proclaimed war againſt Mandonius and Indibilis. For they conſidering with themſelues, how the ROMAINE ſouldiers that had rebelled in the camp, were put to death, they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leauied an armie of twenty thouſand footmen and two thouſand horſemen, and came downe with them againſt the ROMAINS. Scipio hauing intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increaſe their army, & that;

that other nations could rebell: he departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great speed as he could, to meet with ỹ enemy. The kings were camped in a very strong place, & trusted so to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor [illegible] to refuse ỹ battel if it were offered them. Howbeit it chanced by the neareneſſe of both campes, that within few daies, they being prouoked by the ROMAINS, came downe and set their men in battell ray, & ioyned battel with Scipio: so that a good while together, the fight was very bloudy & cruell. But at length the SPANIARDS seeing themselues compaſſed in behind, & being driuen to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on euery side, they were ouercome: so that the third part of them scarcely saued thẽ-selues by flying. Mandonius and Indibilis seeing themselues vtterly vndone, and that there was no hope nor remedy left, they sent Ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receiue them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMAINS; yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemy by curteſie and clemency, then by force: he did pardon them, & only commanded them to giue him mony to pay his souldiers. In the meane time Maſiniſſa came from GADES, & landed: becauſe he would himſelfe in perſon confirme the friendſhip he had offered Scipio in his abſence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, & also speake with him face to face, whõ he iudged to be a worthy man, for the famous victories he had obtained. And in truth Maſiniſſa was not deceiued in the opinion he had of the valiantnes & vertues of Scipio, but found him the ſelfe ſame man whom he before had imagined him to be in his mind: the which but ſeldome happeneth ſo notwithſtanding. For beſides the great rare gifts of nature that Scipio had aboue all others, there was in him alſo a certain princely grace and maieſty. Furthermore, he was maruellous gentle & courteous vnto them that came to him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a paſſing gift to win euery man. He was very graue in his geſture & behauior, and euer ware long haire. Maſiniſſa being come to ſalute him, when he ſaw him, he had him in ſuch admiration, as it is reported, that he could not caſt his eyes off him, nor haue his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him maruellouſly for ſending his nephew vnto him, & promiſed him that his deeds ſhould confirme & witneſſe the friendſhip agreed vpon betweene them: the which he euer after inuiolably kept vnto the ROMAINES, euen to the houre of his death. So all the nations of SPAINE became ſubiect to the Empire of ROME, or at the leaſt their cõfederates: wherupon thoſe of GADES alſo following ỹ example of others, came & yeelded themſelues vnto the ROMAINS. This is a very ancient nation, & if we may credit the report of it, as CARTHAGE was in AFRICK, & THEBES in BOEOTIA; ſo was GADES vpõ ỹ ſea, a Colony of the TYRIANS. Scipio after he had cõquered al SPAINE, & driuen out the CARTHAGINIANS, conſidering that there remained nothing more for him to do, he left the gouernment of the prouince vnto L. Lentulus, & to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to ROME. When he was arriued at ROME, the Senate gaue him audience out of the city, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he had particularly told them of the things he had valiantly and fortunately brought to end: and further, that he had ouercome foure Captaines in diuerſe foughten fields, and alſo put to flight foure armies of the enemies, and driuen the CARTHAGINIANS out of both SPAINES, and that there was no nation left in all thoſe parts, but was ſubdued to the ROMAINES: the Senate gaue iudgemẽt, that al theſe things were worthy of a noble triũph. But becauſe neuer man yet was ſuffered to enter into ROME in triumph, for any victories he had obtained, whileſt he was only but Viceconſull, and had not yet bene Conſull: The Senators thought it not good, and Scipio himſelfe alſo made no great ſuite for it, becauſe he would not be an occaſion, to bring in any new cuſtome, and to breake the old. So when he came into the city, he was afterwards declared Conſull, with the great goodwill and conſent of the whole aſſembly. It is reported that there neuer came ſuch a world of people to ROME, as were there at that time, not only for ỹ aſſemblies ſake, but more to ſee Publius Cornelius Scipio. Wherefore not the ROMAINES onely, but all the ſtrangers alſo that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and ſaid both openly and priuately: that they ſhould ſend him into AFRICKE, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, at home in their owne countrey. Scipio alſo being of the ſame opinion, ſaid, that he would aske aduice of the people, if the Senate would be againſt ſuch a worthy enterpriſe. For amongſt the Peeres and Senators, there were ſome that vehemently inueyed againſt that opinion, and amongſt the reſt, Fabius Maximus ſpecially, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and ſhewed many reaſons that there was no way to ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to driue Hannibal out of ITALY, but that only: and that all other counsels were in vaine,& vnprofitable. After this matter was long debated in councel, Sicile was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with his army into Africke, if he thought it meete and profitable for the commonwealth. The decree of the Senate being published, euery mans mind ran of so great enterprises, that they perswaded themselues Africke was already their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio saw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this iourney, because of the pouerty of the common treasure, and for lacke of yong men, the flower and choise of the which was vtterly gone, by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Hannibal had giuen them. Howbeit to satisfie euery mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speed he could, to prepare things necessary for the warres. So diuerse people of Thvscan, and of the Vmbrians, offered to help him to their best power: some of them gaue him timber to build his ships, others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kind of victuals, and munition for his army.

Scipio prepared his armie and navie by sea in fiue and fortie dayes.

The ships being built, and all the army by sea put in a readinesse, in the space of fiue and fortie dayes, a thing incredible to many, Scipio departed out of Italie, and sailed towards Sicile. But when he came to take muster of his army, he specially chose those that had serued long time in the warres, vnder the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for very expert souldiers. And for the Sicilians, he partly wanne them by courtesie, and partly by compulsion compelled them to giue him aid for the war he tooke in hand, the which he meant to make in Africke, when the time of the yeare should serue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of diuerse cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the said prouince, and commanded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, euery man with horse and armour. They then coming at the day appointed, according to his commandement, the Consull bad them chuse whether they would follow him in the warres of Africke, or els deliuer vp their armor and horse to as many other Romaines as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the warre, Scipio appointed 300. other yong Romaines in their places, whom he had brought out of Italy with him vnarmed, because he would mount & arme them at the Sicilians cost, as indeed it chanced. Afterwards they did him great seruice in Africk, in many great battels. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his army in garrison for the winter time, when he came to Syracvsa, taking order not only for the preparation of war, but also for the affaires of Sicile. There when it was told him by complaint of diuers, that there was a great company of Italian souldiers in that city, who wold not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the wars, but kept thē still in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enioyned them by speciall cōmandement to make restitution to the Syracvsans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commandement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hearts of Sicile, and was reported to be a iust and vpright Consull. In the meane time he was aduertised by Caius Lælius, that returned out of Africke with great spoile, how king Masinissa was very desirous of his coming thither, and that he instantly prayed him he would come into Africke, as soone as he could possible, so it were without the preiudice of the commonwealth. Moreouer, that diuerse nations and people of Africke had the like desire: who hating the gouernment of the Carthaginians, desired nothing more then some good occasion to rebell. Now this iourney was not deferred through Scipioes fault or negligence, considering that such a Captaine could hardly be found that was more careful & diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affaires of Sicile, and the oportunity he had to recouer Locres again, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpose to passe according to his mind. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieued him much, because that hauing left him at Locres, he fell to all sorts of insolencie, as to defloure women, and to spoile the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruellously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subiect to the gouernment of so vile and wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of Locres being arriued at Rome, and exhibiting their complaints in open Senate, of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter so grieuously, that they made bitter decrees, not only against the same Pleminius, but also against P. C. Scipio himselfe. Whereupon Scipioes enemies hauing gotten matter inough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offered the Locrians, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had

ſuffered all theſe things more negligently, then became the office or duty of a Conſul. They added thereto moreouer, that his army he had in SICILE was altogether vnruly & vnſeruiceable, and regarded not the ordinances of the camp: and that the captaine himſelf was careleſſe, and altogether giuen ouer to pleaſure & idleneſſe. But aboue al others Fabius Maximus was his heauy enemie, and ſo vehement againſt him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modeſtie and reaſon, and thought good to call him preſently home out of SICILE, and to diſmiſſe him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very ſtraight, & extreme. Wherfore, following Quintus Metellus counſell, the Senators appointed ten Ambaſſadors to go into SICILE, to make diligent inquiry, whether the accuſations obiected againſt Scipio were true: and if they found him in fault, that then they ſhould command him in the name of the Senate preſently to returne into ITALY. And on the other ſide, if they found that he was vniuſtly accuſed, and onely through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detracters: thē that they ſhould ſend him to his army, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this war. So when the Ambaſſadors were arriued in SICILE, after they had made diligent inquiry according to the articles of their cōmiſſion, they could not finde that Scipio was faulty in any thing, ſauing that he had too lightly paſſed ouer the wrongs and iniuries Pleminius had done vnto the LOCRIANS. For Scipio was very liberall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding curteous, & merciful alſo in puniſhing of them. But when they ſaw his army, his ſhips, and all his other furniture & munition for war: it is reported that they wondered ſo much to ſee the great abundance, and good order taken for al things, that when they returned to ROME, they greatly commended Scipio, and reiecting all the accuſations of his accuſers, they did promiſe the Senat & people of ROME aſſured hope of victory. So when al theſe home-troubles at ROME were takē away, there chanced other outward troubles abroad that grieued him much. For ỳ Ambaſſadors of king Syphax came and told him, that their maſter had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, & was become friend vnto Haſdrubal, whoſe daughter he had maried: and therfore that he wiſhed him if he meant to do his country good, to make no attempt vpon AFRICKE, for he was determined to reckon the CARTHAGINIANS his friends, & alſo to ſet vpon them whō the CARTHAGINIANS account their enemies. Scipio quickly returned the ambaſſadors againe vnto Syphax, becauſe the effect of their comming ſhould not be blown abroad in his camp: and gaue them letters, in which he praid king Syphax, that remembring his league & faithful promiſe, he ſhold beware he attempted nothing vnworthy the name of a ROMAIN, & faith of a king. Afterwards calling his men together, he told them that the Ambaſſadors of king Syphax were come into SICILE, to cōplain of his long tarying, as Maſiniſſa had done before. Therfore he was to haſten his iourny to go into AFRICK, and therupon commanded all his ſouldiers to put themſelues in readineſſe, and to prouide all things neceſſary for their iourny. The Conſuls cōmandement being publiſhed through al SICILE, there repaired immediatly vnto LILYBEA a multitude of people, not only of thoſe that were to ſaile into AFRICK, but of others alſo that came to ſee the fleete & army of the ROMAINES: becauſe they neuer ſaw an army better furniſhed, nor ſet out with all things neceſſary for warre, nor better repleniſhed with ſouldiers, then that. So Scipio, al things being ready imbarked at LILYBEA with ſo earneſt a deſire to paſſe ouer the ſea, that neither oares nor wind did cōtent his mind. Yet he was brought in few daies ſailing, to the promontory or mountaine called Faire, & there he put all his men on land. The newes of his arriual flying ſtraight to CARTHAGE, al the city was preſently in ſuch an vprore, that ſodainly they ſounded the alarme, and guarded the gates & walles, as appeareth by teſtimony of ſome in writing. For from M. Regulus time vnto that preſent day, it was almoſt fifty yeers ſpace ſince any ROMAIN captain euer entred AFRICK with force of armes. And therfore it was no maruell though they were afraid, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did increaſe their feare the more, becauſe the CARTHAGINIANS had no captaine matchable with him. Haſdrubal the ſonne of Giſgo had the name at that time of a luſty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithſtanding bene ouercome, and driuen out of SPAINE by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope and ſafety of their country in him, and in king Syphax that mighty king: they neuer left intreating the one nor perſwading the other, to come and help the affaires of AFRICK, with al the ſpeed they could poſſible. So, whileſt theſe two were preparing to ioyne both their armies together, Hannibal the ſon of Hamilcar, being appointed to keepe the next country adioyning to it, came againſt the ROMAINES. Scipio after he had deſtroyed the country, and enriched his army with great ſpoile, he camped by the city of VTICA, to ſee if it were poſſible for him to win ſo noble and wealthy a city, and being besides so commodious for the wars both by sea and land. At the selfesame time Masinissa came to the ROMAINS camp, and was inflamed with a vehement desire to make war against king Syphax, by whom he had before bin driuen out of his kingdom & inheritance. Scipio that had known him in SPAINE, a yong Prince of an excellent wit, & quick & valiant of his hand, he sent him to discouer the army of the enemies, before the CARTHAGINIANS could gather any greater power, and willed him to vse al the deuice and meanes he could possible to intice Hanno to fight. Masinissa as he was commanded, began to prouoke the enemie, and drawing him out by litle & litle, he brought him where Scipio lay with al his legions armed, looking for a good houre to fight. The army of the enemies was now wearied, when the ROMAINES came to set vpon them with their fresh army. Hanno at the first onset was ouercome & slaine, with most of his men: and all the rest fled and dispersed themselues here and there, where they thought they might best scape. After this victory, Scipio returning back againe to besiege the city of VTICA, the sodaine coming of Hasdrubal and king Syphax, made him to leaue off his enterprise, for that they brought with them a great army both of footmen and horsemen, and came and camped not far from the ROMAINES. Scipio perceiuing that, raised his siege immediatly, and came and fortified his camp vpon a hill, from whence he might go and fight with the enemy, and molest them of VTICA, and also keepe his ships safe that rode at anker. Howbeit the time of the yeare being come, that both armies were to dispose their mē in garrisōs for the winter season, he determined to send vnto king Syphax to feele his mind, and to make him leaue the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS if it were possible. For he knew wel it was his mariage with Sophonisba, which through her flattering perswasiōs had broght him to that fury, that he had not only forsaken the friendship of the ROMAINES, but also meant to destroy them, contrary to his faith and promise: and that if he had once satisfied the heate of his loue with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax hauing vnderstood Scipioes message sent him, he answered, that indeed it was time, not only to leaue the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but also to giue vp all thought of war; and so promised, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Scipio gaue good eare vnto it, and caught hold of an excellent fine deuice. He chose the valianteſt souldiers in his army, apparelled them like slaues, and made them waite vpon the Ambassadors, and gaue them instructions what they should do. These fellowes, whilest the Ambassadors and King Syphax were in talke together about the articles and conditions of peace, and that the consultation held longer then it was wont to do, they went and walked vp and downe through the enemies campe, to see all the waies and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes instructions. After they had done this diuers times, they came againe to Scipio. Truce was takē for a time, the which being expired, Scipio seemed to make preparation for wars, (as being out of hope of any peace) and to make his army ready by sea, preparing engines of battery to returne to besiege VTICA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumor through al the country, to perswade his enemies that it was true: howbeit hauing called the Captaines & pertie Captaines of his army together, he made them priuie to his intent and enterprise. He told them that both the enemies camps lay not farre asunder; of the which, the one of them had all their tents and cabines of wood; and the building of the other camp was all of reeds, so that they were both eafie to be burnt. Wherupon hauing sent for Masinissa and Caius Lelius to come vnto him, he gaue them charge about midnight to giue alarme vnto Syphax camp, and to set it on fire: & that he himselfe on the other side, would set vpon the CARTHAGINIANS camp. They two obeyed Scipioes commandement, performed his will without delay, & came at the houre appointed them to assaile the NVMIDIANS camp, and so did set the houses of reeds on fire; which took fire in such sort, as the flame was immediatly roūd about the camp. The NVMIDIANS at the first thinking the fire had come by misfortune, ranne thither straight vnarmed to quench it. But when they found themselues among the legions of the ROMAINES, and that there was nothing but killing downe right, seeing themselues so compassed in on al sides, they saw their best remedie was to flie. On the other side also, where Scipioes army was, the CARTHAGINIANS camp was almost al burnt, and the enemies put to flight with such cruell slaughter, that some writers affirme, there were slaine that night about forty thousand men, aswell CARTHAGINIANS as NVMIDIANS. This great ouerthrow and slaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in such a feare and terror, that some thought best to send for Hannibal out of ITALY, & others gaue aduice to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich and wealthy, and altogether against the peace

peace makers, they so preuailed, that they leauied a new power to begin war againe. King Syphax and Hasdrubal hauing leauied a great multitude of footmen and horsemen againe, renued their armie sooner then was looked for, & came againe to pitch their campe directly ouer against the enemies. Scipio hauing vnderstanding of that, would not tarie, but determined to giue the battel, whilest his men were in good heart & willing to fight. So it chanced at the first, by the nearenes of both their camps, that there were certaine skirmishes: but in the end, the armies came to ioyne battel, & the Romains fought with such courage & terror, that at the first onset they made the Numidians & Carthaginians flie, and slue the most part of them. Hasdrubal & Syphax escaped, by flying out of the slaughter. Scipio sent Masinissa and Caius Lelius with the light horsemen to giue the chase. Syphax being come into Numidia, and from thence into his own realme and kingdome, he leauied an army in hast of all sorts of people, and came to meete with Masinissa & Caius Lelius, & was not afraid to giue them battell. But it was a fond part of him, considering that he was nothing like so strong as his enemy, neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in likelihood of souldiers. For neither the souldiers nor captaines of his army were matchable with the souldiers and captaines of the Romaines camp: and therfore king Syphax was easily ouercome by such skilful souldiers, & moreouer was himselfe taken in battel, with many other great noble men, whom Masinissa would hardly haue looked for: and then they were brought vnto Scipio. At the first there was a maruellous ioy among them, when it was told them that king Syphax should be brought prisoner vnto the camp: but afterwards when they saw him bound, they were al sory to see him in such pitifull state, remembring his former greatnes & regall maiesty. For they called to mind how famous the name of this King had bin but a litle before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, & also the power of so great a realme & kingdome. Howbeit Scipio the Romain Consull receiued him very curteously, and gently asked him what he meant to change his mind in that sort, & what moued him to make war with the Romaines. Thē the king remēbring his former friendship & faithful promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the loue he bare to his wife Sophonisba, who only had procured him to deale so dishonorably with the Romaines: howbeit, that he had so smarted for it, as al others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreme misery to see that his mortal enemy Masinissa was so taken with that frenzie and mad humor, wher with he before was possessed. For after Syphax was ouercome & taken, Masinissa went into Cyrtha, the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonisba there, with whom he fel in fancie: who after she had finely wrapped him in with her deceitful flatteries & kindnes, he promised her also to deliuer her out of the Romains hands: and becausse he might the better performe his promise made, he took her to his wife & maried her. When Scipio was informed of these things, it grieued him maruellously. For it was knowne to all men, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, & through the Romains meanes: and therfore al that was belonging to Syphax, was at the disposition of the Romains. Wherfore if Masinissa had without Scipioes consent, vndertaken to defend Sophonisbaes quarell, then it appeared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consul, and the maiesty of the people of Rome. Furthermore, his filthy lust did aggrauate his fault the more, the which seemed so much more intolerable, by how much the cōtinēcy of the Romain Consul was the greater, the which Masinissa saw daily before his eyes, and might haue bene a paterne and example vnto him. For Scipio besides many other proofes & shewes of his vertues, in al places where he obtained victory, he alwaies kept the women vndefiled, which were take prisoners. So Scipio being offended with Masinissa, (though he shewed it not before company) receiued him very louingly at his returne to the camp: yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he so sharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a seuere captaine. Whereupon Masinissa went into his tent and wept, and could not tel what way he should take: howbeit shortly after, perceiuing that it was vnpossible for him to keep promise with Sophonisba, which grieued him to the heart: he sent her poyson, and a message withall; the which she dranke immediatly, and so willingly made her selfe away: Furthermore, the Carthaginians after they had receiued such wonderfull great losses & ouerthrowes, one after an other, perceiuing that their affaires were brought to such a straight & extremity, that they were no more to looke after the enlarging of their dominions, but only to consider which way they might keepe their own country: they sent for Hannibal to come out of Italy. Who returning with great speed into Africk, before he did any thing else, he thought good first to talke with

P. Scipio about peace: either becauſe he was afraid of the good fortune of this yong man, or elſe for that he miſtruſted he could not otherwiſe helpe his countrey and commonwealth, which he ſaw decaying & like to be deſtroyed. Wherfore a place was appointed, where they might meet according to his deſire: where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this war. In the end Scipio offered Hannibal ſuch conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the Romaines were not weary of war, and that Scipio himſelfe being a yong man, had better hope to obtaine victory, then great deſire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being ſet aſide, they brake off their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthy Captaines of the moſt noble nations that could be, prepared themſelues to battel, either to giue or take away in ſhort time from their common-weales, the ſeigniorie and Empire of all the world. The place where they employed al their force, and where this famous battel was fought, as it is reported, was by the city Zama: in the which the Romaines being conquerours, did firſt make the Elephants flie, then the horſemen, and in the end brake ſo fiercely into the footmen, that they ouerthrew al the armie. It is reported, that there were ſlaine & taken by the Romaines aboue forty thouſand Carthaginians. Hannibal fled out of the fury of the battel, & ſaued himſelf, though that day he had ſhewed himſelfe like a valiant & famous Captaine. For at this battell he had ſet his army in better order then euer he had done before, and had ſtrengthened it both with the commodity of the place, and reliefe beſide: and euen in the very fury and terror of the battel he ſo beſtirred himſelf among his ſouldiers, that the enemies themſelues did commend and praiſe him for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Vermina king Syphax ſon, that brought aide to the Carthaginians, he put him to flight, and came and brought his army to the walles and hauen of Carthage, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that the Carthaginians would ſue to him for peace. For, as the Carthaginians before had bene very good ſoldiers, and ready to make wars: ſo were they now become timorous and faint hearted, ſpecially when they ſaw their General Hannibal ouercome, in whom they chiefly repoſed al their hope & truſt, for defence of their country. Wherefore they being (as I haue ſaid) out of heart, ſent ambaſſadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accuſtomed clemencie, he would grant them peace. Now was great ſuite made at Rome, to haue the gouernmẽt of the prouince of Africk and one of the new Conſuls made haſte to come and make war, with ſuch charge and preparation as was meet for his dignity and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that another ſhould carie away the glory for ending of ſo great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the Carthaginian ambaſſadors requeſts. So the capitulation of the articles of peace was offered vnto the Carthaginians, according to the conquerors mind: and beſides al other things, the whole fleet of all their ſhips and gallies (in the which their hope conſiſted much) were taken frõ them. For when the whole fleet was burnt, it was ſuch a lamentable ſight vnto them al, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if Carthage had bin deſtroyed and razed to the very ground. For as ſome do write, there were fiue hundred ſhips burnt of all ſorts. Theſe things therfore ſhould make vs al beware of humane frailty, the which we often forget in our proſperity. For they that before perſwaded themſelues to conquer the world, after they had wonne ſo many great battels & victories of the enemy, and in maner conquered all Italy, and ſo valiantly beſides beſieged the city of Rome, were in ſhort time after brought to ſuch miſery and extremity, that all their power and force being ouercome, they had no more left them but the walles of Carthage, and yet they were not ſure to keepe them, but through the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the enemy. After theſe things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely reſtore King Maſiniſſa to his Realme againe, but alſo adding thereunto the beſt part of all king Syphax countrey, they made him one of the mightieſt kings of all Africk: and afterwards he gaue honourable gifts vnto euery man as he had deſerued. In fine, after he had ſet all the affaires of Africke at good ſtay, he brought his army back againe into Italy: at what time there came to Rome a world of people, to ſee ſo great & famous a captaine, returning from ſuch wonderfull great victories. So he entred into Rome with pompe of triumph, Terentius Culeo following him with a hat on his head, becauſe that through his fauor and friendſhip he was taken out of bondage. Polybius writeth, that king Syphax was led in triumph: howbeit ſome ſay he died before Scipio triumphed. Indeed diuers that did triumph, ſome before him during the warres of the Carthaginians, and others afterwards in the warres of Macedonia & Asia, they made greater ſhew of plate, both of gold & ſiluer in their triumph, and

and led alſo a great number of priſoners: howbeit one only Hannibal that was ouercome, and the glory of ſo great a warre ended, did make the triumph of P. Scipio ſo excellent and famous, that it far paſſed all the gold and magnificent pompe of all others triumphs. For after AFRICKE was conquered, no nation then was aſhamed to be ouercome by the ROMAINES. For he made this prouince as it were a bridge and open paſſage to increaſe and enlarge the Empire of ROME, both in MACEDON, and alſo in ASIA, & in other parts of the world beſides. Now Scipio (whom I may rightly call AFRICAN, after ỹ conqueſt of AFRICK) being returned to ROME, he lacked no temporall dignities nor honours. For in the Counſell holden for the election of Cenſors, although there were diuers others of the nobleſt houſes of ROME that ſued for that office, yet he himſelf, and Ælius Petus were preferred before all the reſt, and after they were created Cenſors, they did gouerne in their office like good men, and with good quietneſſe. Afterwards the Cenſors that followed them, did ſtill one after another chuſe Scipio AFRICAN Prince of the Senate: the which dignity was wont to be giuen to them onely, that obtained the type of all honour, through their great conqueſts and benefits done to their country. Shortly after, he was againe choſen Conſul with Sempronius Longus, the ſonne of that Sempronius whom Hannibal ouercame in that great ouerthrow, at the battell by the riuer of Trebia. They two were the firſt (as it is reported) that deuided the Noblemen and Senators from the people, in the ſhew-place to ſee paſtime. This ſeparation was very odious to the people of ROME, and they were marueilouſly offended with the Conſuls for it, becauſe they tooke it, that increaſing the honour of the ſtate of the Senators, they thereby did diſcountenance and imbaſe them. Some ſay alſo, that Scipio AFRICAN afterwards repented himſelfe that he had taken away the old cuſtome, & brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variance betwixt Maſinſſa and the CARTHAGINIANS, touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate ſent Scipio thither with two other commiſſioners: who after they had heard the cauſe of their quarrell, they left the matter as they found it, and would proceed no further in it. And this they did, becauſe that the CARTHAGINIANS being troubled with ciuill warres at home, ſhould take vpon them no other warres abroad, neither ſhould haue leyſure to attempt any alteration otherwiſe. For the ROMAINES had great war with king Antiochus, and Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN was there with him, who ſtill ſtirred vp the old enemies againſt the ROMAINES, and practiſed to raiſe vp new enemies againſt them, and in all things to counſell the CARTHAGINIANS to caſt away the yoke of bondage, which the ROMAINS had brought thẽ into vnder the title of peace, & to proue the friendſhip of the kings. Howbeit ſhortly after, the ROMAINES hauing obtained victory, & driuen king Antiochus out of GRECE, they intended alſo to conquer ASIA: and therfore all their hope was in Scipio AFRICAN, as a man that was borne to end wars of great importance. Howbeit Lucius Scipio and Caius Lælius were Conſuls, and either of them made ſuite for the gouernment of ASIA. The matter being conſulted vpon, the Senate ſtood doubtfull what iudgement they ſhould giue, betwixt two ſo famous men. Howbeit, becauſe Lælius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater eſtimation: the Senate began to take his part. But when P. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, praied the Senate that they would not diſhonour his houſe ſo, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was beſides very wiſe, and that he himſelfe alſo would be his Lieutenant: he had no ſooner ſpoken the words, but the Senators receiued him with great ioy, and preſently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordained in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio ſhould go into GRECE to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and that from thence he ſhould go into ASIA, if he thought good, to make war with King Antiochus: and alſo that he ſhould take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, becauſe he ſhould goe againſt Hannibal, that was in Antiochus army. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection of Publius Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he firſt ſhewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwards alſo vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, conſidering the great things he had done? For, notwithſtanding he was that AFRICAN by name that had ouercome Hannibal, that had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praiſe of martiall diſcipline: yet of his own good nature he made himſelfe inferior to his yonger brother, becauſe he might haue the honour of obtaining the gouernement of that prouince from his fellow Conſul Lælius, that was ſo well beloued, and of great eſtimation. Lucius Scipio the Conſul brought great honour to his country by that war, for that he followed the ſound and faithfull counſell of his brother. For firſt of all going into GRECE, he took truce for ſixe moneths with ỹ ÆTOLIANS, through the aduice of his brother AFRICAN: who counselled him, that setting all things apart, he should straight go into ASIA, where the warre was rifest. Afterwards also he wanne Prusias king of BYTHINIA from Antiochus friendship, who before was wauering vp and downe, doubtfull which side to take, and all through his brother AFRICANS meanes and practise. So the authority of the AFRICAN was very great, and all those that would obtaine any thing of the Consul, came first to the AFRICAN to be their meane & intercessor. Now when he came into ASIA, Antiochus ambassador, and Heraclides BIZANTIAN, came vnto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly told their message, perceiuing that they could not obtaine reasonable conditions of peace, they priuatly talked with Scipio AFRICAN, as they were commanded, and practised the best they could to make him king Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would send his yonger sonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the gouernement of all his Realme, onely reseruing the name and title of King. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no lesse in faithfulnesse and bountie, then in many other vertues, after he had answered them to all other matters, he told them, that for his son he would take him for a maruellous friendly gift: & that for a priuate good turne, he would do the best he could to requite him with the like: Howbeit, that he would counsell the King aboue all things to leaue off thought of warre, and to receiue those offers and conditions of peace which the Senate and people of ROME would offer him. Shortly after, Antiochus sent P. Scipio his son according to his promise: who (as it is reported) had bin taken prisoner from the first beginning of the war, as he went from CHALCIDE vnto ORICVM: or as other writers say, as he passed by in a pinnace. Yet some hold opinion, that he was taken as he went to discouer the counsell of the enemies, and that he was then sent againe vnto his father, lying sicke at the city of ELEA. This great curtesie of king Antiochus was maruellous well thought of by the AFRICAN, & not without cause: for to see his son after he had bene away so long, it did greatly lighten his spirits, and diseased body. But P. Scipio to shew some token of a thankfull mind, prayed the Ambassadours that came vnto him, greatly to thanke King Antiochus for the exceeding pleasure he had done him, to send him his sonne. Afterwards he gaue Antiochus aduice also, that he should not giue battell, till he vnderstood of his returne from ELEA to the camp. So Antiochus being perswaded by the authority of so worthy a man, he kept close in his camp for a certaine time, and determined to draw the warre out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to speake with the Consull, by the AFRICANS meanes. But afterwards, the Consul camping hard by MAGNESIA, did so vexe and prouoke the enemie, that the King came out to battell, and set his men in battell ray. It is reported that Hannibal himselfe was present at the battell, being one of the Generals for the King. So Antiochus being ouercome, and his army discomfited, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires, he came vnto the AFRICAN, (who being newly recouered of his sickenesse, came to the campe a little after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtained of the Consull to be contented to talke of peace. When Antiochus ambassadours were come to the campe, and had humbly craued pardon in the behalfe of their King, and also prayed that they would giue them such conditions of peace, as they best liked of: Scipio AFRICAN with the consent of them all answered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to yeeld to aduersity, neither also to be proud in prosperity: and therefore that he now made him the selfe same offer and conditions of peace, which he did before the victory. That the king should not meddle with EVROPE: that he should surrender vp all he had in ASIA, from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the riuer of Tanais: that he should pay tribute twenty yeares together: that he should also put in such hostages as the Consull would chuse out: and that specially aboue all the rest, they should deliuer Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN vnto the Consull, who was the only author and procurer of this warre. But he, as we haue written in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus army was ouerthrowne both by sea and by land, escaped the ROMAINES hands, and went vnto Prusias King of BYTHINIA. Antiochus hauing accepted the offers and conditions of peace, said, that the ROMAINES vsed him very fauourably, to rid him of so great care, and to appoint him so small a kingdome. For great kingdomes, and ouer-much wealth which euery man coueteth, are full of great and sundrie troubles: insomuch that Theocritus words are as true, as otherwise excellently written.

So when the mighty King of Asia was ouercome, and that ſo great a war was ſo eaſily ended beyond all mens opinion: the Conſull L. Scipio returned to Rome, and made his entrie into the city, ſhewing a great and honourable triumph. He alſo deſerued the ſurname of the prouince and countrey ſubdued by him. So that, as his eldeſt brother was called African, for that he had conquered Africk: euen ſo was Lucius Scipio ſurnamed Asian, for conquering Asia vnto Rome. And P. Scipio, through whoſe counſell his brother Lucius had brought his warres to happie end, he went not cleare without honour alſo. For ſhortly after, two noble Cenſors, T. Q. Flaminius, and Marcus Claudius Marcellus choſe him Prince of the Senate the third time. Now at that time, the houſe and family of the Scipioes and Cornelians flouriſhed with ſupreme degree of honour: and the authority of Scipio African was growne to ſuch height and greatneſſe, as no priuate man could wiſh to be any greater in a free city. Howbeit the ſecret malice of wicked hearts, which could no longer abide this greatneſſe and authority, began at length to burſt out, and to light vpon thoſe that were the authors of ſo great things. For two Tribunes of the people, ſuborned (as it is reported) by Porcius Cato, accuſed P. Scipio African for keeping backe king Antiochus mony, and becauſe he brought it not into the common chamber or treaſurie. Scipio African knowing his innocencie, being called by the Magiſtrate, ſhewed himſelfe obedient, and came into the market place with a bold countenance, and there made an oration, declaring what things he had done for the benefit and commodity of his country and commonwealth. The rehearſal of theſe things did not miſlike the common people that were preſent: becauſe he did it rather to auoid the danger prepared for him, then otherwiſe for any vaine glory or oſtentation. Howbeit the Tribunes not being ſo contented, were vehement againſt him, and ſpared no iniurious words, but accuſed him as though he had indeed bene in fault, howbeit vpon ſuſpition, rather then of any due proofe. The next morning being commanded to come before them againe, he appeared at the houre appointed, and being well accompanied with his friends, he came through the whole aſſembly, & went vp to the pulpit for oratiõs. When he ſaw that euery mã kept ſilence, then he ſpake in this maner: I remember, my lords, that on ſuch a day as this, I wan that famous victory of Hannibal and the Carthaginians, and therefore leauing aſide this contention, I think it good we go vnto the Capitol, to giue God thanks for the victory. So he departed thence, and all the whole aſſembly followed him, not onely to the Capitoll, but alſo to all the other temples of the city, leauing the two Tribunes al alone with their Sergeants. That day was the very laſt day of the Africans good fortune, for the great aſſembly and multitude of people that waited vpon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that day forward he determined to get him into the country, farre from all ambition, and the company of people: and ſo went vnto Linternvm in a maruellous rage, that for reward of his ſo great ſeruice, and ſo ſundry benefits, as he had brought vnto his country, he receiued but ſhame and reproch: or elſe for that indeed being (as he was) of a noble mind, he thought it more honor willingly to giue place to his enemies, then to ſeek to maintaine his greatnes by force of armes. So when the Tribunes did accuſe him of contempt, and that his brother Lucius did excuſe his abſence by reaſon of his ſickneſſe: Tiberius Gracchus, one of the Tribunes that was againſt the African, tooke his excuſe (beyond all mens opinions) for good payment, and did ſo well defend Scipioes cauſe, ſometime honourably praiſing him, another time alſo threatning his enemies, that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were maruellouſly offended for the great iniurie they did him. Some do write that P. Scipio himſelf, before he went vnto Linternvm, did with his own hands teare the booke his brother had brought vnto the Senate, to deliuer the account of his charge: and that he did it not for any deceit or pride, but with that ſelfe boldneſſe of mind he aforetime vſed to the treaſurers, when he did againſt the law require the keyes of the common treaſure, to ſupply the preſent need of the State. Now ſome there be alſo that ſay, it was not the African, but Scipio Asian that was accuſed before the Tribunes: and that Scipio African was ſent in commiſſion at that time into Thvscan. Who, vnderſtanding of his brothers accuſation, at his returne to Rome, and finding his brother Lucius condemned, and the Sergeants waiting on him to carrie him, being bound, into priſon, he was in ſuch a rage withall, that he reſcued his brother by force out of the Sergeants hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report beſide, that Tiberius Gracchus

one of the Tribunes, complaining firſt that the authority of the Tribuneſhip was trode vnder feete by a priuate perſon, he afterwards letting fall all the malice and enuie he bare vnto the Scipioes, defended their cauſe, becauſe the Tribunes ſhould rather ſeeme to be ouercome by a Tribune, then by a priuate perſon. They ſaid moreouer, that the ſelfe ſame day the Senate ſupped in the Capitol, he perſwaded the AFRICAN to let Tiberius Gracchus marrie his yonger daughter. This promiſe was no ſooner made, but P. Scipio coming home to his houſe, told his wife that he had beſtowed their daughter: wherupon ſhe being angry, told him againe, that he ſhould not haue maried her without conſent of her mother, though he could haue beſtowed her vpon Tiberius Gracchus. This anſwer liked Scipio maruellous well, when he ſaw that his wife was of his mind, touching the mariage of their daughter. I know it is thought of ſome, that it was attributed to Tiberius the ſonne, and to Appius Claudius his father in law. For Polybius, and other ancient writers affirme, that Cornelia, the mother of Caius and Tiberius Gracchi, was maried vnto Gracchus after the AFRICANS death. For Scipio AFRICAN was maried vnto Æmylia the daughter of L. Paulus Æmylius Conſul, that was ſlaine at the battel of CANNES. By her he had two daughters, of the which the eldeſt was maried vnto P. Cornelius Naſica, and the yonger vnto Tiberius Gracchus, either before or after the death of his father. Now touching his ſonne, there is litle mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certaintie to be true. We haue ſpoken of his yonger ſonne that was taken by king Antiochus, and afterwards frankly ſent vnto his father: of whom notwithſtanding afterwards I find no mention in writing, ſauing that ſome ſay he was afterwards Prætor, and that he came to this office by meanes of Cicereius his fathers Secretarie. There appeareth in writing alſo, that the yonger AFRICAN was adopted by the ſon of P. Scipio. Cicero in his booke intituled Cato Maior ſaith, how weake (ſaid he) was the ſonne of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his ſon? And in his ſixt book alſo de repub. Æmylius the father exhorteth Scipio his ſon, to follow iuſtice and pietie, as his grandfather Scipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio AFRICAN, writers do diuerſly varie: for ſome ſay, that he died and was buried at ROME. And for proofe thereof, they do bring forth the monument that was ſet vp for him by the gate Capena, ouer the which ſtood three ſtatues or images, two whereof were the images of Publius and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And ſurely that which Cicero wrote, ſeemeth to confirme it true: our Ennius, ſaid he, was maruellouſly beloued of AFRICAN the great, and therefore it is thought that he was buried in Scipioes tombe. Other authors write alſo (& ſurely they agree beſt with the common report) that Scipio AFRICAN died at LINTERNVM, & that there he was buried at his own appointment: becauſe his country ſo vnthankfully acknowledging his ſeruice, ſhould do him no honour at his death: and that there they ſet him vp a tombe, and his ſtatue vpon that, the which afterwards was blowne downe by a tempeſt of wind, and the which Liuie himſelfe witneſſeth he ſaw. Furthermore, by CAIETA this Epitaph was grauen in a plate of copper, ſet in a marble tombe.

The man that vanquiſht Hannibal, and conquer'd Carthage towne,
And eke increaſt the Romaines both in Empire and renowne,

His deeds, his proweſſe, and his life, are altogether gone.
Whom neither Europe could withſtand, nor Africke in times paſt, (Behold mans frailtie) here he lies in litle roome at laſt.

Now touching the time of his death, hauing made great ſearch for it, I haue found in certaine Greeke authors, that the AFRICAN liued foure and fiftie yeares, and died ſhortly after. Furthermore he was a noble Captaine, and worthy of al commendation for martiall diſcipline, and beſides excelled in other vertues: the which did ſo delight his mind, that he was wont to ſay, he was neuer leſſe idle, then when he tooke his eaſe: neither leſſe ſolitarie, then when he was alone. For ſometimes he would withdraw himſelfe out of the aſſembly, and from all mens companie, and thought himſelfe ſafe when he was alone. The fame of his noble deeds was ſo great, that whereſoeuer he went, all ſorts of people would come and ſee him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTERNVM, there came certaine rouers vnto him, to ſee ſo famous a man, and to kiſſe that ſo faithfull and victorious a hand. For vertue hath great force and power with all ſorts, of people: becauſe it doth not onely make the good, but the euill alſo to loue and honour it.

THE COMPARISON OF Hannibal with P. Scipio African.

NOW let vs compare Hannibal and Scipioes deedes together, as touching their ciuill diſcipline. Firſt, if we remember their deedes in warres, it is manifeſt, that both of them haue bene great and famous Captaines in warre, and that they haue not onely bene comparable with the nobleſt Kings and Princes in their time (being alſo in that age when warres flouriſhed moſt) but with thoſe alſo that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder much at them, that they hauing great and heauie enemies in their countrey, (who ſought to ouerthrow all their doings and enterpriſes) could poſſibly goe through with ſo great matters, and to obtaine ſuch happie and famous victories, in ſtrange and forreine warres. Therefore paſſing ouer all other matters, what ado had Publius Scipio before he could obtaine to be ſent into AFRICKE, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other Noblemen of the city being greatly againſt it. Againe, what enemie had Hannibal of Hanno, who was prince and head of the contrary faction againſt him? Now they both hauing ouercome ſuch great troubles at home, did notwithſtanding bring things to end worthy perpetuall memorie: not by chance, as it happeneth vnto many; but through their induſtrie, great wiſdome, and counſell. So diuers do wonder greatly at Hannibals courage and noble mind: who after he had ſacked the citie of SAGVNTVS, came boldly from the fartheſt part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great army of footemen and horſemen, and came to make warre with a great State and common-wealth, the which his predeceſſors alwaies dreaded: and after he had wonne many battels, and ſlaine ſundrie Conſuls and Captaines of the ROMAINES, he came and camped hard by the city of ROME it ſelfe, and procured ſtrange Kings and farre nations to make warre with the ROMAINES. He that was able to do ſo great things as theſe, men cannot otherwiſe thinke of him, but that he was a great and valiant Captaine. Others alſo ſpeaking of Scipio, do greatly praiſe and commend him for the foure Chieftaines he ouercame, and for the foure great armies which hee defeated and put to flight in SPAINE, and alſo for that he ouercame and tooke that great King Syphax priſoner. In fine, they come to praiſe that famous battell, in the which Scipio ouercame Hannibal at ZAMA. For if Fabius (ſaid they) were praiſed, becauſe he was not ouercome by Hannibal, what eſtimation will they make of the AFRICAN, who in a pitched battell ouercame that ſo famous and dreadfull Captaine Hannibal, and alſo did end ſo dangerous a warre? Beſides alſo that Scipio did alwaies make open warre, and commonly fought with the enemie in plaine field: where Hannibal in contrary manner did alwaies vſe craft and ſubtiltie, and was full of ſtratagemes and policie. And therefore all Authors, both Greeke and Latine, do count him very fine and ſubtill.

Furthermore, they greatly commend Hannibal for that he maintained this armie of ſo ſun-drie nations, ſo long time in peace, as he had warre with the ROMAINES: and yet that there was neuer any mutinie or rebellion in his campe. On the other ſide, they blame him againe, becauſe he did not follow his victorie, when he had ouercome the ROMAINES at that famous battell of CANNES: and alſo becauſe he ſpoyled his ſouldiers with too much eaſe, and the pleaſures of CAMPANIA and APVLIA, whereby they were ſo changed, that they ſeemed to be other ſouldiers then thoſe that had ouercome the ROMAINES, at the ſundry battels of TREBIA, THRASIMENE, and CANNES. All writers do reproue theſe things in Hannibal, but ſpecially his cruelty. For amongſt other things, what crueltie was it of him to make a woman with her children to come from ARPI to his campe, and afterwards to burne them aliue? What ſhall a man ſay of them whom he cruelly put to death in the temple of Iuno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio AFRICAN on the other ſide, if we ſhall rather credit the beſt authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious writers, we may ſay, he was a bountifull and temperate Captaine, and not onely liuely and valiant in fight, but alſo curteous and mercifull after victory. For oftentimes his enemies proued his valiantneſſe, the vanquiſhed his mercy and clemencie, and all other men his faithfulneſſe. Now therefore, let vs tell you what his continencie and liberality was, which he ſhewed in SPAINE vnto a young Ladie taken priſoner, and vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: doth it not deſerue great praiſe? Now for their priuate doings, they were both vertuouſly brought vp, and both of them embraced learned men. For as it is reported, Hannibal was very familiar with Socillus LACEDÆMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Ennius the Poet. Some ſay alſo, that Hannibal was ſo well learned in the Greeke tongue, that he wrote an hiſtorie in Greeke touching the deeds of Manlius Volſo. Now truly I do agree with Cicero, that ſaid in his booke de Oratore, that Hannibal heard Phormio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHESVS, diſcourſing very largely of the office and duty of a Chiefetaine and Generall, and of the Martiall lawes and ordinances: and that immediatly after being asked what he thought of that Philoſopher, he ſhould anſwer in no very perfect Greeke, but yet in Greeke, that he had ſeene many old doting fooles, but that he had neuer ſeene a greater doterd then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talke, and Hannibal had a ſharpe taunting wit in his anſwers. When King Antiochus on a time prepared to make war with the ROMAINES, and had put his army into the field, not ſo well furniſhed with armour and weapon, as with gold and ſiluer: he asked Hannibal if he thought his army ſufficient for the ROMAINES? Yea Sir, quoth he, that they be, were the enemies neuer ſo couetous. This may truly be ſaid of Hannibal, that he obtained many great victories in the warres, but yet they turned to the deſtruction of his countrey. Scipio in contrary manner did preſerue his countrey in ſuch ſafety, and alſo did ſo much increaſe the dominions thereof, that as many as ſhall looke into his deſerts, they cannot but call ROME vnthankfull, which liked rather that the AFRICAN (preſeruer of the city) ſhould go out of ROME, then that they ſhould repreſſe the furie and inſolencie of a few. And for mine owne opinion, I cannot thinke well of that city, that ſo vnthankfully hath ſuffered ſo worthie and innocent a perſon to bee iniured: and ſo would I alſo haue thought it more blame-worthie, if the city had bene an aider of the iniurie offered him. In fine, the Senate (as all men do report) gaue great thankes vnto Tiberius Gracchus, becauſe he did defend the Scipioes cauſe: and the common people alſo following the AFRICAN, when he viſited the temples of ROME, and left the Tribunes alone that accuſed him, did thereby ſhew how much they did loue and honour the name of the Scipioes. And therefore, if we ſhould iudge the citizens hearts and good-wils by thoſe things, men would rather condemne them for cowards to haue ſuffered ſuch outrage, then vnthankfull for forgetting his benefits: for there were very few that conſented to ſo wicked a deed, and all of them in manner were very ſorie for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of great mind, not much regarding the malice of his enemies, was content rather to leaue the citie, then by ciuill warres to deſtroy it. For he would not come againſt his countrey with enſignes diſplayed, neither would he ſolicite ſtrange nations and mighty kings to come with force and their aide to deſtroy the city, the which he had beautified with ſo many ſpoiles and triumphs, as Martius Coriolanus, Alcibiades, and diuers others did, by record of ancient ſtories. For we may eaſily perceiue how carefull he was to preſerue the libertie of ROME, becauſe when he was in SPAINE, he refuſed the title and name of King which was offered offered him: and for that he was maruellous angry with the people of Rome, becauſe they would haue made him perpetuall Conſull and Dictator: and conſidering alſo that he commaunded they ſhould ſet vp no ſtatue of him, neither in the place of the aſſembly, nor in the iudgement ſeate, nor in the Capitoll: all which honours afterwards were giuen by the citizens vnto Ceſar, that had ouercome Pompey. Theſe were the ciuill vertues of the African, which were great and true praiſes of continencie. Now therefore, to deliuer you the ſumme and effect of theſe things, theſe two ſo famous Captaines are not ſo much to be compared together in their ciuill vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the diſcipline of warres, and in the glory of their famous victories. To conclude, their deaths were ſomewhat alike: for they both died out of their countries, although Scipio was not condemned by his country as Hannibal was, but would by voluntary baniſhment die out of the citie.

TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH,

By

THE GRACE OF GOD OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND QVEENE, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c.

THE Princely bounty of your blessed hand (most gracious Soueraigne) comforting and supporting my poore old decaying life, of right challengeth the trauels in my studie, the labours of my body, and the prayers of my deuotions, to be wholly employed for your Highnesse, and altogether dedicated to your seruice. Wherein whilest I striue to bring in open shew some small performance of my most humble duty to your sacred Majestie, mine owne vnworthinesse amazeth me with trembling feare for my presumption, but that your Highnesse matchlesse grace to so many your most admirable vertues offer my pardon. Vnder which I present in all humblenesse into your Majesties sacred hands, this my second translation of the late addition of fifteene other liues, vnto those former in Plutarch, published for benefit of my countrie, vnder protection of the most royall name of your most gracious Maiestie. And albeit in respect of my selfe I offer but dutie, which I wish I could in other and better sort performe: yet I am the rather emboldened herein, for that the famous me-

morie of renowmed Emperours, mighty Kings, worthie Chieftaines and Generals of armies, yea and of two famous Philosophers Plutarch and Seneca, being the whole subiect of this second translation, is worthily published vnder your Majesties patronage. Whose rare vertues and wonderfull wisedome, neither former mighty Kings, nor learned Philosophers might equall: from whose blessed fortunes many oppressed Kings and distressed kingdomes, haue sought and found their succours: and whose most honorable and most happy peaceable gouernement, is worlds wonder to all posterity.

Wherefore most gracious and most blessed Soueraigne, I beseech your Princely fauour to accept with grace the simple performance of your poore vnworthy seruant his most humble seruice, whose soule with heartiest prayer according to his most bounden duty, continually calleth vnto God for preseruation of your most royall person, in all honour, health, and happinesse, and so still to reigne ouer vs.

Your Majesties most humble and obedient seruant,

THE LIFE OF Epaminondas.

O onely like thy ſelfe, the world alwaies
Admireth thy great valour, grace and wit:
And thinking to haue all good parts in it,
By hauing thee, triumpheth in thy praiſe.

WRiters of hiſtories report that Cadmus the ſonne of Agenor hauing taken ſea out of PHENICIA into EVROPE, by commandement of an Oracle he left the countrey of THRACIA where he had dwelt, and came into BOEOTIA, where he had great doings againſt a certaine neighbor-people called SPARTANS: of whom hauing ouercome part of them by ſubtilties, he made alliance with the chiefe of thoſe that were left aliue, and grew into ſuch fauour with them, that he drew them and their people vnto THEBES, where theſe great men which were of noble houſe tooke them wiues, and ſo had a great number of worthy men of noble race deſcended from them. Of which ſome of them were very rich men, and attained to the tipe of royall dignity: as Creon and Iocaſtus. Now becauſe they were deuided into two principall houſes, it is hard to iudge out of which of the two families of the Chronians or Echionides, Polymnis the father of Epaminondas was deſcended. Some are of opinion that he came out of the houſe of another chiefe man of the SPARTANS, called Vdæus, from whom deſcended the diuine Tireſias. But howſoeuer it was, he deſcended from one of the moſt noble and ancient houſes of the THEBANS, of whom they report this notable thing: that the moſt part of this noble linage caried vpon their body euen for a naturall birth-marke from their mothers wombe, a Snake: and ſo did they beare it in their armes in deuice of their Scutchions. Touching this matter, I hold the ſaying of the Poet Euripides to be true: that the honor of noble houſes falleth to decay, if once their goods faile them. For the pouerty wherof ſome of Epaminon-

Epaminondas nobly deſcended.

das anceſtors made profeſſion of vertue, ſeemed to be the cauſe that they were made ſmall account of. Otherwiſe I cannot allow that the ſaid Poet ſpake of, that a noble and vertuous man is no body if he be poore. For one Epaminondas onely throughly confuted this opinion, who notwithſtanding he was exceeding poore, obtained neuertheleſſe the chiefeſt places of honor in the common wealth: for he was one of the beſt learned and moſt excellent Philoſophers of the world, being Platoes follower & familiar, and the moſt renowmed man of all the GREEKS, as appeareth by the diſcourſe of his life. Now Polymnis had two ſonnes, to wit, Caphiſias, and Epaminondas, whom he was very carefull to ſee well brought vp and taught all the liberall and honeſt ſciences, eſpecially Epaminondas, who had the moſt ſtayed wit, and beſt inclined to vertue, deſirous to hearken and to learne, humble, obedient, and wonderfull apt and docible: and according to the diſcipline of the THEBANS, he learned of one Dionyſius to be very skilfull in ſong and playing vpon inſtruments. And as for learning, and in Philoſophy chiefly, it happened well for him that he fell into good mens hands by ſuch a meane. When the colledges and companies of the Pythagorian Philoſophers that were diſperſed through the cities of ITALY, were baniſhed by the faction of the Cylonians: they that kept ſtill together, met in councell at METAPONT to determine of their affaires. But ſome ſeditious perſons aroſe againſt them, ſet fire on all parts of the houſe where they were, and burnt them all together, ſauing Philolaus and Lyſis, who being young and luſtie, ſaued themſelues through the fire. As for Philolaus, he recouered the country of the LVCANIANS, and kept there with his friends: but Lyſis went further, and got to THEBES, where when he was arriued, Polymnus receiued him, and prayed him to be Epaminondas ſchoolemaſter, who was but a young boy, but yet of good capacity, and of very great hope. This Philoſopher imployed his endeuour to manure this noble and quicke wit of Epaminondas, and in ſhort time made him ready and perfect in all ſcience and vertue: ſo that it is hard to find a more wiſe, graue, and vertuous perſon then he was, of whom it is fit we ſhould ſay ſomewhat more at large. When he was but fifteene yeares of age, he gaue himſelfe to all manner of exerciſes of the body, as to run, wreſtle, play at the weapons, and to practiſe all manner of armes: and being quickly skilfull in all theſe, he then gaue himſelfe to his booke, being naturally ſilent, fearefull to ſpeake, but neuer wearied to heare, and to learne. Whereupon Spintharus the TARENTINE hauing bene a long time with him in THEBES, ſaid, he neuer ſpake to any man that knew ſo much and ſpake ſo little as Epaminondas. If he fortuned to be in any company where there was talke of Philoſophy, or of ſtate matters, he would neuer from thence till he ſaw the matter ended that was propounded. Furthermore, he had no great liking of theſe darke & myſticall arguments of ſome, that think to hide vertue in the obſcurity of their words, but he gaue himſelfe wholly to the true practiſe thereof: though otherwiſe he was as pleaſant a man to giue a fine ſlent in diſcourſe, as could be poſſible to be found, as the diſputation betwixt him and Theanor, touching pouertie and riches doth witneſſe, which worthily deſerueth to be mentioned here, as in his proper place.

Polymnis father to Epaminondas.

Epaminondas his vertuous inclination in his youth.

Lyſis a good ſchoolemaſter to Epaminondas.

Epaminondas exerciſes in his youth.

Epaminondas wiſdom in ſpeaking little.

Lyſis after he had liued a long time in THEBES, died, and was honorably interred by his diſciple Epaminondas, who had honored and entertained him whileſt he liued, & at his death omitted no ceremonies requiſite at his funerall. Arceſus, one of the chiefe of the Pythagorian Philoſophers that ſtayed in SICILIA, vnderſtanding that Lyſis was at THEBES, through age not able to go to him: appointed by his will and teſtament, that they ſhould bring Lyſis aliue againe into ITALY if it were poſſible, or at leaſtwiſe the reſt of his bones, if ſo it happened he were dead. The warres that fell out in the interim were a hinderance that that could not be done ſo ſpeedily. But when the wayes were open and free, the Pythagorians ſent Theanor of their ſect to THEBES, where he found Lyſis dead and buried: and ſo coming to Epaminondas, after ſalutations and preambles, told him before Polymnis and Caphiſias, that his companions which were very rich, willed him to giue Polymnis and his children a good ſumme of money, in recompence of their courteous entertainement which they had giuen to Lyſis. Whereupon after pleaſant excuſes made, Epaminondas concluded, that none could be receiued: and added further that Iaſon a Captaine of the THESSALIANS thought I had giuen him a rude and vnciuill anſwer, when he hauing earneſtly intreated me to take a good ſumme of gold which he gaue me, I ſent him word that he did me wrong, and began to make warre with me: for that he aſpiring to make himſelfe a Lord, would corrupt me with money, a plaine citizen of a free towne, and liuing vnder the law. But for thee, Theanor, I commend thy good will, becauſe it is honeſt and

and vertuous, and I loue it with all my heart: but I tell thee, thou bringeſt phyſicke to men that be not ſicke. Admit then that thou hearing we had bene in warres, haddeſt brought vs armes to defend vs, and then in the ſame place thou haddeſt found vs quiet, and in good peace and amitie with our neighbours: thou wouldeſt not haue thought it good to haue beſtowed theſe armes, and left them with thoſe that had no need of them. Euen ſo thou art come to relieue our pouerty, as if it were a griefe vnto vs: whereas to the contrary it is an eaſie and pleaſant thing for vs to cary, and we are glad we haue it in our houſe amongſt vs: and therefore we need no armes nor mony againſt that that doth vs no hurt at all. But thou ſhalt tell thy brethren there, that they do vſe their goods very honeſtly: and alſo that they haue friends here which vſe their pouerty well. And as for Lyſis entertainement & burial, he himſelf hath fully recompenced vs, hauing taught vs amõgſt many other goodly things, not to be afraid of pouerty, nor to be gricued to ſee it amongſt vs. After Theanor had made ſome reply touching the good or euill of riches, as that if pouerty were not euill of it ſelfe, neither was riches to be had in contempt, and deſpiſed: No, truly ſaid Epaminondas: yet conſidering with my ſelfe that we haue a world of couetous deſires of many things, ſome naturall as they call them, and borne with vs, bred in our fleſh by the luſts pertaining to it: others ſtrange vnto vs, grounded vpon vaine opinions, which taking a ſetling and habit in vs by tract of time, and long vſe through euill education, oftentimes doe plucke vs downe, and withdraw our ſoules with more force and violence, then thoſe that be naturall vnto vs. For reaſon, by daily exerciſe of vertue and practiſe thereof, is a meane to take many of thoſe things away from vs that are borne and bred within vs: yet this notwithſtanding, we muſt vſe continual force and exerciſe againſt our concupiſcences that are ſtrangers vnto vs, to quench them in vs, and by all poſſible meanes to repreſſe and ſubdue them. Now hauing made ſufficient proofe of that, there is alſo, ſaid he, an exerciſe of Iuſtice againſt greedy couetouſneſſe of getting, which is not, not to go rob and rifle his neighbors houſes in the night, nor not to rob men on the high way ſide, nor if any man betray not his friends nor his country for mony: ſuch one doth not exerciſe himſelfe againſt couetouſneſſe, for law poſſible, or feare, bridleth his couetous deſire to offend any man: but that man that oftentimes willingly abſtaineth from iuſt gaines, which he may lawfully take, he it is that by continuall exerciſe keepeth himſelfe farre off from vniuſt and vnlawfull taking of money. For it is vnpoſſible that in great pleaſures, yea wicked and dangerous, the ſoule ſhould containe it ſelfe from coueting of them, vnleſſe before being oftentimes at his choiſe to vſe them, he had not contemned them. And it is not eaſie to ouercome them, nor to refuſe great riches euill gotten being offered, vnleſſe he had long before killed in him this couetous deſire of getting, the which beſides many other habitudes and actions, is ſtill greedily bent ſhamefully to gaine, pleaſing himſelfe in the purſuite of iniuſtice, hardly ſparing to wrong another, ſo he in any thing profit himſelfe. But to a man that diſdaineth to receiue liberality and gifts of his friends, and refuſeth to take preſents offered him by kings, and that hath reiected the benefits of fortune, putting by all couetous deſires of gliſtering treaſure layed before him: he ſhall neuer be aſſailed or attempted to do that that is vniuſt, nor his mind ſhall neuer be troubled, but will content himſelfe quietly to do any thing that is honeſt, carying an vpright heart, finding nothing in it but that that is good and commendable.

Epaminondas contentment with a poore eſtate.

But his life is farre more excellent then his diſcourſe: and as touching that, I will yet ſpeake ſomewhat of it. Diomedon Dyzicenian, at Artaxerxes requeſt, promiſed to win Epaminondas to take the Persians part. To bring this to paſſe, he came to Thebes, & brought a great maſſe of gold with him, and beſtowing three thouſand crownes, he bribed a yong man called Mycithus, whom Epaminondas loued dearely. This young man went to Epaminondas, and acquainted him with the occaſion of the other mans coming to Thebes. But Epaminondas ſtraight anſwered him, Diomedon being preſent: I haue no need of money: if the king wiſh well to the Thebans, I am at his commandement without taking one penny: if he haue any other meaning, he hath not gold nor ſiluer enough for me: for I will not ſell the loue I beare to my country for all the gold in the world. As for thee that haſt now attempted me, not knowing me, haply thinking me to be like thy ſelfe, I pardon thee: but get thee away quickly ou of the city, leſt thou ſeduce ſome other, hauing failed to corrupt me. And for thee Mycithus, deliuer him his crownes againe: and if thou doeſt it not preſently, I will ſend thee before a Iuſtice. Thereupon Diomedon beſought him he would let him go away with ſafetie, and cary that with him he brought thither. Yes mary, ſaid Epaminondas, but it ſhall not be for thy ſake, but for mine honor: being afraid that if thy gold and siluer should be taken from thee, some man would accuse me that I had a share in that which I refused to take openly. Then he asked him: Whither wouldest thou I should cause thee to be conueyed? Diomedon said, to ATHENS: which was done, and he had a very good conuoy with him; and because he should not be troubled by the way betwixt the gates of THEBES, and the hauen where he should imbarke himselfe, Epaminondas gaue Chabrias the ATHENIAN charge of this man, that he should see him safe at his waies end, and so he straight returned backe againe.

Now though he was very poore, yet he would neuer take any thing of his city or friends, he was so well acquainted with pouerty, which he bare more patiently through his studie of Philosophy. For on a time hauing the leading of an army of the THEBANS into the country of PELOPONNESVS, he borrowed about fiue crownes of a citizen for his expences in his iourny. Pelopidas being a man of great wealth, and his exceeding good friend, could not possibly euer make him take any part of his goods, but rather Pelopidas learned of him to loue pouertie. For Epaminondas taught him to thinke it an honor to him to go plainely apparelled, to eate moderatly, to take paines willingly, and to make warre lustily. But to releeue others, he would make bold to vse his friends goods, and in such a case their goods were common to him. If any of his citizens were taken prisoner with the enemy, or any friend of his had a daughter to be maried, and was not able to bestow her: he called his friends together, and seised euery man of them at a certaine summe, and afterwards brought him before them that should haue this money, and told him how much euery man had bestowed vpon him, that he might thanke them all. But on a time he went far beyond this: for he sent a poore friend of his to a rich citizē of THEBES, to aske of him fiue hundred crownes, and to tell him that Epaminondas willed him to let him haue them. The citizen being amazed at this demaund, went vnto Epaminondas to know what he meant to charge him so deepely, to make him disburse these fiue hundred crownes vnto him. It is, saith he, because this man being an honest man, is poore: and thou that hast robbed the commonwealth of much, art rich. He liued so soberly, and was such an enemy vnto all superfluitie and excesse, that being on a time inuited to supper to one of his neighbours, when he saw great preparation of fine meates, baked meates, made dishes, and perfumes: he said vnto him: I thought thou haddest made a sacrifice, not an excesse of superfluity, and euen so went his way. Euen the like he spake of his own table, saying, that such an ordinary neuer receiued treason. On a time being at a feast with his peeres and companions, he drank vineger. And when they asked him what reason he had to do so, and if it were good for his health? I cannot tell, saith he, but well I wote it is good to put me in remembrance how I liue at home. Now it was not for that his nature misliked sweet meates, that he liued thus strictly, and did loue and embrace pouerty, for he was maruellous high and nobly minded: but by his straight and vnreproueable life he led, he thought to bridle many insolencies & disorders then reigning amongst the THEBANS, and to reduce them to the former temperance of their ancestors. As vpon a time a cooke giuing vp an account to him and his fellowes of their ordinary expences for certaine daies, he could find fault with nothing, but with the quantity of oyle that was spent. His companions maruelling at it: Tush, saith he, it is not the expence that offendeth me, but because they haue powred in so much oyle into their bodies. The city of THEBES made an open feast, and they were all of them in their banquets, feasts, and great assemblies one with the other: but Epaminondas to the contrarie, he went drie vp and downe the towne very sad, without being annointed with any oyle of perfume, or decked with braue apparel. Some of his familiar friends met him in this estate, & wondering at him, asked him why he walked so alone, & ill apparelled through the city? Because, said he, you might in the mean time safely giue your selues to drink drunke, and make merie, taking thought for nothing. Thus haue we spoken enough touching his temperance: and as for his other vertues they are most famous in armes, the which he with great good fortune and happinesse managed for the good of his countrie.

Epaminondas his temperance in apparell & diet.

Epaminondas redeemed prisoners, and maried poore maides

Epaminondas his strict life a checke to the Thebans.

Epaminondas fasted when others feasted.

Now his modesty would in no wise suffer him to seeke his aduancement, but contrariwise he withdrew himselfe from gouernment, onely to giue himselfe quietly to the studie of Philosophie. Howbeit it happened that the LACEDÆMONIANS on a time prayed aide of the THEBANS, at that time being in league with them, who sent them certaine foot-bands. Epaminondas being about fiue and thirty yeares of age, armed himselfe, and went with the rest. Then it was that that friendship began betwixt Pelopidas and him, which constantly continued euen to the end.

end. For they being both in battell ray, the one by the other, against the ARCADIANS, whom they had in front against them in the plaine of MANTINEA, it chanced that one of the points of the battell of the LACEDÆMONIANS, in the which they were, retired, & many of them left their rankes: but they being resolute, determining rather to die then to flie, stood to it like men, vntill that Pelopidas being hurt in seuen places, fell downe vpon an heape of dead bodies: then Epaminondas though he tooke him to be but a dead man, stepped manfully before him to defend his bodie and armes, and he alone fought against many, resolued to die in the place, rather then to leaue Pelopidas among the dead men, vntil that himself being thrust into the breast with a pike and wounded in the arme with a blow of a sword, (ready to giue ouer) by good fortune, and in a happie time, King Agesipolis came on with the other point of the battell; and saued them both. Afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS finely wanne the castle of THEBES called CADMEA, put in a strong garrison there, and gaue the gouernment of the citie vnto Archias, Philippus, and Leontidas, authors of all the mischiefe. Whereupon to auoide their violence, Pelopidas and many others with speed fled and saued themselues, and were banished by sound of trumpet. And as for Epaminondas, they said nothing to him, but let him alone in the city: for he was contemned as a man of no reckoning, because he was so giuen to his booke: and if he should haue had any will to haue stirred against them, he could haue done them no hurt for his pouertie. Now whilest Pelopidas and his companions being at ATHENS, had layd a plot to free THEBES, Epaminondas making no shew of any thing, had long before deuised another practise, which was, to lift vp the hearts and courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they went out to play and exercise their bodies, he alwaies found a way to make them wrestle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Afterwards when he saw the LACEDÆMONIANS fiercely throw them, and giue them shrewd falles, they being the stronger, he rebuked the THEBANS, and told them, it was a shame for them for want of courage to suffer ŷ LACEDÆMONIANS to set their feet vpon their throats, that were not halfe so strong, rough, and boisterous as they were. All this while Pelopidas & his followers went on with their complot, and they had so good successe in their purpose, that one night they got priuily into the city of THEBES, and met at Charons house, where they were to the number of eight and forty. Epaminondas knew all well enough, and some towards night taking him aside, went about to perswade him to ioyne with them in this enterprise, and to take armes with them to set vpon these tyrants: maruelling much, that hee would be so backward, the liberty of his countrey standing vpon it. He answered, that he had taken order with his friends and Gorgidas, that they should put themselues in readinesse vpon any occasion; howbeit that he would put none of his citizens to death, vnlesse they were condemned by law: yet if you will make an attempt for deliuery of the city, so it be without murther, and shedding the bloud of the citizens, I will helpe you (said he) with all my heart. If you will not beleeue me, but perseuere in your determination, I pray you let me alone, pure and vndefiled with the bloud of my citizens, and so blameless to attend occasion, whereby I may iustly take hold of that which may turne to the good of the commonwealth: for the murther that wil be committed, cannot possibly be contained within reasonable bound. I do certainly beleeue that Pherecides and Pelopidas peraduenture will specially set vpon the authors of the tyrannie: but Eumolpidas and Samiadas, both cholericke and fierce men, taking the liberty of the night, they will neuer lay downe their armes, nor put their swords vp into their sheathes, before they haue filled all the city with murthers, and slaine diuers of the chiefe personages. Moreouer, it is very conuenient for the people of THEBES, that some be left free, and blameless of this murther, and guiltless of al that shall be done in this furie of action: for so the people shall least suspect that we giue any encouragement to their rising, although to good end. Notwithstanding al this the enterprise was executed, and the tyrants put to death, the city restored to her ancient liberty, and the castle of CADMEA rendred vp by composition, and Lysandridas the LACEDÆMONIAN, and other commanders within, suffered to depart, with saferie of their goods and the souldiers.

The occasion of friendship betweene Epaminondas and Pelopidas.

The tyrants of Thebes slaine, and the citie freed.

These were the beginnings of the long wars of the LACEDÆMONIANS against the THEBANS, with whom the ATHENIANS ioyned in league. For Epaminondas, he quietly gaue himself to his booke: notwithstanding he was put forward by Pammenes, a principall man of THEBES, & he began to follow the wars very hotly, and in diuers encounters made great proofe of his wisedome, hardinesse and valour: insomuch that by degrees he attained at the length to the highest charges of gouernment in the commonwealth. And his citizens hauing made no further reckoning of him, being a man of forty yeares old: after that they came to know him, and had trusted him with their army, he saued the city of THEBES that was like to haue bin vndone, and freed al GRECE from the seruitude & bondage of the LACEDÆMONIANS: making vertue as in a cleare light shine with glory, shewing her effects when time serueth. Furthermore, Agesilaus being entred into BOEOTIA with an army of twenty thousand footmen, and fiue thousand horse, preyed and spoyled all the plaine countrey, and presented the THEBANS in open field that which they would not accept, finding themselues the weaker: howbeit they defended themselues so well, through the aide of the ATHENIANS, and of the wise conduction of Epaminondas and Pelopidas, that Agesilaus returned home with his army. But after he was gone, the THEBANS went with their troupes before the city of THESPIES, where they surprised and put to the sword two hundred men of the garrison, and afterwards gaue diuers assaults one vpon another vnto the wall; and seeing their labour lost, they returned with their army back againe to THEBES. Howbeit Phœbidas the LACEDÆMONIAN, hee that had taken the castle of CADMEA by treason, (whereupon rose all this warre that followed) and was then gouernour of THESPIES, made a sallie out of the towne, and rashly went to giue a charge vpon the THEBANS in their retreate, where he lost fiue hundred of his men, and himselfe was slaine in the field. Not long after, the LACEDÆMONIANS with the self same power returned againe to make war with the THEBANS, who hauing wonne certaine streights and places of aduantage, so blocked vp the way, as they could not ouerrune the country, and spoyle it as they had done before. Neuertheless, Agesilaus had so harried and troubled them, that by little and little they came to a maine battell, which held very long and cruell. Now though Agesilaus at the first had the better, yet the THEBANS charged him so hotly, that at the length he himselfe was hurt, and constrained to retire, being well payed for teaching the THEBANS militarie discipline. And this was the first time that the THEBANS knew themselues to be as strong and lustie as the LACEDÆMONIANS: whereupon they triumphed in signe of victory, and from that time forwards they waxed more couragious to make head against the enemy, and to present them battell. But the onely thing that did most encourage them, was the presence of Epaminondas, who counselled, commanded, and executed very wisely, valiantly, and most fortunately. A certaine time after that, they went with a great number of good chosen men before ORCHOMENE, where they preuailed not, because there was a strong garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that sallied out vpon them to giue them battell, which was very sharpe betweene them. And yet, albeit the LACEDÆMONIANS were many against one, the THEBANS gaue them the ouerthrow, which neuer happened to them before: but what nation soeuer they had bene, they thought they had done a great feate, if with a greater number by many, they had ouercome a small number of the LACEDÆMONIANS. But this victory, and the encountring of TEGYRE, where the THEBANS obtained another victory vnder the conduct of Pelopidas, lift vp their hearts on high, and made their valure more famous then before.

The next yeare following, Artaxerxes king of PERSIA, meaning to make warre in ÆGYPT, and therefore to retaine diuers strangers, determined to appease the warres against the GREEKES, in hope that they being at peace, would more easily be contented that souldiers should be leauied in their countrey: and thereupon sent his Ambassadours to all the townes of GREECE, to perswade & intreate them to be at peace together. The GREEKES were very willing to hearken vnto it, being wearied of all sides with so long a warre, and were easily drawne to treate of peace: wherby it was especially agreed and concluded, that all the cities of GREECE should be free, and vse their owne lawes; and commissioners were sent all about to withdraw the garrisons in euery place where any was kept. Vnto this the THEBANS onely refused to agree, that euery towne should by it selfe seuerally capitulate this treatie, requesting that the townes in the countrey of BOEOTIA should be comprehended vnder the city of THEBES. Thereunto the ATHENIANS mightily opposed themselues, and there was one of their Orators called Callistratus, that touching this matter made a notable oration before the assembly of the States of GREECE. And Epaminondas on the other side also, made a wonderfull and vehement oration in defence of the right of the THEBANS: insomuch as this controuersie was left vndecided, and the treatie of peace was vniuersally agreed and concluded amongst all the other GREEKES, the THEBANS onely excepted, who were not comprised within the treatie. So through the motion of Epaminondas, they were bold to withstand the decrees of all the rest of

GREECE. For the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS that many yeares before had contended for the principality of GREECE, made then diuision together: so that the one should command by sea, and the other by land. Thus they could not like in no wise, that the THEBANS should aspire to be chiefe, and therfore they sought to dismember the other towns of BOEOTIA from the city of THEBES. And the rather for that the THEBANS being strong and lusty of bodie, and encouraged for that of late they had oftentimes beaten the LACEDÆMONIANS, would striue with them for the superiority of GREECE by land, but especially they had a wonderfull confidence in the wisedome and prowesse of their Captaines, but specially of Epaminondas. Matters resting thus doubtfull, the citizens of PLATÆES, a towne of BOEOTIA, desirous to be at league with the ATHENIANS, they sent to request some soldiers of them, promising to put the town into their hands. The gouernors of the country of BOEOTIA hauing intelligence of it, desirous to preuent the garrison of the ATHENIANS, brought a troupe of souldiers against them, and they al came before PLATÆES, before the townes men had any knowledge of their coming: insomuch that part of them were surprised in the fields by the horsemen, and the other fled into the towne. But hauing no body to aide them, they were compelled to receiue and accept such composition as it pleased the THEBANS to grant them: which was, to leaue their towne, and to go safely with bagge and baggage, and neuer to returne againe into the country of BOEOTIA. After this, the THEBANS razed the city of PLATÆES to the ground, and had the sacke of the towne of THESPIES, enemy vnto them. All the GREEKS solicited againe by the ambassadors of PERSIA, thought it good to make a generall peace, and so assembled the commissioners of al the townes at SPARTA. Epaminondas that was yet scarce knowne, because he loued not to shew himselfe, and in all his exploits of warre had euer preferred the aduancement of his great friend and companion in armes Pelopidas, before himselfe: yet famous among the GREEKES for his great knowledge and experience, was sent thither by the THEBANS. Epaminondas finding that the other commissioners did leane to Agesilaus, began to speake boldly and plainely, and made an oration, not onely in the THEBANS behalfe, but for all GREECE also: making them plainely see, that war did still increase the greatnesse of the city of SPARTA onely, and keepe all the rest of the townes of GREECE vnder. Therfore he gaue counsel to al to establish a firme peace indifferently betwixt them, that thereby it might haue the longer continuance, when all comprized within the contract should be equals. Agesilaus perceiuing all the GREEKS assistant at this assembly, to giue very attentiue eare vnto him, and to be tickled, hearing him speake so freely of peace: he asked him aloud if he thought it iust and reasonable, that all BOEOTIA should be set at liberty. Epaminondas on the other side, did presently and boldly aske him againe, if he thought not also that it was iust and reasonable, that all LACONIA should be set at liberty. Thereupon Agesilaus in anger stood vp on his feete, and commanded him to answer plainely, if they should not restore all the prouince of BOEOTIA to her liberty. Epaminondas returned the selfe same speech againe vnto him: if they should not also put that of LACONIA in her liberty. This did so anger Agesilaus, besides that it did him good to haue this colour for an old grudge he bare vnto the THEBANS, that forthwith he put the names of the THEBANS out of the list of those that should be comprized within the peace, and immediatly proclaimed open war against them. But this being done had euill successe afterwards, and by reason of the sodaine and rash enterprise of the LACEDÆMONIANS, it turned to their vtter ouerthrow. For the THEBANS, there was no remedy but they must beare the whole brunt alone: for there was not a towne that durst send them any aide, because they were all agreed and sworne to this peace, insomuch as euery one thought them vtterly cast away and vndone. Many pitied their estate, and they that loued them not, reioyced: they made so full account, that the LACEDÆMONIANS should find nothing that could stand before them.

Agesilaus excludeth the Thebans out of the treaty of peace.

So the LACEDÆMONIANS made king Cleombrotus march with his army towards THEBES: and being come neare to CHÆRONEA with ten thousand footmen and a thousand horse, he pitched his camp there to stay for the rest of his allies. The THEBANS hauing intelligence of the approch of the enemy, chose Epaminondas to be captaine generall, giuing him the charge of this warre, with sixe other Councellers, whom they call Beotarches, as who would say, Gouernours of BOEOTIA, to be of his counsell, and to assist him. Now there came Oracles to the THEBANS from all parts: some promising victory, others threatning ouerthrow. He commanded them to set those on the right hand of the chaire for Orations, that promised victory: and those that threatened ouerthrow, on the left hand. They being thus disposed of, he got vp to the chaire for Orations, and said to the THEBANS: If you will be obedient to your Captaines, and couragious of heart to encounter your enemies, these here (shewing the good Oracles on the right hand) are yours: but if for faint hearts you refuse danger, those there (shewing the bad on the left hand) shall be for you. Thereupon enrolling all the THEBANS names that were of age to beare armes, and of some parts of BOEOTIA those that he thought fittest for wars: word was brought him that a very honest and valiant man of his person died in his bed. O Hercules, said he, what, had this man leysure to die in all these troubles? His presence reioyced, and made all his army liuely: also all the time he was Captaine of the THEBANS, they neuer saw any of these terrours happen in this campe without manifest cause, which they call sodaine feares. He was wont to say, that there was no death more honest then to die in the warres: and that the body of a souldier should not onely be kept in exercise like the champions that fight for mastery, but rather more hardned to endure any labour or paines meet for a good souldier. And therfore he could not abide very fat men, but cassiered a whole band of thē for that cause only: saying, that scarce three or foure targets could couer so great a belly, as did keepe him that he could not see his own priuities. So he drew his army out of THEBES, hauing in all but sixe thousand fighting men. Euen as they were marching away out of THEBES, diuers of the souldiers thought they had had many vnluckie signes. For as they were going out of the gates, Epaminondas met on his way a Herald, that following an ancient ceremony and custome of theirs, brought an old blind man as if he had bene run away, and the Herald crying out aloud, Bring him not out of THEBES, nor put him not to death, but cary him backe againe, and saue his life. The old men tooke this meeting and cry for an euill signe: but the young men kept silence, and spake neuer a word, for feare it should be thought that their hearts failing them, they would seeke to dissuade Epaminondas from going the iourney he had vndertaken. And he himselfe, vnto some that were bold to tell him, that it were well done before he went any further, to consider first what successe the flying of the birds did promise vnto him, answered this verse of Homer:

Epaminondas incourageth his souldiers.

It is a happy signe, to fight for his countrey.

Such a present and franke resolution stopped the mouthes of all those that were not very constant. But there happened yet another signe worse then the first. For there went a Secretarie before him carying a Iauelin, vnto ŷ which was tyed a scroll, to make the souldiers know that they should do what the Generall commanded them. The wind rose and blew of this scroll and caried it away, folding it vpon a square pillar that stood vpon a tombe of certain LACEDÆMONIANS, and PELOPONNESIANS that had bene slaine in that place when Agesilaus brought his army thither. Also there came againe certaine old men vnto him to speake with him, perswading and protesting that he ought not to go any further with his army, since the gods were so manifestly against it. All this notwithstanding he neuer ceassed to march with his campe, thinking that the conscience and resolution to fight in a good cause, ought to be much stronger and of more force to put him in good hope, then these euill signes that appeared, to make him mistrust the worst. And as in marching to meete with the LACEDÆMONIANS they heard it thunder: they that were neare vnto him, asked him, what that thunder meant? That, saith he, betokeneth that the enemies braines are troubled & astonied: seeing they hauing hard by them so commodious places, to campe in, they now lye encamped where they are. Indeed they halted, staying for diuers of their allies that came not: all of them hauing at better leysure considered of the discourse Epaminondas made in SPARTA in open assembly of al the commissioners of euery towne, against the ambitiō of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas therfore applying to good purpose at that time all the goodly discourse he had learned by the studie of Philosophie, for the present time the common people blamed him much: but after the fortunate successe of his intention, euery man then iudged him to be a man ripely vnderstanding the dutie of a wise and valiant chieftaine of war. For making his army march with speed, he wanne the straights hard by the city of CORONEA, and camped there. Cleombrotus on the other side, vnderstanding that the THEBANS had gained that passage, despairing he could not passe that way, made his army goa great compasse about the countrey of PHOCIDE: and marching along the sea side in a very troublous and dangerous way, at the last he pierced into the country of BOEOTIA without any danger. And as he went also he tooke in little townes, and certaine gallies that lay along that coast, and in the end arriued at LEVCTRES: and there sate downe to refresh his men a litle,

Epaminondas winneth credit in the end.

Cleombrotus king of the Lacedæmonians, retireth cowardly.

ouer-wearied

ouer wearied with trauell in their iourney. The BOEOTIANS marched presently that way to meete with them, and so passing ouer some little mountaines, they discouered them in the plaine of LEVCTRES, which did amaze them, seeing so great an army.

Counsell & consultation is to be vsed in war.

The Bœotarches thereupon came together to consult whether they should go forward, and to fight one against many: or else retire, and find out some better place of aduantage. In this counsell their opinions fell out to be equall: for three of them thought it good to retire: the other three with Epaminondas, said, they must tarrie and fight. So the conclusion of this counsell being doubtfull, and the Bœotarches disagreeing, Pelopidas captaine of the holy band came to them, who was of the second opinion: so that they all agreed together to put it to the hazard of battel. But Epaminondas seeing their souldiers affraid through the superstition of these signes, deuising by some like remedy to put this mistrust out of their heads: to bring this to passe, some being newly come from THEBES, he willed them to say & giue it out euery where, that no man could tell at THEBES what was become of the armes that hung vp in Hercules temple: but that the voice was all the towne ouer, that the ancient demigods their ancestors had come and taken them away, for the aide of their descendants at this present time. He suborned another also, that gaue it out he was newly come from Trophonius truncke or hole, and that the god which giueth the Oracles in the same, cõmanded him to tell the BOEOTIANS that after they had ouercome their enemies in the plaine of LEVCTRES, they should celebrate yeerely plaies in the honor of Iupiter. And thereof it came that ỹ BOEOTIANS long time after that did yearely celebrate a feast, which is made in LEBADIA. Now to end the painting of this artificiall deuice, Leandrias a SPARTAN, being a banished man out of his countrey, and fighting at that time for the BOEOTIANS, being brought before the souldiers, whom they encouraged to fight like men the day of the battel: he did sweare vnto them that the LACEDÆMONIANS had an ancient Oracle, that said they should lose their principality, when they should be ouercome by the THEBANS in a pitched field, in the plaine of LEVCTRES. It is true indeed that the LACEDÆMONIANS had had many oracles and forewarnings to bid them beware of the anger of LEVCTRES: but the common people vnderstood not what this warning meant, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the word: for that there were three LEVCTRES: to wit, in LACONIA, ARCADIA, and BOEOTIA. Howbeit, the vision of Pelopidas, whereof is made large mention in his life, and the sacrifice he made of the yong Filly that came into his camp, confirmed all the former inuentions, and made them bold that were most discouraged. Adding withall, that Epaminondas hauing assembled all his army, began to encourage them with these strong and liuely reasons to shew their valour: insomuch, that being freed from this superstitious feare, they longed for nothing more then to come to blowes. Epaminondas euer concluded all his orations in this manner: O worthy men, embrace sacred death, aduancing your selues to the most honorable and famous fight for your country, for the tombes of your ancestors, and for the holy things. Euen at the same time came to the THEBANS an aide of fiue hundred horse, & fifteene hundred footmen THESSALIANS, conducted by Iason: who practised with both sides to make a peace for certaine daies, telling them he was not wise that feared not the euents. Some iudge it was not at that time that Iason trauelled betweene them both, but rather it was after the iourney of LEVCTRES. Howbeit, I haue followed that which Diodorus the SICILIAN writeth, as a thing most likely. Now as Cleombrotus retired with his army out of BOEOTIA, he met with a great supply of naturall LACEDÆMONIANS, and of some of their allies, brought to him by Archidamus, Agesilaus sonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS seeing the THEBANS so resolute, and fearing their desperate boldnesse: sent these two troupes the easilier to daunt the courage of their enemies. These two being ioyned together they were ashamed to be afraid of the BOEOTIANS, and whether it was that the truce taken was neare expired, or that they forced not of it, they returned on the sodaine again into the plaine of LEVCTRES fully bent to fight. The BOEOTIANS also for their part shrunke not an inch backe, and so on both sides they set their men in order of battell. For Epaminondas, he set his battell after a new fashion, neuer before shewed by any other Captaine. For hauing chosen out of his army the best men and valianteſt souldiers he had, he placed them together in one of the points of his battel, where he should be himselfe & fight in person, seconded with Pelopidas, with his three hundred chosen men, called the holy band: and in the other corner he placed his weaker men, commanding them expresly not to abide the charge of the enemies that should come to assaile them in front, but faire and softly to retire when they saw them come neare them. So the matter fell out as he wished: and he hoped to determine the battell by the vertue and proweſſe of that point where he had placed all the flower and choiſe of his army.

Now the ſigne to fight being giuen, the LACEDÆMONIANS marched of euen hand with the two horns of their battel, ordered in forme of a Creſſant. On the contrary part, one of the wings of the battell of the BOEOTIANS began to giue backe, and the other with great fury ranne to charge the enemie in the flancke: ſtraight they were both come to the ſword together. And at the firſt, becauſe either ſide fought very deſperatly, the victory was doubtfull for a certain time: but at the length Epaminondas troupes brake in amongſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and killed the moſt part of them that were about king Cleombrotus. So long as the king was aliue, he kept backe the THEBANS from victory, becauſe he was accompanied with all the moſt valiant men of his army, valiantly fighting about him. But after he fell downe dead on the ground, hauing receiued an infinit number of wounds, and ſtriken downe many of his enemies: then they thronged together on all ſides, & there was a cruell fight about his body, where were heapes of mens bodies ſlaine one vpon another. And although Epaminondas did ſharply follow his point, yet the LACEDÆMONIANS made ſuch reſiſtance at the laſt, that they did a litle repulſe the BOEOTIANS and cleared the body of the king out of the preſſe and multitude: but that held not long. For Epaminondas through his perſwaſions did ſo lift vp the hearts and courage of his men, that they gaue a ſecond and ſo fierce a charge vpon them, that they wholly ouerthrew the LACEDÆMONIANS, & made them flie for life. Then Epaminondas fiercely purſuing the flying enemies, made great ſlaughter, and wan one of the moſt glorioueſt victories that euer Captaine did: hauing in a pitched field ouercome the moſt noble and warlike nation of all GREECE, with a farre ſmaller number of men then his enemies had. Alſo he tooke more glory of that aboue all his other exploits, and ſpecially becauſe it hapned vnto him in his father Polymnis life time. And oftentimes he had theſe words vp in his mouth: that of all the honeſt and happie fortunes that euer chanced vnto him, nothing ioyed his heart more, then that he had vanquiſhed the LACEDÆMONIANS at the battel of LEVCTRES, his father and mother that begat him being both aliue. And to ſay truly, he that day preſerued the life of his father and mother, and of his whole country beſides: for the LACEDÆMONIANS were fully reſolued vtterly to deſtroy the THEBANS. Now he vſing at all other times to ſhew himſelfe amongſt them, fine and neat, with a pleaſant countenance: the next day after the battel at LEVCTRES he came out openly very ſad, heauy and penſiue. Whereupon his friends asked him preſently if he had heard any euill newes, or ſome misfortune had happened to him. None, ſaid he, but I perceiued by my ſelfe yeſterday, that ouerioyed with the victory that I obtained, I lift vp my ſelfe more then became me: and therfore to day I correct this ioy, which yeſterday was too exceeding in me. He knowing that it was the maner of the SPARTANS to hide and couer (as well as they could poſſible) all ſuch misfortunes: deſirous openly to expreſſe and ſhew the greatneſſe of the loſſe they had ſuſtained, he would not ſuffer them to carrie away their dead bodies by great all together, but euery city one after another: and ſo by this meanes it appeared that there were aboue a thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine. Some make the number of the dead to be greater, and ſay they were foure thouſand naturall LACEDÆMONIANS, but that muſt be vnderſtood of them and their allies: and of the BOEOTIANS, there were not aboue three hundred or thereabouts found dead. This battell of LEVCTRES was ſtricken at the beginning of the 2. yeare of the hundred and ſecond Olympiade.

Epaminondas ouercometh the Lacedæmonians.

The LACEDÆMONIANS hauing at that battell loſt the greateſt part of their honour & greatneſſe, which men had ſeene before in their eſtate, loſt not their courage for all this: but to keepe their youth ſtill in heart, and to take away all feare which had poſſeſſed them that had eſcaped from this ouerthrow, Ageſilaus entred ARCADIA with an army, and was contented to take a ſmall towne of the MANTINEANS, and to prey and ſpoile the country; which done, he returned home againe. Some thinke that this was the cauſe that brought Epaminondas into LACONIA. Otherſome report it otherwiſe, and ſay that Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the MANTINEANS to reedifie their city. And there be that are of another opinion, which is: that Lycomedes Captaine of the ARCADIANS hauing made a rode hard to ORCHOMENE, he flue vpon an encounter Polytropus Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and 2. hundred SPARTANS with him, his purpoſe being to win ORCHOMENE: and thereupon they finding themſelues too weake to ſtand againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, they ſought the alliance and aide of the THEBANS. city of MANTINEA: that was the cause the THEBANS ioyned with the ARCADIANS, and being followed with their allies, led by Epaminondas, they entred into LACONIA with an armie of forty thousand men of warre, and with thirty thousand others that followed the campe. The ATHENIANS sent Iphicrates Captaine with twelue thousand men to aide the SPARTANS: but before his comming Epaminondas entred into LACONIA in diuers places, and sacked all the whole countrey, which had not bene laid wast by any enemy in sixe hundred yeares space before, when the DORIANS came to inhabit there. The SPARTANS seeing their countrey wasted and destroyed before their eyes, were desirous to go out with all the force they could make: but Agesilaus would not suffer them, telling them how dangerous it was to leaue the city, to set vpon such a mighty enemie. So they were quiet, and Epaminondas in the meane space descended the mountaine Taugete with his army, towards the riuer of Eurotas, the which at that time was risen very high by reason of the winter. He sought what he could to draw Agesilaus to fight, who beholding Epaminondas a great while, marching in battell ray alongst the riuer side at the head of his troupes: he wondred at his boldnesse and valour, but would by no meanes come out of his fort. Insomuch as after this army had preyed and foraged all LACONIA, Epaminondas led them backe againe laden with booty. And though Agesilaus had won himselfe great honour for his wisedome, in looking to the safetie of his city: yet Epaminondas had made his countrey so poore with the former losses sustained, especially at the ouerthrow at LEVCTRES: that SPARTA could neuer afterwards recouer that losse againe, nor grow into that reputation & power it had before. Furthermore, notwithstanding all the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the experience of Iphicrates, Epaminondas returned with his whole armie as he came. And the more to keep the LACEDÆMONIANS still vnder their feet, & to heape new troubles vpon them: he gaue counsell to the ARCADIANS and other their allies, to reedifie and repleniſh the city of MESSINA with new inhabitants againe, which the LACEDÆMONIANS had long before that destroyed. All the whole councell giuing their consents vnto it, he made diligent inquirie forthwith to seeke out all those that till that time had bene ancient inhabitants in MESSINA: and in the space of foureſcore and fiue daies hauing reedified the ruined houses, he set on foot againe one of the nobleſt and most ancient cities of GREECE, and left there a strong garrison: for the which he was as much esteemed and rather more, then for any other seruice he had euer done.

Sparta impouerished and decaied.

Epaminondas causeth Messina to be repaired & peopled.

The LACEDÆMONIANS being lightened of a maruellous great feare, made an agreement with the ATHENIANS, and left them the chiefe command by sea, reseruing to themselues that by land. Afterwards through the aide of the ATHENIANS, and the supply that was sent vnto them out of SICILIA, they wan their townes againe by litle and litle. The ARCADIANS to stop their course, assaulted the city of PALLENE in LACONIA, put al the garrison there to the sword, razed the towne, and preyed all the countrey thereabout: and doubting that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be reuenged, they prayed aide of the THEBANS, who sent Epaminondas thither and the other Bœotarches, with six thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horse. The ATHENIANS hauing intelligence thereof, sent their army before vnder the leading of Chabrias, who marched directly to CORINTH, and there had supply of souldiers, of the MEGARIANS, PALLENIANS, and CORINTHIANS, so that he had made vp a regiment of ten thousand men. And afterwards the army of the LACEDÆMONIANS and of their allies, being arriued at the very place of CORINTH, they made all together the number of twenty thousand fighting men. So they determined to repaire and fortifie al the passages and entrances into the country of PELOPONNESVS, to stop the passage of the BOEOTIANS. And beginning from ỳ city of CENCREES vnto the hauen of LECHEVM, they shut and blocked vp all the waies from the one sea to the other, with mighty great peeces of timber acrosse, and with a maruellous deepe ditch. And this great peece of worke was followed with such speed, both by meanes of the great multitude of people, as also through the goodwils of those that laboured it hard: that they had finished and done all before the BOEOTIANS could arriue there. Epaminondas at his comming hauing diligently viewed and considered this fortification, perceiued that the easiest way to be forced, was that which the LACEDÆMONIANS themselues kept. So he sent to giue them defiance, though they were thrice as many men in number as his own. For all this that they had the defiance, they durst not come out, but kept them close vnder this fortification, which receiuing certain assaults, they were repulsed. Now al of them doing their best indeuour, being occupied, some assailing, other defending, Epaminondas chose out the best men in all his armie, and lustily charging the guard of the LACEDÆMONIANS enforced them to giue him way, and in despite of them he entred into PELOPONNESVS, which was a wonderfull and memorable exploit of al others. Frō thence he marched towards the cities of EPIDAVRE & TROEZEN, and so foraged all the country: howbeit he could take none of the townes, because they were defended with strong garrisons. Neuertheless he put SICYONE, PHEVNTE, and some other townes in such feare, that they yeelded themselues vnto him. That being done, he went to CORINTH, & there ouercame the CORINTHIANS in a set battell, and beate them home fighting euen to the wals of their citie. There were some of his men so rash, and presuming of their valour, that they entred hand ouer head with those that fled, euen within the gates of their city: which put the CORINTHIANS in such a terrible feare, that they ran with all speed possible to get their houses ouer their heads. Chabrias beate them out againe, and killed some of them. Wherupon he caused a token of triumph to be set vp, as if it had bene an ouerthrow. Epaminondas laughing him to scorne for it, said he should not call it a Trophee, or token of triumph, but rather Hecatesie, as one would say, a statue of Proserpina: because in times past they commonly set this image of Proserpina at the first gallowes they found before the gate of any city. The BOEOTIANS therefore came on with their battell as neare vnto CORINTH as they could, and Chabrias with his troupes camped without in a very strong place of aduantage for him: so there were many skirmishes betweene them, in the which Chabrias shewed such valour, that he wan great fame and reputation euen of Epaminondas himselfe. Who being asked on a time whom he thought the greatest captaine, himselfe, Chabrias, or Iphicrates: It is hard to iudge, said he, whilest we are all aliue. Another brought him word that the ATHENIANS had sent an army againe into PELOPONNESVS, furnished with new armours. Well, answered he, doth Antigenidas weepe when he knoweth that Tellin hath new flutes? This Tellin was a very bad player of the flute, and Antigenidas excellent good and skilfull. Touching the supply of this army, they were ten thousand SPANIARDS and GAVLES, whom Dionysius the tyrant sent out of SICILIA to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing payed them for fiue moneths. They had serued reasonably well in this war, and so in the end of sommer returned home againe.

Epaminondas ouercame the Corinthians

Chabrias a valiant captaine.

Now it fortuned in these last encounters, that Epaminondas hauing forced the LACEDÆMONIANS that stood to the defence of the fortification aboue mentioned, and hauing them in his power to haue slaughtered a great number of them at his will: he contented himselfe only with this glory, that in despite of them he had entred into PELOPONNESVS, and sought to do them no more hurt: which gaue those occasion that did enuie his glory to blame him, and to accuse him of treason, as hauing willingly spared the enemies, because they should particularly thanke him onely. But now that we haue begun to speake of this matter, we must see how he behaued himselfe among his citizens, and the wisedome he vsed in defence of his integrity. Among all those that could not endure the glory of his vertues, was Menecclides the Oratour, an eloquent man, but withall most wicked and malicious. He finding that Epaminondas wan such honour by warres, neuer left perswading the THEBANS to embrace peace, and to preferre it before warre: because they should not liue alwaies vnder the obedience and command of one man. Epaminondas told him one day in open councell: Thou wilt deceiue the THEBANS, going about to counsell them to leaue warres: and highly commending ease, thou goest about to put iron bolts vpon their feete. For warre begetteth peace, the which cannot hold long but among those that know how to seeke and keepe it with the edge of the sword. Then speaking to the citizens: If ye will haue the principality and command of all GREECE, before all others: you must shrowd your selues in your tents and pauilions in the open field, and not follow games & wrestlings here at home. Also he knew well enough that the BOEOTIANS spoiled and vndid themselues by ease and idlenesse: which was the cause that he constantly bare this mind to keepe them continually in wars. Whereupon when time came that they fell to choosing of Captaines, and that they went about to chuse him Bœotarche: he said to the citizens: My masters, I pray you consider of it now you are at leysure, before you choose me: for I tell you plainely, if I be chosen your captaine, you must to the warres. He called the country of BOEOTIA, which is all plaine champion, the scaffold of war: saying it was vnpossible to keepe it, vnlesse the inhabitants had their targets on their armes, and their swords in their hands. This was not because he did not loue peace, and solitarinesse to studie Philosophy, and that he was not more fearful of them he had in his charge then for himselfe, vsing alwaies to watch and forbeare his meate, when the THEBANS were at their their banquets and feasts giuing themselues to all pleasures: but he knew them well enough, and he was neuer more carefull of any thing, then to keepe his army from idlenesse. For on a time the ARCADIANS intreating that his troupes might enter into one of their towns, to lie driethere in couert all the winter, he would by no meanes yeeld to it. For now (said he to his souldiers) that they see you exercise your selues in arms, they wonder at you as braue & valiant souldiers: but if they should see you at the fire side parching of beanes, they would esteeme no better of you then of themselues. No more could he endure couetousnesse: for if sometime he gaue his men leaue to go a booting, his meaning was, that whatsoeuer they got should be bestowed in furnishing of armes. For if any man went about to fill his purse with mony, he thought him vnworthie to be a souldier. As on a time when he perceiued that his Target-bearer had receiued a great summe of money for the ransome of a prisoner, he said vnto him: Giue me my target, and go thou thy waies, and buy thee a Tauerne to leade the rest of thy life there: for I perceiue thou wilt no more like an honest man put thy selfe in danger in the warres, as before thou hast done, because thou art now rich and wealthy. Now Epaminondas being such a one as you haue heard, Meneclides notwithstanding would neuer cease controlling of him: and one day he went so farre as to reproch him that he had no children, that he was not married, & that he magnified himself more then euer king Agamemnon had done. Epaminondas answered him, thou hast nothing to do to counsell me to marrie: for in that respect there is neuer a man here in all this councell whom I would lesse vse then thou. And this he spake, because the other was suspected to be an adulterer. And where thou thinkest that I do enuie the glory and fame of Agamemnon, thou art fouly deceiued: yet I tell thee he was not a little troubled to win a town in ten yeares: where I to the contrary putting the LACEDÆMONIANS to flight in one day, haue deliuered our city and al GREECE from them. But thankes be to you, my Lord THEBANS, (speaking to all the whole assembly:) through you I did it, and ouerthrew and ruined the power and gouernment of our enemies. Neuertheless, Pelopidas and he were very euill recompenced for this good seruice of theirs: for at their returne from LACONIA, they with some other of the Bœotarches were accused, for that after the time of their charge & gouernment was expired, they had kept it foure moneths beyond the time the law had appointed them. With much ado Pelopidas was absolued: but Epaminondas willed his companions to lay all the fault vpon him, as being forced vnto it by his authority: and that for his part his words could be no better then his deedes. So vpon this he being called before the Iudges, and after he had iustified that he had passed the time limited of his authority: in stead of excusing himselfe, he went and told brauely his worthy exploits he had done in this iourney at that time: adding withall, that he was willing and ready to die, so they caused his condemnation to be written vpon the pillar of his tombe, to the end the GREEKES should vnderstand that they had put Epaminondas to death, because he had compelled the THEBANS, against their wils to burn the country of LACONIA, the which in fiue hundred yeares before had neuer once bene spoiled: that he had restored the city of MESSINA with inhabitants againe, two hundred and thirty yeares after the LACEDÆMONIANS had laid it waste: that he had brought all the people and townes of ARCADIA to be as one bodie in league together, and had set all the GREEKES at liberty: and all these things, said he, we did in our iourney. The Iudges vnderstanding this worthy and true defence, they all rose from their seates and laughed a good, and would neuer take their bals to ballot against him.

Epaminondas careful to keepe his army from idlenesse.

But as for his second accusation, that he had shewed fauour vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS for his own particular honour, he would make no answer before the people of THEBES to this false imputation, but he rose out of the Theater, and passing through the assembly walked into the parke of exercises. The people being in vprore against him, made no choise of him againe as they were wont to do, although there was great need: but created other Bœotarches to go into THESSALY. And the more (as they thought) to despite Epaminondas, they commanded him to go that voyage as a priuate souldier: the which he refused not, but went very willingly, and vpon this occasion. Pelopidas being sent the second time into THESSALY, to make accord betwixt the people and Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was by this tyrant (not respecting the dignity of an Ambassador, nor of his countrey) made prisoner with Ismenias. Whereupon the THEBANS being iustly offended, sent thither an army of eight thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horse, howbeit vnder the leading of vnskilfull Captaines, who wanting iudgement to vse the time, thought it good to returne home againe without doing any thing. But as they went their way, Alexander being ſtronger in horſmen then they, followed them, and gaue charge vpon the rere, killed ſome, and grieuouſly wounded others. So they knowing neither how to go forward nor backward, were in great diſtreſſe, & the rather becauſe their victuals fell ſhorter euery day then other. But being now almoſt out of all hope to retire home with ſaftetie, Epaminondas being then amongſt the foote, was earneſtly intreated by the ſouldiers and Captaines to helpe to redreſſe this diſorder. Thereupon he choſe certaine footmen light armed, and all the horſemen, and ſo falling himſelf amongſt them in the rereward of the army, he ſo luſtily repulſed the enemies, that the reſt of the army afterwards marched in great ſafetie: and did ſo well, fighting at times, making head as occaſion ſerued, and keeping his troupes in ſo good order, that he brought them all away ſafe. This act crowned him with a new glory, confounded his enemies, and wanne him great honour euery where, beſides the loue and good will of his citizens: who ſet great fines vpon their Captaines, becauſe they had behaued themſelues ſo euill in this iourney. Againe, the people ſeeing that by ſo many worthy deeds Epaminondas razed out all the ſlanders and accuſations which his euill willers had vomited out againſt him: they choſe him anew their Captaine generall, to returne into THESSALY with another army. At whoſe coming all the countrey ſtraight reioyced for the reputation of ſo great and famous a Captaine, and there wanted little euen to breake this tyrants necke altogether, his friends and Captaines ſtood in ſuch feare, and his ſubiects in good mind to rebell, and very ioyfull for the hope they had ſhortly to ſee the tyrant at one blow well recompenced for all his curſed and wicked deeds he had done long before. Neuertheleſſe Epaminondas ſetting aſide the conſideration of his honour and glory, in reſpect of the deliuerance and ſafety of his friend Pelopidas, and being afraid that Alexander, when he ſhould ſee his eſtate in danger to be ouerthrowne, would take reuenge in his madneſſe vpon Pelopidas: he purpoſely drew this warre in length, wheeling about in euery place, refraining to ſet on him in earneſt, diſſembling to make his preparations, and ſtill delaying, becauſe he would prepare and ſoften the heart of this tyrant by this deuice, not to leaue him too much to his bold vnbridled will, neither to ſtirre vp (to the danger of Pelopidas) the ſharpe and inhumane anger of this bloud-ſucker. Who being a monſter, compounded of cruelty and cowardice, was ſo afraid onely of the name and reputation of Epaminondas, and hanging the wing, as they ſay: that he preſently ſent men vnto him to excuſe and iuſtifie him. But Epaminondas would not that the THEBANS through his ſlackneſſe ſhould make peace and alliance with ſo wicked a man, but onely he was contented to take a truce with him for thirty dayes, taking Pelopidas and Iſmenias out of his hands. So with them he returned backe againe to THEBES, and alwaies continued faithfull friendſhip with Pelopidas, refuſing euer to haue any part of his goods, but did ſtill perſeuere in his wonted ſimplicity and diſcipline. Now ſpeaking of this friendſhip, they report that Epaminondas hauing committed a man of baſe condition for ſome light fault to priſon, Pelopidas prayed him to ſet the poore man at liberty, but he denied him: and yet afterward being intreated by a woman he kept, he did it at her requeſt, ſaying that harlots were to be granted ſuch requeſts, not Captaines.

Epaminondas choſen Captaine generall for Theſſalie.

Epaminondas preferreth the ſafety of his friend before his own reputation.

Epaminondas deliuereth Pelopidas out of priſon.

This boldneſſe he ſhewed in all places, and to all men yet mingled with a great ſweetneſſe, and with a good liuely grace: whereof we will bring many examples, beſides that he ſpake at SPARTA againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS & Ageſilaus, in the preſence of all the commiſſioners of GRECE. The ARGIANS hauing made league with the THEBANS, the ATHENIANS ſent their Ambaſſadors into ARCADIA, to ſee if they could gaine the ARCADIANS to be their friends. So theſe Ambaſſadors began roundly and hotly to charge and accuſe both the one and the other: inſomuch as Calliſtratus ſpeaking for them, reproued the other two cities ORESTES and OEDIPVS. Epaminondas being preſent at that aſſembly of counſell, ſtood vp, and ſaid: My Lords, we confeſſe that in times paſt we had a man that killed his father in our city, and in ARGOS one that killed his mother: but for vs, we haue driuen out of our countrey, and baniſhed all ſuch wicked murtherers, and the ATHENIANS haue receiued them both. And to the SPARTANS that had layd many great and grieuous imputations vpon the THEBANS: If they haue done nothing elſe, my Lords of SPARTA, anſwered Epaminondas, yet at the leaſt they haue made you forget to ſpeake litle. The ATHENIANS had made league with Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, mortall enemy of the THEBANS, who promiſed the THEBANS that he would let them haue a pound of fleſh for an halfe peny. Epaminondas hearing of it, Well ſaid he, and we will find them wood that ſhall coſt them nothing to ſeeth this fleſh withall: for we will go fell and cut downe all the trees they haue in their country, if they goe about to make any alteration other then good. So when he went into THESSALY, and brought backe Pelopidas againe, the ATHENIANS made no great ſtirre againſt him: and the tyrant that promiſed fleſh ſo good cheape, had much ado at that time to keepe his skin whole. But afterwards he had his payment, as you may reade in the latter end of Pelopidas life. But that which did excell in Epaminondas, and did cut the throate of enuy it ſelfe, was his moderation and temperance, knowing how to vſe any ſtate or condition offered him, & neuer to rage againſt himſelfe nor others, alwaies bearing this mind, that howſoeuer they tooke him, and in what place ſoeuer they ſet him, he was well contented, and all for the good of his country: for proofe whereof I will ſhew you this example. His euill willers on a time thinking to bring him in diſgrace, as they ſay, for ſpite they made him ſuperintendant and ouerſeer of al the cuſtomes, whileſt others his inferiors, vnworthy to be compared to him, were placed in the moſt honourable offices. This notwithſtanding he deſpiſed not this office, but did diſcharge it very faithfully: for, ſaid he, office or authority ſheweth not onely what the man is, but alſo the man what the office is.

The moderation and temperance of Epaminondas.

But now further: ſhortly after Epaminondas returne out of THESSALY, the ARCADIANS were ouercome by Archidamus and the LACEDÆMONIANS, and they loſt not a man: and therefore this dayes iourney was called for them, the teareleſſe battell. Epaminondas foreſeeing that the ARCADIANS ſhould yet haue a ſtorme, gaue them counſell to fortifie themſelues: whoſe counſell they following, they built the towne which afterwards was called MEGALIPOLIS, ſituated in a very conuenient place. Whileſt they made warre with the ELIANS their neighbours, Epaminondas heart neuer fainted, but his minde was alwaies giuen to high enterpriſes for the good of his country: where being reſpected and honoured aboue all others, he made an oration vnto his citizens, perſwading them to make themſelues ſtrong by ſea, and to attend the conqueſt of the principality, making themſelues Lords of it. This oration of his had bene long thought of before, being full of liuely reaſons, which did ſhew and proue vnto them that the enterpriſe was both honourable and profitable, aſwell by other arguments he alledged, as alſo for that he told them it was an eaſie thing for them that were now the ſtronger by land, to make themſelues alſo the ſtrongeſt by ſea: and the rather for that the ATHENIANS in the warre againſt Xerxes, notwithſtanding that they had armed and ſet forth two hundred galleys well appointed with men, they neuertheleſſe willingly ſubmitted themſelues vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. So alledging many other reaſons to this purpoſe, he preuailed ſo much, that the THEBANS inclined to vndertake the enterpriſe by ſea. Thereupon the people gaue preſent order they ſhould build a hundred galleys, & withall an arſenall with ſo many roomes to lay them vnder couert in the docke: and that they ſhould ſend to them of RHODES, of CHIO, and of BYZANCE, to pray them to further them in this enterpriſe. And for this purpoſe Epaminondas was ſent with an army vnto theſe cities. So in this courſe he met with Laches, a captaine of the ATHENIANS, and a good number of ſhips in his fleete, ſent of purpoſe to hinder the intention of the THEBANS. Notwithſtanding, Epaminondas made him ſo afraid, that he draue him backe againe: and he holding on his voyage, brought the cities before named to make league with the THEBANS, who on the other ſide were at warre with the city of ORCHOMENE, which had done great hurt and miſchiefe in their eſtate. So they hauing won it by aſſault, they ſlue euery man that was able to beare armes, and moreouer made all the women and children ſlaues.

Eloquence commendable in a captaine.

Some time after Pelopidas death, certaine priuate men of MANTINEA, fearing to be called to account for their bad behauiours and robberies they had done, if the ARCADIANS & ELIANS fell to agreement: they practiſed ſo, that they raiſed vp a new quarrell within the countrey deuided into two factions, of the which the MANTINEANS were chiefe of the one ſide, and the TEGEATES on the other part. This quarrell went ſo farre, that the parties would try it by armes. The TEGEATES, they ſent to demand aide of the THEBANS, who choſe Epaminondas their Captaine generall, and ſent him with a good number of men of warre to aide the TEGEATES. The MANTINEANS aſtonied at this aide coming out of BOEOTIA to their enemies, and at the reputation of this Captaine: they immediatly ſent vnto the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, the greateſt enemies of the BOEOTIANS for aide, which both the cities granted. Wherupon there fell out often and many great skirmiſhes in diuerſe parts of PELOPONNESVS. Epaminondas being not far off MANTINEA, vnderſtood by the ſame country men, that Ageſilaus and the LACEDÆMONIANS were come into the field, & that they waſted al the territory of the

TEGEATES. Whereupon imagining straight that there were few men left in the city of SPARTA to defend it, he went about a great exploit, and a wonderfull stratageme of a man of warre: and had brought it to passe, if the maruellous great good fortune of SPARTA had not hindred it. So he departed from TEGEA by night, the MANTINEANS knowing nothing of it, and taking another way then Agesilaus, he had taken SPARTA without one stroke striken, but for a post of CANDIA that with speed brought Agesilaus word of it: who forthwith sent out a horseman to giue them intelligence that were left at SPARTA, that they should beware they were not surprised vpon the sudden: and he himselfe came speedily after, and arriued there a litle before the THEBANS coming thither: who being very neare the city by breake of day, gaue assault to them that were within to defend the towne. Then Agesilaus bestirred him throughly, beyond the power of an old man. But his sonne Archidamus, and Isadas the sonne of Phœbidas, fought valiantly on all parts. Epaminondas seeing the SPARTANS in order of battell, began then to mistrust that his enterprise was discouered. This notwithstanding, he left not off to force them all he could, albeit he fought with great disaduantage for the inconuenience of the places he occupied: and continued alwaies couragiously doing and receiuing hurt, vntill the army of the LACEDÆMONIANS came on, and the night also: whereupon he made them sound the retraite. Now he being aduertised that the MANTINEANS came on also with their forces, he drew his troupes somewhat further off the towne, and there camped. After that he caused his men to refresh themselues with victuals, and hauing left certaine horsemen in the campe, he commanded them to make fires in the morning, and he himselfe went in the meane space, to surprise those that remained at MANTINEA before any man wist he was gone. Neuertheless he failed of his purpose, albeit he had forethought him of all misfortunes that any man possible could haue considered in so weighty a cause.

The Thebans prosperity come to the height.

But the prosperity of the THEBANS was come to his height, and the course of Epaminondas life drawing neare to an end, would very shortly depriue GREECE of this noble and famous person, from whom was taken a most notable victory, and that twise, by a most strange accident. For at this second time, when he was neare vnto MANTINEA, left without guard and defence; on the other side of the towne there arriued six thousand ATHENIANS led by their Captain Hegelecus: who hauing put sufficient force into the towne, he ordered all the rest in battell without the towne wals, as though he meant to haue fought a field: and immediately after them came also the LACEDÆMONIANS and MANTINEANS together, who prepared themselues to put all to the hazard of a battell, and therefore sent for their allies out of all parts. They were in all fiue and twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. The ARCADIANS, BOEOTIANS, and their partakers, made the number of thirty thousand footmen and aboue, and three thousand horse. First the horsemen charged with so great furie as was possible, insomuch as the horsemen of the ATHENIANS finding ẏ THEBANS in front, were the weaker: not because they were lesse valiant and hardy then the other, but because they had not so good leaders, and had few archers among their troupes. The THEBANS on the other side they were wel appointed, & specially of THESSALIANS amongst others, men very skilfull in their bowes, who so plied the ATHENIANS, that they brake them, and put them all to rout. Yet they did not flie amongst their footmen which made them somewhat recouer their honour they had lost by running away, and all because they had not broken the rankes of their allies. On the cõtrary part, as they fled they met with certain troupes of souldiers of NEGROPONT, whom the ARCADIANS sent to take in certaine hils hard by the plaine where the battell was fought, and they put them all to the sword. The men at armes of the THEBANS seeing them turne their backes, did not pursue them at all, but gaue charge vpon a great battalion of footmen, forcing them all they could to breake & run through them: so the fight was very cruell and sharpe, but in the end the ATHENIANS left the place. This notwithstanding, the Colonell of the horsemen of the ELIANS being appointed for the safety of the reregard, defended them, and comming to the encounter of the BOEOTIANS he resisted them, and made them speedily giue backe: and this reformed the fault againe of the left point of their army. But in the right point, after the horsemen had charged one vpon another, the fight was soone tried. For, by reason of the great number of the men at armes of the THEBANS and THESSALIANS, the partakers of the MANTINEANS were presently put to rout, and after they had lost a great number of their men, they succoured themselues about ẏ battalion of their footmen. And this was the successe of the fight of the horsemen. As touching the battalion of the footmen, footmen, after they came once to the ſword, it was a maruellous bloudy and moſt cruell fight: for neuer before that time was there ſo great number of GREEKES in battell one againſt the other, nor ſo great Captaines, nor of better fighting and more valiant men. The two nations that at that time bare the name to be the braueſt ſouldiers for footmen of al the world, to wit, the THEBANS, and LACEDÆMONIANS, they were ſet in front in the battel one directly againſt the other. So ỹ firſt began to charge, neither ſparing life nor limme. The firſt charge they gaue was with their pikes, which being broken by force of the great blowes they gaue to each other, thē they fought with their ſwords, and laying about them body to body, there was no kind of ſlaſhing and wounding but they both gaue and receiued: and neither part ſhrunke nor gaue ouer, but ſtucke to it manfully. And ſo continuing this dangerous fight a long time, by reaſon of the valiantneſſe of either ſide, the victory ſtood doubtfull a great while, and could hardly be iudged which ſide were like to haue the vpper hand. For euery one that fought had this reſolution in his heart, not to feare death whatſoeuer hapned: but rather deſiring to make proofe of the valour of his perſon, worthily gaue his life in prey, to win honour in exchange. By reaſon whereof, though the fight was moſt ſharpe and violent, the euent of it remained a long ſpace betwixt two irons, not to be diſcerned of whether ſide the victory ſhould fall. Vntill ſuch time as Epaminondas ſeeing that there was no remedy, but that the reſolution of this doubtfull fight depended vpon his owne vertue and valour: he reſolued with himſelfe to venter his life vpon it. So he preſently gathered about him all the beſt and choiſe men of his army, and of them hauing made a company of reſolute men, he ran with great furie into the greateſt preſſe of all the enemies, marching himſelfe the foremoſt man before his troupe, with a ſpeare in his hand, with the which at the firſt blow he gaue, he ſlue the captain of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſtraight way the other began to aſſaile their enemies. But Epaminondas killed ſo many in the place with his owne hands, and did ſo terrifie the others, that at the laſt he opened the battell of his enemies, and layed on them ſo luſtily, that they not able any longer to defend themſelues againſt the valorous force of himſelfe and his followers, were enforced to giue backe, and to leaue the place to the BOEOTIANS: who were ſtraight at their heeles, beating and following them ſo eagerly that in a ſhort ſpace all the field was couered with dead bodies, lying on heapes one vpon another. But in the end, the LACEDÆMONIANS ſeeing they could by no meanes ſaue themſelues, becauſe Epaminondas followed them ſo neare (giuen ouer too much to his paſſionate courage) they gathered a troupe together, and running all on heapes they ſet vpon him, throwing infinit numbers of darts at him, of the which he put by ſome, and receiued others vpon his target: but yet there were many that ſtucke in his body, which he pulled out himſelfe, and with the ſelfe ſame weapons fought with them that had throwne them at him. At the laſt, when he had fought more then a man, and beyond all the force a man could vſe to giue his countrey the victory: a LACONIAN called Anticrates thruſt him into the breaſt with a dart with ſuch a force, that the wood brake, and the iron with the tronchion remained in his body. Hauing receiued this great wound, he ſuddenly fell downe to the ground: but then was there a more cruell fight about him then before, with great ſlaughter of both ſides: vntill that the THEBANS which had much ſtronger bodies then the LACEDÆMONIANS, made them flie for life: and after they had followed them a little way, they returned againe to the campe where the battell was fought, to the end they might haue the dead bodies in their power, and ſo the whole victory. Thereupon they ſounded the retraite, and thus the battell ceaſed, for the which both of them ſet vp tokens of triumph, either ſide pretending they had the better. For the ATHENIANS hauing ouerthrowne thoſe of NEGROPONT and their adherents which were ſent to take the hils of that plaine: they kept the bodies in their power. The THEBANS on the other ſide hauing ouercome the SPARTANS, had the bodies of thoſe that were dead in that battell in their power, being the farre greater number alſo: wherefore they ſaid that they were victours. So ſtanding in theſe termes, it was a good while before they ſent trumpeter or herauld the one to the other, to bury their dead: vntill that the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent firſt of all, and then they all tooke their dead bodies and buried them. And furthermore, he that had killed Epaminondas was ſo wel thought of, and highly eſteemed for this valiant act of his, for the great feare all the SPARTANS had had of Epaminondas in time paſt: that they gaue him many great preſents and honours, and beſides, made thoſe that came after him free from all publike charges and contributions in the common wealth. And Plutarch alſo ſaid, that in his time one Callicrates, a nephew of Anticrates

aboue named, did then enioy that freedome. Touching Epaminondas, he was brought yet aliue into his tent: howbeit the phyſitions and ſurgeons being called together to dreſſe him, they all agreed, that ſo ſoone as euer they pulled out the head and ſplent of the dart out of his body, he muſt needs die. So he made a moſt worthy and noble end of his life: for firſt he called for his target-bearer, who was alwaies at his hand in battell, and asked him, Is my target ſafe? He brought it ſtraight to ſhew it him. Then he asked who had the victory? The BOEOTIANS, ſaid the target-bearer. Then he commanded they ſhould bring him Diophantus and Iolidas: but being told they were both dead, he willed his citizens to make peace with their enemies, for that now they had no more Captaines of skill to leade them to the warres. Adding further to that aboue ſpoken, It is now time I die, and ſo commanded them to plucke this ſpell of the dart out of his body. At that word all his friends about him fetched grieuous ſighes and cried out: and one of them weeping, ſaid vnto him: Alas Epaminondas, thou dieſt now, and leaueſt no children behind thee. No that I do not, ſaid he: but I leaue two faire daughter behind me, whereof the one is the victory of LEVCTRES, and the other that of MANTINEA. Immediatly they pulled out the ſpell of the dart, and at that inſtant he gaue vp the ghoſt, without ſhewing any ſigne or token that he was troubled in his mind. And thus did he embrace that bleſſed death: that fortuning vnto him which he often had in his mouth: that warre is the bed of honour, and alſo that it is a ſweete death to die for his countrey. Now may we well ſee, that he excelled all the Captaines that euer were before him, did accompany, or follow him. For whoſoeuer would compare all their vertues with the deeds and glory of Epaminondas, he ſhall ſee that the vertue of him was more noble and excellent, then any of theirs. For in them will appeare at the firſt ſight ſome ſpeciall thing more eminent then all the reſt, which hath made their fame great and glorious: but in this man onely were ioyned together all the vertues and good parts that could be wiſhed for in graue, politicke, and a great Captaine, to make him perfect and complete in all things. For in the liberall ſciences, in experience, ripe vnderſtanding, force of eloquence, ſtrength of body, diſpoſition of his perſon, in height and greatneſſe of courage, in temperance, wiſedome, watching, ſweetneſſe and courteſie: and moreouer in hardineſſe, proweſſe, good iudgement, and ſufficiencie in military diſcipline: I know not where there is to be found ſo compleate a man. For my opinion, I compare Epaminondas to himſelf. Alſo in his time he wan to his country by force of armes, the principality of GREECE: but after his death his citizens loſt it immediatly, and fell daily to decay: that at the laſt Alexander the Great vtterly ouercame them, made them that were aliue ſlaues, and deſtroyed their city to the very ground. To conclude, before, and after Epaminondas, THEBES was vnder foote, and yet commanded all others whiles he ſtood on his feete. And ſo we muſt conclude, that THEBES was vtterly ouerthrowne in the battell of MANTINEA, and that Epaminondas at that time wan an immortall glory. And as in his life time he had caried himſelfe modeſtly, and alwaies deteſted couetouſneſſe: ſo after his deceaſe the THEBANS brought him to his graue at the common charge of the towne, becauſe they found no money in his houſe to defray the leaſt charges of his funerall.

THE LIFE OF Philip of Macedon.

Philip: that wiſedome booteth not at all,
Which ſcorning iuſtice, hopes to clime on high.
Let Princes that behold thy ſudden fall,
Loue right and meekeneſſe, leſt like thee they die.

Amyntas, the ſecond of that name, and ſeuenteenth King of MACEDON, of the race of Temenides or Caranides, deſcended from Hercules, and that reigned foure hundred and ninety eight yeares, reckoning from Caranus vnto Antipater, in whom began another race: he had three ſonnes by his firſt wife called Eurydice, borne in ILLYRIA: to wit, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip. Alexander hauing ſucceeded his father, reigned but one yeare, during which time he made warre with his baſe brother Ptolomæus Alorites. But to appeaſe the ſtrife betwixt them, they ſent for Pelopidas, who was at that time in THESSALIE. He tooke vp all their quarrels, reſtored thoſe that were baniſhed vnto their houſes, and (becauſe this peace ſhould be more ſurely kept) he tooke of them for hoſtages, Philip, and thirty other of the nobleſt mens ſonnes in MACEDON, and brought them all away with him to THEBES. Now during the time that Perdiccas reigned, which was the ſpace of fiue yeares, Philip kept at Pammenes houſe, with whom Epaminondas was very great: and hereof it came, that ſome thought Philip was a hearer of Lyſis Epaminondas ſchoolemaſter, and that they conferred together in Philoſophie. Howbeit Epaminondas was then much older then he, and ſurely it can hardly be that they were ſcholers together: except they will ſay that Epaminondas continuing all his life time to profit by the ſtudy of wiſedome, made Philip deſirous to heare him ſometime, and to follow him alſo. And it may be well inough alſo that he had learned of Epaminondas to be ſo quicke and ſudden of execution in the wars, as he was: which was but one of the leaſt parts of Epaminondas vertues. But as for his continencie, iuſtice, magnanimity, and clemency, which were the parts that in truth made him great: Philip, neither by nature, nor by education, nor by ſtudy, euer attained vnto it: for all this, he wanted not great gifts of body and mind, as ſhall appeare in the diſcourſe of his life: and as Theophraſtus teſtifieth, he was greater then any other of the kings of MACEDON, not only in proſperity of fortune, but alſo in wiſedome, bounty, and moderation of manners. So it came to paſſe that Alexander, notwithſtanding the accord Pelopidas had made, was traiterously killed by Ptolomy surnamed Alorites, who vsurped the kingdome, and was slaine himselfe by Perdiccas: who after he had bene ouercome in a great battell by the SLAVONS, in the which he was slaine: Philip which was the last of the three brethrē, stealing away from the place where he was in hostage, fled into MACEDON, and came to succeed in the kingdome, the which he found in great trouble. For there were slaine at the last battell aboue foure thousand MACEDONIANS, and those that escaped were so beaten and astonied with blowes, that they thought of nothing lesse then to take armes against the SLAVONS. On the other side the HVNGARIANS made inrodes into MACEDON, and the SLAVONS mustered againe to returne thither. There was one Pausanias also that aspired to the kingdome, by the support of the king of THRACIA. And the ATHENIANS also, they would establish one called Argæus, and to this end sent a great fleete by sea, and three thousand footmen well armed by land, led by Mantias. Philip taking heart to him in these rude beginnings, began to embolden the MACEDONIANS by wise perswasions: he reestablished military discipline, furnished his souldiers very well, making them arme themselues, and gaue order they should be continually trained and exercised. It was he that amongst other things deuised how to close his footmen, and that framed the square battell, which euer since was called the MACEDONIAN Phalange. He was very gracious in his words, and by his promises and gifts he wan the hearts and good will of his subiects.

Philips first exploits.

Now finding himselfe strong, although he was yet but young of yeares, he resolued to make head against all his enemies, yet not by open force, but where there was need: being alwaies of this mind, to buy time and men as much as he could possible. So perceiuing that the ATHENIANS did their vttermost indeuor to win the city of AMPHIPOLIS againe, & that by this meanes they sought to bring the kingdome of MACEDON into the hands of Argæus: he made them leaue it, and thrust out their garrisons. As for the PANNONIANS (others reade PÆONIANS) or HVNGARIANS, hauing sent ambassadors to them, he corrupted some with money, and wan others by faire promises: insomuch that they were all contented to liue in peace with him. And by the same meanes he brake the hope of Pausanias, hauing by presents gained the king of THRACIA that aided him. And for the regard of Mantias captaine of the ATHENIANS, he marched with his army vnto the city of METHONA: but he remained there, and sent Argæus with the souldiers strangers whom they had brought with them, vnto the city of ÆGES. Argæus approching neare the towne with his troupe, sent to feele the inhabitants, if they would receiue him, and be the first that should be cause of his entrie into the possession of the kingdome of MACEDON. But perceiuing they cared not for him, he returned againe. Philip that followed him hard at his heeles gaue him battell, killed the most part of his men, and draue the rest vnto a little mountaine, where he besieged them so straightly, that they were forced to deliuer him all the banished men of MACEDON amongst them: whereupon he let them goe their liues and goods saued. This first victory of Philip put the MACEDONIANS againe in heart, and made them bold to enterprise any thing afterwards. Hereupon he made peace with the ATHENIANS, and vnderstanding that the king of HVNGARIE was dead, he entred into their country with a maine army, ouercame them in battell, and made them subiect vnto him. Of all his enemies there were left none but the SLAVONIANS, whom he went to assaile with ten thousand footmen, and sixe hundred horse. But since they could not agree together, Bardyllis their king trusting in the victories he had gotten before time of the MACEDONIANS, and in the valiantnesse of his SLAVONS, he came into the field and presented battell. The which hauing bene fought a long time, Philip behaued himselfe so valiantly with his men of armes the MACEDONIANS, that he ouerthrew the SLAVONS, leauing seuen thousand of them dead on the ground: and the rest escaped by flying away. Shortly after they were agreed together, and restored to Philip all the places they held pertaining vnto MACEDON. Now the AMPHIPOLITANS had of long time borne Philip euill will, and whilest he was occupied in other places, they did him many iniuries: wherefore he determined to make a sharpe war vpon them. He hauing besieged them with a puissant army, and hauing brought his engines of war hard to their wals, he beat them with such furie, that he made a sufficient breach, and entred the towne by force: out of the which he draue those afterwards that were his enemies, and very courteously vsed and intreated the rest. This towne being seated in a very commodious place, vpon the frontiers of THRACIA, and of the countries neare adioyning thereto, stood him afterwards in great stead for the furtherance and increase of his greatnesse. For by meanes of that he presently had the

the city of PYDNE, and made league with the OLYNTHIANS, of great power at that time: by reaſon whereof he and the ATHENIANS enuying one the other, they both practiſed to winne them. But Philip hauing wonne POTIDEA, draue out the garriſon of the ATHENIANS, and vſed them very honeſtly: for he ſent them home to their houſes, their liues and goods ſaued, not because he loued the people of ATHENS, but for that he feared the power of their city. After he had taken in the city of PYDNE, he gaue it to the OLYNTHIANS, with al the territory belonging vnto it. Then he returned to CRENIDES, the which he hauing augmented with a great number of inhabitants, he changed the firſt name of it, and called it by his own name, PHILIPPI. Within that territory he had mynes of gold, the which he opened and digged ſo diligently, that he drew out yearely new made, about the ſumme of ſix hundred thouſand crownes. By this means in a ſhort time hee gathered together a great treaſure, and dayly the kingdome of MACEDON grew great, becauſe it had one of the chiefeſt ſinewes and props of war. So he coyned a number of peeces of gold called Philippus, wherewith he waged a great number of men, and bribed many priuate GREEKS: who afterwards ſold him for ready mony the townes of their country, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. In all this buſineſſe, Alexander the tyrant of PHERES in THESSALY, hauing bene ſlaine by his wife Thebe, and by her brethren called Lycophron, and Tiſiphonus, at the firſt they were honoured as men that had deliuered their countrey of a cruell tyranny: but very ſhortly after, theſe two men changing their mindes, by money wanne the ſouldiers whom Alexander kept for the guard of his perſon, & put themſelues in his place whom they had killed, putting many citizens to death that withſtood their enterpriſe: and hauing gathered together a great number of ſouldiers, they made themſelues Lords of PHERES. The ALLEVADES, men of authority, and greatly followed in the countrey for the ancient nobility of their houſe, would haue oppoſed themſelues againſt this new tyranny. But finding themſelues to be too weak, they made meanes to Philip: who entring into THESSALY with his army, ouercame the two tyrants, and ſetting the townes at liberty which theſe tyrants held in ſubiection, he ſhewed great loue and fauour to the THESSALIANS. By which occaſion, in all his conqueſts he obtained afterwards, he found the THESSALIANS alwaies ready to do him ſeruice, and to aide him in all his affaires, and not himſelfe alone, but alſo his ſonne Alexander. But the greatneſſe of Philip grieued his neighbours, inſomuch as the kings of THRACIA, HVNGARIA, and SLAVONIA, not being ſtrong enough of themſelues, they ioyned forces together to make warre vpon him, and to be reuenged. Whileſt they were preparing to ioyne their forces, Philip went before, and compelled them to do what he would.

Treaſure the ſinew of war.

Philips greatneſſe enuied at.

About this time, to wit, in the laſt yeare of the hundred and fift Olympiade, fifteene yeares after the battell of MANTINEA, the holy war began amongſt the GREEKES, which continued ten yeares ſpace: and this was the occaſion. The THEBANS not being contented with the victory they obtained at the battell of LEVCTRES, framed a complaint againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS in the aſſembly of the Eſtates of GREECE: which they call the Councell of the Amphictyons: and followed the matter ſo hard, that the LACEDÆMONIANS were condemned in a great ſumme of mony, becauſe they had in time of peace ſurpriſed the caſtle of CADMEA. The PHOCIANS alſo, they hauing plowed vp a great deale of a certaine land ſacred to the gods, called the land of CIRRHE, were condemned by the Amphictyons in a great ſumme of money: and becauſe they would not pay it, the Councell pronounced, without longer delay and refuſall, all their townes and lands to be confiſcated to the gods, and that all other which were condemned (of which number were the LACEDÆMONIANS) ſhould be compelled to pay their fines, and if they refuſed, they ſhould be taken for excommunicate, and the other GREEKS ſhould make warre with them, as againſt accurſed and execrable men. Philomelus, a man of great authority among the PHOCIANS, did ſo much, that he perſwaded them not to pay it, but contrariwiſe to defend their country with armes, and to win DELPHES. Whereunto they giuing their conſents he gathered together a great army, and in deſpight of all hindrances made himſelfe maſter of DELPHES: cut aſunder with ſheares the decrees made by the Amphictyons engrauen vpon marble pillars: poſſeſſed all the gold and ſiluer that was in the Temple: and afterwards rendred a reaſon of his fact, & prepared himſelfe to make war againſt the THEBANS, THESSALIANS, and LOCRIANS, and wanne three great battels of them. But being ouercome at the fourth battell, he threw himſelfe downe off a high rocke. In the meane ſpace, Cerſobleptes, the ſonne of Cotis King of THRACIA, hauing rendred vp to the ATHENIANS the townes of CHERRONESVS, partly for ỹ good will he

bare the Athenians, and partly for the hatred he had to Philip: the people of Athens sent inhabitants thither to keepe and defend the towns. Philip perceiuing that those of Methone lent out their towne to all them that would make war against him, went & laid siege before it. They that were besieged, did valiantly defend it for a time: but in the end finding themselues too weak to make resistance, they yeelded vpon condition, that the inhabitants should go out euery man with one only gowne. As soone as euer Philip had the towne in his hands, he razed it euen to the ground, and gaue the country al about vnto the Macedonians. At this siege he was wounded with an arrow, that put out one of his eyes. Afterwards he led his army also at ỹ instance of the Thessalians, into the country against Lycophron, that began again to tyrannize those of Pherres: who hauing demanded aid of the Phocians, they sent thither Phayllus with 7000 fighting men, whom Philip ouercame, and draue them out of Thessaly. Then Onomarchus that succeeded Philomelus in the charge of generall, hoping to haue won Thessaly, made great speed thither with al his army, vnder colour to bring aid vnto Lycophron. Philip went against him with the Thessalians, but because Onomarchus had the greater number of men, he ouerthrew him, and killed many of the Macedonians, insomuch that Philip himselfe was in great danger. For his men also were so afraid, that they would haue forsaken him, and he had much trouble to keepe them together: and in the end was constrained to retire home into his kingdome. Onomarchus departing from thence, entred into the country of Boeotia, ouercame the Boeotians in battel, & took the city of Coronea. But Philip returned immediatly with a great force into Thessaly to driue out Lycophron: who hauing called in the Phocians, Onomarchus returned thither, followed with 20 thousand footmen, and fiue hundred horse. Hereupon Philip perswaded the commons of Thessaly, that they must all together vndertake this war. And he could so well solicite them, that he assembled in one camp twenty thousand footmē, & three thousand horse. Then was there fought a most cruell battell, whereof the victory fell to Philip, through the valiantnesse of his Thessalian men of armes. For Onomarchus and his men, they fled on foote towards the sea, where was by chance Chares the Athenian captaine sailing all alongst the coast with certaine gallies. There was great slaughter of ỹ Phocians there, followed by the victors. Others to flie with more speed, threw downe their armes, and leapt into the sea, by swimming to get to the gallies of the Athenians. There were slaine in battell and flight as wel of natural Phocians, as of strangers that came for pay, aboue six thousand mē, & there were taken prisoners to the number of three thousand: Onomarchus that was one of them, was hanged, and all the other drowned as sacriledgers, by the commandement of Philip: vnto whom Lycophron yeelded the towne of Pherres, & so retired out of Thessaly, which by this meanes was set at liberty.

As for Philip, he marched with his army towards the way of Thermopyles, to make war with ỹ Phocians, within Phocide it selfe: but the Athenians stopped his passage. Wherfore he was constrained to returne back into Macedon, where he staid not long at rest, but determined to bring the townes of Chalcide in subiection to him. So he took by assault a fort called Gyre, the which he razed. But this was such a terror to the other small towns, that they put themselues vnder his obedience. Passing from thence into Thessaly, he draue away Pytholaus that had made himselfe master of Pherres. And intending to bring the townes of Hellespont vnder his subiection, he tooke in wi thout paine or danger (rather by treason) the townes of Micybrne, & of Torone. Afterwards he went with a great army against the city of Olynthe, the greatest & of most power that was in that marches: where first he ouercame ỹ Olynthians in two great fights, so that he made them leaue the field, & shut them in within their own town, vnto the which he gaue many assaults, and lost a great number of his men there. But hauing with great sums of mony corrupted Euthicrates & Lasthenes gouernors of the towne, at the length he had it by treason: and hauing sacked it, he sold the towns-men for slaues by the drum. The taking of this towne, brought him a great quantity of siluer to help to defray the charges of his war, & did also make the other towns afraid, which had taken armes to resist him. Now after he had bestowed many rich presents vpon his Captaines and souldiers that had done him good seruice in this war, he gaue also all about great sums of mony to the heads of the townes, and found merchants also among them that sold him their owne country and fellow citizens: insomuch that he himselfe confessed he had enlarged his kingdome more through gold and siluer, then he did by force of armes: according to an answer that was made him, when he began first to put himselfe forward: for being desirous to know how he should carie himselfe, the oracle answered:

No towne so strong but it may bee ouercome by treason.

With ſiluer ſpeares begin: and end thy warre,
So ſhalt thou topſie turuy turne all things what ere they are.

Now the ATHENIANS being iealous of his greatneſſe, did euer helpe them whom he would hurt, and ſent Ambaſſadors to all the cities, to perſwade them to maintaine and preſerue their liberty, and to put their townes-men to death whom they found willing to betray the Common-wealth: promiſing them to ayde them all, and declared themſelues open enemies vnto Philip. Hee that ſet them moſt againſt him, was Demoſthenes, the moſt eloquent man of all GREECE at that time, and that did more trouble and hurt Philip with the blowes of his tongue, and his continuall motions, then all the Captaines of GREECE did him beſides. All this notwithſtanding, with all the diligence and labour ATHENS could vſe, they could neuer bridle the wicked diſpoſition of ſome priuate perſons, but they ſtill ſought to ſell their countrey: for he that bought, ſowed ſiluer without any ſpare, and there were a great number of traitors at that time through all GREECE. And touching this purpoſe, they ſay, that he being deſirous to win a very ſtrong hold, he ſent ſome men before to view it: who returning, reported that it was vnpoſſible almoſt to approach it, and did by deſcription ſet it downe in all points impregnable. Then he asked thē if the place were ſo hard to come to, that a poore Aſſe laden with gold could not come neare it: for hee had oftentimes with ſiluer very eaſily wonne that, which otherwiſe was not to be had by force of armes. And this was the cauſe that he practiſed to haue traitors in euery towne by gifts and penſions, calling them that receiued him, his hoſtes and friends, corrupting mens manners beſides by vnworthy and diſhoneſt meanes. As after that hee had wonne OLYNTHE, he made ſumptuous and magnificent ſacrifices to his gods, to thanke them for the victory they had giuen him: and ſo hauing ſet downe a day of triumph for tilting and tourneying, and common ſports, thither repaired a great number of ſtrangers that came to ſee the feaſt. So keeping open Court, he inuited many of theſe ſtrangers to come to his ſumptuous feaſts he made, and in them he ſhewed all the familiarity and courteſie that might be to entertaine them. For he dranke to ſome, and then gaue them the cups wherein he dranke to them: to others he gaue great preſents, and vnto al generally he gaue good words and large promiſes: inſomuch that many ſought how to obtaine his loue and fauour. So it is reported, that one day at a banquet he eſpied Satyrus, an excellent Comedian and player, that he was very ſad: and that he asked him why he did not craue ſomething of him, that he might ſhew his liberality vnto him. Satyrus anſwered him againe, that he would be glad to obtaine a ſuite at his hands, but he durſt not aske it him, being afraid he ſhould be denied. Philip liked his anſwer well, and bad him aske boldly. Then he told him, that a friend of his had two daughters among others priſoners, both of them mariageable, and beſought him that hee would beſtow them vpon him; not for any other pleaſure or profit he ſhould haue of them, but becauſe he would marrie them both at his owne charge, before they ſhould be forced to their diſhonour. Philip thanked him for his honeſt petition, and preſently cauſed theſe two maides to be deliuered vnto him. Thus he beſtowed many ſuch courteſies euery where, whereof he made his profit afterwards with great vſurie. For a number being drawne by the ſent and odour of ſo many good turnes, ſtudied with themſelues, enuying one another, which of them might do him beſt ſeruice, and find out moſt meanes to deliuer townes and countries into his hands.

The force of eloquence.

But now to returne againe to that we had begun to ſpeake of the holy war. The PHOCIANS that had three very ſtrong holds in BOEOTIA, to wit, ORCHOMENE, CORONEE, & CORSIES, did ordinarily from thence make incurſions into the countrey of the BOEOTIANS, with great number of ſouldiers ſtrangers whom they kept in pay, and did burne & lay waſt all the territory thereabouts, and euer had the vpper hand in all their inrodes and skirmiſhes they had with the countrymen. Vpon this occaſion the BOEOTIANS being weake of men, and wanting money, ſent in the end to demaund aid of Philip: who was not a little glad to ſee them brought ſo low, for he deſired their pride might he pulled downe, which had lift them vp ſo high ſince the battel of LEVCTRES. So he ſent them a good number of ſouldiers, not for any deſire he had to aide them, but to make them thinke that he made great account of the Temple of DELPHES, which the PHOCIANS had ſpoyled. After diuers exploits of warre, the one ſide and the other ſeeing themſelues wearie and bare, the BOEOTIANS prayed Philip to come and ayde them: which he granted them: and taking a ſupply of THESSALIANS with him, he came to LOCRIDE with a good army, and put himſelfe in order to end this warre at one battell. But Phallecus Generall of the PHOCIANS, finding himselfe not strong enough to fight with him, sent vnto him to treate of peace: so he was suffered to go safely with his men whither he would. Whereupon vnder the assurance of this peace, he retired with eight thousand men into PELOPONNESVS. The PHOCIANS then left without all hope, yeelded themselues to Philips discretion. Thus hauing ended this holy war without stroke stricken, beyond all mens opinion, he called a Councell of the BOEOTIANS and THESSALIANS in the which it was determined that there should be an assembly of Parliament of the Amphictyons, vnto whom they would wholy referre themselues for deciding of this matter. Whereupon the Commissioners for the Parliament of the Amphictyons were assembled, and there among other acts it was ordained, that from thenceforth it should be lawfull for Philip and all of his race to sit in this Councell of the Amphictyons, and that they should haue the two voices which the PHOCIANS (by him lately conquered) had before. Also, that he & his thenceforth should haue the gouernment and superintendancie of the sports PYTHIANS, with the BOEOTIANS and THESSALIANS: because the CORINTHIANS had bene partakers with the sacriledge of the PHOCIANS. The rest of their decrees concerned those of PHOCIDE, the safety of the temple of DELPHES, and the vnion of the GREEKES. Philip hauing broken vp the armories of the PHOCIANS and of the strangers that had fought in their pay, he defaced their townes, and made them sell their horses. After he had receiued of the Amphictyons the greatest honour and thankes they could deuise, he returned into his realme of MACEDON, hauing won him the name of a deuout and valiant Prince, and layed the foundation of the greatnesse, vnto the which his sonne Alexander came afterwards. For he singularly desired to be chosen Captaine generall of all GREECE, with full power and authority to make war with the king of PERSIA, as he did. Furthermore, the hereditary quarrels he had against the SLAVONS, being as irreconciliable, he entred with his army into SLAVONIA, where hauing spoyled a great part of that country, and taken many townes, he returned backe into MACEDON laden with booty. After that he went into THESSALY, and draue out the tyrants there, which held the townes in subiection. By this meanes he wanne the hearts of the THESSALIANS, whom indeed he had great care to vse well, hoping that if the THESSALIANS remained his faithfull friends, he should easily gaine the other GREEKS to desire his friendship; & so it hapned: for the people neighbours to THESSALY, did presently enter into league with him. Soone after that, he led his army into THRACIA to represse Cersobleptes, who troubled all the townes of HELLESPONT next adioyning to his realme. When he had beaten the THRACIANS in diuers encounters, he compelled the vanquished to pay yearely vnto the MACEDONIANS the tenth part of their reuenues; and fortifying a few good townes in the best parts of their countrey, he bridled the boldnesse of these barbarous people: whereupon the townes within those marches being deliuered from warres, they very willingly entred into league and alliance with Philip.

Philip aspireth to greatnesse.

Philip besiegeth Perinth.

Thus waxing greater euery day then other, he held his army before the city of PERINTH, because that stood against him, and tooke part with the ATHENIANS. So he layd siege vnto it, and brought his engines of battery before it, among the which there were rams of 80. foot long, and built vp towers of wood higher then the highest towers of stone that were within the towne: vpon the top whereof he maruellously annoyed the besieged: and battering the wals with these rammes, he made them fall downe in diuers places. The PERINTHIANS on the other side very lustily defended themselues, and reared vp other walles within, in place of them that were fallen downe. He plyed them continually with wonderfull assaults, the assailants and assailed shewing all their possible force and endeuour. Now Philip had great Crosse-bowes and other engines of all sorts to kill farre off, great arrowes long and sharpe at the end, which did wound those that came to the cranewes of the walles; and those that were besieged, lost many of their men euery day. But at the length they were supplied with armes and men, whom the BYZANTINES sent vnto them: whereupon equalling their enemies, they beganne to be couragious againe, and resolutely offered themselues vnto any danger for defence of their countrey. For all this, the battery begun discontinued not, and Philip deuiding his men into diuers troupes, gaue them many assaults, continued by turnes one in the necke of another night and day. Which hee might easily do, considering he had thirty thousand fighting men in his campe, with an inestimable number of missile weapons, with engines to bestow great shot a farre off, and of all sorts of engines to beate downe townes, with the which he wonderfully plagued and hurt the besieged. Neuertheless the siege drew on in length, and many of the townes-men died, besides those thoſe that were hurt and wounded: and becauſe that victuals alſo waxed ſcant amongſt them: ſo that they hourely looked for no other thing, but to take PERINTH. But it fell out cleane contrary: for the fame of Philips greatneſſe being blowne abroad throughout all ASIA, the king of PERSIA being affraid of ſuch a power, writ vnto his Lieutenants vpon the ſea coaſts, that they ſhould aide the PERINTHIANS all they could poſſible. Thereupon his Satrapes hauing conſulted of this matter together, ſent vnto the beſieged a great ſupply of men of warr, ſtore of gold and ſiluer, plenty of corne, of armes, and of all other neceſſarie prouiſions for the warres. The BYZANTINES on the other ſide ſent them the beſt experienced Captaines and ſouldiers they had. By this meanes the two forces of the beſiegers and the beſieged being equall of new againe, the warre began to be hotter then before. For Philip beating at the walles without ceaſe with his rammes, made very great breaches, and with his engines to ſhoote farre off, kept them that none durſt ſtay at the cranewes of the walles: and at one inſtant made his men to giue an aſſault at the breaches of the walles throwne downe, and cauſed others to ſcale the walles that were yet ſtanding whole, and ſo fighting with their ſwords, many were ſlaine in the place, and others ſore wounded, both valiantly fighting for the reward of honour and victory. The MACEDONIANS hoped to haue the ſacke of a rich and wealthy city, and more then that, to haue goodly preſents of the King. They that were beſieged on the other ſide, ſetting before them all the calamities and miſeries of the taking of a citie, did luſtily endure any paines and danger to preuent ſo great a miſchiefe. Beſides that, the ſituation of the towne was a great helpe vnto them, not onely to hope well, but alſo that in the end they ſhould be maſters. For the towne of PERINTH ſtood all vpon the ſea ſide, vpon a hauen of halfe an Iland that ſtood of a great height, and this hauen was about halfe a quarter of a league long. The houſes there were very narrow and high, and becauſe they ſtood high vpon the hanging of the coaſt all the towne being vnderneath it on the ground, they were built much higher then thoſe that ſtood beneath: ſo to ſee them aboue, they ſhewed like ỳ degrees of ſeates in a Theater. And although that they without did ſtill beate downe ſome part of the wall: that vantaged them nothing for all that. For thoſe within did nothing elſe but mure vp the entrance into the ſtreetes which were narrow, and they alwaies defended themſelues, making rampiers before the low houſes, as if they had bene the beſt wals in the world.

Perinth rescued by the Persians

So Philip hauing gotten the outward walles of the towne, with all the troubles and dangers poſſible: he found other walles ready built ſtronger then the other, as if they had bene done of purpoſe: beſides that the BYZANTINES did alwaies furniſh them with any thing they wanted. Philip conſidering this, deuided his army into two, and left the halfe of them to continue the ſiege, vnder the charge of the beſt captaines he had: and taking with him the other halfe, he went to beſiege BYZANCE it ſelfe, & gaue it a moſt braue aſſault: whereat ỳ BYZANTINES were amazed, becauſe their ſouldiers, their armes, and all other neceſſary prouiſions for war were in the city of PERINTH. But the ATHENIANS ſent them immediatly an army by ſea to aide them, as alſo thoſe did of CHIO, of RHODES, and out of other places. Chares went thither, ſent by the ATHENIANS, but he did nothing of worth, nor worthy of the fleet he brought thither: becauſe he was ſuſpected of his friends, and deſpiſed of his enemies. So that they ſent Phocion thither, who before that time had fought brauely with Philip in the Ile of EVBOEA, (which he thought to haue won by means of traitors) had ouercome the MACEDONIANS in battel, & had done many other notable exploits. Howbeit after his departure Philip being the ſtronger, departing from thence came to beſiege PERINTH, and after that BYZANCE, into the which Phocion entred with his troupes: who did ſo valiantly in all fights and aſſaults, that Philip (who before that time was thought ſo terrible in armes that none could reſiſt him, neither durſt any man preſent himſelfe in battel againſt him) roſe from the beſieging of PERINTH, and retired from BYZANCE and out of HELLESPONT, and did nothing, but loſt much of his reputation. For, beſides the men that were killed at theſe two ſieges, he loſt ſome of his ſhips, and many ſtrong holds, out of the which his garriſons were throwne, and his friends forraged by the ATHENIANS. This was the cauſe why hee offered articles of peace, fearing the forces of the ATHENIANS, deſirous to forward his affaires ſome other way, or rather to meddle no more with them. Phocion counſelled the ATHENIANS to hearken vnto it, and to accept the conditions vnto the which Philip ſubmitted himſelf. But the Counſellers (eſpecially Demoſthenes) that bare the ſway at that time, moued the ATHENIANS to a new league, the which Demoſthenes prepared againſt Philip: who bethinking himselfe, determined to employ all his meanes to subdue the cities all at once, to the end that he might afterwards passe further. So he leauied an army with great speed, and hauing ouercome certaine troupes of the townes in league together neare vnto AMPHISE, he marched into the country of ELATIA, and afterwards wan PHOCIDE; and being lift vp with such prosperous beginnings, he resolued to go to ATHENS. Whereof the ATHENIANS hauing intelligence, they were straight in armes euery where, the people being so amazed, that none durst be so bold as to speake, and they knew not what to do. They reiected the wise counsell of Phocion, of which Demosthenes was the cause. Wherefore to repaire his fault, he stepped out and counselled the ATHENIANS to seeke the friendship of the THEBANS. So thereupon they sent him to put it in practise, and happily he obtained it, notwithstanding all Philips oppositions to the contrary: who being astonied more then before with these crosses which the eloquence of one man did against him: he sent againe to offer the GREEKES peace. But they kept themselues close, and made strange of it, expecting the euent of all this great tempest: not being disposed at that time to hearken to pacification. But as if the time of their bondage had bene at the gate, they refused all conditions, yea contemned the very oracles of DELPHES, and Demosthenes had it often in his mouth, that the Prophetesse did Philippizate, to wit fauoured Philips affaires. These oracles threatned both the one and the other, and especially the GREEKES. Now Philip, though he saw he was deceiued of the friendship of the BOEOTIANS, yet he resolued to fight with the one and the other. Therefore keeping his campe certaine daies, looking for the forces of his friends that were not yet come vnto him: he entred into BOEOTIA, with thirty thousand footmen, and about two thousand horse. So both campes being ready to giue charge vpon each other, they both had like courage and resolution to do well. But as touching the number of men, and skilfulnesse of Captaines, Philip did passe them farre: for hauing done in many places so many worthie exploits of armes, he was become very expert in military discipline. To the contrary, on the ATHENIANS side, their best captaines, as Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, were dead. Phocion also, he neuer thought well of this warre: and the factious, they had hindered the best they could that he should haue no charge. Then was there but Chares and Lysicles, that were too weake to take such a great charge vpon them, & were much inferiour to many of the Captaines Philip had then with him.

Philip winneth much.

The Greeks refuse the peace offered by Philip.

Philip ouerthroweth the Athenians.

The day being broken, and both armies set in battell the one against the other in the plaine of CHÆRONEA: Philip placed his sonne Alexander, comming but newly out of his infancie, in one of the points of his army, attended vpon by the best Captaines he had: and he placed himselfe in the other point, with the valiantest men in his army, giuing order and direction in all things according to time and place. The ATHENIANS, hauing taken one of the points of their battell, left the other vnto the BOEOTIANS. So the fight began very sharply, and many were slaine on both sides, and it could not be discerned yet whether side had best occasion to hope of victory: vntill that Alexander at the length, desirous to make his father see some proofe of his valour, and many other valiant men seeing the courage of this young Prince, following him, they with him brake into the battell of the enemies, and there was a maruellous cruell slaughter. Philip on his side also giuing charge vpon the greatest presse and multitude of his enemies, not enduring that any should take the honour from him, no not his owne sonne: set vpon them so fiercely that withstood him, that he put them out of order, and made them flie for life. There died in this battell aboue a thousand ATHENIANS, and there were taken prisoners to the number of two thousand. And of the BOEOTIANS in like manner there were many killed in the field, and a great number taken. After this battell, Philip caused a token of triumph to be set vp, and suffered the enemies to take away the bodies of their dead, and to burie them. Hee made sumptuous sacrifices vnto his gods, to giue them thankes for his victory: and honoured them that had done good seruice in this battell, euery one according to his degree and desert. Howbeit he committed certaine insolencies: for after he had drunke wel with his friends, he went to the place where the dead bodies lay, and there he fell a singing in mockerie, the beginning of the decree which Demosthenes had propounded, whose counsell they following, the ATHENIANS concluded to warre against him, lifting vp his voice, and keeping measure with his foote: Demosthenes, the sonne of Demosthenes PÆANIAN set out this. But afterwards when he beganne a little to come to himselfe againe out of his drunkennesse, and that he had thought a little of the danger he had bene in: then his haire began to stand vpright on his head,

when he entred into the conſideration of the force and vehemencie of ſuch an Orator, that had brought him in a peece of a day, to put his whole eſtate and his life to the hazard of a battell. And when the ATHENIANS ſent vnto him to treate of peace, he preſently ſet his countenance, rubbed his eye-browes, and laying aſide all madneſſe and wantonneſſe, made them a very ſober and aduiſed anſwer. Others ſay, that he dranke too much at the feaſt of his ſacrifice, and that after ſupper he danced and made a mummerie with his minions: paſſed by the priſoners, and gaue them ſharpe taunts in mockerie, touching the misfortune of their ouerthrow: and that Demades then being one of the number, was ſo bold franckly to ſpeake a word to him, which was of ſuch efficacie, as it made him refraine from his inſolencie. O King, ſayd he, it being now thy fortune to play Agamemnons part, thou art not aſhamed to ſhew the deedes of Therſites. Philip finding himſelfe touched to the quicke with this word ſo well ſet, he preſently changed his apparell and countenance, caſt downe to the ground his garland of flowers he wore on his head, cauſed all the other ſignes of mockerie which were caried after him to be broken, and from thenceforth began greatly to eſteeme of Demades, and would haue him about him. Demades, being paſſing eloquent aboue others of his time, did ſo well entertaine Philip, that he cauſed him to deliuer all the other priſoners of the ATHENIANS, without paying of any ranſome. And further yet, humbling the conquerours fierceneſſe, he made peace with the ATHENIANS, but put a garriſon within THEBES, and moreouer granted peace vnto the BOEOTIANS.

Demades toucheth Philip to the quicke, and thereby winneth eſtimation with him.

But that which principally brought him to incline vnto it, was the deſire he had to be choſen Captaine-generall of GREECE. And to this end he cauſed them to giue out abroad, that hee would vndertake to make warre for the GREEKES againſt the PERSIANS, and to be reuenged of them for the outrages and ſacriledges which they had committed againſt the Temples of the gods in GREECE: and ſought to gaine the good will and friendſhip of all the GREEKES, by all kinde of courteſies he could poſſibly deuiſe or thinke of, as well openly as ſecretly. So he made a motiue, that he deſired to ſpeake with the townes openly, and to communicate ſome things vnto them, which concerned the good of all their common-wealth in generall. And for this purpoſe there was appointed a generall aſſembly of the States in GREECE in the city of CORINTH, in the which he propounded this, to vndertake the warre againſt the PERSIANS: and putting them in great hope of happie ſucceſſe, he perſwaded the commiſſioners of euery towne, which were preſent in this aſſembly of counſel, boldly to conclude this enterpriſe. He ſolicited his matter in ſuch ſort, that the GREEKES with generall conſent choſe him their Captaine-general with ſoueraigne authority. Then he began to make great preparation for this war, and hauing made a deſcription and teſte of all the contributions, as alſo the number of men of warre which euery city ſhould furniſh for this enterpriſe: he returned into MACEDON, and ſent from thence two of his chiefe Captaines before into ASIA, Attalus and Parmenio with a part of his army, commanding them to deliuer the GREEKES cities of ASIA out of bondage. But his death brake the voyage, ſo that they went not very farre. Now hitherto haue we ſeene Philips naturall diſpoſition in the middeſt of his deeds, and what is commendable and reprochfull in ſo great a Prince. But before we go further in the reſt of his life, it may peraduenture not be much impertinent to inſert in this place ſome of his ſentences and memorable actions, whereby he may be the better diſcerned, to compare him afterwards with the others. For mens words and faſhions amongſt their familiars, be the very liuely tables of the affections and paſſions of the ſoule: it being vnpoſſible for any man alwaies to counterfet ſo, but that they may oftentimes ſee his heart at his tongues end.

The cauſe that moued Philip to make peace with the Athenians.

Philip choſen captaine generall of Greece.

So then, newes being brought him in one ſelfe day of three great proſperities: The firſt, that he had wonne the prize at the courſes of coaches with foure horſe in the ſolemnity of the Olympian games: The ſecond, that his Lieutenant Parmenio had ouercome the DARDANIANS in battell: The third, that his wife Olympiade had brought him a goodly ſonne: he lifted vp his hands to heauen, and ſaid: O fortune, I beſeech thee ſend me in exchange of this, ſome reaſonable aduerſity, againſt ſuch and ſo great happineſſe. Laſthenes an OLYNTHIAN, that for a great ſumme of mony had ſold him the towne of OLYNTH, complained to him one day that ſome of his minions called him traytor. He anſwered him againe, that the MACEDONIANS were rude plaine men, that called all things by their name. He ſeemed to repute the ATHENIANS happie men, for that they found yearely ten Captaines in their towne to be choſen: and that he to the contrary in many yeares could find but one, and that was Parmenio. After he had ouercome the GREEKES, many aduiſed him to put good and great garriſons in the townes, that they might with more ſafety be kept vnder. But he anſwered them: I had rather be called a long time courteous, then a ſhort time Lord. And when his familiars gaue him counſell to baniſh a malicious perſon, that did nothing but ſpeake euill: he anſwered them he would not, fearing leſt he ſhould euery where elſe ſpeake euill of him. There was an ACHAIAN called Arcadion, that made profeſſion to ſpeake euill of him euery where, and warned euery man to flie ſo farre from Philip, as none could tell there what man he was. Arcadion being by chance met in MACEDON, the courtiers would haue had Philip to haue puniſhed him, and not to let him eſcape out of his hands. Philip to the contrarie ſpake him faire, and ſent him preſents to his lodging. Shortly after, he commanded they ſhould make enquirie what talke Arcadion had of him among the GREEKES. Euery man brought him word, that he did wonderfully commend and praiſe him whereſoeuer he came. Then ſaid Philip vnto them: I am a better phyſition for euill ſpeech then you are. Another time in the aſſembly of the Olympian games, as the GREEKES ſpake euill of him, his friends ſaid, That ſuch ill ſpeakers would be ſeuerely puniſhed, to ſpeake ſo much euill of him that had done them ſo much good. Nay, but what would they do then, anſwered he, if we did hurt them? Smicythus did often accuſe Nicanor vnto him, telling him that he did nothing elſe but ſpeake euill of Philip: ſo that his beſt familiars thought it good he ſhould be ſent for, and be puniſhed according to his deſerts. Yea but (replied he) Nicanor is one of the honeſteſt men of MACEDON: were it not better therefore to enquire whether the fault be in vs, or not? And forthwith hauing made diligent ſearch whence this diſcontentment of Nicanor came, he found that he was a man oppreſſed with extreme pouerty, and that no man would releeue him in his neceſſity: whereupon he ſent him immediatly a good preſent. Afterwards Smicythus brought word, that Nicanor euery where ſpake great praiſes of Philip. See then, ſaid he, how it dependeth vpon our ſelues to be well ſpoken of. He was wont alſo to ſay, that he was much beholding vnto the counſellors of ATHENS, for that they ſpeaking euill of him, were cauſe to make him an honeſt man of word and deed: For, ſaid he, I do dayly enforce my ſelfe both in my deeds and words to make them lyers. He ſent home (as hath bene ſpoken before) all the ATHENIANS priſoners at the battel of CHÆRONEA, without paying any ranſome, and yet moreouer they asked for their beds, their apparell, and al their baggage, and complained of the MACEDONIANS, becauſe they did not deliuer it vnto them: When Philip heard of this, he fell a laughing, and ſaid vnto them that were neere about him: How ſay you, do not you think theſe ATHENIANS, ſuppoſe they were ouercome by vs at the play at bones? He ſaid alſo, that they which gaue him counſell to deale ſharply with the ATHENIANS, were men of an ill iudgement, to counſell a Prince that did and ſuffered all things for glory, to deſtroy the Theater of glory, which was the city of ATHENS, by reaſon of learning. There was a great number of priſoners taken at a battell, and he was preſent to ſee them ſold by the drumme, ſitting in his chaire, his gowne being turned vp a litle higher then was decent. Then there was one of the priſoners that was a ſelling, that cryed out aloud vnto him: I beſeech thee, ô King, to pardon me that I be not ſold, for I am thy friend from father to the ſonne. Philip asked him, how and from whence this friendſhip ſhould come betweene vs? I will tell thee in thy eare, anſwered the priſoner. Philip commanded they ſhould bring him to him. Then the priſoner coming neare to him, told him ſoftly: O king, let thy gowne fall downe before a litle, for as thou ſitteſt, thou ſheweſt that that is vnfit to be ſeene. Then ſpake Philip aloud to his men, Deliuer him, and let him goe: for he is indeed one of my friends and wel-willers, but I had forgotten it. Such was his behauiour to his enemies, and thoſe that ſpake euill of him.

Let vs now ſpeake ſomewhat of his iuſtice, and of diuers other affections worthy to be noted in him: the which do appeare ſomething in his words, and by the effects that followed. And they doe ſhew more and more, that this Prince had learned very much with Epaminondas, but aboue all, to be nobly minded, patient, and deſirous of honour without ſhame: qualities that had bene much more excellent in him, if he had not made ſuch merchandize with wicked men as he did, that ſold their country: beſides that they ſaw in him an ardent ambition, as alſo in that he coueted to be Captaine generall of all the GREEKES, and the triumphs preceding his death, and all his life do ſhew. And to this purpoſe he counſelled his ſonne Alexander to ſpeake graciouſly vnto the MACEDONIANS, to winne their good wils, whileſt he had leiſure now to be courteous courteous vnto them, another reigning in the kingdome: as if he would haue ſaid, that when he came to be King, he ſhould carie the grauity of a maſter and of a Lord, and that he ſhould do iuſtice. He gaue him counſell alſo to ſeeke to get the loue of thoſe that bare credit and authority in good townes, as well of the wicked as of the good, that he might afterwards vſe the good, and abuſe the euill. But now to returne to his iuſtice againe: Being a Iudge betweene two bad men, hee ordained that the one ſhould flie out of MACEDON, and the other ſhould runne after him. It is reported of him, that hee had gotten together a number of the wickedeſt and moſt diſordereſt men that were in his time, whom he lodged all together in a towne which hee had cauſed to be built, and called it PONEROPOLIS, the towne of knaues. Hee had on a time beſtowed the office of a Iudge vpon one recommended vnto him by Antipater: but vnderſtanding afterwards that he vſed to paint his haires and beard, hee tooke it from him, ſaying, that he that vſed deceipt in his haire, would hardly deale truly in a good cauſe. Machetas pleaded a cauſe on a time before him whileſt he ſlept, ſo that not conceiuing nor vnderſtanding well the matter, hee wrongfully condemned him. Whereupon Machetas began to crie out, that he did appeale. Philip being angred at that word, asked him preſently, vnto whom he did appeale from him? Before thy ſelfe, ô King, anſwered he, when thou art awake, and wilt giue good eare to conceiue of my fact. Theſe words touched Philip to the quicke, whereupon he roſe vp on his feete, and calling himſelfe better to minde, knew that he had wronged Machetas in his ſentence, and yet neuertheleſſe he would not reuoke his iudgement: howbeit he himſelfe with his owne money diſcharged the matter, whereupon the ſuite was brought before him. Harpalus had a kinſman and a friend of his called Crates, attainted and conuicted of great crimes: hee beſought Philip, that paying the fine, ſentence ſhould not be pronounced againſt this Crates, that hee might auoide the ſhame and diſgrace. But Philip anſwered him againe, It is better he ſhould beare his owne blame and diſcredit, then I for him. A ſouldier of his, a valiant man of his hands, hauing by falſe report obtained of him the gift and forfeiture of the goods of a MACEDONIAN: it fortuned that the MACEDONIAN ill willing to put vp ſuch an outrage, bewrayed vnto Philip the vnthankfulneſſe of the ſouldier whoſe life he had ſaued. Philip was ſo offended with the villanie of this ſouldier, that after he had reuoked his gift, he made him quaile in ſuch ſort, that his wickedneſſe was knowne of euerie one, and the MACEDONIAN reſtored againe to all his goods. A poore old woman being in ſuite of law, beſought him to giue iudgement, and preſſed him continually: but he excuſed himſelfe, and told her, he was not at leiſure to heare it. The old woman cryed out aloud: Leaue then to be King. He being aſtonied and liuely pricked with this word, did heare her, and all others in order. As for his friends, Philo a gentleman of THEBES had done him many pleaſures at the time when he remained in hoſtage in the city of THEBES: for he was lodged in his houſe, and after that he would neuer receiue any gifts or preſents of him. Whereupon Philip ſaid vnto him: Take not from me the title and honour of inuincible, being ouercome by thee of courteſie and liberality. Word being brought him of the death of Hipparchus, borne in the Ile of EVBOEA, he was very ſorie: and as one that ſtood by, told him he was ripe and ready to die for age: Yea, ſaid he againe, for himſelfe, but not for me, to whom he is dead too ſoone: for he is dead before he receiued any recompence of me, worthy the friendſhip he bare me. As touching houſhold matters, he fell out on a time with his wife Olympias, and his ſonne Alexander: in which time of his anger, Demaratus a Gentleman of CORINTH went to viſit him. Philip then asked him, how, and after what manner the GREEKES liued one with another. Truly, anſwered Demaratus, thou careſt much for the peace and vnion of the GREEKES, ſince the perſons that touch thee ſo nearely, and thoſe whom thou oughteſt to make much account of, are ſo ſeparated from thee. This word made him conſider ſo well of it, that afterwards he appeaſed his anger: the cauſe thereof is ſhewed in the beginning of Alexanders life; and ſo reconciled himſelfe vnto them. Being told him that his ſonne Alexander miſliked it, and complained that he begot baſtards of other women: he told him, Since thou ſeeſt now that thou ſhalt haue many competitors with thee for the kingdome after my death, endeuour thy ſelfe to be an honeſt man, that thou mayeſt come to the crowne not ſo much through me, being mine heire, as through thy ſelfe, for that thou art worthy. He perſwaded him much, diligently to ſtudie Philoſophie vnder Ariſtotle, to the end, ſaid he, thou do not many things that I haue done, whereof now I hartily repent me. Being on a time fallen backward, lying all alongſt the place where they exerciſe wreſtling: and wallowing vp and downe, as if he had ſeene the figure and print of his body in the duſt: O Hercules, ſaid he, how little quantitie of ground will ſerue vs by nature, and yet we couet to inhabite all the world. He would on a time lodge his campe in a faire ground: but being told that there was no forrage for the beaſts, he was conſtrained to diſlodge from thence, ſaying: What is our life, ſince we muſt take care euen to place Aſſes? There was an hoſt of his, that on a time bad him to ſupper with him. So, as he was going, he met diuers by the way, whom he caried thither with him. Whereupon perceiuing his hoſt was much troubled, becauſe he had not meate enough to feede ſo many mouthes: Philip ſeeing it, ſent ſecretly to tell euery one in their eares whom he brought with him, that they ſhould keepe a place in their ſtomacke for the tart. The other beleeuing that he ſpake in earneſt, did forbeare to eate, whereby there was meate enough for them all. That which is already ſaid, is ſufficient to make vs know the naturall diſpoſition of this great Prince: whoſe end we are now about to deſcribe vnto you. He vndertaking to paſſe into Asia, to make war with the Persians, in the ſtate of Captaine-generall of the Greekes: being deſirous his voyage ſhould be fauoured of the gods, he asked of the propheteſſe of Delphes, whether he ſhould ouercome the king of Persia? She anſwered him:

Philip beguileth his friends at a banquet.

The oxe is crowned when his end is neare at hand,
To offer him in ſacrifice, a man doth ready ſtand.

Philip deceiued by an ambiguous oracle.

This oracle being doubtfull and obſcure, Philip tooke it for his aduantage: as if Apollo had told him, that the king of Persia ſhould be ſlaine by him, as an oblation of ſacrifice. But cleane cõtrary, the oracle threatned him with death in a day of a ſolemne feaſt: and that he ſhould be ſlaine as a bull, whom they crowne with garlands and hats of flowers, when they go about to ſacrifice him. Notwithſtanding ſuppoſing that the gods did fauour his enterpriſe, he was very pleaſant, perſwading himſelfe that Asia ſhould ſhortly be tributarie to Macedon. So he prepared ſumptuous and magnificent ſacrifices in honour of the gods, and made preparation for the mariage of his daughter Cleopatra. Now he being deſirous to draw to this feaſt as many Greekes as he could poſſible, to that end made proclamation euery where, that there ſhould be games of prize for learning and muſicke, and ſent to ſummon all his hoſts and friends, in what part of Greece ſoeuer they were, to come to this mariage: and commanded the Lords of his Court that they ſhould do the like for their part. For he deſired to ſhew the Greeks al ſignes of friẽdſhip, and to make them the beſt cheare that could be poſſible, in recompence of the honour they had done him, to chuſe him their Captaine-general. There was a wonderfull aſſembly of people from all parts at this feaſt; and the mariage was ſolemnized betwixt Alexander king of Epirvs and Cleopatra, and the games alſo at Æges a city of Macedon. Where not only Philips priuate friends, and the moſt notable men of the Greeks but alſo the principall & chiefeſt townes of Greece (& among others Athens) gaue him preſents of many rich crownes of gold. The decree of the people preſenting a crowne of gold, & openly proclaimed by a herald; the effect of it was: that if it hapned any man hauing conſpired or attempted ought againſt the perſon of King Philip, ſhould flie to Athens in hope of priuiledge there, that he ſhould be deliuered into the hands of the king. In the middeſt of this great feaſt at the mariage, there was an excellent player of tragedies, called Neoptolemus, that rehearſed verſes touching the enterpriſe of Philip: and as if he had meant to haue reproued the pride of the King of Persia, he liuely touched that of his maſter Philip; and before he was ware, foretold his death in couert termes, and which might be applied (as alſo Philip did, blinded and aſtonied with his proſperity) vnto the eſtate, and vnto the king of Persia. Among other verſes the beginning of it was very neare to this effect:

Cleopatra Philips daughter maried with great ſolemnities.

Aboue the skies extoll thy pride,

The day after this royall mariage, the games began to be played, and the people ranne from all parts to the Theater to see them, euen vntill it was dark night. And in the morning at the breake of day there was a procession, in the which (among many other sumptuous and magnificent shewes) they caried the images of twelue principall gods of GREECE, wonderfull cunningly wrought with great art; and then after them was borne the image of Philip for the thirteenth, as if he would haue placed himselfe in ranke with his gods. When the Theater was full set with people, Philip himselfe came in the end, apparelled all in white, hauing commanded all his guard to follow him a farre off: desirous to shew the GREEKES, that because of the great confidence he had of their faithfull friendship, he thought he needed no guard for his body. But at that time he was put to death after a strange sort: and that we may know by what occasion, we wil take the matter further off.

Philip placed in ranke with the gods.

There was in his Court a MACEDONIAN gentleman, called Pausanias, borne in the countrey of ORESTIDE, one of the gentlemen pensioners of Philips guard, that sometime was beloued for his beautie. He perceiuing that the King loued another, whose name was as himselfe, Pausanias: began to gall him with iniurious words, calling him Androgyne (as much to say, as womanish man) and reproued him that he abandoned his body to any that would. This second Pausanias very impatiently bare these words in his heart, yet made no reply to them, but onely imparted vnto his friend called Attalus what he meant to do; and within few daies after lost his life after a notable manner. Philip fought a battell with the SLAVONS, in the which this young man behaued himselfe very valiantly, right before the person of Philip, and receiued vpon his body all the blowes they strake at him, so that he died in the field. This valiantnesse of his being blowne abroade through the army, Attalus that then was in great fauour with the King, intreated the first Pausanias to come and suppe with him, and hauing made him drunk, he left his body to all the horse-keepers and mule-letters to be carnally abused. His drunkennesse hauing left him, he was so grieued at his heart for the outrage Attalus had done him, that hee went and complained to the King himselfe. Philip was maruellously offended withall, because of the villanie that was offered him. But because of the loue he bare to Attalus, and also for that he stood in need of his seruice, and for that he was vnkle to Cleopatra, the last and well beloued wife of Philip, and appointed his Lieutenant for the warre of ASIA, he made as though he knew it not. But to appease Pausanias, he gaue him great presents, and placed him amongst the number of them of the guard about his person. Pausanias hauing made his complaint to Olympias, vnto Alexander, and to some other, had sundry answers, but no iustice at that time. Wherfore keeping this despite in his heart, hee resolued not onely to be reuenged of him which had done him this iniurie, but also of Philip that would do him no iustice. But to further him in this diuelliſh purpose, amongst others a Rhetoritian called Hermocrates did set him on, whom Pausanias frequented to learne of him. Discoursing one day together, he asked him how a man might in a short time make himselfe famous, to be spoken of of euery body? Hermocrates answered, in killing one that had done many great things: for, said he, it is of necessity, that remembring his facts, the name of him that killed him must also be comprised. Pausanias applying that to the purpose of his anger, hauing no patience to prolong time, his heart being so full of choler and griefe, determined with himselfe to execute his enterprise the same day the playes should be: the which he did, as followeth. Hee layed horses ready at the gate of the Theater, and went about it, hauing a sword vnder his gowne, after the fashion of the GAVLES as they weare it. When the time was come that Philip would himselfe go to the Theater, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen that attended vpon him, went into the Theater before him, who had commanded all the Gentlemen of his guard to come a good way behind him. Then Pausanias seeing Philip going all alone, ranne to him, and gaue him such a blow with his sword ouerthwart his flankes, that he ranne him through and through, so that he fell downe starke dead. The blow being giuen, hee ranne away straight vnto his horse, and some of the guard ranne to Philip, others swiftly followed the murtherer, among which was Leonidas, Perdiccas, and Attalus. Howbeit Pausanias that had gotten the start before, had easily mounted on horsebacke before the others could haue come neare him to ouertake him, had it not bene that in the way as he fled, he stumbled at the roote of a vine, which ouerthrew him. Then Perdiccas and the rest lighted on him as he rose, and thrusting at him, killed him in the place. Behold how Philip that was the greatest King in his time of EVROPE, and for the great-

neſſe of his power, placed himſelfe among the gods: was brought low, euen to ranke with the weakeſt of the world, and died being but ſixe and forty yeares old, hauing reigned 24. yeares. That therfore whereof he gloried moſt, was in his skill of wars, and in the actions which he managed brauely, preferring that farre aboue all exploits of war. For (ſaid he) in victory all that fight in the battell haue their part; but in thoſe things that I haue atchieued vnto, hauing wiſely directed them, none is partaker of the honour but my ſelfe only. He had fiue wiues, the firſt was Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus king of the MOLOSSIANS, of the line of Æacus, of whom were borne Alexander ſirnamed the Great, and Cleopatra. Alexander ſucceeded his father: and for Cleopatra, ſhe was maried to her vnkle Alexander king of EPIRVS, and brother of Olympias. The ſecond wife of Philip was Audate, a Lady of SLAVONIA, of whom he had a daughter called Cyne, maried vnto Amyntas his coſin germaine: who being ſlaine, ſhe was betrothed vnto Lagarus king of the AGRIANIANS, who died before conſummation of mariage. After the death of Alexander the Great, ſhe being of a manly courage, and oppoſing her ſelfe againſt thoſe that would depriue the children of Alexander of the crowne of MACEDON, was ſlaine by Perdiccas commandement. The third was Phila: and the fourth was called Mede, the daughter of the king of THRACIA. Theſe two had neither of them any children. And laſtly being too old to marrie, he maried Cleopatra, the daughter of Hippoſtratus, and Attalus neece: at the mariage of whom he would haue killed his ſonne Alexander, for throwing a cup at Attalus head: after the which followed great trouble and foule ſtirre betwixt Philip, Olympias and Alexander: but Demaratus the CORINTHIAN ſalued all that againe. Of this laſt wife, he firſt had a daughter called Europe, and then a ſonne called Caranus, whom Olympias put to a cruell death. For his concubines, the one called Arſinone, being gotten with child by Philip, ſhe fell into Lagus hands, vnto whom ſhe gaue Ptolomie afterwards king of ÆGYPT. The ſecond was a girle of LARISSENE, called Philinna, of whom he begat Aridæus: who firſt of all was poyſoned, and in the end cruelly murthered by Olympias: being the laſt King of the race of Temenides in MACEDON. For the iſſue of Alexander, they were reiected by Caſſander. The third was Nicaſipolis, a woman of THESSALY, and Iaſons ſiſter, tyrant of PHERES: of whom he had a daughter called Theſſalonica, whom Caſſander maried, and was afterwards ſlaine by Antipater. The end of Alexander, of his mother, and of his children and ſucceſſors, was lamentable in diuers ſorts. And thus we ſee in Philip and in his race, how many waies the high Iudge of the world hath in his power and hand to ouerthrow the greateſt, when they are drunke with their proſperity.

THE LIFE OF Dionysius.

Base Tyranny is wrongs vnhappy mother,
Witnesse this wretch, in shew both graue and wise.
Yet he himselfe beguiling, and each other,
Shew'd that his heart was fierce and full of vice.

IN the second yeare of the second Olympiad, Archias a CORINTHIAN, not daring to returne againe into his city for a foule fact committed by him in the person of an honest youth called Acteon: he tooke the sea and sailed into SICILIA with certain CORINTHIANS & DORIANS, and there built the city of SYRACVSA, the which by processe of time became so great, that it had within it as it were foure townes, of the which the one was called the Ile, the second Acradine, the third Tychè, and the last Neapolis: the one neare vnto the other, with a fort called Hexapyle, which commanded all the other, and it was in the top of a high place which they called Epipoles, as much to say, as ouer all the other townes. It was gouerned at the first, by the command and power of Archias onely: but he being killed by Telephus, whom he had abused in his infancie, the SYRACVSANS gathered together of diuerse parts, brought their estate to Aristocratia, which flourished for a time. But being come to passe that Tyndaris one of the Lords of the towne caried himselfe after such a manner, that he made many ielous that his drift and policy was to make himselfe chiefe Lord: the other Lords made a law called Petalisme, to meete with this practise: howbeit it was that that increased his enterprise. The effect of this law was, that the name of him that aspired to make himselfe absolute Lord of the city, should be written in an oliue leafe, the which being put into the hand of this Lord, without further ceremony it was to tell him that he was banished the city for fiue yeares, much after the fashion that is reported of the Ostracisme of the ATHENIANS. By meanes of this Petalisme, the Lords banished one another, so that in the end, the people became Lord. But hereupon a dangerous sedition happening amongst them, Gelo, Lord of the city of GELE, did so wisely look into the troubles of the SYRACVSANS: that they chose him king in the second yeare of the threescore and twelfth Olympiade. After him succeeded Hieron, who at the beginning caried himselfe very euill: but afterwards falling into acquaintance with the Poets Simoni-

des, Pindarus and Bacchylides, which taught him many good things, he reigned very prudently. So, he hauing reigned about twelue yeares, left his brother Thrasybulus his succeſſor: who for his cruelties and inſolencies was driuen out of SYRACVSA by force, and went to LOCRES, and there ended the reſt of his dayes. Then the SYRACVSANS eſtabliſhed the gouernment of Lords, which continued ſixty yeares: in which time they make warre with the AGRIGENTINES, and compelled them to ſue for peace: they deſtroy the TRINACRIANS & their town: they ſet vpon the LEONTINES, which are aided by the ATHENIANS vnder the conduct of Laches and Carcedas, who behaued themſelues ſo euill, that at their returne home they were baniſhed. Shortly after the new troubles betwixt ý SYRACVSANS & the LEONTINES, the ATHENIANS ſent Phaax into SICILIA to kindle the fire a litle, and to mutine the one againſt the other. Howbeit it had no good ſucceſſe, but rather raiſed a cruell warre betwixt the SYRACVSANS and ATHENIANS, in the which at the laſt Nicias and Demoſthenes were ouercome by ſea and land both, and afterwards put to death, & the ſouldiers of ATHENS that were priſoners moſt cruelly vſed. The SYRACVSANS lift vp with this victory, did put downe their Lordly gouernment, and brought it to a popular ſtate againe. Then thinking to be reuenged of the CARTHAGINIANS that were come to the aide of the SEGESTANS againſt the SELINONTINES, which were their friends: they ſent Diocles with foure thouſand good men againſt Hannibal the ſonne of Giſco, who lay in campe at that time before HIMERA, the which he wan after he had ouercome Diocles, and ſlaine the moſt part of his troupes. The SYRACVSANS caſting their anger for this loſſe vpon Hermocrates one of their chiefe citizens, they baniſhed him with the Petaliſme, and draue him out of the towne. He helping himſelfe with the meanes he had in his hand, made vp and armed fiue gallies, and afterwards with certaine baniſhed men of HIMERA, attempted to put in againe into SYRACVSA. But ſeeing he could not preuaile, he landed and poſſeſſed the ruined towne of SELINONTE, he repaired it, called home againe al the inhabitants diſperſed through SICILIA, fortified himſelfe there, and in few daies got together a troupe of ſix thouſand men. With theſe forces he ſet vpon them of PALERME, and MOTYE, in league with the CARTHAGINIANS, ouercame them in a pitched field, maintained his friends, and followed his victory. The SYRACVSANS hearing good report of Hermocrates valour, begā to repent them that they had ſo diſhonourably vſed him. He on the other ſide being aduertiſed by his friends of the good affection of the citizens vnto him: to win their good fauour againe, he was very carefull to gather together the bones of thoſe that were killed by HIMERA vnder the leading of Diocles, and ſent them to SYRACVSA, in carts very richly ſet out. For all this they ſent not for him home, the SYRACVSANS being affraid of him, for that he was a man of ſuch courage and wiſedome, leſt he ſhould make himſelfe Lord of the towne. He ſeeing himſelf thus refuſed, went backe to SELINONTE, and ſhortly after being ſolicited by his friends, he found meanes by night to come into SYRACVSA, and poſſeſſed the Acradine. The SYRACVSANS tooke armes immediatly, fought with Hermocrates, killed him in the great market place with part of his traine, and baniſhed thoſe that fauoured him. His friends ſaued ſome of them from the violence of the citizens, and amongſt others Dionyſius the ſonne of Hermocrates, a plaine citizen of SYRACVSA, whoſe life we preſently write of.

Hermocrates father of Dionyſius ſlaine.

Dreames foreſhewing Dionyſius his qualities

Now it is reported, that his mother being with child of him, dreamed that ſhe was brought to bed of a Satyre, and that the Soothſayers being asked their opinion, anſwered, ſhe ſhould haue a ſonne that ſhould be famous aboue all the GREEKES. Furthermore, a yong gentlewoman of SYRACVSA called Himera, ſome time before Dionyſius made himſelf Lord of ý city, dreamed that ſhe was taken vp to heauen, by a guide that hauing caried her too & fro, in the end brought her before Iupiter, at whoſe feet ſhe ſaw a yong man with a yelow haire, bound with iron chains: and asking her guide what he was: It is, ſaid the other, the cruell ſcourge of SICILIA & ITALY, the which ſhall ſpoile a great country, aſſoone as his bolts be off his feet. Within few yeares after, Dionyſius hauing already ſeized vpon the eſtate, as he came to make his entrie into SYRACVSA, and that the citizens went out to meet him to do him honor: Himera being there by chance, knew him, and ſtraight cried out: This was the yong man that ſhe ſaw in heauen. This being reported to Dionyſius, he cauſed them to kill the yong damoſell. Another time his horſe falling in the mire that he could not get out, Dionyſius left him faſt there: but the poore beaſt with ſtrugling got himſelfe out, and ranne after his maſter: bringing in his maine a ſwarme of bees. This did hearten him, eſpecially through the counſell of his Soothſayers, to follow his purpoſe to ſubdue due his country: the which he obtained by this meanes. The CARTHAGINIANS desirous to make themselues great in SICILIA, sent thither their Captaine Himilco with a great army: against whom the SYRACVSANS made head, wan a battell, and killed sixe thousand of his men. Notwithstanding this, he went and besieged AGRIGENTE, and hauing vpon surprise ouerthrowne the army of the SYRACVSANS by sea, he enforced them that were besieged to saue themselues as they could, entred into this great rich city abandoned, and tooke the spoile of it. The AGRIGENTINES that escaped gaue y allarme, through al SICILIA, & retiring thēselues to SYRACVSA their friend town, began in full assembly of the city to accuse the Captaines of SYRACVSA, saying, that by their treason the country was sold vnto their enemies. Dionysius, the son of Hermocrates, a yong man of a stout hart, and that did embrace great matters in his mind, being in this assembly, tooke hold of the occasion offered; and seeing the people out of countenance, he stepped forth, charged the Captains very much, and gaue counsell that they should do iustice: whereupon the magistrates did set a fine on their heads. And hauing found Philistus inclined that way, and gotten money of him (who was very rich) to pay this fine, with promise to furnish others if they were condemned: he followed his purpose in other assemblies, hauing speech at will, & a comely maner withal, so that almost for litle or nothing, he wan the harts of the people, who moued by his oration, did casseere the old Captaines, and chose new, & among others Dionysius, who was a good souldier, & had made proofe of his valiantnesse in diuers encounters against the CARTHAGINIANS. But after they had chosen him captaine, he neuer came to counsell with his other companions, nor would not be acquainted with them: but vnder hand, made a foule report run abroad that they practised with the enemies. This made men of good iudgement to presume that he himselfe went about to make some alteration: and they could not forbeare to blame him for it. Neuertheless the people not looking so inwardly into it, they esteemed him very much. Hereupon many assemblies were made to think of their affaires in wars, in one of the which Dionysius perceiuing the SYRACVSANS astonied, gaue aduice that they should call home their banished men, saying: that it was a great mockery to run into GREECE & ITALY for aid since they had heard at their doores such as had bene citizens, who had rather die like vagabonds, then serue the enemy. And that the fauour they should shew them, would spurre them forward to do their country good seruice. The wisest men durst not gainsay this aduice, perceiuing that the people did incline vnto it: that if they hindred that, it was to get as many enemies as there were banished: and that they being called home, should thanke none but Dionysius, at whose commandement they would euer be afterwards. No man speaking a word, the decree of repeale was authorized by the people, and the banished men returned to SYRACVSA. In the middest of all this businesse, letters were brought from GELE, which demanded aide. Dionysius offered himselfe straight, & was sent thither with 2000. footmen, & 400. horse. Being arriued at GELE, & finding the city in trouble, he tooke the peoples part, accused the principals, made thē be put to death, & their goods forfeited. With which forfeiture he payed the ordinary garrison of GELE, & promised double pay to them that followed him from SYRACVSA: vnto the which he returned immediatly, hauing the fauour of his souldiers. So all the people ran about him in multitudes, asking him where the enemies were, and what they did? You do not consider, said he, that your enemies indeed are in your towne. They that gouerne in your estate are more to be feared, then the CARTHAGINIANS: for whilest you are busie about your playes and feasts, they deuide the common treasure among themselues, and pay not the souldiers. In the meane space Himilco prepareth himself to come & besiege you, whereof your gouernors make no reckning, neither do they giue any order for it. I knew this well enough before, but now I am most assured of it: for Himilco sent a trumpet vnto me, vnder colour of certaine prisoners, and secretly bad him tell me, that he wold giue me more thē any other of my companions, so that I would not search him too narrowly: & if so be that I would not helpe him, at the least yet that I would not hinder him. And therfore thinke with your selues to find another captaine in my place: for it is no reason whilest others sell the town to the enemies, that I should go hazard my selfe with my fellow citizens, & in danger in the end that they should thinke of me I should be partaker with the wicked practises of others. Those that heard what he spake, being maruellously offēded, caried these words immediatly all about the towne. But for the present time euery one went home to their house, sad, and troubled in their minds. The morrow after, as those that should speake before the people did draw by lot of letters, that they might know in order how they should speake, and that the letter F. came to his lot: ſome ſtander by told him, this F. ſignifieth * Foole, Dionyſius, becauſe thou wilt tell vs great follies. No, replied he quickly: that I ſhall be a Monarke. Preſently the people being aſſembled, and his turne being come to ſpeake, he accuſed his other companions with great vehemency, was heard very attentiuely, and with great praiſe of all the people, whom the day before he had angred very much: ſo that in the end there was ſome of the aſſembly cryed out, that neceſſity required that Dionyſius ſhould be choſen alone Captaine generall, with all authority & ſoueraigne power, and that it was no tarying till the enemies be vnder our wals, and that he was a fit man to take care of this buſineſſe: and as for the traytors, that they ſhould thinke of them at better leiſure. Hereupon the people choſe Dionyſius their Captaine generall, giuing him full authority, and power of the affaires of the common-wealth, and praying him to conſider of all that ſhould be expedient to reſiſt the enemies.

* A leſſer or ſhrewd Foole.

Dionyſius choſen Captaine generall.

Hee ſeeing his enterpriſe ſo well grounded, propoundeth a decree to the people, that the ſouldiers pay ſhould be doubled ouer that it was before: for that would make them more courragious and willing to do good ſeruice. And as for money, that the SYRACVSANS ſhould take no thought for that, for he knew a way how to come by it well enough. This ſo ſudden aduancement, and his bold promiſes ioyned with the diſpoſition of this yong man, made many ſuſpect him that had any vnderſtanding and iudgement: inſomuch that ſome began to goe and come to houſes to conferre together to find meanes betimes to withſtand the tyranny, which had now (as they ſay) put the irons in the fire. But Dionyſius hauing an eye abroad, and a number of ſpies that ſlily fell into companies, being afraid they would do him ſome hurt, determined to prouide for it by a farre fetch to ſight, but very fit to ſerue his turne: which was, to obtain licence to chuſe a guard for his perſon, vnto ỹ which he came, as followeth. He proclaimed in the towne that thoſe that were able to beare armes ſhould follow him, and to make their rende-vous with their armes at a day ſet down at the towne of the LEONTINES, and bring victuals with them for one moneth. There was then in that towne a garriſon of the SYRACVSANS: the baniſhed, and all ſorts of men withdrew themſelues, whom Dionyſius hoped would haue taken his part, for that they were men which deſired nothing more then change and alteration, and perſwaded himſelfe that few of the SYRACVSANS would follow him. Hereupon he went himſelfe into the field, and being encamped nere the towne, one cauſed his friends to giue the alarme, and to cry helpe, as if the enemies had enuironed him to kill him in his tent: and making as though he had bene maruellouſly afraid, he fled, and ſaued himſelfe by ſwiftneſſe within the caſtell of the towne, where he paſſed all the reſt of the night, made fires all about, and ſent for his ſouldiers in whom he put moſt truſt, as a man that is afraid, ſeeing his enemies lie in waite for him. The next morning ſome of the people of SYRACVSA being gathered together in the towne of the LEONTINES, in open aſſembly he made a long diſcourſe of that that had paſſed, to make them beleeue that his euill willers would haue ſurpriſed him, and could ſpeake ſo well, that the people appointed him ſixe hundred ſouldiers to guard his perſon, ſuch as he himſelfe would chuſe out. Immediatly he choſe young men to the number of a thouſand, which had nothing to loſe, hardy and deſperate to put any thing in execution that they were commanded. Theſe he furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, and made them great promiſes: ſo that he wan their hearts, and got vnto him the ſouldiers ſtrangers that were in the SYRACVSANS pay. Howbeit he changed the Captaines from their companies, and put in their places ſome other made to his hand. And afterwards he ſent Dexippus, a wiſe and valiant Captaine LACEDÆMONIAN, backe againe into his country, of whom he ſtood in feare, and perceiued he would be a barre in his way to hinder that he went about. Ouer and aboue that he ſent for the ſouldiers of the garriſon of GELE, and gathered together all them that were baniſhed, all theeues and rogues that would come and ſerue him, iudging them to be fit men to ſerue the turne he purpoſed. When he had gotten a great troupe of ſuch rakehels, he ſtraight returned to SYRACVSA, and lodged his forces in the Arſenall, and then ſhewed himſelfe openly Lord, and tyrant, without any longer diſſimulation. This amazed and grieued the SYRACVSANS moſt extreamely: neuertheleſſe they were enforced to beare this yoake which they could not helpe, becauſe the towne was full of ſouldiers ſtrangers, and for that alſo they were afraid of the CARTHAGINIANS that were neare vnto them with a mighty armie. All this happened, Dionyſius being but fiue and twenty yeares old, in the third yeare of the ninetie three Olympiade, and in the three hundreth ſeuen and fortieth yeare yeare of the foundation of ROME. Thus you see how this yong man, of a base condition, meanely borne, made himselfe Lord of one of the greatest common-wealths in the world at that time, and continued this vsurpation all the daies of his life, which was the space of 38. yeares.

This being done, he made them all rich and wealthy that aided him in this enterprise, draue out all those he could find that withstood these his attempts, put to death before all the people Daphneus and Demarchus, two of the chiefest men, and of greatest power that were at that time in SYRACVSA, and that had most crossed him of all others in the deuice of his purpose. Afterward, because he would yet strengthen himselfe the better, he maried Hermocrates daughter, a SYRACVSAN Captaine, that ouercame Nicias and the ATHENIANS, and maried his sister vnto Polyxenus, brother in law vnto Hermocrates. Whilest things passed thus, the CARTHAGINIANS, being masters of AGRIGENTE, after they had spoiled, burnt and razed it, they marched away with their Generall Himilco, and went and besieged the city of GELE, friend to the SYRACVSANS, in maner of a like distance from SYRACVSA and AGRIGENTE, very farre in land, where the other two were ports of the sea. The besieged did wonderfull valiantly defend themselues, their Towne being weake and kept by the citizens onely, accompanied with their wiues and children that would not forsake them. Dionysius hearing of their necessity, brought a strong aide vnto them of thirty thousand footmen, and a thousand horse, besides a great number of gallies, that lay off and on vpon the Ile, to cut off victuals from Himilco, and to land also. But when they came to ioyne, Dionysius hauing diuided his bands into three troupes to trouble his enemy the more, he could not do so well but the CARTHAGINIANS had the better, and slue many of his men. He very hardly escaping with his troupe entred into the towne, and there called his friends together to counsell what they were best to do. They seeing the place dangerous, and of great disaduantage to hazard battell in, gaue him counsell to retire againe. He sent a Trumpet ouer night to Himilco, to pray him to surcease armes till the morning, that he might gather the dead bodies together to bury them. In the meane space, in the first watch of the night, he made all the people come out of the towne, and dislodged himselfe about midnight, leauing there two thousand men lightly armed, commanding them to make great fires and noise, that the enemies might thinke that he and his men were still in the towne: and that they at the breake of day should come to their troupes. Dionysius hauing escaped thus, came vnto CAMARINE, a towne halfe-way betwixt GELE and SYRACVSA, and commanded all the inhabitants to dislodge and come to SYRACVSA, that they might auoide the cruelties of the CARTHAGINIANS who sacked GELE. So, all the inhabitants of these two townes compelled to leaue their houses and country, all the fields and high-waies were full of women, children, and of poore people of the country. This moued the souldiers against Dionysius, who accused him that he had done this of purpose, that he might more easily seise vpon the other cities of SICILIA, which should be destroyed by the barbarous CARTHAGINIANS: and thus they complained one to another of the litle aide he had giuen to the townesmen of GELE: how the souldiers of his gard had dealt cowardly in their seruice, and ran away without the losse of a man of theirs, and no body pursued after them. Vpon this discontentment, the ITALIAN souldiers that came out of ITALIE, tooke their iourney to returne home. And the men of armes of SICILIA at the first began to lye in waite to kill Dionysius on the way: but seeing that the souldiers of his gard were neuer from him, nor he from them, they departed all together, and went with speed towards SYRACVSA, and found them that were left there in garrison, lodged in the place of the Arsenall, who knew nothing what had happened before GELE. By this meanes being entred without resistance, they sacked the pallace of Dionysius, where they met with great riches, and did so villanously abuse his wife, that for griefe she killed her selfe. But about the time that they departed from the campe, Dionysius imagining by the way what would follow after this, chose out certaine footmen and horsemen which he thought he might best trust about his person, and went with all speed possible with them to SYRACVSA, supposing he should not ouercome these men of armes, vnlesse he did as they. And euen as he thought so it came to passe: for they perswading themselues that Dionysius could not well tell what course to take, whether to follow them, or to keepe with his army: thought they had won all, and walked vp and downe the towne telling stories of the cowardlinesse of Dionysius: who hauing marched well neare nineteene leagues at one iourney, came about midnight to the gates of ACRADINE, with about an hundred horse and six hundred footmen: and finding it shut, caused store of fagots, reeds, and sedge of the fennes to be laid againſt the gate, wherewith the SYRACVSANS vſe to burne their lime, which they found there ready at hand. Whileſt this gate was burning, his men that could not follow him ſo faſt, arriued one after another. And ſo the gate being burnt he entred, & found in the market place ſome of theſe men of armes, who in haſt had ſet themſelues in order of battell: but on the ſudden they were engaged, and killed with pikes & darts. Dionyſius on the other ſide, he ran through the towne, putting them all to the ſword he met here and there in the ſtreets, that were running to aide their men. And not ſtaying ſo, he entred into their houſes whom he knew to be his enemies, killed ſome of them, and draue others out of the City. The reſt of the men of armes fled, ſome here, ſome there, and the next morning all his forces arriued at SYRACVSA. But they of GELE, & of CAMARINE being angry with him, went into the city of the LEONTINES.

The Carthaginians by reaſon of the plague demand peace.

In the midſt of all theſe ſtirs and doings, the plague being hot in the campe of the CARTHAGINIANS, enforced Himilco to ſend an herald vnto SYRACVSA to demand peace. Dionyſius accepted it very willingly. So peace was cõcluded, that the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould haue the SICANIANS, beſides al the towns which they had before the war in their power: That they of SELINONTE, of AGRIGENTE, of HIMERE, of GELE, & of CAMARINE, might returne home to their houſes, dwell in their country, and in their townes without wals, paying a certaine yearely tribute vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: That the LEONTINES, thoſe of MESSINA and al other the SICILIANS ſhould be free, & enioy their liberties & priuiledges: That the SYRACVSANS ſhould remaine vnder the gouernment of Dionyſius: That the priſoners and gallies taken in this warre ſhould be reſtored againe on either ſide. By meanes of this peace Dionyſius got the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, eſtabliſhed his principality ſurer then euer, & maried againe two other wiues together: the one a ſtranger of the city of LOCRES, called Doris: the other of SYRACVSA called Ariſtomache, the daughter of Hipparinus the chiefe man of all the citizens. He had asked a wife of them of RHEGE, but they refuſed him, & ſcorned his tyranny: of whom he was cruelly reuenged, as we will tell you hereafter. It is reported that he maried them both in one day, & it was neuer knowne which of them he knew firſt: for the reſt, that euer afterwards he ſhewed thẽ both a like fauour. They did ordinarily eate together with him, and both of them by turnes lay with him. They of SYRACVSA were deſirous that his wife of SYRACVSA ſhould be preferred before the ſtranger. But Doris had this good hap, to bring forth Dionyſius eldeſt ſonne: which ſerued his turne well to defend himſelfe, that ſhe was a forreiner. Ariſtomache to the contrary was maried a long time to Dionyſius & had no children, though he was very deſirous to haue one by her. Inſomuch that he put Doris mother to death, charging her that ſhe had by charmes and ſorceries kept back Ariſtomache from conceiuing. But afterwards ſhe had children, to wit, two ſons, Niſæus, and Hipparinus: and two daughters, Arete, and Sophroſyne. Dionyſius the yonger, maried his ſiſter Sophroſyne: and Arete was maried vnto Thearides, brother to Dionyſius the elder: and her ſecond husband was Dion, the brother of Ariſtomache. Furthermore, conſidering that the SYRACVSANS being deliuered from the war of the CARTHAGINIANS, ſhould haue leiſure to thinke to recouer their liberty againe: and perceiuing that the quarter they called the Ile was ſtronger of ſituation, & eaſier to keepe then any other of the three: he encloſed it in with a ſtrong wall frõ the reſt, and built there many great and high towers, pallaces to keepe his Courts, hals for his Counſell and publike aſſemblies, goodly galleries, and ſpacious gatehouſes to containe a great number of people. And to retire himſelfe vnto vpon any ſudden emotion of the cõmon people, he built a maruellous ſtrong Caſtle, within the compaſſe wherof he encloſed the Arſenal, where might lie in docke threeſcore gallies: and there was a gate alſo to ſhut too, into the which could enter but one galley at a time. Then chuſing out the goodlieſt and beſt place of all the territory of SYRACVSA, he deuided it among his friends, and gaue it vnto them that had charge of men of war vnder him. That which remained, he diſtributed by equall portions vnto other inhabitants of the towne, as well naturall borne citizens, as ſtrangers, come from other parts to dwell at SYRACVSA, concluding vnder the name of citizens the bondmen enfranchiſed, whom he called the new burgeſſes: and diſtributed to the people alſo the houſes of SYRACVSA, thoſe reſerued of the quarter of the Ile, which he gaue vnto his friends and ſouldiers.

Dionyſius maketh warre againſt the free cities of Sicilia.

So, hauing as he thought well aſſured his eſtate, he began to make war vpon the free Cities of SICILIA, vnder colour that they had fauoured the CARTHAGINIANS. HERBESSE, a City in firme land neare vnto the mountaines, in the hart of the country, was the firſt he attempted, and went and beſieged it. But the SYRACVSANS that were a great number in this army, and well appointed, pointed, began to haue ſecret meetings, and to blame themſelues, for that they ioyned not with the men of armes to driue out this tyrant. He whom Dionyſius had giuen them for their Captaine called Doricus, was aware of their conferences, and threatned one that ſpake louder then the others: who replied ſo fiercely againe, that the Captaine came to him in choler to ſtrike him: but his companions took the quarrell, and did ſo conteſt againſt him, that they killed the captaine in the place. Then ſtirring vp their fellow citizens to recouer their liberty, they ſent for the men of armes of the SYRACVSANS, who were retired into the fort of ÆTNE. Dionyſius amazed with this change, preſently raiſed his ſiege, and with all expedition tooke his way towards SYRACVSA, that he might be there firſt. After he was gone, thoſe that had mutined choſe them for their leaders that had killed Captaine Doricus, went and encamped themſelues with the men of armes before SYRACVSA, in a place called Epipoles to make warre with the tyrant, hauing ſtopped all the paſſages that he could not come out into the field. And forthwith they ſent to them of RHEGE and MESSINA, to pray them to ſend them aide: which they obtained, to wit, ninety gallies well appointed. Furthermore, they promiſed by open proclamation, a great ſum of money to him that would kill the tyrant: and to the ſtrangers that were in pay, to make them Burgeſſes as themſelues, if they would take their part againſt him. They prouided engines of battery to beate downe the walles of the Iſle, and euery day gaue new aſſaults vnto them, and made very much of all the ſouldiers ſtrangers that tooke their part. Whereupon Dionyſius ſeeing himſelfe ſhut out of the field, and that his men forſooke him euery houre, aſſembled his friends to conſult with them what was to be done. Some counſelled him to tarie, alledging that tyrannie and abſolute power vſurped by him, was a faire tombe. Polyxemus his brother was of the mind, that he ſhould ſaue himſelf on the ſwifteſt horſe he had in his ſtable, in the lands which the CARTHAGINIANS held in SICILIA. But Philiſtus, who afterwards wrote the ſtorie of his geſts, ſaid then, that Dionyſius ſhould neither flie away, nor yeeld vp his tyrannie, the which he ſhould neuer forgo but by force, and his feet forward. Dionyſius tooke hold of this opinion, and reſolued with himſelfe to abide al extremity, rather then to yeeld vp his place. Being in this caſe he fortuned to come to ſee a butcher ſlaughter an oxe, and hauing obſerued that at one ſtroke he fell downe ſtarke dead: Alas, ſaid he, were it not great ſhame that for feare of death which laſteth ſo litle while, and is ſo ſoone gone, I ſhould leaue ſo goodly and great a Seignioric? But knowing what people he had to deale withall, he ſent ambaſſadors vnto them that kept him in ſo ſtraightly, to beſeech them to permit him with ſafety to come out of the towne with his followers. Euen at that inſtant he ſent men to the ſouldiers CAMPANIANS, to promiſe them al that they wold haue, ſo they would come and beſiege SYRACVSA. The townesmen hauing ſuffered him to go his way with fiue ſhips, ſlept quietly in hope that he would be gone: and caſſiered a part of their ſouldiers, ſuppoſing they ſhould need no longer to beſiege it. So that their ſoldiers diſperſed themſelues here and there in the fields, euen as if the tyrannie had bene put downe. But the CAMPANIANS allured by Dionyſius promiſes, came into the field, and being come to AGYRIDE, they left their cariage, to be ſo much the ſooner before SYRACVSA. They were twelue hundred horſemen, and made ſuch ſpeed, that they ſurpriſed the SYRACVSANS, and in deſpite of them rode through the towne vnto the caſtle of Dionyſius, in whoſe aide alſo at the very ſame time there arriued by ſea, three hundred other ſoldiers: ſo that now he became more couragious then euer he was. The SYRACVSANS on the other ſide began to diſarme themſelues, ſome being of one minde ſome of another: which Dionyſius vnderſtanding, he made a ſallie out vpon them that kept the quarter called NEAPOLIS, or new towne, and put them all to flight: howbeit many were not killed: for Dionyſius riding euery where about, willed his men to kill none that fled. Thus were the SYRACVSANS driuen and diſperſed in the field, where there gathered about the horſem̃ aboue ſeuen thouſand. Now for Dionyſius, he hauing cauſed them to be buried that were ſlaine in this conflict, he ſent ambaſſadours vnto ÆTNE to them that were retired thither, to intreate them to be at peace, and to returne home to their houſes, promiſing them by oath, that he would neuer be reuenged for any thing they had practiſed or done againſt him. Thoſe that had wiues and children at SYRACVSA, were compelled to truſt to his words and promiſes. But when the ambaſſadours alledged to the others, the humanity of their maſter in burying the dead: they anſwered, that the tyrant deſerued to haue as much done to him, and that they prayed ỹ gods they might quickly requite him. For al this they would not ſtirre out of ÆTNE, expecting oportunitie to ſet vpon their enemy: who being eſcaped from ſo great a danger, he courteously vsed them that returned, to entice the others to follow. And for ỹ rest, after he had well payed the CAMPANIANS, he put them out of the city, suspecting their inconstancie and treason. They departing from SYRACVSA, went vnto the city of ATELLE, where they preuailed so much, that they were receiued into the towne to dwell there. But their wickednesse burst out into such extremitie, that one night they set vpon the naturall inhabitants, killed euery man that was able to beare armes, and afterwards by force thrust out their wiues: and by this meanes made themselues masters of the towne, and of all the territorie thereabout. At the same time Aristus, one of the chiefest men of LACEDÆMON was sent vnto SYRACVSA, vpon a rumour giuen out amongst the people, that it was to driue out the tyrant: but the effect shewed that it was but to negotiate with him, and to bind him vnto them, to serue their turnes in their affaires. Aristus then immediatly after his arriuall hauing had secret conference with Dionysius, he began to mutine the SYRACVSANS, promising them al the aide he could, for the recouerie of their libertie. But afterwards he himselfe killed Nicoteles the CORINTHIAN, who had promised the SYRACVSANS to be the head of this enterprise: and accusing them that gaue credit to his words, he made the tyrant more bold and stronger then euer. So did he also begin to shew himselfe more then before: for he found the meanes to send the SYRACVSANS into the fields to get in their corne and harueſt, and in the meane space whilest they were out of the City, he went into the houses himselfe, and fetched out all their armes that had any. Then he enuironed his Castle round about with another second wall, built diuerse ships, and assembled a great number of souldiers strangers, whom he afterwards entertained. Now he thinking himselfe too little a Lord, vndertooke to conquer some frontier townes neare vnto the territory of the SYRACVSANS, and before he would assaile them, he brought his army before ÆTNE, which he wan presently. From thence he came to besiege the city of the LEONTINES, the which hauing resisted him, after he had foraged and preyed the countrey about, he turned vnto the townes of the naturall SICILIANS, making as though he meant to set vpon them, to the end that those of CATANE, and of NAXE, seeing the warre in another place, should care the lesse for themselues. So being neare vnto the towne of ENNE, he put into Limnestus head, a citizen of the same, that he should take vpon him to make himselfe Lord of the towne, promising him to helpe him in it: which the other executed. Howbeit he kept the towne for himselfe, and shut the gates against Dionysius: who being angry with this repulse, counselled the ENNIANS to driue out this new tyrant. The people being set on by him, ran one day in armes into the market place, and cried, Liberty. Dionysius vnderstanding that, followed with some of his faithfull friends, tooke hold of Limnestus, and deliuered him to the ENNIANS, and went out of the towne againe immediatly, to make others to trust him. From thence he went vnto CATANE, and wan the towne through the treason of Arcesilaus Captaine of the same: tooke all the armes from the inhabitants, and left a good garrison there. Procles Captaine of NAXE, shortly after, played euen the like part that Arcesilaus had done, and was well recompenced for it: and all his kinsmen and friends were giuen him: but the other inhabitants were sold by the drum, their Towne destroyed, and their lands giuen vnto the SICILIANS, neighbours to SYRACVSA. For those of CATANE, they were also sold to them that would giue most within SYRACVSA, and their towne giuen to the souldiers CAMPANIANS. This made the LEONTINES hold vp their hands, leaue the towne, and go dwell at SYRACVSA. Now Dionysius fortified SYRACVSA anew, and hauing determined to close in the quarter called Epipoles with wals, he assembled three score thousand labourers distributed by troupes, and seruing skilfull masters, accompanied with Masons that had their day-worke. These men encouraged by his presence, by his promises and gifts, finished the wall in three weekes of a reasonable height and thicknesse, being litle lesse then two leagues about. The banished men of SYRACVSA being fled to RHEGE, did what they could possible to moue the inhabitants to make war against Dionysius. They laboured it so well, that in the end the RHEGIANS went into the field, and induced the Gouernours of MESSINA to keepe them company. But a MESSENIAN called Leomedon, hauing discouraged the troupes, euery one went home againe, and did nothing: and as for Dionysius, he looked no further into them, but the RHEGIANS and MESSENIANS hauing sent vnto him to treate of peace, he iudging that the friendship of these two Cities would be very expedient for him, made peace with them.

Treacherous ingratitude

So hauing assured himselfe on that side, and considering that many GREEKES of SICILIA fled into the townes which were subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, and that there were townes vntouched

vntouched, vnto the which they caried their goods: he thought that ſo long as he was at peace with them, diuers of his ſubiects would be willing to do the like. Howbeit that in making warre with them, thoſe whom the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould ouercome by armes, would come to his ſide. Furthermore, word was brought him that CARTHAGE was wonderfully afflicted with the plague, which did the more ſtrengthen him in his reſolution. But knowing that he had to deale with mighty enemies of all the people of EVROPE, & that this war would not ſo ſoone be ended: he gathered together into SYRACVSA out of all the coaſts of ITALY, of GREECE, and of SICILIA, the beſt workmen and artificers, vnto whom he gaue great wages, and great gifts vnto thoſe that were moſt skilfull and diligent. Who labouring in enuie the one of the other, they built vp in a ſhort time two hundred gallies, repaired an hundred and ten that had ſerued a long time, forged an hundred and forty thouſand bucklers or targets, ſo many ſwords and daggers, as many helmets and ſallets: fourteene thouſand corcelets, curates, and brigandines of all ſorts: engines of battery of all faſhions, and of darts, an incredible and vneſtimable number. Touching the galleyes, to arme them with pilots, mariners, and galley ſlaues, the city of SYRACVSA furniſhed for the one halfe: and Dionyſius for the other halfe payed the ſouldiers ſtrangers. The furniture of theſe ſhippes, armes, and harneſſe being readie, he began to gather his army together, and would not for ſauing of charges put himſelfe in readineſſe before. He gathered together within SYRACVSA all thoſe that were able to beare armes: he drew out of the townes ſubiect vnto him, all that were meet for war: he leauied men out of LACONIA with conſent of the Lords of SPARTA, and got a great number out of all parts becauſe he payed well, and gaue them very gracious entertainment that came to ſerue him. But aboue all the reſt he ſhewed himſelf a maruellous friend to the RHEGIANS, and MESSENIANS, that had a reaſonable ſtrong army in readines to be employed: being afraid that ſo ſoone as they ſhould ſee the CARTHAGINIANS paſſed into SICILIA, they would ioyne with them: for to which ſide ſoeuer theſe two cities would incline, they would helpe to make a great weight in the ballance, and to bring the victory to fall on their ſide. It was at that time that he gaue a great country of extent vnto the MESSENIANS, and prayed the RHEGIANS to giue him a wife of their towne. But they would not heare of that in any wiſe. Wherupon he went to ỹ LOCRIANS, who gaue him her of whom we haue ſpoken before: & for many daies together did nothing elſe but make banquets & feaſts, aſwell to his ſoldiers, as vnto the more part of the citizens of SYRACVSA. For he had now changed his firſt ſoureneſſe and cruelty of a tyrant into gentlenes: he did vſe his ſubiects in a more ciuill ſort, put no more of them to death, nor baniſhed any mo of them, as he did at the firſt beginning. Shortly after this mariage was paſt, he aſſembled the people of SYRACVSA, & did perſwade them to make war with the CARTHAGINIANS, telling them that they were enemies of all the vniuerſall GREEKS, and of thoſe eſpecially that dwelt in SICILIA, whom they practiſed by all meanes they could to make ſubiect vnto them. And that albeit they did not now make any alteration, it was becauſe of the plague that tormented them much: but ſo ſoone as they were free from that, they ſhould ſee the effects of their malice againſt al the inhabitants of SICILIA, which they caſt long before in their minds. And that it were better for him, ſince it muſt needs be, ſoon or late, to begin to make war vpon them they being now weake, then to tarrie till they were recouered againe: and that it was a great ſhame to them to ſuffer the towns of GREECE ſo neare vnto them, to be made ſubiect to barbarous people: that being deſirous to recouer their liberty, ſo much more willing they would be to yeeld themſelues vnto the SYRACVSANS, ſo ſoone as they ſhould ſee that it were open war. Theſe and other reaſons were receiued and allowed by the SYRACVSANS, who were no leſſe deſirous then himſelfe to make war with them. For they hated the CARTHAGINIANS, becauſe that for feare of them they were conſtrained to put themſelues vnder the yoke. And next, for that they hoped Dionyſius would vſe them more gently, ſo long as on the one ſide he ſhould be afraid of the force of the enemies, and on the other, of the rebellion of thoſe whom by force he kept vnder. And eſpecially aboue the reſt, for that they hoped being armed, if occaſion were offred, they might one day ſtand for the recouery of their libertie.

Dionyſius by perſwaſions preuaile to make war with the Carthaginians.

Warre being concluded vpon in this aſſembly, Dionyſius ſuffered the SYRACVSANS to ſpoile the PHENICIANS that trafficked in their hauen: which they executed out of hand. The other SICILIANS did aſmuch: ſo that the CARTHAGINIANS were driuen to run away, & thoſe that they could catch were cruelly handled in euery place, for the hatred they bare them, becauſe of the proud parts they committed in the wars paſt. Dionyſius hauing all his army in readineſſe, ſent a

Herald vnto CARTHAGE with letters, containing that the SYRACVSANS had decreed in their Councell to make warre vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, vnleſſe they departed from the townes of GRECE, which they held in SICILIA, and did leaue them at liberty. The Senate and people of CARTHAGE amazed at it, knew that they had to fight with Dionyſius, neuertheleſſe they reſolued to take armes, and ſent to leauie men out of all parts. Dionyſius on the other ſide, he tooke the field with an army of foureſcore thouſand fighting men of foote, and three thouſand horſe: and had at the ſea nere two hundred gallies and ſhips of ower, accompanied with fiue hundred great ſhips of burden, full of all ſorts of engines of batterie, and of neceſſarie munitions for ſuch an army. All the townes almoſt of SICILIA yeelded themſelues vnto him, ſauing MOTYE, ANCYRE, SOLES, EGESTE, PALERME, and ENTELLE. Leptines his brother and Admirall, lay before MOTYE, and beſieged it: and himſelf ſpoiled all the country of the SOLENTINES, PALERMITANS, and ANCIREIANS: and beſieged EGESTE, and ENTELLE, and gaue them diuers aſſaults. Newes being brought vnto him that Himilco was at hand, he went and encamped before MOTYE, a towne ſituated within a litle Iſle of SICILIA, halfe a league from firme land, ſtately built, and very rich at that time. The which he aſſaulted by ſea and by land, draue Himilco and his forces back, and wan the towne by aſſault: but they ſold their liues and towne very deare, hauing killed a great number of the enemies, before they were forced. The SICILIANS yet angry in their harts for the miſchiefes they had endured through the inſolencie of the CARTHAGINIANS in the former wars: were ſo brued in bloud, that al thoſe of MOTYE were put to the ſword. They that ſaued themſelues in the temples, had their liues granted them: but Dionyſius made them al be ſold by the drum. Whileſt he was occupied there, the EGESTANS made a ſallie vpon the campe which he had left before the towne, and ſet it on fire, which burnt the moſt part of his ſoldiers, and the reſt wel warmed, ſaued themſelues as they could. But Dionyſius not much regarding this loſſe, ſet vpon all the townes of the CARTHAGINIANS with his army. They for their part, gaue all the authority and power to Himilco, to prepare for this warre of SICILIA. He made an army of three hundred thouſand footmen, and of a great number of horſemen, and gaue the rende-vous to the ſhippes of burthen at PALERME: where he arriued with his fleet of gallies that followed him. The Admirall Leptines hauing deſcried his comming, ſet forward with his ſhips, and fought with them in the maine ſea: he killed fiue thouſand of his men, ſunke fiftie ſhips, and two hundred carts of war: and the reſt of them ſaued themſelues by flying. But Himilco hauing landed his armie, went and aſſailed MOTYE, and wanne it againe of the SYRACVSANS.

At that time Dionyſius was before EGESTE, where word being brought him of the arriuall of the CARTHAGINIANS, and of the taking againe of MOTYE, he began to be affraid, and to take aduice to returne to SYRACVSA: he commanded the SICILIANS to retire, and made their lands waſt, to diſaduantage their enemies by ſo much the more. This ſudden change of Dionyſius, was cauſe that many of his friends tooke part with Himilco, who ſeeing his affaires proſper ſo well, made his armie march to MESSINE: tooke in (paſſing by) the Ile and towne of LYPARE: and then beſieged the MESSINEANS ſo ſtraightly, that in the end he wan the towne by aſſault. And there hauing refreſhed his troupes, he razed the towne to the very ground, the which did ſo much amaze the SICILIANS, that all, except the ASSARINS, turned vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionyſius being at his wits end for ſo many loſſes, did fortifie the ſtrong holds that were in the territorie of the LEONTINES, ſent the CAMPANIANS to ÆTNE, that dwelt in the towne of CATANE: and taking order for his affaires the beſt he could poſſible, he went into the field with foure and thirty thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſe, and lodged vnder the mount Taur, where the baniſhed men of SYRACVSA were placed, fauoured by the CARTHAGINIANS, and had fortified it, and made it in forme of a towne: whilſt he made his abode there, newes came vnto him that the army of the CARTHAGINIANS was deuided into two, and that the one part of them went by land to CATANE with Himilco: and the other came towards him by ſea, led by Mago. He hoping to make this fleet as nothing, commanded his brother Leptines to make out with his ſhipping againſt Mago. But Leptines was put to flight, with the loſſe of twenty thouſand men, and well neare an hundred of his ſhips. This loſſe draue Dionyſius into ſuch a feare, doubting beſides leſt Mago following his victory ſhould draw towards SYRACVSA, which was eaſie to be wonne hauing no garriſon in it: he retired into his city, and from thence ſent men into ITALY and into GRECE, to pray aid againſt the CARTHAGINIANS.

Himilco

Himilco knowing his retraite, brought all his forces immediatly vnto SYRACVSA, beſieged it by land and by ſea, wan the ſuburbes of ACRADINE, and ſet vp his pauilion in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, all the other temples of the ſuburbes hauing bene rifled by the ſouldiers. In the meane time Polyxemus brought to the aide of the towne, thirty ſhips of their friends vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS. With this aide, and all the ſhips of burthen, Dionyſius put to the ſea to go get victuals. But now whilſt he was at the ſea in his voyage, the SYRACVSANS being carefull to looke to their citie, and ſpying out all occaſions to miſchiefe the beſiegers: they deſcryed a boate that brought corne to the campe of Himilco. Whereupon on the ſodaine they armed all their galleys, and fought ſo valiantly with the CARTHAGINIANS, that they tooke their Admirall with twenty others, and ſunke foure of them, and followed the reſt that fled, vnto the very place where their ſhips lay at anker within the great hauen, prouoking thē to battel. But ỹ CARTHAGINIANS aſtonied with this ouerthrow, ſtirred not.

Then the SYRACVSANS faſtened the galleys priſoners vnto the poopes of theirs, and brought them into the city. Whereupon they being couragious againe for this little aduantage they had of their enemies: they began to talke among themſelues, how the tyrant had bene many times ouercome, and that they to the contrary without him had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS. And thereupon gathering together by troupes, they went ſpeaking one to another, that they were weary with ſeruing a tyrant, and now ſpecially hauing meanes to put him downe for euer: for before they were diſarmed, but now by reaſon of the wars they had their armes in their hands. Notwithſtanding they daily held this talke, Dionyſius made the people to aſſemble, and praiſed them highly for the good ſeruice they had done, perſwading them furthermore to be of good courage, for within few daies he would make an end of this war. But as the aſſembly of the people was ready to go their way, Theodorus a SYRACVSAN, iudged to be one of the beſt men of armes within the towne, ſtepped vp, & made a long oration, in the which after he had by peece-meale laid open all the tyrannies, cowardlineſſe, and wicked deeds of Dionyſius, whom he called grammarian, clerke, a careleſſe man, ignorant of the affaires of war, oppreſſor of al SICILIA, & fauorer of all theeues and ill men of the world: he perſwaded them by diuers reaſons to indeuor themſelues to recouer their liberty. And ſince that their allies of ITALY & GREECE were within the city, that they ſhould bring backe againe the power and authority to create ſuch captaines as they ſhould thinke good, into the hands of the citizens, according to the tenure of their ancient lawes, or elſe into the hands of their anceſtors & firſt founders, which were the CORINTHIANS: or at the leaſt into the LACEDÆMONIANS hands, who had then ỹ ſeigniority of al GREECE. The SYRACVSANS being maruellouſly moued with ſuch a ſpeech, beheld the countenance of their confederates aſſiſtants in this aſſembly: vntill ſuch time as Pharacidas being gotten vp into the pulpit for orations, made euery man hearken, ſuppoſing it ſhould be he that ſhould begin firſt to ſtir vp and encourage others to the recouery of their liberty. But to the contrary, he being particularly friend to Dionyſius, began to tell them, that his Lords had ſent him to aide the SYRACVSANS & Dionyſius againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, not to deſtroy them, nor to aboliſh his eſtate. This ſpeech being cleane contrary to that the common people expected, the ſouldiers ſtrangers ran ſtraight about him. Wherupon the SYRACVSANS ſtirred not, ſauing that to themſelues they curſed the LACEDÆMONIANS, becauſe that hertofore they had ſent them Ariſtus, who pretending he came to aide them for to recouer their liberty, was a traitor and ſold them: and now that this Pharacidas had broken the harts of their courages, being well diſpoſed to root out this tyrānie. For Dionyſius, he ſpake ſmoothly for the time, being throughly afraid they would haue ſet vpon him, and ſo diſmiſſed the aſſembly, vſing the moſt gracious words vnto them he could poſſibly. To others he gaue preſents, he ſent for others to come & eate with him at his table. In the meane time the plague ſtrangely poſſeſt the campe of the CARTHAGINIANS, and in a ſhort time killed wel neare 150000 of them: whereupon the moſt part of them were forſaken aliue & dead, the contagion was ſo horrible. Some imputed it partly to the diſcommoditie of the place, and exceſſiue number of men liuing as it were on heapes together: partly vnto the vengeance of God puniſhing their pride, the inſolencies, cruelties, and ſacriledges of the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionyſius vnderſtanding of this miſerie, would not vainely let ſlippe ſuch a fit occaſion, but armed foureſcore galleys, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas and Leptines, and his troupes, with whom he aſſailed Himilco by ſea and by land, tooke his fortes, burnt and drowned the moſt part of his ſhippes, brake the reſt, and gaue his people of SYRACVSA meanes to ſet

vpon the litle barks, & to ſhut them within the city. To be ſhort, he brought them to ſuch extremity, that they ſent ſecretly vnto him to pray him to ſuffer that which was ſaued from the ouerthrow the day before, to paſſe the ſea, and to retire home to AFRICKE with ſafetie: promiſing to make him a preſent of an hundred and foureſcore thouſand crownes. His anſwer was, that it was not poſſible al ſhould be ſaued, yet he was contented the natural CARTHAGINIANS ſhould paſſe. For he doubted much that the SYRACVSANS and their friends would neuer ſuffer him to reſpite thoſe other, if they once vnderſtood it. But he did it of purpoſe, being vnwilling that the army of CARTHAGE ſhould be vtterly deſtroyed, for feare that when the SYRACVSANS ſhould ſee themſelues free from this feare, they would remember the Oration of Theodorus, and put too all their force to recouer their liberty againe. The mony promiſed him being deliuered, Himilco imbarked by night all the naturall CARTHAGINIANS that were left into forty gallies, and made ſaile immediatly towards AFRICKE. Howbeit he was ſcant out of the hauen, but certaine CORINTHIANS perceiued his ſtealing away, and ſuddenly came to tell it to Dionyſius, who ſeeming to be very greatly buſied, commanded to ſound the alarme, and that the Captaines ſhould prepare themſelues to follow him. The CORINTHIANS ſeeing he went but faintly to worke, would tarie no longer, but euen at the preſent houre imbarked themſelues, drew vp their ankers, and rowed hard after their enemies: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace they ouertooke the rere of their veſſells, and ſo rudely hurt them, that they ſunke ſome of them. Immediatly after, Dionyſius drew his army into the field: but the SICILIANS, friends vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, had gotten the ſtart before croſſing the country, inſomuch that the more part of them got home to their houſes. For this cauſe Dionyſius hauing left a guard to keepe the paſſages by the high waies, he brought his army backe againe to the enemies campe. The barbarous people ſeeing themſelues betrayed by the Generall, forſaken of the naturall CARTHAGINIANS and SICILIANS, their hearts were killed, and began to flie, ſtealing away, ſome this way, ſome that way: but all of them in manner fell into the hands of the ſouldiers that guarded the high wayes. Thoſe that were left came before Dionyſius, and caſting downe their armes, beſought him to take pittie of them, and to ſaue their liues: the SPANIARDS onely excepted, who gathered themſelues together with their armes, and ſent vnto him to offer their ſeruice, if it would pleaſe him to accept them: the which he did, and receiued them into pay among the ſouldiers ſtrangers. For the reſt, he tooke the other priſoners, and gaue their baggage in prey to his ſouldiers. For Himilco, after he had liued ignominiouſly and poorely at CARTHAGE, hee died diſtract of his wits. Some hold opinion that immediatly after he was arriued, not able to endure the ſhame he got in this war, he killed himſelfe.

Dionyſius his feare.

Dionyſius hauing driuen the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, he built vp MESSINA again which they had ruined. Then he went to beſiege TAVROMENION, fortified by the SICILIANS who luſtily gaue him the repulſe, and made a ſally vpon him, & killed the moſt part of his men, hauing much ado to eſcape himſelf. On the other ſide, Mago chiefe of the AFRICANS in SICILIA, did courteouſly intreate his allies, and receiued into his protection all thoſe whom Dionyſius oppreſſed. By which occaſion hauing won the hearts of the moſt part of them, he became ſo ſtrong in a ſhort time, that he got a great army againe on foot, marched with thē to MESSINA, and oueranne all the plaine country; where hauing gotten a great booty, he tooke vpon him to beſiege the ADACENIANS confederates of Dionyſius: who being bound to aide them, he went againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, beate Mago in a conflict, and killed eight hundred of his men. So hauing brought his troupes to SYRACVSA and refreſhed them, he armed a fleet of an hundred veſſels, to go and make war with thoſe of RHEGE, and comming to their hauen by night, at that inſtant time he did fiercely aſſaile them, ſet fire on their gates, and ſet vp ſcaling ladders in diuerſe parts: neuertheleſſe the RHEGIANS defended themſelues ſo couragiouſly, that he was forced to retire. And therupon receiuing certain intelligence what great preparations they made at CARTHAGE to begin the warre againe: he left RHEGE, and returned againe to SYRACVSA. So the CARTHAGINIANS had gotten together againe foureſcore thouſand men, whom they ſent into CICILIA vnder the conduct of Mago. But before they came to ioyne with the enemies, they concluded peace with theſe conditions, that euery one ſhould enioy that they had gotten: That one of them ſhould not quarrell with the other for any thing: That Dionyſius might without breach of peace make war with the TAVROMENITANS. Theſe being thus agreed vpon betweene them, Dionyſius went and beſieged TAVROMENION the ſecond time, and did more furiouſly furiouſly aſſault it then before: ſo that in the end, after long reſiſtance of them that were beſieged, he wanne the towne, draue out the SICILIANS that dwelt there, and did repleniſh it with ſtrangers whom he kept in pay. Afterwards becauſe his army ſhould not be idle and mutinous, hee choſe twenty thouſand footmen, and three thouſand horſe, and went into ITALIE with them, next adioyning vnto SICILIA, to ſubdue thoſe GREEKS which had dwelt there of long time. Newes being brought vnto them of Dionyſius intention, they aſſembled al the eſtates of the country of CROTONE, where they al reſolued to ioyne together to repulſe this common enemy: and making all the forces they could, eſtabliſhing Eloris a baniſhed man of SYRACVSA their Chieftaine, they made their army march againſt Dionyſius, who camped before the citie of CAVLONE. He vnderſtanding of their comming, raiſed his ſiege ſuddenly to go and meeete with them: and the next morning after his departure, by breake of the day, he gaue charge vpon the GREEKES with his troupe well appointed, who marching diſorderly, he killed their Chieftaine, and the valianteſt men of their army: and afterwards beſieged the others that had ſaued themſelues in a towne, and compelled them to yeeld for that they had no water. Yet contrary to all mens expectation, he vſed them very courteouſly, and ſent them home ſafe without ranſome. After he had won this goodly victory, he led his army into the territorie of the RHEGIANS, whom he hated to the death. They hauing no friends, and too weake of themſelues to reſiſt ſuch a mighty enemy, were conſtrained to make peace with him with very hard conditions. For he made them giue him threeſcore gallies, an hundred and foureſcore thouſand crownes, and for hoſtage and obſeruation of other articles, an hundred of the chiefeſt of the towne. From thence he returned to beſiege CAVLONE, and held them ſo ſtraight, that he wan it by aſſault, deſtroyed it, and gaue the lands vnto them of LOCRES.

Dionyſius vanquiſheth the Greekes that dwelt in Italy.

The Rhegins conſtrained to make peace with hard conditions.

But for as much as he could not forget the vnreconciliable hatred he bare vnto the RHEGIANS, he hauing demanded on a time one of their daughters in mariage, they report, that the anſwer they made in an open aſſembly of the towne vnto his Ambaſſadors, was, that they wold giue him none of them, vnleſſe he would marrie the hangmans daughter of the towne: this made him reſolue that he would ſee the end of it. And where before he had made peace with them, it was not for any good wil he bare them, nor that he deſired their friendſhip, but becauſe he would take their gallies from them, hoping that after he had left them bare at the ſea, he ſhould come cloſer to them, and haue them at his diſcretion. Therefore whileſt he was in ITALIE, he ſought nothing elſe but to take an occaſion to make warre with them, ſo that he might not be charged, that contrary to his faith he had broken the edict of pacification. Hauing therefore led his army vnto the ſtraite, making as though he would paſſe into SICILIA, he ſent vnto the RHEGIANS to demand victuals for his army, promiſing to ſend them ſo much againe vpon his returne to SYRACVSA. Which he did, to the end that if they refuſed, he might excuſe himſelf well if he did ſet vpon them: and if they did giue him any, it ſhould then turne to the hurt of the towne, which if it came to be beſieged, ſhould be conſtrained for famine to hold vp their hands to him. The RHEGIANS that leaſt doubted his malice, furniſhed him with victuals for certaine dayes: but perceiuing he taried there too long, now counterfeiting he was ſicke, then that he vſed other delayes to prolong time, they began to ſee his fetches, and refuſed to victuall him any more. Thereupon he faining to be much offended, ſent them home their hoſtages, and came to beſiege the towne: and coming hard to their wals, made daily & continuall aſſaults, beating vpon the wals with great engines which he had made expreſly of an incredible greatneſſe. They hauing choſen a valiant man for their Captaine, called Phyton, and furniſhed all thoſe that were able to beare armes in the towne, they defended themſelues couragiouſly, and did many waies hurt their enemies: and ſpecially in a ſally they made Dionyſius was ſore hurt with a launce in the flancke, that he was like to haue died; but being recouered and well againe, he purſued his purpoſe more obſtinately then euer: whereby he tooke all hope of aide from them, and hauing continued ſiege there eleuen moneths all together, in the end the RHEGIANS found themſelues in great want of victuals of all ſorts: for a buſhell of wheate was at fiftie crownes. After that all kind of corne failed them, firſt they did eate vp their horſes, and all kind of beaſts of burthen. Then when they had no more to eate, they did ſeeth all their hides and leather they could finde within the towne, and ſo liued awhile. And laſt of all, comming out of the towne, they did eare and deuoure vp ſuch hearbes and rootes as they could finde by their walles, euen as wild beaſts. Dionyſius perceiuing it, in ſtead of pitying of them (nay rather desiring they should eate one another of them) he caused the grasse to be cut downe, and put his beastes in the campe into it, to feede of all that was along the towne walles and ditches, to the end they should haue nothing more to eate. So that in the end the poore RHEGIANS ouercome by necessity, were constrained to yeeld themselues and their towne to the discretion of the tyrant. Who being entred into the towne, found heapes of bodies dead of that plague of famine: and such as were yet aliue, seemed rather ghosts then liuing persons. So he gathered together about six thousand prisoners, whom he sent al to SYRACVSA, suffering notwithstanding all that could ransome themselues, (paying a talent) to be redeemed: and the rest to be sold by the drumme to him that would giue most. Amongst the prisoners there was Phyton and his sonne. Dionysius made his son to be drowned first: and the next morning after, he made the father to be tied to the highest engine of battery he had, and sent to tell him news of the death of his son. He was happier by a day then his father, said Phyton: who was drawne all the towne ouer, and whipped most shamefully: hauing a sergeant at his back that cried out aloud, that Dionysius made him be whipped thus, because he had made the RHEGIANS take armes against him. But Phyton that had shewed himselfe like a valiant captaine and worthy man in this siege, and had liued honorably all his life time, did patiently endure the paine which the tyrant made him suffer. For he remained constant, speaking out aloud that euery body heard him: That he was put to death, because he would not betray his country, and deliuer it into the tyrants hands; howbeit that within few daies the gods would be reuenged of him for this outrage. His constancie was such, that it moued Dionysius souldiers to compassion: who began already to murmure against him. Wherfore fearing lest they should be so bold to take him out of the tormentors hands, he made them leaue whipping of him, and commanded that they should drowne him in the sea with all his kinred, which was done: for the rest, the city of RHEGE was razed to the ground.
